BR. JUDAH BABCOCK.—A friend in the West writes us for information respecting the nature of the charges which, some time ago, one of our Associations in this State, gave notice had been preferred against Br. B. I never knew, or even heard what those charges were, and can not therefore answer the inquiries. Probably, by addressing the Clerk of the Association, the required information could be had. A. "ODD-FELLOWSHIP: Its character and tendency. A public Address, delivered before Oneida Lodge, No. 70, I. O. of O. F., in the Bleeker Street Methodist Episcopal Church, Utica, February 28th, 1843. By Rev. Br. A. B. Grosh. Printed at the Observer Office."—Pp. 22, 12mo.

We notice this pamphlet, (though we neglected to do so earlier,) to say that it is for sale at this Office, the Office where it was printed, at Tiffany's Bookstore, and probably in some others. The proceeds of sales, after paying expences of its publication, will go to the Widows and Orphans Fund. A. B. G.

THE UNIVERSALIST AND LADIES' REPOSITORY.—This excellent monthly, edited by Br. Henry Bacon, and published by Br. A. Tompkins, 38 Cornhill, Boston, begins a new volume in July. It contains more interesting and useful matter to interest a religious minded female, than any work of the kind now issued from the press; and we are certain no Universalist lady will regret the two dollars per annum it will cost her to obtain it. Subscriptions received at this office. A. B. G.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Br. D. K. L. will gratify us much by sending those articles—they are needed, and will do good.

Sister F. M. Baker has our thanks for her unexpected favors. We hope she will surprise us again.

We have several excellent articles from our female correspondents, which we have delayed from week to week preparing for the press. We hope they will not think the delay is caused by any supposed want of merit in the articles themselves. The cause is wholly in ourselves and the printers, moving, etc.

TO OUR READERS.

It is perhaps just to suspected persons, to say that the "Letters of the New England Spy" were not addressed originally to this paper—but were handed us for publication, by a friend to whom they were (and probably will continue to be) addressed by the writer. The author's name does not appear on the MSS., though confided to us by our friend—the title is of our own invention, and given for convenience in making out our index at the close of the volume.

WONDERFUL APPEARANCE IN THE HEAVENS.—The following is going the rounds.

A Mr. Blindman, pilot on a flat boat on the Ohio, recently saw a most wonderful sight in the heavens. He was watching, eagerly, the comet's tail, when all at once, he saw the tail curl up, and form in big letters the word

PAY

He didn't pay much attention to it; but in a few minutes he looked around again, and saw distinctly in the same place, the word

THE

Astonished at this, he ran below to inform the captain, and when he got back, and looked up at the tail, he found that it had changed again, and had formed the word

PRINTER.

Whereupon he and the captain marvelled greatly, and did resolve instantly to heed the admonition, and as soon as they got home to pay the printer. And we take the liberty to add that it would be very gratifying to us, if some of our delinquent subscribers who have neglected us for two or three years, would chance to have some such sight meet their eyes, and cause them to pay us our due. If they do not, may they imagine that they see on every evening sky, the word honesty written for their special gratification. PUBL.

In this city, on the 19th inst., after a long and protracted illness, which she bore with Christian fortitude, Mrs. ELIZABETH JONES, aged 45 years and 6 months.—[Oneida Whig.]

In Carroll, Chautauque county, N. Y., on the 17th ult., after a long and painful sickness, SALLY, daughter of Mr. Charles Russell, in the 19th year of her age. Thus has the cold frost of death withered another intellectual blossom, just as it began to fully expand and develop those latent beauties which were calculated to adorn and bless humanity. She was a youth of buoyant and cheerful temperament, of pleasing and fascinating demeanor, and unblemished character—one who would make friends, and secure their attachment. Through most of her sickness, until a short period before her death, she manifested a strong desire to recover; life had its thousand charms, and afforded many promises to her youthful imagination. Still she had not been thoughtless on the subject of religion; and for something more than a year past, she had been a very diligent reader of the Scriptures, and had made many interesting inquiries in regard to their great doctrines; and shortly before her death, her mind became tranquil, satisfied, resigned and happy.

There were, at the time of her decease, some twenty persons present beside her parents. She saw her end fast approaching—she called her parents, brother and sister, and all present, separately to her, took each by the hand, conversed with them, and bid them farewell. She then expressed her full resignation, her firm belief in the universal goodness of God, and her faith in the final salvation of the whole human family; this, she said, she believed the Scriptures taught, as far as she understood them; and this, her faith, she wished should be made known.

She then requested a young man, an intimate acquaintance, indeed a companion of her youthful diversions, but now a theological student, to pray with her. He complied. She then requested them to sing a hymn, which was done—then, by her request they sung another, and then another, and during the singing of the third, without a struggle or a groan, she sweetly entered upon the enjoyment of her spiritual existence.

Her funeral was attended on the 19th, and a discourse delivered to a numerous concourse of deeply sympathizing friends, by the writer. N. STACY.

Also, in Concord, Erie county, Pa., March 18th, THE-RESA SUSAN, daughter of Mr. Simeon Stewart, in the 17th year of her age.

She was a bright and promising bud, but she is transplanted to blossom in a more congenial soil. And, blessed be God, her parents are not among those who mourn without hope.

Her funeral was attended on the 20th, and a discourse delivered by the writer. N. STACY.

In Darien, of quick consumption, April 1st, Mrs. MARIA A. HARPER, wife of N. P. Harper, aged 25 years.

Mrs. Harper has left a child 10 months old, bereft of the greatest earthly blessing, a mother's care; and an affectionate husband who deeply feels his great and irreparable loss. But he has the true Christian comfort, that though he is deprived for a little while of her company here below, yet she has gained a home—a world of light, where disease can never fade the beauty with which his companion is now favored. In view of such a world, well may the Christian exclaim:

"Farewell, conflicting joys and fears,

Where lights and shades alternate dwell;

A brighter, purer scene appears:

Farewell, inconstant world, farewell." B. B. B.

In West Edmeston, Mr. SALMON FARRAR, Jr., aged 36 years—a man universally respected by all who knew him. C. S. B.

Also, March 24th, Mr. LILLIS WALKER, aged 53 years—one who bore affliction with patience, looking forward to the fulfilment of the promises, when all our heavenly Father's children shall get home. Sermon by C. S. B.

Come up, then, brethren—let us hear from all, without reserve. Assist in our deliberations, that we may ascertain whether we shall stand or fall.

Those from a distance, who will attend the Conference, enquire for J. H. Stevens, J. Phelps, J. Goodno, J. Healy, where they will find feed for their horses, and something (not bread alone) for themselves. I am not acquainted at Springwater, therefore can give no directions. But I will venture to say, enquire for friends, and you will find them here. A. UPSON.

DEATH.

BY B. F. DENTON.

I've seen the babe with childish joy
Unmeaningly caress each toy,
The tender parent's gift!
But visited by some rude blast,
The happy child soon breathed its last—
Its gentle spirit left.

I've seen proud beauty—at whose shrine
All worship—at death's nod resign,
And yield her mortal breath;
Thus are the beautiful laid low
By him who glut on human woe—
The fell destroyer, death!

I've seen the youth in manhood's power,
Yield to the tyrant in an hour,
And sink in his embrace:
All dreams of future fame have fled,
Alone he rests in narrow bed,
Perhaps saved from disgrace.

I've seen the man of vigorous frame
Fall by the hand of death the same;
Even he must yield at last;
Though oft before as firm as rock
He's stood unharmed by rudest shock,
Of each tempestuous blast.

I've seen again, the trembling form
Of age, (which shrank at slightest storm,)
With scattered locks, and gray,
Unmurmuring meet th' expected doom,
Sink silently into the tomb,
Thus, calmly pass away.

Death strikes alike, at old and young,
Extends his ravages among
The beautiful and gay;
His hated presence ever near,
Oft bows the timid heart with fear
And dread of the coming day.

Though shunned by all, yet let us turn Redeeming qualities to learn,
Nor direst foe condemn;
For even death may justify
His deeds against mortality,
And seeming hate of man.

He's but the messenger of fate,
Sent by the Deity, to wait
Upon the parting soul,
The body in his mournful trust,
While time shall crumble it to dust,
And age on age shall roll.

The prospect's gloomy to the sight;
Yet far beyond, like beacon light,
Which makes our pathway plain,
Is the cheering hope to mortals given,
Of future bliss, and joys of heaven,
Released from care and pain.

We live to friends in memory,
And dwell in immortality;
No more is death our foe;
But blessed in Christ's all-saving love,
We soar on angel wings above,
Freed from all human woe.

THE USE OF LEARNING.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

"I'm tired of going to school," said Herbert Allen to William Wheeler, the boy who sat next to him. "I don't see any great use, for my part, in studying geometry, and navigation, and surveying, and mensuration, and the dozen other things I am expected to learn. They'll never do me any good; I am not going to get my living as a surveyor, or measurer, or sea captain."

"How are you going to get your living, Herbert?" his young friend asked, in a quiet tone, as he looked up into his face.

"Why, I'm going to learn a trade; or, at least, father says that I am."

"And so am I," replied William. "And yet my father wishes me to learn every thing that I can; for he assures me that it'll be useful, some time or other in my life."

"I am sure I can't see what use I'm ever going to make, as a saddler, of algebra and surveying."

"Still if we can't see it, Herbert, perhaps our fathers can, for they are older and wiser than we are. And we should endeavor to learn, simply because they wish us to, even if, in every thing we are expected to study, we do not clearly see the use."

"I can't feel so," Herbert replied, tossing his head; "and I don't believe that my father sees any more clearly than I do, the use of all this."

"You are wrong to talk so," his friend said, in a serious tone; "I would not think as you do for the world. Our fathers know what is best for us; and if we do not confide in them we will surely go wrong."

"I am not afraid," responded Herbert, closing the book over which he had been poring reluctantly for half an hour, in the vain effort to fix a lesson on his unwilling memory; and taking some marbles from his pocket, began amusing himself with them, from the teacher's observation.

William said no more, but turned to his lesson with an earnest attention. The difference in the character of the two boys, is too plainly indicated in the brief conversation we have recorded, to need further illustration. To their teacher it was evident, in numerous particulars in their conduct, their habits and manners. William always recited his lessons correctly, while Herbert never learned a task well. One was always punctual at school—the other a loiterer by the way. William's books were well taken care of—Herbert's soiled, torn, disfigured and broken, externally and internally.

Thus they began life. The one obedient, industrious, attentive to the precepts of those who were older and wiser, and willing to be guided by them; the other indolent, and inclined to follow the leadings of his own will, rather than the more experienced teachings of others.

As men at the age of thirty-five, we will again present them to the reader. Mr. Wheeler is an intelligent merchant in an active business—while Mr. Allen is a journeyman mechanic, poor, in embarrassed circumstances, and possessing but a small share of general information.

"How do you do, Mr. Allen?" said the merchant, about this time, as the latter entered the counting room of the former. The contrast in their appearance was very great. The merchant was well, and had a cheerful look, while the other was poorly clad, and seemed sad and dejected.

"I can't say that I do very well, Mr. Wheeler," the mechanic replied, in a tone of despondency. "Work is very dull, and wages low, and with so large a family as I have, it is tough enough getting along under the best circumstances."

"I am really sorry to hear you say so, Mr. Allen," replied the merchant, in a kind tone; "how much can you earn now?"

"If I had steady work, I could make nine or ten dollars a week. But our business is very bad; the substitution of steam-engines on rail-roads for horses on turnpikes, has broken in seriously upon the harness making business. The consequence is, that I do not average six dollars a week the year round."

"Is it possible that railroads have wrought such a change in your business?"

"Yes—the harness-making branch of it—especially in large cities like this, where the heavy wagon trade is almost entirely broken up."

"Did you say that six dollars a week were all that you could average?"

"Yes, sir."

"How large is your family?"

"I have five children, sir?"

"Five children! And only six dollars a week?"

"That is all, sir. But six dollars will not support them, and I am in consequence going behind hand."

"You ought to try to get into some other business."

"But I don't know any other."

The merchant paused for a while and then said, "perhaps I can aid you in getting into something better. I am President of a newly projected railroad, and we are about putting on the line a company of engineers, for the purpose of surveying and engineering; and as you studied these sciences at school at the same time that I did, and I suppose have still a correct knowledge of both, if so, I will use my influence to have you appointed surveyor. The engineer is already chosen, and at my desire will give you all requisite instructions until you revive your early knowledge of these matters. The salary is one hundred dollars a month."

A shadow still darker than that which before rested there, fell upon the face of the mechanic.

"Alas! sir," he said, "I have not the slightest knowledge. It is true, I studied it, or pretended to study it at school—but it made no permanent impression on my mind. I saw no use in it then, and am now as ignorant of surveying as if I had never taken a lesson on the subject."

"I am very sorry, Mr. Allen," the merchant replied, in real concern. "If you were a good accountant, I might, perhaps, get you in a store. What is your capacity in this respect?"

"I ought to have been a good accountant, sir, for I studied mathematics long enough; but I took little interest in figures, and now, although I was for many months at school, pretending to study book-keeping, I am utterly incapable of taking charge of a set of books."

"Such being the case, Mr. Allen, I really do not know what I can do with you. But stay! I am about sending out an assorted cargo to Buenos Ayres, and thence around to Callao, and want a man to go as supercargo, who can speak the Spanish language. I remember that we studied Spanish together. Would you be willing to leave your family and go? The wages will be one hundred dollars a month."

"I have forgotten all my Spanish, sir, I did not see the use of it while at school, and therefore it made no impression on my mind."

The merchant, really concerned for the poor mechanic, again thought of some way to serve him. At length he said, "I can think of but one thing that you can do, Mr. Allen, and that will not be much better than your present employment. It is a service for which ordinary laborers are employed—that of chain carrying to the surveyor on the purposed railroad expedition."

"What are the wages, sir?"

"Thirty-five dollars a month."

"And found?"

"Certainly."

"I will accept it, sir, thankfully," the man said. "It will be better than my present employment."

"Then make yourself ready at once, for the company will start in a week."

"I will be ready, sir," the poor man replied, and then withdrew.

In a week the company of engineers started, and Mr. Allen with them as chain-carrier: when, had he, as a boy, taken the advice of his parents and friends, and stored up in his memory what they wished him to learn, he might have filled the surveyor's office, at more than double the wages paid him as chain-carrier. Indeed, we can not tell how high a position of usefulness he might have held, had he improved all the opportunities afforded him in youth. But he perceived the use of learning too late.

Children and youth can not possibly know so well as their parents, guardians, and teachers, what is best for them. Men who are in active contact with the world, know that the more extensive their knowledge on all subjects, the more useful they can be to others; and the higher and more important use in society they are fitted to perform, the greater is the return to themselves in wealth and honor.

ORIGINAL SERMON.

Unity of spirit, and diversity of opinion.

BY REV. A. B. GROSH.

Delivered on Communion day, in Utica, in October, 1841.

"Endeavoring to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace," Eph. iv. 3.

The church at Ephesus embraced many, who, before their conversion to Christianity, had been sunk in the lowest depths of pollution and idolatry—also, others, who had been rigid in burdening themselves with all the rituals and observances of the law of Moses, until the things these ceremonials prefigured, were forgotten, and the foreshadow became to them the after-following substance. Thus made up of Jews and Gentiles, who came into the church often from the pressing haste of sudden impulse, it is reasonable to suppose, that each brought with him many of his former peculiar opinions and feelings, and clung to them as highly important in a religious point of view, if not essential to the Christian character. At first, when the church was small, and persecution raged with incessant fierceness, these differences of opinion might remain unnoticed, if not unknown; each believer being more intent on upholding and maintaining the great doctrine of the Messiahship of Jesus, and the resurrection of mankind to immortal glory, which was opposed on every hand; than he would be in maintaining doctrines supposed to be connected very remotely with this, or slightly involved in it.

But when the outward pressure which drove them into common fellowship from every side, was removed, and they were allowed time to look around them, the circumcised Jew, who still adhered punctiliously to many of the customs of his nation and the ceremonies of his law, beheld by his side, one whom he had ever been taught to despise and condemn; and beheld, too, with additional horror, that his Gentile brother in Christianity was partaking food, or performing acts, that must make a Jew totally unfit to mingle in society, or appear in the worshipping assembly! The Gentile, on the other hand, as soon as the common enemy of the cross allowed breathing space, beheld the Jew, whom he had ever been taught to consider a semi-barbarous, selfish, intolerant and superstitious bigot—a condemner of all religions save his own—and beheld him avoid him, as if contamination was in the Gentile touch or breath. Is it any wonder that, under such circumstances, ancient and long nurtured prejudices and animosities should arise between them—that the Gentile should recede from the side of the Jew, as readily as did the Jew from that of the Gentile—that old grudges and differences of opinion should be opened up between them, and be discussed with a firm determination on each side, not to learn some truth, if possible, but to maintain each his own opinion at all hazards—and that, consequently, in a short time there was great danger that the church would go to pieces from internal strifes, and its various factions devour each other? When we compare many of the Christian denominations at the present day with some of those primitive churches, we must be astonished at the forbearance which could forget the prejudices and enmities of a whole life-time, when less differences of opinion than then peaceably existed between strangers, now suffice to sunder brethren and sisters of the same family, and to divide them forever.—Yet attention of feeling did frequently occur, even in those primitive assemblies, which required all the eloquence, and argument, and affection of the apostles to subdue or restrain. The context and the text appear to be such an effort—and contain an exhortation, to which all Christians would do well to take heed—especially all members of the same assembly, or congregation, or church.

Differences of opinion will exist among men.—Even matters of fact, are very variously apprehended by different minds: It is probably impossible for any one to state a proposition that shall be a matter of faith or opinion, in terms that will be understood alike by every intelligent or thinking mind. Words are understood in so many various senses—in such a great variety of shades of the same meaning—that the mere words in which a proposition is clothed, are often the fruitful causes of differences of opinion among men. But when we add to all this, the various constitutions and orders of mind, the great differences caused in mind by degrees of cultivation and habits of thought, and circumstances of training, it is surely little matter of wonder that men differ from each other on all subjects that are believed in the world. For it is not in religion, alone, that men differ. There is probably less difference of opinion in matters really pertaining to religion, than in any other matter that has been equally discussed and examined. Take the Constitution of the United States for instance—a very brief instrument compared with the Bible—and behold what a variety of political creeds have been framed out of it, directly and indirectly—positively and by inference—by teaching and construction—until it would puzzle a plain man to tell what was or was not constitutional.

Let those who are disposed to censure the Bible for ambiguity, sit down and frame a statement of twenty points of opinion in which all agree—then let them meet in a few weeks again, to discuss those subjects, or to give their views and reasons for belief of each point, and I venture to say, they will find a hundred shades of difference in their views on nearly every one of those subjects. And if they enter earnestly into the attack and defence of those differences, they will, in a short time, magnify them into great importance in their own eyes, and shame even religious fanatics with their intemperate zeal, fury and intolerance.

We see, then, the tendency of the human mind to seek out a path of opinion suited to its own constitution, habits and feelings. There is no remedy for it, but the long continued influence of reason, and the increasing benevolence, toleration and real utilitarianism of our race! These will bring men closer to each other in time. Nor can it be prevented. God made the mind free, and has here, at least, placed it in a free land. Nor should it be prevented, if it could be done. The enslaved mind can not worship God. He requires the free-will offering, only.

What, then, is to be done? Our text gives us the answer. "Endeavor to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace." Endeavor not to trammel the mind and conscience—endeavor to give reason a fair field at all times—endeavor even to be so tolerant to what you deem error, as to give it a fair hearing; for without such a hearing, you can not easily and fairly answer it and refute it.—But, above all things, cultivate the spirit of love and kindness toward the errorist. Battle the creed as you may, but war not with the man. Even the sinner—the vile and abandoned wretch who deliberately and wilfully sins—is your brother, and you are commanded to love him, and to do him good as you have opportunity. How much more, then, should we be charitable in regard to differences of opinion; for the mind is not governed in its faith or disbelief by volition—we do not generally deliberately resolve what we will, and what we will not believe. Could belief be entirely regulated by the will, your speaker had never been a Universalist; for so far from willing or desiring to believe it, he struggled against it, until he was overpowered by the benevolence of its spirit, the force of its arguments, and the number of its proofs. I have no doubt there are many here present, who could justly say the same thing. How wrong, then, to treat the errorist as a deliberate wrong doer—and especially to consider him an enemy because he believes not as we do! And how unwise, also, to refuse to hear the reason for the hope that is in him, when our doing so, might lead us further toward perfection in divine truth.

But it may be asked, whether we should be indifferent to matters of faith, or differences in opinion?—whether we should hold our own views loosely as a glove, that we may cast off or pull on at pleasure?—or whether we should be nothingarians, and have no opinions at all? By no means. Truth is the most important thing in the world, and should be sought with diligence, and held with tenacity, and advocated with zeal, and practised with fidelity—but all this should be done, remembering that "every difference of opinion is not a difference of principle"—that we are as frail, imperfect and fallible, as others—that, therefore, we may hold errors believing them to be truths. And above all, should we remember, that the most important portion of truth, is its practice—right doing is always more important than right believing. Charity, or the spirit of true Christian love, is declared to be greater than either faith or hope, and will abide when the former is swallowed up in knowledge and the latter in fruition.

I ardently desire that all who name the name of Christ should imbibe his spirit, obey his precepts, and follow his example;—that every sect and party in Christendom should learn what manner of spirit those are of, who forget that the Son of Man came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them—and that he did not allow a work of mercy to be stopped, merely because its doer followed not with him. But especially do I desire that Universalists, who have already so long led the van in religious liberality, may still keep in mind the great principles of religious freedom, toleration and charity they have asked for themselves, and which they have exercised among themselves and extended to others. In the liberal and all-affectionate spirit of the great doctrine of God, the universal Father of our spirits; of Jesus, the universal Saviour of our race; of heaven, the universal home and destiny of moral beings, we have enfolded as brethren and sisters those who hold almost every variety of religious faith and religious practice in Christendom. The Presbyterian, the Episcopalian, the Baptist, Methodist, Lutheran, Quaker, Moravian—all, have, at various times, embraced this great doctrine of the Gospel, and come into the open fellowship of the Universalist denomination. Each class brought with it, undoubtedly, many of the views and feelings previously entertained—and, perhaps, in casting off former errors, some ran into an opposite extreme, and inhibited others. But regarding the great doctrine of God's universal paternity and of man's universal brotherhood, as the most important truth, the belief of which could best sanctify the heart and direct the conduct of man, we have fellowshiped them as Christians and Universalists, even while many of us reject other opinions which they hold—and we claim all as Christians who have the spirit of the Master, and profess his name.

Various attempts have been made by our opposers, to turn us into ridicule, because these various opinions exist among us—and summaries of them have been arrayed in contradiction to each other, to prove us contradictory and inconsistent in our views—but instead of feeling disposed to quail under such an exhibition, I the rather glory in it, and rejoice that we are able, in our numerous and widely spread denomination, to maintain mutual fellowship, and unity of the spirit in the bond of peace, in despite of these numerous minor differences of opinion and ceremonies among us.

Other denominations have had these same diversities of religious views among them, and have split asunder, in quarrels, and revilings, and persecutions that were disgraceful to them as men, and rendered them a reproach to all Christians.

The quarrels of the Friends or Quakers on the subject of the Trinity—those of the New School and Old School Presbyterians on the subject of Calvinism—of the Methodists on Church government and discipline—of the Baptists on the modes of immersion, or what day of the week is the Sabbath—of the Episcopalians on the High and Low of their Church—of the New School Presbyterians on Perfectionism—and a hundred other strifes and divisions that might be named, have certainly done more to disgrace Christianity, than our cultivation of unity of spirit in despite of all these and many other differences of opinion.

Take the two great divisions in Christendom—Partialism and Universalism—and what do you behold? One great division is rent and split into some 300 or 400 sects and parties—generally quarrelling “about words to no profit, to the subversion of their hearers”—constantly forming new sects and parties, because they differ on some minor doctrine or trifling ceremony—and thus waging continual war on each other. And some of the heated partizans choose to revile us—the other division of Christendom—because we have all the differences of opinion existing among us that exist among them, and yet we do not fight, and quarrel, and split up into hundreds of sects and parties about them! Poor fellows! they must be scarce in subjects for mirth, when they thus ridicule us for loving one another, and for “endeavoring to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace!” Long may we continue thus to merit their ridicule and laughter, and may we be able even to increase it by a more zealous and earnest cultivation of the Christian graces among us—by cherishing more sedulously than ever, the Christian virtues, and exhibiting the fruits of the spirit in our lives and conduct. To do this, let us remember that we ask, each one of us, for the privilege—or rather, I (and you, and each) claim as a right, the privilege of reading the Bible for myself—of understanding its teachings for myself, of professing its teachings for myself, and of preaching what I humbly believe are its doctrine and principles. As the equal son of an impartial Father, it is my duty to allow to all others what I claim for myself—and not to damn as I would not be damned by others, for mere differences of opinion. In short, to do to others as I would be done by, is clearly my rule of right and duty. Do you hold a doctrine which I reject? It may be my duty to convince you if I can, that your doctrine is an error—is unreasonable, or unscriptural, or demoralizing in its influences and tendencies; but so long as you profess Christianity and manifest the spirit of Christ, it is not my duty to cast you off because I reject that item in your faith. And should you profess to belong to the great division to which I belong, so long as you maintain the doctrine of the final salvation of mankind from sin and death, and live what you profess, I am bound to accord to you the name of Universalist.

Nor does my duty end here. On the broad principles of Universalism, it is my duty to give you an equal privilege and right to defend your views, as I have to attack them—and leave God to give the victory to the right and the true—thus “endeavoring to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace.” And could this rule be extended throughout Christendom, and the right feelings be extended with it, there would soon be fewer angry quarrels—fewer divisions—and at last few differences of religious opinion and practice, among men.

One word more, and I close. Though a member of this church now about to commune by the administration of bread and wine among its members, I have never felt it my duty to partake with them in that ceremony—deeming the ceremony virtually fulfilled and completed in the event to which it pointed, the second coming of Christ, nearly 1800 years ago; feeling that, as at present observed, to me it would answer no good purpose, and would even prevent, in a measure, the enjoyment of a communion with God and Jesus, which I already possess—and believing it injurious to many who now partake it, and as now administered. For these, and other reasons which I have neither inclination nor time even to name, I have always refused—and probably always shall refuse to partake myself, or to administer the bread and wine to others with that intent.

But while I claim for myself the right to abstain from thus communing with you, I am anxious that all who do deem such communion a duty, should be allowed to partake of it. My conscience in regard to all ceremonies, is for my own guidance.—Others have views and consciences for themselves, and I pray that they may not attempt to subject me to theirs, as I do not and will not attempt to subject them to mine.

And, particularly do I claim this at the hands of Universalists, who do not deem any ceremony essential to salvation, and can therefore allow others to omit or perform them as they please.

In thus allowing to each one his own views, and the practice or disuse of ceremonies, and avoiding censorious judgments, or ascribing wrong motives to each other, we shall best obey the text.

Br. Skinner will now, at the close of the hymn and benediction, proceed to the administration of what is called the Lord's Supper; and I pray God that all who partake, and all who abstain from partaking, may be blessed with a true, holy, and refreshing spiritual communion with God, and Jesus, and the whole church of God, and thus keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace. Amen.

ABUSE OF POWER.

BY REV. A. SCOTT.

“Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name, and we forbade him; because he followeth not with us.”—A disciple of Christ.

There appears to be implanted in the human system, a passion that causes man to seek after power, which, like all other passions, has its perfect and imperfect work. This love of power, when rightly used, is calculated to enhance the happiness of man; but on the contrary, when abused, it causes an immense amount of trouble.

This love of power to lord it over creation, I said, is a passion inherent in the nature of man, which will, unless restrained and kept within due bounds, grow with his growth and strengthen with his strength; and finally lead him to sudden destruction. This principle may be seen at work even in children, and is exercised over whatever comes in their way. Nor is this all, we discover it much stronger in some people than in others; still those whose passions for power is strongest, do not exercise it most, nor are they the most arbitrary; but on the contrary, they who give the loosest rein.—Here is one thing worthy of note, those who are the most given to rule over their fellow men, have the least control over themselves; hence it is we see so many who are unwilling that others should have the same privileges as themselves, which is too often the case.

The body is not the only part over which people desire to hold the reins of government. In many, far too many instances, they endeavor to lord it over the mind, laying down certain principles for others to receive and fellowship; and unless it is done, they hesitate not to denounce them as heretics, unworthy the care, protection and confidence of their fellows, beside being subjects, and fit ones too for the powers of an angry Deity and the fires of an endless hell. A usurpation of power is bad enough, let it be over what part of man it may; but at the present time I shall barely glance at that usurpation which many have endeavored to exercise in regard to religious views.

It is a fact well known to all, that ever since the reformation, and even down as far as the time of Christ, one class have endeavored to rule the other. One has set himself up as being infallible; while all others are out of the way and are deserving of condemnation. This was plainly visible in the case of John Calvin, who exercised his lordship, or rather I might have said, endeavored so to do, over the whole Christian world. In compliance with that usurped power, he may be seen delivering Michael Servetus to be burned at the stake.

Our Pilgrim Fathers also, exercised the same unhallowed power, in hanging Baptists and Quakers for the honest convictions of their hearts. Yea, even now the same spirit is at work, and people continue to denounce all such as do not walk in strict obedience to their will, and believe as they teach. To so great a pitch is this spirit carried at the present day, that many refuse to acknowledge others as Christians, or fellowship them as such unless they believe as do themselves. I have at the present time a circumstance in my mind that will fully illustrate, or rather prove this fact. In a town where I have formerly resided, one of the members of the Baptist Church renounced her faith, and embraced the cheering doctrine of Universalism. The church in agreement with their rules, sent a committee to converse with the dissenting member, and to report at an adjourned meeting. They performed the duties assigned them; reporting that they believed the offending members was a Christian. In reply to this report the Pastor said, “We don't care whether she is a Christian or not, we want to know what she believes.” Times have altered sadly since Christ's day. Then, those who followed after the teachings of the Gospel, were acknowledged as Christians. He who performed works of righteousness was considered as righteous. But oh how changed! Belief is the watchword of the day, in consequence of which the Universalist is branded as a heretic merely because he believes in the final triumph of the Saviour over all sin. Formerly it was another class. It is but a few years since, and the Arminian was considered a devil incarnate on account of the liberality of his sentiments. Let us for a moment examine, and if possible learn, what is heresy and what is not—also what is best calculated to inspire good works.—Christ, it appears from the language of the angel to his mother, was sent into the world to save his people from their sins; from which, we learn that Christ's people are sinners. The same fact was taught by Christ in answer to those who condemned him for associating with publicans and sinners. “The well need not a physician, but they that are sick. I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance,” plainly declaring that those he came to visit were sick. Again he says “the Father loveth the son and hath given all things into his hands,” which agrees perfectly with the words of prophecy, “ask of me and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession.” Here we see all things given into the hands of the Son, and all are sinners; there not being a “just man on earth who liveth and sinneth not.” It is impossible that Christ's people should be any other than sinners; for “all have sinned and come short of the glory of God.” A question then arises, Will Christ save his people? In answer, the angel says “he shall save his people from their sins.” Christ also declares, saying, “All that the father giveth me shall come to me, of all that the father hath given me I will lose nothing, but will raise it up at the last day.” Says an Apostle, “Wherefore God hath exalted him and given him a name which is above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow, of things in heaven and things in earth and things under the earth, and that every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father.”

Nothing can be better calculated to inspire the heart with feelings of love to God and good will to all the creatures of earth, than this; still I would not censure those of a different faith. No, rather would I have compassion upon them, and pity their folly. No doubt they are sincere; which should cause us to exercise in an especial manner, towards them feelings of love and good will. Instead of condemning them, our faith calls upon us to extend the hand of kindness and charity towards them—to bless and curse not. It is impossible for us to curse them only as we borrow curses from themselves, there being no curses in the Universalist vocabulary. Let us then cultivate towards all, the feelings of brotherly kindness; and instead of usurping authority over their minds, endeavor to lead them into the truth by the gentle cords of love, when we shall be enabled to reap in a golden harvest.

STILL THEY COME.

BROTHER GROSH—With high emanations of joy I have recently learned the fact, that the very talented and popular Rev. John Barber, now of Harts-ville, Onondaga, co., N. Y., who for many years was a preacher of the Methodist denomination, and with whom I debated in February last, the subject of the Saviour's second advent; has fully embraced and is successfully preaching the doctrine of God's boundless benevolence, as resulting in the ultimate salvation of all human creation. Br. Barber is a gentleman of great research, possessing strong reasoning and speaking powers—besides, sustaining a spotless moral reputation.

He is determined to devote the remainder of his days, in support of Gospel truth and righteousness; which determination, may God strengthen by the holy influences of His love; and I trust Br. Barber and his worthy family, will deserve the confidence and support of our denomination—that he will be an ornament in Zion, by being prominently useful, in his day and generation.

Br. Barber will preach at Clockville, the third Sunday in June, (inst.) when he will present his reasons for renouncing the doctrine of endless punishment. W. J. Goss.

AN INCIDENT.

"I understand," said I to Rev. Mr. B.—, "that young Mr. John Jones died suddenly last night." "There now," said he, "'twas but the other day I endeavored to reclaim him from his doctrine of Universalism—well, how true it is the Scriptures must be fulfilled: 'the wicked shall not live out half their days.'" At this time a messenger steps in, and says to Mr. B., "you are requested to preach at John Johnson's funeral to-morrow at 11 o'clock." "What do I hear?" said Mr. B., "is Br. Johnson dead? that good young man?" "Yes," replied the man, "he died suddenly last night." "Mr. Jones is not dead then," said I, "but Mr. Johnson." "Yes," said the man; so I mistook the name.—"Well," said Mr. B., "the righteous are taken from the evil to come—so it is with even brother J."

Struck with the two clashing remarks of Mr. B., I went home and took the Bible in hand, and discovered that the word "life," as well as "death," is used in a figurative sense. Jesus says, "you will not come to me that you might have life." This gives me to understand that the wicked are dead in trespasses and in sins, and that the followers of Christ, only, have life, that is, the enjoyment of the religion of Jesus Christ; and hence I concluded, that the wicked did not live out half their days, for the pleasures of sin are of short duration, in comparison to the time and severity the sinner suffers therefor. And, also, I found out, that not only the Jews, who took the advice of Christ, and fled from Jerusalem to the mountains, escaped a calamity to come, but the righteous, at all times, are taken from the evil that generally comes upon the wicked, in this life, to wit; death, the wages of sin, in the shape of unhappiness.—Nazarene.

INQUIRY ANSWERED—SLANDER REFUTED.

BR. GIBSON—I have just seen a late No. of the 'Nazarene'—shown to me, by Br. W. D. Gallagher, of your City,—in which Br. J. L. C. Griffin inquires if it is true, that dram shops are made the depositories of Universalist publications in Louisville, as asserted by Rev. Mr. Crane, of Richmond, Pa., and others.

I answer, It is NOT TRUE; but as false as falsehood itself.

The report, however, is not a new one—not 'got up' by Mr. Crane; but has been going the Orthodox rounds for some time. I saw it, last, in Matthew H. Smith's book of Twattle and slander. It originated thus: Rev. Mr. Peck, Baptist preacher in Illinois—(I think he was the man,) passing through the City, (of Louisville,) saw a Store, having for a sign, 'G. Chapin, Grocer,' and another sign, 'Universalist Books, and Agent for papers.' In relating this, in a sermon,—whence it has spread all over the land,—Mr. Peck, said he saw, in Louisville, on a certain corner, a sign,—'Universalist Books for sale,' and at the same place another—'Grocery:' and 'said he, with a knowing wink, 'you all know what a grocery is'—leaving it to be understood that it was a drinkery—groggery—dram shop; for that is the use of the word in some parts of the West.

Here is the truth: Our respected friend and brother, G. Chapin, keeps a small grocery, for the sale of tea, coffee, sugar, molasses, provisions, with some kinds of dry goods, and also keeps Universalist publications for sale; but this 'grocery,' is not a 'dram shop,' and never was; nor does he keep liquors to sell; for Chapin is a tee-total abstinence man—neither drinking himself, nor selling to others;—still, he keeps a 'GROCERY,' and sells Universalist books.

It may be asked, if there is not another place—a 'dram shop'—in the city, where our publications are kept. I answer, No; none such are known to us or to any Universalist in the City.

I have been thus particular in this explanation, that our friends everywhere may know how to correct this widely spread piece of petty slander, and that our eastern Editors may be able to contradict that particular item in M. H. Smith's collection of like stories. E. M. P.

PREACHERS AND SOCIETIES.

It is known, to our readers that Br. I. D. Williamson, late of New York, has repaired to Charleston, S. C. for the benefit of his health. During his absence he has written a letter to the New York Society, which all Societies ought to see and regard. The following is an extract from it.

1. I pray you neglect not the assembling of yourselves together. The public worship of God is not only a duty that we owe to ourselves and to him, but it is the most important means of advancing the interests of your Society, and the cause of truth at large. No Church or Society can long prosper whose members habitually neglect the house of worship. Every member of a Society should hold it as a sacred duty to be always present in the sanctuary, unless prevented by some extraordinary event. Whoever is in the desk, the people should be in these places, and there is little less apology for them for being absent from their pews, than for the preacher for being absent from the pulpit. If the preacher engages to supply the pulpit, it is not to preach to naked walls and empty pews, but is under an implied obligation on the part of the people to whom he preaches, that they will be there to hear him. If they are not so, his energies are paralyzed, and he labors to no effect. Besides, the people do themselves a wrong.

There are two objects in view in attending church. The first is to worship God, and the second, to obtain religious instruction. Now it is not always that both these objects can be obtained. When you reflect upon the constant demands that are made upon the intellectual powers of a clergyman, and the duties that he has to perform every day, calculated to interrupt his mental labors, you will see at once, that a very profound or eloquent sermon is not always to be expected. No living man can give it. If a member of Congress makes one sound and effective speech in a year, it is as much as is expected. So if a clergyman gives you one powerful and profound sermon in a month, or in three months, it is as much as ought to be expected. It will and must frequently occur that the preacher's sermons (whoever he may be) will be common place and tame, and from them you will derive but a small share of instruction; and thus you will in a manner fail of one object of attending church. But you need not lose the other. You can worship God, and commune with him from off the mercy seat, and thus call down his blessings upon your souls, and aid by your presence and countenance the cause of truth and righteousness. Cleave then, I pray you, to the altars of devotion, and forsake them not.

2. Be judicious in your choice of a pastor. I do not mean that you should seek for an angel, nor for the greatest or most eloquent man. One man may excel in public speaking, another in sermonizing, another in the pastoral relations and duties out of the pulpit, and all these are useful. But it is rarely the case that they all combine in an eminent degree in the same man. Indeed, generally, he who excels in one of these points will be deficient in another, and perhaps a moderate combination of all is best on the whole. Look not, then, for the highest attainments; for these are not always most useful. But look to the more substantial qualities of the man. See that he be a man of known and tried faithfulness, of sterling integrity, of substantial character, and of pure christian feeling: then if he be a fine orator or a beautiful writer, so much the better; but with moderate acquirements in these respects, he will succeed and build up. Let no minor considerations divide your feelings, but with one heart and mind give him your confidence, and esteem him for the work's sake, but still think more of the cool waters of life than of the pitcher from which you drink.—Banner.

GIVE THE DEVIL HIS DUE.

"Give the devil his due," is a trite and just proverb and one which perhaps has been disregarded to man's disadvantage, as much as any other. From a neglect of this injunction has sprung many of the errors and evils of the past. Men have supposed the devil to be their personal and perfect adversary, opposed to every thing good and infinite in evil. Upon this hypothesis, when anything sinful or corrupt was discovered among them, it was immediately charged to the devil, believing that he could not be accused of too much. If the church was annoyed by contentions, and its members disobedient—if the clergy became corrupt and licentious—if its members became backsliders, and it could gain no increase—in short, if any sin incident to human nature was committed, it was all charged to the devil, though in fact it was conceived, generated, and sprung forth from the accusers themselves, and they alone were the authors of the whole mischief.

This is not "giving the devil his due," but it is more—it is one of the thousand contrivances to screen men from the consequences of sin, and indeed it is curiously calculated to effect its design, by cheating them into the belief that the devil is all to be blamed, so their consciences may not be troubled.

I do not know how corrupt a being the devil is, but I honestly believe that if all would give him his due, and no more than his due, and take from him the curse of those sins of which man alone has been the author, he would make a much better appearance in the world, and perhaps would not be ashamed to be compared with some of its inhabitants! Notwithstanding it is so convenient for men to make him a scape-goat for all their sins, they profess to be great enemies to him, and constantly seeking his destruction, and I have even heard of large rewards being offered for his ruin.

Now I am seeking no reward, but I am quite sure that if every one would take from the devil what sin justly belongs to himself, and leave him only his due, he would at least be as naked as the daw when striped of her borrowed feathers, if she did not wholly disappear. Yea, I believe there would be nothing left of him. J. C. WILCOX.

Halifax, Vt., Feb., 1843.

For the Magazine and Advocate.
HOUSEHOLD FOES.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

"The greatest impediment our cause has to encounter, may be found in the conduct of some of its professed friends."—Correspondent of the Magazine and Advocate.

Who that has considered the matter at all, has any doubts, respecting the truth of the above remark? A secret enemy in the garb of a friend, is more to be dreaded and more to be detested than an open foe. He adds turpitude and treachery to criminality—he is base indeed. That there are many professed Universalists who are not Universalists in reality, admits of no doubt. And this class is of every grade and character, from the man who becomes enraged and refuses to lend his assistance to further Universalism, either by his presence or his bounty, because it may be he is not flattered in all his notions, and perhaps in his besetting sin, to the man who has not to stoop a great deal to perform the vilest act of treachery that ever disgraced the black catalogue. And there are the cold and indifferent—the man who has no sympathy with Universalism any farther than it goes to tear down orthodoxy. There are those in whom the spirit of Universalism can find no congenial soil—in whom it is dead—is not an active, living principle. And there are those who evince their particular regard for Universalism by condemning the members of other churches for their zeal and activity for what they have embraced as the truth. There are enough of these characters mentioned above, in almost every place; but you can find them in greater abundance in those places where Universalism has been in a manner built up, and then from some trifling cause or causes, has been suffered to die away, or been prostrated by the suicidal thrusts of its professed friends. They suffer acrimony and embittered feelings to usurp the place of religion. And they will begin to attribute the ill-success of the cause among them to the real or supposed injury it had received from others.

And, if there are any, (which, no doubt there are,) who helped to make up such a society, that escape the epidemic passion of fault-finding—of embittering their own feelings and those of others—and of attributing their decline in religious prosperity to evils remote from their own members—they are to be prized for their sterling worth. In every place where Universalism has flourished, but is now languishing or dead, and moves but slowly or not at all, under the efforts for its revival, the real cause may be traced to a want of harmony in feeling and tastes—to a want of union and efficiency in action—a willingness of each to do his part. There was much truth and philosophy in the remark of an ancient writer, that "No author was ever written down but by himself;" and it is no less true and philosophical, that Universalism was never put down in any place but by its professed—not its real friends. All that have looked into this matter must be aware of its correctness. It requires no great stretch of foresight to perceive the real cause of the languishing state of Universalism in many places, and the struggles it has to encounter in other places. It may be summed up in the simple unvarnished phrase—a want of harmony and action among its professors.

There are some in every place, perhaps, who are worthy to be called Universalists; and there are others—mere professors, to whom the name of Universalist would be as foreign as it would be to a Turk or heathen. Yet among this latter class you may find those who are loud in their professions, and who are ready to combat orthodoxy and argue Universalism in the highway and in the corners of the streets, and can be about all the week; but let an effort be made to sustain meetings, and they will be so unwell on Sundays that they can not get to church more than two or three times in the course of two or three months. Others there are, who can tell how desirable it would be if they could only have meetings; and when they have them, they might find it convenient to drop in two or three half days in seven or eight Sabbaths; and who can dress up their children and suffer them to attend orthodox churches to hear that which they do not believe to be the truth—which too, caused them so much trouble when they believed it, if they were so unfortunate; and who would reply, should they be questioned as to the propriety of such a course, that young folks wanted to go where there were the most young people—and that nothing more could be expected of them—and thus flatter their child in a course which they and every consistent individual will say is not very commendable; deeming all the while that they are paying a very high compliment to the young. Others might be found who would be quite anxious that their preacher should attend orthodox protracted meetings and combat their teachers—disturb them in their worship—and create unpleasant feelings, and get the ill will of those who, if they are not our friends, can not say that we have made them our enemies; while these professed Universalists would rarely find it convenient to attend Universalist meetings, thus evincing that the greatest degree of what they have embraced as Universalism, consists in opposition to orthodoxy, instead of building themselves up in peace and joy in the truth. And others there are, who would think that they were paying the preacher, who should forego the privilege of laboring in a pleasanter field and engage to labor among such a class, a very high compliment if they should lend their precious presence at church once in three months. And still there are others, who had rather be relieved from any obligation than to go to meeting, but would rather lounge the Sabbath away in idleness and indifference. These are some of the characters that profess Universalism. And no one can be long in coming to the conclusion, that it would take as many of this mass of heterogeneous characters to make one real, consistent, living, practical Universalist, as it would of apple dumplings to build a stone wall! Here is a mirror in which some mistaken Universalists can see themselves at full length, neither too great nor too small—a perfect picture.

PROFANITY....NO. VI.

BY REV. S. J. GIBSON.

Not the least of the evils arising from this habit, is the tendency which it has to render powerless and weak, the moral faculties of the mind.

If any have any doubts respecting this position, then let them bestow their attention upon the conduct of the boy of some five or six years of age, who has thus far received the proper instruction of his parents—into whose mind have been instilled the precepts of good moral counsel. In that mind we have a fair representation of the beauties and blessings of innocence—a fair sample of what man was, when he stood forth in the morning of creation from the plastic hand of his Maker, for we are even assured, that of such is the kingdom of heaven.—To day you observe him engaged with his play fellows, and probably influenced by bad example which has been set before him by others, and forgetful of the instructions of his parents, he for the first time in his life, makes use of an oath—immediately he starts back with astonishment, and exclaims, I swore! Yes, he swore; and why did he manifest so much surprise and horror on account of it? Because the act was shocking to his innocent sentiments—offensive to his fine and delicate feelings, and yet it sullied them in a measure; for tomorrow he makes use of an oath again, with far less surprise, and thus onward, until his fine moral sentiments become seared, as it were, and he indulges in the habit with but little if any care.

And as with the youth, so with the man. This practice ever throws a dark shade over the fair face of his moral faculties—sullies the finer feelings of his heart—renders his conscience less sensitive, and thus bereaves him of some of the most exquisite pleasure that mortals are permitted to enjoy in this lower world. And is it not surprising, that men should prove such enemies to themselves and to their own enjoyment? How illy are they rewarded for their actions! How many hours of pleasing reflection do they thus deprive themselves of, and all too, but the result of a want of proper attention to the more exalted sentiments of their nature!—Far better for every one, to make it a study to preserve these untarnished. We should ever bear in mind that our moral powers, had their origin in the deep counsels of infinite and eternal Wisdom—that they were bestowed upon us for the purpose of guiding our feet in that straight and narrow path that leadeth to life; and hence, we should guard against every thing which has a tendency to weaken them, and especially so, against this useless and vulgar habit, which is so expressly forbidden by revelation.

ONLY GOD'S MERCY AND GOODNESS.

BROTHER GROSH—The following incident is worth nothing more, than to show in what estimation the goodness and mercy of God is held by the "Orthodox." About eight months ago at the funeral of a widow lady held in the Presbyterian meeting house, the Rev. Isaac Todd, Pastor of the church of that order, pronounced the sermon on that occasion, in which he set forth a sentiment published, I think, by Dr. Doddridge, and observed that, that error had driven many to embrace the doctrine of Universal salvation, and they (the Universalists) predicate their hopes of eternal happiness upon the goodness and mercy of God; but, said he, (raising his arm and shaking his finger at the congregation.) "I pity the man—yea, I pity the man who has no better foundation for his hope of eternal salvation, than to depend upon the goodness and mercy of God."

A dash of rain coming up as the service closed, detained the congregation for some half an hour, in which time I made inquiry of the Rev. Gentleman whether I understood him right, respecting his words; he said I did, and he would repeat it again without repentance. I replied that repentance altered nothing in the goodness and mercy of God, and upon me. But, sir, your pity may fall, for I confess to you, and to this congregation, that I have no other hope of eternal salvation than God's goodness and mercy.—I also said, I had been recently called upon to subscribe for his support, but did not; believing the doctrine he taught could not be found in the Bible. I called upon the congregation to witness upon what condition I would pay him fifty dollars at the end of the year; which was that in that time he should bring me a text in the Bible, declaring the misery of the wicked to be endless, or that there would be a judgment day in the spirit-world, after the resurrection. He then promised that he would take some suitable opportunity and show me the text. The Rev. gentleman has not yet found that suitable opportunity; but he has yet four months to perform his promise in, and make me indebted to him fifty dollars. This contract was made before many witnesses, for as yet there had not one left the meeting house.

SOMETHING BETTER.

BY MISS CELIA M. TIBBITS.

Creation is a mystery—life is a mystery—and what a most inexplicable mystery is the human heart! From its first pulsation in the infant breast, to the closing scene in the grand drama of life, it is a mystery to itself—a sealed book of unuttered things—a land of alternate sunlight, and fearful, impenetrable gloom.

How ardently from the innocent pleasures of childhood, do we look through the vista of coming years, amid its twilight shadows, and sigh for—we know not what—an undefined good—something better. Youth succeeds—its brightness and rainbow effulgence is ours. We look back upon the past—it has left no sad traces of misspent hours; no dim haunting remembrance of the loved and lost; no yearnings for the departed who have gone from us to return no more. And before us is the future—the bright, untried, the bewitching future—with its sunlit skies; its summer landscapes; its winds whose tones are music; a land of unalloyed bliss, of undimmed splendor, and perennial bloom. We gaze upon all the pleasures life has given, the many she promises at this brightest period of existence; and the unsatisfied soul still looks forward and exclaims is there nothing better? Ah, yes, a mystery—an unfathomed mystery is the human heart! How noble and god-like its capacities! How mighty its powers of thought, feeling and endurance! Yet "a breath—a tone of music—summer's eve, or spring, may wound, striking the electric chain wherewith we're darkly bound." Amid the hurry and tumult of life, from the realization of golden dreams, from overflowing coffers, and bright prospects of future gain, the man of wealth turns in disgust; and his soul sated with this world's good, recoils from its vain pageantry and sighs for something more enduring and satisfactory—a something better. The student pores over the unsealed records of other days; unlocks the hidden treasures of science, and dreams of "eternal honors to his name, of endless glory, and perennial bays." And perchance fame goes with him, and his pale brow is crowned with the laurel wreath which he has so long, so earnestly sought; yet does it bring with it the promised good? has it satisfied those yearnings which have ever been with him, even in his happiest hour? Does he say, lo here is peace? No—oh no! the aching void is still unfilled—the boon unfound; and from all that life gives, he turns in disappointment and exclaims is this all? has earth nothing better? No, this is not all! it is no vain dream that has been over us, breathing of a more pure and exalted state of being. It is the natural aspiration of the immortal soul, for something more enduring than the transitory things of earth. We are created for something better; and in a future and better land our spirits will realize that which they have so long sought; they will grasp that undefined good which has so often hovered over them, like dim sad remembrances of some happier home, from which we have been driven forth mourners and exiles—wandering strangers in a strange land.

"HEAVEN IS LARGE ENOUGH FOR US ALL."

Such were some of the last words of Miss Minerva Kinney, of McGrawville—who departed this life on Sunday morning, the 7th inst. Her death was calm and pleasant as the unruffled lake. In my visits to this young lady during her short illness, I could not but be reminded of the sickness and death of Lazarus, and the grave of Jesus, when Mary and Martha, in much love and humble gratitude, came to embalm the remains of their friend. The scene produced in my mind a sort of pleasing melancholy—there was on her countenance such a sweet composure of mind, such confidence in God as her Father and Friend, that it buoyed my spirits up—and then, to witness the devotedness of her father and mother, brother and sisters around her sick bed, together with the affection and attention of other young friends; I could not but say within myself, O that my end, may be as tranquil and happy! On my last visit, (as she was supposed to be drawing near her end,) as I passed out of her father's residence, in the evening, there were several persons gathered around the house, waiting, seemingly with breathless anxiety to inquire if the spirit had departed? I thought to myself, this whole scene speaks a language not to be misunderstood; for be it known, dear reader, there were within and without friends of various religious opinions. Now this young lady was a Universalist—she was one of the few, who was not over-awed by popular favor—when it was possibly convenient for her, she was in attendance at church, listening to the glad news of a world's salvation from sin and death—nor could she be moved from her faith, although she was talked and written to on the subject. On Saturday evening at about eleven o'clock she fell apparently into a sweet sleep, and on Sunday morning at half-past two, her spirit took its departure for the "better land," or her "home" as she called it. In her life she gained the love and respect of her numerous acquaintance—she always met them with a complacent smile, that bespoke a sweet welcome, so that her memory is precious to us all. The community at McGrawville and vicinity, by a large attendance, spoke in language louder than words, their sympathies for the bereaved friends, and respect for the character of the deceased, and are justly entitled to our gratitude and respect. May God abundantly bless them in every good word and work. The bereaved friends mourn and sorrow not as those who have no hope, for they remember the language of the deceased, when they received the last fond kiss, "weep not for me! your loss is my gain."

Here thy loss we deeply feel;
But 'tis God that hath bereft us,
He can all our sorrows heal."

The following lines were sung at her grave.

"When the calmness of evening calls nature to rest,
And the wild howling tempest now ceases to rave,
Sure this is the season of others the best,
To reflect on the cold silent night of the grave.
Must we then yield to sorrow? oh! no, we'll rejoice,
For though o'er her tomb the sad willow may wave,
From the courts of high heaven, sweet whispers the voice.
There's a morning that dawns on the night of the grave.

THE SAVIOUR.

What a perfect pattern for imitation does the life of the Saviour exhibit! How admirable every trait in his character! How full of love and sympathy to suffering humanity! How compassionate to the frail and weak! Indeed, his whole life was spent in acts of kindness to the frail children of men.—Though sorely tempted, yet he never fell! Though persecuted by his enemies, yet how uncomplaining! Though condemned to the infamous death of the cross, and expiring in agonies, yet he still sustained the same purity of principle; manifested the same kindly benevolent feeling towards his cruel persecutors, who were causing him the most excruciating suffering. He raises his voice in their behalf—his last moments were spent in prayer for them. "Father (he cried) forgive them, for they know not what they do!" What love, what purity of principle, what firmness of purpose is here manifested! He came on a mission of love to man, and fulfilled the object of it. Is there one soul who can contemplate his character without admiration? Here is a pattern, kind reader, worthy our imitation. This same benevolent being is still our friend, nor can he ever become our enemy until the fountain from which sprang all this goodness, is exhausted! even that exhaustless ocean of God's love, which is itself boundless, though "it fills, connects" and bounds a universe. We think no believer in the Saviour will say that he will ever lose any of this benevolence of his nature. He wept over Jerusalem in view of her impending judgments—he wept in sympathy at the grave of a friend—and think you, kind reader, he would not still weep should one soul be left to groan and writhe in endless pain? ### SHORT NOTES ON SELECT PASSAGES...NO. I.

BY REV. H. H. WATSON.

Matt. xvi: 26.—"For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul, or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?"

This passage is supposed to teach the doctrine of ceaseless wo; and this supposition is derived from the phrase, "lose his own soul." But that the above doctrine receives any support from the text, is denied. It is stated, according to Dr. Adam Clarke, that the original word psuche, translated "soul" in our common English version, should have been rendered life; which would make the text read thus —"For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own life? or what shall a man give in exchange for his life?"

With these facts before us, and coming as they do from such a celebrated commentator, we discover that the text loses all the force which has been ascribed to it in favor of endless misery; and hence, if endless misery be true, it must be established by other testimony than this.

Matt. xvi: 27, 28.—"For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels, and then shall he reward every man according to his works. Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here, which shall not taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom."

This passage concludes the chapter from which the foregoing one was taken, and is referred by many to a general judgment yet future. But by a careful examination of the text, it will be seen that it has no reference to such event, but that the event of which it speaks has long since transpired.

There have been some commentators, (believers in endless punishment,) who seemed to have correct ideas of the true sense of this passage, and accordingly they have referred it to the overthrow of the Jewish nation and polity; among these were Drs. Gill, Wynnan, Clarke, Cappe, Pearce, and Hammond. And this application is clearly sanctioned by the last clause of the passage—"Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here, which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom."

That there were those alive at the time Jerusalem was destroyed, that heard this declaration of Christ, is very probable; as it took place about 43 years after his death. And at least one of the disciples, (viz. St. John, the evangelist,) who lived 24 years after this prediction was fulfilled, and consequently must have been an eye witness of the truth of this prophecy; for he says—"And I saw a new heaven and a new earth;" (evidently alluding to the Gospel dispensation) "for the first heaven, and the first earth," (or Mosaic institutions and laws) "were passed away, and there was no more sea."

EDITED BY

Revs. A. B. Grosh, G. W. Montgomery and A. C. Barray.

UTICA, FRIDAY, MAY 26, 1843.

CHRISTIAN UNION...NO. I.

Much has been said and written, and is yet said and written, on the subject of a general Christian Union—an association of all sects and denominations, into one general denomination. And from time to time, efforts have been commenced to effect such an organization—a few of which, as samples of the whole, I will briefly mention.

The "CHRISTIANS," as they term themselves—Christians, as they are termed by others—are probably the most numerous class of those who have started to produce such a union. Their beginning promised fair; but performed not long in accordance with their professions. The Scriptures were to be their only rule of faith and practice—and any one who acknowledged Jesus Christ as the Messiah—the Bible as his creed, and led a pious and moral life in obedience thereto, was to be admitted to their fellowship, whatever might be his opinions on other subjects. They rejected all distinctive titles, and called themselves simply Christians, to denote that they belonged not to any particular sect, and were not, themselves, a sect among sects.

So far, perhaps, all was well, save that they assumed a stand which subsequent events prove that they were not able to sustain.

Obedience to Christ, was one of their requisites—but they took upon them to say what was the particular mode which constituted obedience, and in this first departure from the right of private judgment, they constituted themselves a council of popes, and became a sect among sects. For instance—it was agreed by them, that Jesus commanded his followers to be baptised. Admitted, by all parties. Now, said the leaders and majority of these Christians, this baptism means water baptism. If any, in the exercise of their private judgment, received the Bible in a sense different from this, they were voted disobedient to Jesus, and disfellowshipped—not as from a sect; for they claim to be freed from sectarianism—but from Christian communion!

But may not a man be a Christian—a believer in, and a follower of, the Lord Jesus, without being baptised by water? Turn to Acts, 10th chapter, and read the conversion of Cornelius—and mark!—"While Peter yet spake these words, the holy spirit fell on all them which heard the word. And they of the circumcision which believed, were astonished—as many as came with Peter—because that on the Gentiles, also, was poured out the gift of the holy Spirit, for they heard them speak with tongues, and magnify God. Then answered Peter, Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptised, who have received the holy Spirit as well as we?" Now, notice—Cornelius was converted—he had faith in Jesus—he received the word preached—and, to add to all, he was miraculously endowed, (he and his fellow Gentiles) with the holy Ghost—yet, if this test may be received, they were not Christians, for they were not yet baptised with water!

But these anti-sectarians stopped not here. They decided that Jesus meant, not only water baptism, but baptism by immersion. And if any Christian, in the exercise of that Protestant and truly Christian virtue, the right of private judgment in matters of faith, presumed to suppose that any other mode would answer, he was declared disobedient to the commands of Christ, and disfellowshipped accordingly. In other words, as they were not a sect, but Christians, he was declared to be no Christian!

Those called sectarians, will frequently exclude persons from their denominations for not agreeing to its peculiar tenets, and still leave to them the general name of Christian; but this most liberal and tolerant no-sect, by calling themselves Christians, not as a distinctive or denominational name, but as their only and proper name, virtually declare all whom they disfellowship, to be infidels—not believers in or followers of our Lord and Saviour.

But this is not all. Their sectarianism—for it was and is rank sectarianism—extended to opinions. They understood the Bible to teach either the annihilation, or the endless punishment of the wicked; for I believe they have not, as a body, yet decided which. If any one understood the Bible to teach universal salvation, and dared to preach it—for preaching it, is, after all, the offence—he was disfellowshipped, and thus virtually declared to be a disbeliever in the Bible, and no Christian. In some cases, as if rather ashamed at retaining in their communion some, who it is well known believe quietly in Universalism, while they exclude those who honestly avow the same belief, they have urged that the latter were not pious, and that it was not on account of a difference of opinion, but for a want of piety, that they refused to them their fellowship. But from what I have said, you see at once that every sect in the world could as consistently claim that they were no sect—only Christians—and yet exclude, under the very same pretences, all who do not believe every tittle of their creed, and practise every one of their ceremonies. The Presbyterian may as well say, "I am no sectarian—I fellowship every one as a member of my church, who believes and obeys the Bible. But I understand the Bible to teach infant damnation, or the salvation only of elect infants, and any one who does not understand the Bible to teach as I understand it, does not believe the Bible, and I can not, therefore, fellowship him as a Christian." A. B. G.

THE RIGHT SPIRIT.

We rejoice in transferring to our columns, from the Western Luminary, the following "Fraternal Questions," by Brother J. Whitney—the more so, for their having first appeared in a paper pledged, to the defence and inculcation of certain ceremonies, and the managers of which, it has appeared to me, (and to many who, like Br. Whitney are favorable to the observance of those ceremonies,) have not always manifested the most tolerant spirit in their inculcations. Br. Whitney manifests the right spirit—the only spirit, in fact, which can be successful in preserving union in our ranks and peace among our members. The ground implied in these questions—for their teaching, though interrogative, is hardly dubious—is the one that has always been advocated and inculcated in this paper; and, by the blessing of God, I hope always to maintain this spirit of charity and toleration toward all who differ from me on such subjects. The questions are, therefore, most affectionately commended to the attention of all who read—and especially to the practice of all who need their liberal teachings. May they tend to the enlargement of charity, the increase of liberality, and the proper regulation and direction of religious zeal among all—both of those opposed to the observance by others of these forms, and of those who would, by word or deed, set at naught any brother or sister who abstains from their observance.

It will be seen, by the sermon which we publish this week, that we held to these views at least as long ago as the fall of 1841—and those who knew us before and since then, know that we have invariably, since we entered into the ministry of reconciliation, held the general principles of liberality and charity therein advocated; and we yet retain them. And we do not despair yet of their becoming universal in our denomination—synonymous with our doctrine, and co-extensive with its profession. A. B. G.

FRATERNAL QUESTIONS.

1. In regard to the rituals of the church, is it not wise and prudent for us to "walk in the spirit" according to our own sense of duty, and let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind?

2. Why is a difference of opinion on forms and ceremonies the most prolific source of contention and persecution among Christian professors?

3. Since outward emblems do not form the only mode of induction into the kingdom of heaven, are we not the most safely employed in cultivating the virtues and graces of our divine Master?

4. Why should the writer, who believes in observing the Eucharist, be any purer at heart, than the brother who believes that our Saviour's last supper is not a perpetual and binding institution?

5. Can our minds be enlightened and renewed after the spirit of the inner man, by controverting a point of doctrine which was only intended to symbolize an inward work of grace upon the heart?

6. In differing with a brother about the rites of the Church, why is it that we indulge in so much bitterness of feeling, while we know that the peace and harmony of our order has been advanced only by preaching Christ and him crucified?

7. If we, who deem it a duty to observe the Eucharist, consider others reprehensible for neglecting it, are there not good reasons to suppose that we lack that spirit of charity and toleration which Christ inculcated and manifested?

8. If ceremonials are necessary, as thousands believe that they are, to perpetuate the memory of our ascended Lord, will not the incentives to imitate him be increased and strengthened by their observance?

9. Brethren, do we realize this spiritual benefit in celebrating the Lord's supper? J. W.

A WORLD OF CHANGE.

One of our brethren of the Western Luminary, thus feelingly discourses on change (not changes) in a late number of that paper.

In one of our exchange papers we notice a paragraph which commences in the following manner: "It is a world of change we live in." Now, we have abundant reason to doubt the veracity of this presumptuous statement. We have not received, seen, or heard of a dollar, or even less of the shining dust for a long time, and if our Br. Editor has, it must be he lives in a world entirely different from the one we have the pleasure of residing in.

Now we can not exactly sympathise (except in imagination) with our Brother of the Luminary; for a few weeks ago we were called on in a hurry to attend a wedding. The parties were from the country, and liberally rewarded my prompt compliance, and long walk, and valuable services, by giving me a one dollar bill, which without examination I safely stowed away in one corner of my wallet, where it remains to this day—for it is on the "Lapeer County Bank" of Michigan, and therefore, luckily for my spending propensities, not worth one cent! If my brother of the Luminary will send me one bogus half dollar he may have the note; and thus both of us can live once more in "a world of change!"

TO E. A. G.

Your course has placed us in a very embarrassed and painful situation; and I hope, therefore, that you will immediately retrace it. If that can not be, write as soon as you see this, that I may know where to address a letter of explanation. If you will retrace your steps, however, all you desire can be effected in a way better for you, and pleasanter by far for all others concerned.

A. B. G.

Br. N. BROWN expected to start immediately on a missionary tour through the western and southwestern counties of this State, on the 1st of June, just passed.—He will preach to destitute societies on his route, and supply orders for the Scripture Compendium, or Universalist Looking Glass; a useful chart published by him, and favorably noticed by several of our papers.

COLLECTORS WANTED.

Two or three efficient and good collectors are wanted to go through nearly all the counties in this State and collect arrearages due for this paper for a number of years past to the former publishers. Young preachers, who have no families, and could make excursions of several weeks at a time, and occasionally preach and lecture on their routes would undoubtedly do well in the business, a liberal percentage will be allowed. Enquire at this office.

WASHINGTONIAN STATE CONVENTION.

We hope that our readers who are Washingtonians, (and we earnestly wish all were such,) will not forget that this interesting and important meeting is to be held in this city, on the second Wednesday (14th) of June next. It is recommended that, in all counties where the society at the county seat does not call a County Convention, each society select and send two or three delegates—and these several delegations of each county will undoubtedly be received as the delegation of such county, the same as if they had been selected by a County Convention. Remember this—make it known to your societies—for it is very important that a full representation be present from every part of our State.

MARRIAGES.

In Dexter, April 13th, by Rev. G. S. Abbott, Mr. GEORGE H. KIMBALL, to Miss ELVIRA BAKER. Also, on the 16th, same place, by the same, Mr. JAMES A. BAYLEY, to Miss MARTHA ROCKWOOD, all of Dexter.

DEATHS.

In McGrawville, May 7th, Miss MINERVA KINNEY, daughter of Gilmore Kinney, Esq., aged 20 years. A notice of her character and her last moments will be found in another part of this paper. Her funeral was attended on the 18th inst. Prayer at the house, by the Pastor of the Presbyterian church—sermon in the Presbyterian meetinghouse, by Br. Whitcomb—concluding prayer by Elder Dye, (Baptist).

At the residence of Br. Charles Traffarn, Alden Creek, on the 13th inst., of consumption, Miss JANE MARIA WILLIAMS, aged 20 years and 11 months. Her life was that of a Christian, though her sentiments were not known, if indeed she had formed any relative to a partial or a universal salvation. A few hours before her death she called to her bed-side her relatives and friends, and informed them that her dissolution was at hand—took each by the hand and calmly bid them an affectionate adieu, adding that she was going to meet her friends in a better world, and the separation from those present would be but momentary, and that Br. Traffarn could not wish those of his friends to return who had gone before him—that she had no desire to live longer, and that she was happy. Truly she smiled at death's firm grasp, and hailed him as her deliverer from the bonds of earth, and as a sure passport to pure holiness and happiness, in that house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. May the Father of all souls become the stay and solace to friends, and particularly to her two sisters who are the only two near relations left to mourn her decease, and may their lives and death be like hers. The consolations of the Gospel was tendered this day, (14th,) to a large concourse of people by Rev. E. Hunter, D. D., of the Congregationalist society of Boonville, in an impressive discourse from Romans viii: 18; and although some of the leading features of his own sentiments might be inferred, the spirit of kindness and Christian charity in which they were delivered won for him golden opinions of those who think differently from him. L. M.

In South Canton, April 5th, EURANA LETITIA, daughter of Mr. Eri Ames, aged 14 years, 5 months and 10 days.—Peace be to the ashes of this young and interesting girl, and the full consolations of the Gospel of a world's salvation, to the afflicted parents and kindred.

On Pierpont Plains, April 8th, Mrs. ALMEDA OLIN, daughter of Mr. Lyman Tupper, aged 38 years. The deceased was feeble for several years, but on the day of her death was not thought to be more than usually unwell. She took breakfast with the family in the morning, and at midday was a corpse. Verily, "In the midst of life we are in death."

In Parishville, May 1st, BETSEY, daughter of Mr. Asa Brownson, aged 17 years 4 months. Probably but few young persons were ever called from earth, more deeply lamented than this. She was an amiable and lovely daughter, a highly valued associate and friend, and her memory will long be fondly cherished. So much was she endeared to the hearts of others, that after the services at the church, almost the entire congregation must pass by the altar to see the corpse. We affectionately mingle our sympathies with the afflicted. W. H. WAGGONER.

WISHES.

BY MISS MARY E. TILLOTSON.

First, Washington's blessed tomb, would I survey,
Where virtue's model slumbers in decay!
Nought but it's clay shall sleep; it's model lives,
While in freeman's heart memory survives,
Or history speaks, or blooms Columbia's soil,
Or Freedom's cherished flag floats in the gale!

Lone would I linger round the richest spot America can boast of. I would not
A sound should there my meditation break;
Or kindest voice profound devotion shake;
Or eye perceive the tears shed o'er such worth—
In grateful reverence shed, on hallow'd earth!

Then would I hear Niagara's distant sound,
Approach and see the rushing torrent's bound—
Muse on Bridgewater's midnight conflict, brave—
The Christians, whose firm hands our land did save—
The veterans who for freedom fearless fell,
Niagara's thunder-roar, their dying knell!

Then, Bunker Hill's declivity would trace—
In fancy see the Britons fly the place—
See them recede before my country's power;
Then breathe for Liberty an ardent prayer—
Retire in silence from the battle shock,
And place my feet on Plymouth's Pilgrim rock!

I'd hie the ocean o'er, the Thames ascend—
To Westminster my course directly bend;
Not for the king there laid, the ssepered dead,
But those whose genius light on science shed,
Around their tombs delight and knowledge blend;
There, who'd not feel improved a day to spend?

One man in England would I glance upon;
The Poet whose sweet lay the soul can chain—
Whose inspiration bids the heart adore—
In sympathy dissolve—in rapture soar!
He loved his "Gertrude's" land, when weak and wild,
It's daughters love in turn "O'Conner's Child!"

Istent I'd gaze the Alpine heights upon,
And deem me blest to cross the honored Rhine—
To see the relics of Rome's ancient pride;
Nor would St. Peter's structure be denied;
No, nor famed Etna—nor Vesuvius,
Since on my way to ever-worshipped Greece!

Of vast extremes, the scene thou'st been, dear Greece!
Now, shall thy infant Liberty increase—
With Freedom's rise, science again shall reign—
This be our wish—be "classic land" again!
Expel pollution—Art's sublime unfold—
Then blessed indeed, the eyes that thee behold!

And thou, Jerusalem! scarce do I know
If view of thee could grant more joy than wo;
'Twere bliss to scan thy "holy Temple's site,"
If not degraded now, by Moslem rite!
And to explore the land a Saviour traced,
Could Calvary's scene from mem'ry be effaced!

SPRING.

BY MISS C. M. TIBBITS.

Yes, there are voices in the merry spring,
To breathe again the tones of early youth—
To draw aside the curtained gloom of years,
And bid us revel in its promised truth.

And whispered words in gentle tones are heard,
Low soothing voices echoed from the past;
Waking low music from the spirit's lyre,
Of bright ideals in its dreamings cast.

O, there are voices in each forest leaf,
That find deep echoes in the human breast;
And mystic words in every gentle breeze,
With might "to shake the mantle of its rest."

Each breeze comes laden with the tale of years,
Its joys, its sorrows, all its early grief;
With burning words of deep unburied wo,
To read the secrets of each folded leaf.

In the low gushings of a singing rill,
A voice may whisper of thy early home,
And in the rustling of the forest boughs,
A tone of sadness o'er thy spirit come.

SCENES IN THE DRAMA OF HUMAN LIFE.

BY MRS. F. M. BAKER.

SCENE FIRST.

Sarah C. was very beautiful. Few have ever dwelt upon this earth, where existed so much of the beautiful and lovely, more so than she was. And yet it would be very difficult for pen or pencil in sketching the picture, to show in what that beauty consisted: for writer or painter to so describe or delineate her form or features as to give a just conception of them. Still they were very perfect: but they were of a kind which must be seen in order to be felt.

I recollect it was a common expression among those who knew her, that her look, her expression was unearthly. And truly it was so; especially towards the close of her mortal career. In her girlhood she had been a gay, cheerful, happy creature. Although early left an orphan, yet she scarce felt the sorrows of her lot; for a kind relative, near her own age, took her to her own home and heart, and was all that parent, or brother, or sister could be to her. Nor did her kindness cease here; for almost her last request was, that her husband should ever continue a protector to Sarah. Within two years after, Sarah was his wife.

From that time she was a changed being. All noticed it, and attributed it to her deep love for her husband. Still scarcely more than a girl when she married, yet all her former gaiety was at once laid aside. A shade of thoughtfulness—yea, more, of seriousness settled upon her countenance; while her whole appearance became not only more dignified, but gentle and cautious. Indeed, to a close observer it was evident that something exerted a powerful restraint over her feelings. But very few ever knew the real cause of this change: So easily are the mass of mankind deceived; so much are they the dupes of external appearances. Mere superficial observers, they seldom read the heart or the thoughts, and scarce trouble themselves to guess the motives which actuate their fellows.

Sarah and her husband were praised for their pure affection and strong attachment for each other. He seemed to be actuated by the most devoted attentions to her welfare and happiness, while her love for him seemed little less than idolatry. And when, three years after, she was laid in her early grave, people wondered how death could have severed love so strong. She faded away so gradually, and sank so calmly to her last sleep, that few saw or dreamed of her passing, until she was gone forever.

Alas! still less did they dream that this was the first quiet rest the sleeper had enjoyed for long months. That she welcomed death as a kind friend, who would soothe all her sorrows, and the grave as her only resting place from which suffering could not rouse her. In secret had she struggled with and borne griefs, caused by him who should have been first to shield her from harm. And when he openly professed for her so much care and anxiety, she alone knew that it was but a veil to conceal his real feelings, which in secret were vented towards her in censures, repinings and cruelty. Nor must she by word or deed betray her own sorrows—but, must wear a cheerful smile, must seem a happy wife, while grief, like a canker worm, was gnawing at the very springs of life!

This it was which loosed the silver cords, which broke the golden bowl. To be the victim of him who had sworn to love and cherish through weal or wo; to feel that she was deceived; that when she gave her own heart in trust, it was only thrown back to her a crushed and slighted thing; was more than her timid, confiding spirit could bear. It sought a support to which it could cling: it found none upon earth, and gladly went home—to Him who gave it.

The guilty husband shed a few crocodile tears, which by the world were looked upon as precious drops wrung from a broken heart! But he soon mingled with the world and forgot all. Oh, thou hypocrite! will not thy sins rise in judgment against thee?

THE OLD NEWSPAPER.

BY MRS. L. J. B. CASE.

Opening a small parcel the other day, that contained a few purchases from a dry goods store, my attention was drawn to the wrapper. It was a piece of torn newspaper, without title or date; but from the events mentioned in an article, headed, "Facts worth knowing," I gathered some idea of its age.

What a sermonizer is an old newspaper! What a homely doth it preach on man, and his pursuits! These "facts worth knowing" have gone out of our interest; others have elbowed them from their places, in turn to retire before the march of improvement. Though not much more than a dozen years old, how much of change is shown up in its "news"! Here is a long account of a distressing shipwreck. Where are those thankful survivors now? They have been but saved from the sea, for consumption, for fever, and perchance another shipwreck. Here is an account of the arrival of the servant of John Randolph, that meteor of the South, then our ambassador to St. Petersburg, with news of his ill health and speedy return. John Randolph and that faithful servant sleep almost unremembered among the woods of his own Roanoke. That late king of France, hath ceased to lament the successful attack on his divine right. He hath nothing further to do with earthly thrones, and the heir apparent of his successor hath as little also.

Under the "Literary Notices," firstly, are two works from the mighty magician of the North, whose broken wand lies hidden among the ruins of Dryburgh Abbey. These also belong to a day that is past. Then a novel is well puffed, that now rests almost undisturbed among the dusty shelves of the village library, a production of that celebrated author of "fabel stories and novels." Then a foreign work is pronounced "eminently ridiculous and trashy"—the truth, no doubt!

Then comes a column of foreign news—and all these as the things of yesterday! Verily, what a passing pageant is life, and how evanescent is all its interests! But a few years, and the events now being chronicled—so full of absorbing thought, will fall on the eye of some idle dreamer, with the reflections these have brought to mine! Truly may we say, "Lord, what is man that thou art mindful of him!"—[Portland Amulet.

I AM ON OATH.—A Lawyer not over-young nor hand-some in examining a young lady, a witness in Court, made attempts to confuse her, and thus to render her testimony contradictory and unavailing. She, however, seemed to be calm, and proof against all frivolous questions put to her. At last, the lawyer determined to perplex her, said: "Miss, upon my word you are very pretty." The young lady very promptly replied: "I would return the compliment, sir, if I were not on oath." As may be supposed, the lawyer questioned her no farther.

"SPEAK NOT TO HIM A BITTER WORD."

BY MRS. S. ELIZA GIBSON.

A few days since in taking up a number of a periodical containing the index to a volume, my eye fell on the list of poetical productions, and my attention was arrested by the motto which heads this article. I do not remember of ever having seen the production referred to, but my thoughts immediately turned to the many in our world, to whom it would be better by far, if we were to heed the injunction—speak not to them a bitter word.

The parents of one already in the meridian of life, have reached an age from whence have fled all the ardent hopes and rapturous emotions of youth. The circumstances and promptings which once gave a zest to the employments of life, live now, only in the memory of days long since passed. The father looks back to the many days of toil, which were made cheerful by the consciousness of being the better prepared to bestow a liberal bounty upon the child of his care, and remembers the many midnight hours which have visited his pillow, ere the messenger of sleep had closed his eye-lids, while he was planning the advancement or indulging the joyous anticipation of the time, when that child should occupy an honorable place in society. The mother too, recalls the many times she has bent over her sleeping infant, while her heart swelled with emotions she could not express, and the hours of anxious and unwearied watchfulness she has passed at the bedside, when sickness had laid a heavy hand upon the one so dear to her—and both, even now, look with a deep interest on all the plans of their offspring. The heart of each thrills with pleasure at each new token of dutifulness or affection, and is wrung with anguish at every mark of ingratitude or expression of harshness. O children! know ye not that in thy parents' breasts are fountains of feeling which you alone can stir? Know ye not that there are chords of affection which at your touch will cause vibrations of overflowing delight, or pangs of bitter grief and sorrow. Oh! reflect upon this, and speak not to them a bitter word.

An orphan has been left to buffet with her single arm, the wave of misfortune, and to struggle unaided with the ills of life. Loneliness is her fortune, and poverty her estate; but deep in her heart flows, silently though it may be, affections as warm and thoughts as pure, as though she were the favored of fortune or the lauded of earth. Gladly indeed would she quaff deep and lasting draughts from the fountain of knowledge, but a barrier is interposed which nought but the most laborious and persevering industry can remove. Joyfully, too, would she climb to the temple of Fame, and twine around her longing brow the laurel wreath; for sweet to her ear is the voice of praise; but to her, far more rugged than to others is rendered the ascent, and more towering the height on which the fane is placed! Often in depths of night, has her pillow been bedewed with tears, and her sobs gone forth on the silent air, for the proud have scanned with haughty eye, her humble garb, and then passed her coldly by; and the unfeeling have looked upon her lowly occupation, and with sneer and cruel words, checked her ardent aspirations. With none to protect, none to aid, and none to encourage her, lonely and sorrowful indeed is the orphan's lot! Ye who bask in the smiles of parents and fortune, think of it, speak not to her a bitter word.

One there is, who once trod the path of iniquity. The scorpion sting, and heavy, galling load of sin were his; and still he hastened on, vainly supposing that the way he had chosen was one of pleasure. His friends forsook him, and the virtuous and pure in heart frowned on his conduct. But at length a kind voice reached his ear, and a benevolent arm was stretched forth to rescue him from ruin. His footsteps were arrested, and now would he turn to the way of virtue and life. But he needs encouragement and aid, that he may sunder the strong bands which habit has thrown around him, and be enabled to resist the entreaties of his former companions, to return to their haunts of vice. And more than all, he would have the evil of forgetfulness thrown over his past conduct, and feel that its darkness does not cast a blight or a shadow upon his present earnest and virtuous endeavors. No; he can not bear that the deeds of his past life should be associated with his present name, but he would have his treatment and reputation measured by the course he is now pursuing. Oh, then, aid and encourage him, that he may be constant in well doing, and above all speak not to him a bitter word!

A young bride has left the home of her youth, and the early friends of her girlhood, to share the joys and sorrows of one whose name she has adopted. She still remembers the sadness of the parting hour—the bedewed cheek of the mother, the tearful eye and quivering lip of the sister and brother, and the tremulous "God bless you," of the father, and feels certain that these were not feigned testimonials of their affection. Yes, there were strong ties, which bound her to her early home, but a stronger had been woven around her heart, and these were sundered. But husband! know you not that in your treatment, she expects will meet all the tenderness and affection which were bestowed upon her by those left behind; yea, know you not that she would spare no labor that would win from you a smile of approbation, and that each word or look of coldness or indifference, would send a pang to her heart, such as neither harshness or severity from others could produce! Value highly, then, that warm attachment which prompted her to relinquish home and all its endearments for you—reward her confidence and high appreciation of your affection, by attention and tenderness; and if she has faults, employ the language of kindness in correcting them; but oh! speak not to her a bitter word.

But we have enemies—those who have on many occasions, studied to do us injury. They have siezed upon each unfortunate event in our lives which could be turned to our disadvantage, they have misinterpreted our language, misconstrued our motives, and in not a few instances and with no little success, they have directed the poisoned arrow of slander at our reputations. But shall we in return improve upon their example? Shall we seek to do them harm by involving them in difficulties, by injuring their feelings, or sinking them in the opinion of those by whom they are surrounded? Shall we if opportunity offer, place obstacles in the way of their enjoyment, or do ought to embitter their happiness or peace? O no: this is not in accordance with that religion which teaches that we are all children of one Parent! This was not the precept and example of him who was pure in heart, and went about doing good! "Love your enemies," said he, "bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you."—Let us then heed this injunction, and speak not even to them, nay; speak not to any, a bitter word!

SHORT NOTES ON SELECT PASSAGES.....NO. II.

BY REV. H. B. WATSON.

Mark x: 25.—It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God."

Many of the opposers of God's unlimited grace, seem confident that reference is here had to that cheerless system, endless punishment; and quote the text to sustain that position. But by a careful examination of the phraseology of the passage, it is confidently believed that it can be shown that it relates to no such event.

First, it will be necessary to show what we are to understand by the camel passing through the eye of the needle. Second, it will be requisite to show the meaning of the term kingdom of God.

1. The original word here translated camel, according to Whitty and Clarke, might be literally rendered cable; and would read—"It is easier for a cable to go through the eye of a needle," etc.—which is a very common proverb among eastern nations, and signifies an impossibility. A similar expression is to be found in the Koran, as follows—"The impious, who in his arrogance shall accuse our doctrine of falsity, shall find the gates of heaven shut; nor shall he enter there till a camel shall pass through the eye of a needle. It is thus that we shall recompense the wicked." See Al Koran of Mahommed.

2d. The term "kingdom of God" is used to denote the kingdom which Christ came to establish on earth. And hence to enter into the kingdom of God, or kingdom of heaven, (for the terms are synonymous) is to become a true disciple of our Lord Jesus Christ. See Pearce, Elsley, Lightfoot, and others, on the passage.

Therefore from the above explanation the following conclusion presents itself. That is, it is impossible for a man with his whole heart set upon riches, upon worldly grandeur and self-aggrandizement, to become a true Christian, a true disciple of Christ, and a member of the "kingdom of God," while he retains this desire for worldly honors, as it is for a cable or camel to pass through the eye of a needle. That this is a correct interpretation of the text, the language of Christ plainly shows; for he says to a rich man, verse 21 of this chapter—"go thy way, sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven, and come and take up the cross and follow me."

Mark xvi: 16.—"He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned."

The above passage is very frequently quoted by certain religious classes of the day, to show the situation of mankind in a future state of being.—And this too, is done without any reference to the context, either directly or indirectly. In giving this brief explanation of the text, I shall with but one exception, confine myself to the Scriptures of divine truth; believing, that in all cases where they are definitely understood, that Scripture is its own best interpreter.

The exception alluded to is Dr. Campbell's remarks on the word katakhrino, here translated damned, which he says exactly corresponds with our English word condemn. But to the context. It appears that the disciples had no faith in the resurrection of Christ from the dead, although he had often told them that such would be the case; and although they had been told that he had been seen since his resurrection, and had been conversed with. Therefore in order to convince them that he had risen, he appeared in their midst as they sat at meat and upbraided them for their unbelief.

Having convinced them that it was really their Master that stood before them, he then commanded them to go and preach the Gospel to every creature, telling them that—"He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved;" (that is, he that believeth in the Gospel, and on him as the risen Saviour, shall be saved,) "but he that believeth not shall be damned," or condemned for unbelief. That this is a correct view of the text, we have but to turn to John iii: 18, where it says—"He that believeth on him" (that is, Christ) "is not condemned: but he that believeth not is condemned," (or damned) "already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God."

LETTERS OF THE NEW-ENGLAND SPY.....NO. V.

—, March 10, 1843.

MY DEAR F.—You would like to learn something in regard to New England Universalism.—"Is it spreading or not?" "Or is it declining rapidly, as has been stated in the papers?"—"What think you of its final prosperity?" "Will it ever become the popular doctrine of New England?" These are some of the questions you would have me reply to. And in doing so, you would have me strive to be as impartial as possible, that my statements may be those of truth, rather than those of party bias. Well, you shall be indulged in this respect, but I fear you will hardly believe what I write.

You wish to know the real state of Universalism in New England. Is it prospering? And in truth I must say, that it is. There is no denying this matter, or covering it up any longer. The fact is undeniable. New England Universalism is in a very high state of prosperity. No man with his eyes open can fail to see that this is the case, who resides long in different parts of New England.—Why, fifty years ago there was scarcely a meeting-house in all New England, that they could properly call their own. And now they are all over the hills and valleys of this new world! You can hardly get out of the sight of one of their churches, go where you will. Some of their societies, 'tis true, are not in as prosperous a condition as they have been. But still; whoever takes this as an evidence of the general decline of Universalism is mistaken. His judgment is regulated more by a desire to have things as he would, than to relate them as they are. I do not like this fashion of running down opposing sects by misrepresenting them. Let us have the real facts in the case, I say; no matter how melancholy they are, or discouraging they may seem. If Universalism is prospering, let us have the fact; for if it is a fact, it ought to be known in order to be properly met. Universalism can never be put down by representing it as declining, when it is rapidly spreading over the country. And here permit me to say that the apparent prosperity of Universalism as we have given it, is far short of what truth will justify me in saying, or the real fact in the case. There is a mighty under current of which I have said nothing. It is a silent, deep work. It is a work going on in the very heart of all the New England churches. The best men in them are beginning seriously to doubt what have been heretofore deemed the fundamental doctrines of those churches, respectively and collectively. And already there has been some wonderful changes, both in the tones from the desk and the hearts of the people. Already—I state what I know to be a fact—already there are large numbers in what are termed the Evangelical churches of New England, who have rejected the doctrine of endless misery, and secretly entertain the doctrine of the final restoration to purity and holiness of the whole human race. Besides, all the benevolent enterprises of the day are tending towards this same thing, and must eventually lead to it. Instance the temperance cause. What means this Washingtonian movement, which is making our country all over anew, if it does not tend towards that system of divinity which sees in God a Father, in man a brother, and in Heaven a home for all men? What meaneth it, if not to establish the doctrine of the omnipotence of kindness, and the fact that the grace of God is sufficient to redeem a universe? A few years ago, Rev. Dr. Edwards of Andover, I am informed, stated publicly in one of his temperance lectures, that we must give the drunkard up—that we could not expect to redeem him; but that we must strive to enlist the children, the rising generation, and make them sober and temperate men. But what have the events of the last two years proved, if not, that the power of God is sufficient to redeem the worst inebriate that lives? Thus much of the temperance cause, on the Washingtonian basis, as tending towards Universalism, if not founded in it. The same is true of all the other benevolent enterprises of the day. Punishments are growing more humane; sympathy, the golden link which connects man to man, and causes him to feel for the wants and woes of others, is beginning to be respected as part of man's higher nature; the great heart of humanity is outgrowing that theology which has stood still since the days of Luther and Calvin; and the doctrine proclaimed by an African monk sixteen hundred years ago, is beginning to be very much disrelished here in New-England, at least.

I give it, then, as my opinion, that Universalism is in a very high state of prosperity. The very spirit of the age seems to be with it, carrying it along. And I think I hazard nothing in saying that it is destined, at no distant period either, to become the great popular doctrine of New England. As certainly as the temperance cause must eventually triumph; as certainly as slavery must finally cease to be known among a free and unfettered people; as certainly as capital punishment must ere long be erased from our statute books; and as certainly as the great doctrine of human brotherhood is to become a doctrine of the church, so certain is it, that the doctrine of a full and complete Savior, and of one destiny for the whole human race, is eventually to become the religion of beautiful and vine clad New England!

Yours as ever,

THE SPY.

SALVATION FROM SIN.....NO. III.

BY REV. O. WILCOX.

"And thou shalt call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins."

It has been proved that Christ Jesus came to save all from sin, and that he will finally accomplish this glorious work, as surely as he proves faithful to his trust. And now I wish to show in what way it appears to me this work is to be accomplished. But first, it is necessary to understand clearly what is the fountain from which sin springs; for if we can drain the fountain, the streams will then dry up of themselves.

Sin, then, is clearly stated to be the transgression of the law, and the law is fulfilled by love, and love only, although there are many duties stated in the law which we owe to God and man, they are only the natural streams issuing from the fountain of love to God and man, upon which the law and prophets rest. Matthew, xxii: 36-40. Romans, xiii: 10. From this reasoning and testimony, we are able to see clearly that the fountain of sin is hatred to God and man; for if the law is fulfilled by love, and love only, it is clear that it is disobeyed by the opposite principle, which is hatred; and that this hatred constitutes the fountain from whence all will feel disobedience to the outward duties of the law springs.

The question now to be settled, is, whether Christ can remove this hatred in the breast of each, and plant in the same place that love which alone is the fulfilling of the law, and which will "work no ill to its neighbor." It is clear that he has this power if he has power to fulfill the law; and that the law can never be fulfilled by each, till each loves God as the law requires; for if the law is fulfilled by love, it can never be fulfilled by confining a subject in a situation where he can never love, but on the contrary, where he must hate God and his law eternally. All that is necessary, then, in order to accomplish this work, is for the Redeemer to present God in such a light as to have him appear amiable and lovely to each and all. Hence it is, that it is the "love of God that leadeth to repentance;" and if love leadeth to repentance, hatred can not accomplish the same work, for too directly opposite causes can not produce the same effect.

But it is admitted that what will be sufficient to lead one to repent and love God, may not reach the heart of another and melt it into love and obedience, but it is because, for the time being, he does not see it in the same light. But let the most hardened and rebellious have their eyes opened to see the full blaze of God's love shining upon them, above the splendor of the sun at noon day; let them learn that it was love that gave them being at first, that love has caused God to watch over them with infinitely more benevolence, than the mother watches her infant babe; let them see that it was the love of God that caused him to send his Son, clothed with his own mild and heavenly spirit to look for man while in his moral wanderings from God, and in a state of moral ignorance, death and starvation, and that he gave his Son the power to search them out from all their hiding places, and bring them back to their Father's table, and feed them with the rich dainties of his infinite love and goodness; let them see that the hatred, the insults and abuse of the murderers of Christ, were not sufficient to change his love into hatred, and his blessings into curses; and then let them see that in truth he was no respect of persons, but that he loves them with the same love, and that he died to confer a blessing on them while they were yet enemies; let them see this as clearly as Saul saw it, when he was on his way of persecution and death; and they will come to the ground as soon, and submit to the all conquering power of God's love shining on them through the Son, by which he is in truth taking away the sin of the world, reconciling it unto himself, by causing them to see him in such a light as to cause them to love him with the whole heart. And may the God of all grace and giver of all good, speed the day when we shall see, and feel, and rejoice in this love, that God, who is love, may in truth be all and in all, for ever and for ever.

DANGERS TO WASHINGTONIANISM.

We have looked with interest upon the cause of temperance as connected with the Washingtonian movement. We refer to this movement in particular, because we believe this alone to be founded on principles that can give it success. The world has been longing for reform in various particulars for many a year, but never has it, in modern times, sounded the note which called forth a simultaneous response, until the trumpet of salvation was heard, calling those dead in sin to newness of life. Its success has been unexpectedly and surprisingly great. Its praise is upon all our tongues, and its very name has come to be to us a holy word. But I fear lest the purity of the cause should be lost—lest its sacred name should be prostituted—lest it should be sounded as a catch-word with which to rally other forces that make quite other principles their ground of reliance. It is no guaranty of success that the multitude should raise the Washingtonian cry, if at the same time they neglect and despise the Washingtonian principles. The energy, the vigor, the true life, lies not in the name, but in the principles which the name designates. If these be supplanted, the name is little worth.

That there is some danger that these may be supplanted, I have long been convinced. Among those claiming to be Washingtonians, there are some who make the law their van-guard, and visit its curses in the severest manner upon the head of the transgressor, especially if his transgression consist in retailing the destroying beverage. "The law has condemned the inebriate," say they, "in times past, why should it not now thunder its condemnations in the ears of the drunkard maker? It is no more than just. The inebriate should now be left free, and his seducer should be made to suffer."

Thus they pretend to reason with themselves, and find a justification for substituting force for moral suasion with this class of opposers of the temperance movement. They seem blind to the fact that the law has never been able to reform the inebriate, and can evidently do no more for the retailer than for him. They forget that the very corner-stone in the true Washingtonian temple is a repudiation of force, and a Christian-like reliance upon truth and love. Now it is not enough that the principles of Washingtonianism are applied to one class of transgressors, when they may with equal propriety be applied to all classes. It is not the assumption of a name, but the living of the principles that makes a Washingtonian indeed; and he who has progressed no farther in this work than to labor in love with the inebriate, has need yet to be converted more fully to the truth.

I would not by license laws give support and permanency to the traffic. No; all countenance from this quarter should be taken away, and the retailer should be left to bear, by his own strength, the accumulating burdens of the public voice, and his own personal guilt. Let the "truth spoken in love" be held up before them as a mirror, in which they may see what manner of business they are engaged in, and be induced to abandon it at once and forever. In this way the energy of kindness will not be destroyed by the mingling therewith of the waters of malevolence, nor will the door be open for the taking of revenge under the pretended sanctions of justice.

I may recur to this matter again, and notice other dangers in the path of Washingtonianism.—Star of Bethlehem.

Read and adopted the Minutes of the last session.

Heard and adopted the report of the Committee of Correspondences, that charges had been preferred by a ministering brother of the Black river Association against the St. Lawrence Association, and a ministering brother of the latter Association, and that being unable, from various causes, to investigate the said charges, they beg leave to report them, with all the testimony received, to the Convention. They also recommended that the Convention appoint a Committee of five brethren to whom shall be referred the subject, with directions to examine, decide and report on the same during the present session, if practicable—if not, that they appoint a sub-committee of three of their number who shall perform the duties of said committee as early as possible, during the recess of the Convention.

The Moderator appointed, (and the Convention approved,) the following brethren to serve as said Committee of investigation—Brs. M. Ballou, J. K. Ingalls, S. Simonds, N. Stevenson, A. Yale.

The Moderator appointed the following committees: On adjournment—Brs. Morse, Ballou, and Goodrich.—On delegates to the U. S. C.—Brs. Ingalls, Hathaway and Moore. On preacher of occasional sermon—Brs. Seymour, Barry and J. S. Goodrich. On publication of Minutes—Brs. Grosh and Whitcomb. On preparation of Business—Brs. Aspinwall, Moore and Whitcomb.

The Council appointed the following standing Committees:—Correspondence—Brs. E. M. Woolley, T. J. Sawyer, S. R. Smith. Ordination—Brs. J. T. Goodrich, S. J. Hillyer and H. Boughton.

Received and read the Reports from the Associations represented, of which the following is an abstract:—Allegany has 8 societies, 2 meeting houses, 7 preachers, 1 Sunday School, 1 church. Black river, the same as last year. Cayuga, 13 societies, 11 meeting houses, 8 preachers, 3 Sunday schools, 3 churches. Central, 16 meeting houses (including 4 Union houses,) 17 societies, 10 preachers, 1 church and 2 Sunday schools. Chautauque.—societies, 2 meeting houses, and 6 preachers. Chenango, 13 societies, 7 meeting houses, 6 preachers, and 3 churches. Hudson river, 15 societies, 9 meeting houses, 7 preachers, 5 Sunday schools and 4 churches. Mohawk.—societies, — meeting-houses, 4 preachers. New York, 12 societies, 9 meeting houses, 11 ministers, Sunday schools and churches not reported. Otsego, 11 societies, 10 meeting houses (including two Union houses,) 5 preachers, 5 churches and 2 Sunday schools. St. Lawrence, the same as last year.

The following reports from the respective committees were severally heard and adopted. 1. No request for ordination. 2. Br. A. C. Barry preacher of the next occasional sermon. 3. Salisbury, Herkimer county as the place of the next meeting. * 4. Delegates to the U. S. Convention, Brs. T. J. Sawyer, J. Potter, T. J. Whitcomb, P. Hathaway, ministers; and B. Caryl, R. Case, A. Mudge, J. M. Hughes, G. Thomas and A. Metcalf, laymen.

The committee appointed to investigate the charges against the St. Lawrence Association, etc., reported, that on examining the Constitution of the Convention (Article 4,) and precedents, they did not feel at liberty (without express instruction of the Convention) to investigate the charges against the minister, said charges having been preferred by a minister, as an individual merely; but only those against the St. Lawrence Association—thus making it their duty to examine the facts of the proceedings of the Association, and not the facts of the minister's case, tried by it. Having signified this to the complainant, he submitted a written declaration, stating that as his main object was to procure an investigation of the preacher's guilt or innocence, he withdrew the charges against the St. Lawrence Association, so that the Committee find no cause for further action in the premises, and beg to be discharged. Adopted.

Resolved, That this Convention tender their acknowledgements to the Methodist society of Cooperstown for their liberality and Christian courtesy in granting us the use of their meeting house on this occasion.

Resolved, That the Clerks forward a copy of the above resolution to the Trustees of the Methodist society.

Resolved, That the thanks of this Convention be tendered to the friends in Cooperstown for their hospitality and kindness on the present occasion.

Resolved, That our thanks be tendered to Br. E. M. Woolley, for delivering the occasional sermon, and that he be requested to furnish the usual copy for publication.

The deliberations of the council were harmonious—the congregation so large as to bear division on Thursday forenoon, the singing excellent, and the preaching as good as usual on such occasions. We were kindly received and hospitably entertained. The weather only was unpleasant. As all the business performed is embraced in the Minutes, further remarks appear unnecessary. Per order, A. B. ## PROFANITY.....NO. VII.

BY REV. S. J. GIBSON.

Profanity is highly offensive to refined society, and no man will there be a welcome guest, unless he foregoes the practice; and this should be one great reason for every one addicted to it, to form a resolution to abandon it.

Does any one suppose that this habit is not offensive to refined society? Then let him place his attention upon the conduct of the young man who handles his oaths in a superior and off-handed style—who in the common walks of life, and during business hours, makes use of a profane word at the turn of almost every sentence. But let him step into the society of the ladies, and immediately the practice is nearly if not quite laid aside, and if an oath escape his lips, it is the result of his in-cautionness, and many times brings a blush upon his countenance. And why does he thus act? Because his better judgment gives him to understand, that there the habit of profanity is offensive. But why is it offensive to them? Because, as a general thing, female society is in possession of more refinement than that of the males. We are aware that this may be disputed by some—that the position is not a judicious one, for it will be urged that woman was the first to disobey the commandment of the Creator, and hence their faculties—and especially their moral powers can not be so sensitive and refined as are those of the males. It is freely admitted that woman was first to disobey the commandment, but surely man has made a wonderful improvement upon the work—he has revived and sent forth a more embellished edition, wherein disobedience is more fluently taught, and more extensively promulgated, and thus made ample amends for being second in the commencement. But if she was first in disobedience, she has also been the first to obey, so far as this habit is concerned, for as a general thing the female portion of the community is free from the evils of this vice, for it is very far from being in agreement with the feelings of refinement which we find most ladies to be in possession of; and no young gentleman, while in their society, if he has any just claims to respectability, will indulge in its use.

And though some may not be aware of the same, yet it is nevertheless true, that as society advances—becomes more refined in an intellectual and moral point of view, and nearer to what beings should be who bear the impress of a hand above, this habit diminishes; for as improvement goes onward, the practice is beheld in more correct light, and becomes more repulsive to the feelings of virtuous refinement. And that man who is so unfortunate as to be a slave to the practice, may be fully assured, that he thereby sinks himself in the estimation of all virtuous and truly moral men. I do not say that he is, or should be cast off and disowned, or regarded as a vagabond. No! This would be highly improper and unjust! But I do say, and I believe truth will sanction the assertion, that he does not stand as high in the estimation of virtuous and truly moral men, as he would, were he to use no profane language.

Here, then, is not the least of the evils arising from this foolish and I may safely say, vulgar habit; and where is there an individual, who would not like to possess, as far as possible, the good opinion of his fellow men, and especially of those who are looked up to as the guardians of the welfare of society—of those whose lives are rendered beautiful and lovely by their fair characters of virtue and morality! To accomplish this, is an object well worthy the attention of every individual endowed with intelligence, and to secure it should be the aim of every man, whatever be his standing or profession; but more especially should it be the aim of those who are but just setting out upon the journey of human life, and who have yet to establish characters of honor and respectability. How necessary, then, that those thus situated, move onward with prayerful attention—that they labor to remove every thing which can in the least serve to tarnish the brightness of honesty and virtue.—

And that this work may be successfully completed, not the least important thing, is the attention which should be bestowed upon the language which we employ. Let words of profanity never fall from our lips; but those of virtuous refinement alone, and we may be assured that virtuous society, will ever render credit to whom credit is due, and hence, we shall in no wise lose our reward.

CHANGE.

This is no new subject, yet, as the word is legibly impressed upon every terrestrial object—as it is one of the most prominent features of nature, and mortality, it may not be wholly useless, to bring it often to mind. The earth was once a mighty wilderness, interspersed with deserts, plains, lakes and forests. But behold its change. The surface of the barren uniformity seems invariable, when fanned by no zephyr, and agitated by no storm, but it is destined to change. It has its storm—its awful rushing hurricane, filling the atmosphere with scorching, oscillating sand clouds, that overwhelm the weary traveller and his wished for oasis, in ruin as hideous and unmerciful, as the fiery suffocation of the fatal simoon!

The plain, with green and even surface, at one time resembles the serene bosom of the softly undulating lake. At another, it is wrapped in flames which emit terrific volumes of smoke that fill the air with black, convolving clouds!

The lake—to-day wafts its precious burden calmly and safely over its crystal waters. Tomorrow, it will toss it on mountain billows, which at last fold above the wreck of a once proud ship, and cheerful crew.

The forest—at the will of Omnipotence, comes forth, and upright stands upon this passing sphere, its base. But it comes to change. Its autumnal garb of varied hue, is swept from its apparently dry and withered members, and winter seems to deprive it of the last semblance of life; save here and there, an evergreen that defies the power of the boreal blast. Then, spring again adorns it in a blooming robe of majestic beauty; and the admirer of nature's garden, appreciates all its grandeur. And do not all admire. Yes, all who are not frantic, comprehend the voice of air, modulated by waving boughs, its organs. All would fain grant it protection, and unanimously exclaim, "turn aside, thou sweeping tornado! blast not these stately pines, nor these proud oaks; these numberless emblems of sensible mortality, with thy vortical grasp, but spend thy strength upon the impervious rock, or on the sterile waste!" It has another change. The laborer's utensil hews it to the ground, it is sere and burned; the soil rendered arable, the seed scattered; and its upward change, from tender germ to yellow harvest is joyfully witnessed.

But we—frail, carnal accountables, are still more eccentric and unstable than these. One moment we enjoy all the pleasure that earth affords, we inhale it in every breath of spring—in every breeze that refreshes the opening blossom—in every smiling face, and sparkling eye! But, alas, it flies with the velocity of thought! The sarcasms of enemies, the flight of fortune, the consensuous reproof, are sufficient to capsize the cup of bliss, and present that of bitterness! But, mid all these seeming ills, we do not despair, we know they are transitory, and the glimmerings of the star of hope are never obscured from vision. We know, that when this flesh shall fall to its mother dust, an august change shall be participated, even these fragile tenements, exchanged for spirits of light—and this fluctuating world, for a heaven of happiness!

RELIGION.

BR. GROSH—I was reading in an old worn-out book, the other day, a definition of religion as follows. "Religion is the daughter of heaven, parent of all virtues, and source of all true felicity. She alone giveth peace and contentment, diverts the heart of anxious cares, and sheds unmingled and perpetual sunshine in the human breast. By her the spirits of darkness are banished from the earth, and angelic ministers of grace thicken unseen the regions of mortality. She promotes peace, love and good will among men, lifts up the head that hangs down, heals the wounded spirit, dissipates the gloom of sorrow, sweetens the cup of affliction, blunts the sting of death, and where ever seen, felt and enjoyed, there breathes around an everlasting spring."

Now I wish to draw a contrast between this religion and some of the religion at the present day. There is a certain kind of religion prevalent at the present day, which is exactly the reverse of that above described. Does the religion which is upheld, and strenuously adhered to and advocated, by the believers in endless misery, promote peace, love and good will among men; in neighborhoods and communities? Nay, the reverse of this is generally the case. I will instance a case within the knowledge of the writer.

There has been a great religious excitement going on in the town and vicinity where I reside. And instead of its producing love and good will among men, it produces hatred and discord among friends and neighbors—slander and the retailing of slander in the worst manner—and they have even gone so far, that if one member of a family does not believe as the others do, or as they want them to believe, they are turned out to the mercy of the world. Now which of these two kinds of religion is the religion of heaven? which is that pure and undefiled religion which St. James speaks of? I think we can safely affirm, without any fear of contradiction, that the wisdom of Heaven can be termed with propriety the religion of Heaven. If any person practices the principles of true and heavenly wisdom, that person practices the principles of the religion of Heaven.

Now let us find out what is heavenly wisdom. St. James, iii: 17, "But the wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy." Now, dear reader, if the religion that teaches the damnation of a portion of the human family forever, partakes of all or any of these characteristics, then it will be worthy your love and acceptance; but if not, cast it away as you would a thing full of deadly poison.

On the other hand, if that religion which teaches the salvation of the whole human race from sin and sorrow, partakes of the characteristics of the religion of heaven, then embrace it with your whole mind and soul, and great will be your reward.

PATIENCE IN THE PULPIT.

1. Be patient toward those loiterers and lingers who come late to public worship. They are a trial; for some of them live quite near the sanctuary, and it would cost but a slight exertion to be prompt to the time. Bear with them. They will all get in by and by, and then, besides the comfort of having men patient, you can enjoy the pleasure of thankfulness that they are in at last.

2. Bear too with that noisy worshipper. The church-door rings when he shuts it—he marches to his pew with the tread of a heavy dragoon. A crash announces his pew-door is closed. He has a cough that terrifies the nervous, and a sneeze that annoys many a church-slumberer. He snores too, to the manifest discomfort of the drowsy about him. It is a pity there were not such modifications of all these matters, as that you might have a sacred stillness in the place of prayer. But you must bear with him. He gives you a capital opportunity of improving by exercise in the virtue now recommended.

3. Be patient with the sleepers. Perhaps they have never yet awoke to the fact, that the house of God is not the most proper place to enjoy a nap.—Perhaps they will wake soon enough to hear the conclusion of your discourse, and to hear the better for their refreshing slumbers. It is a moving thought certainly, that you can look them up during the week, and taking your sermon in your pocket, you can inquire if they would not like to hear what they so unfortunately lost!

4. The noisy boys in the gallery and elsewhere, will try your patience. But you will add to your stock of knowledge by learning how poorly they are trained and disciplined at home; and how lovely an affair it is for parents to suffer their children to be beyond their sight and influence in the sanctuary.

5. Show sweet patience also towards that man yonder, who demonstrates his interest in the close of worship, by various timely preparations. Incipient steps are taken during the last singing. He buttons his coat; puts on his gloves; disposes of his spectacles; looks after his hat; grasps his whip or his cane, &c., all this before the benediction.—During that he gets the door of the pew ajar, ready for a leap into the aisle, and the benediction sounds are scarcely uttered, ere he begins his flight towards home. One would think from his haste, that his precious life depended on the despatch with which he could leave the sanctuary behind him. Bear with him. It is indeed a pity he shoots out of the house of prayer with such unbecoming haste; but be comforted. Time cures many evils. He will not be able to flee the Temple of the Lord in such swiftness, when increasing years have laid their burdens upon him. Think of that.

6. If yours is a country congregation, be patient to such parishioners as feel it indispensable to bring their dogs with them to meeting. It shows kindness; for how lonely the poor fellows would be at home! Besides, a goodly group of dogs patrolling the porch—whining after their masters—chasing one another up and down the aisles, and anon up the pulpit stairs, making all the children giggle, and starting church-officers and others in pursuit—all this will help keep people awake, will show the sanctuary is a place not altogether destitute of excitement, and will give an excellent opportunity for PATIENCE IN THE PULPIT.—Paschal.

ON HOPE.

How dreary and desolate would man's sojourn be upon earth, were it not that he is sustained by the cheering influence of the undying principle of Hope, which keeps alive within the human breast, when every other spring of comfort has dried up. Amid "the many ills which flesh is heir to," how would our natures "droop and die" unsupported by its cheering beams! In a world of vicissitude and change, how lamentable would be our condition, if hope were withdrawn; but it never leaves man.—Like some guardian angel it is ever near to cheer the desponding, to animate the weak, and strengthen the frail. It sweetens the bitterness of the cup of death. The gloomy dungeon of the condemned malefactor is irradiated by its orient rays. The tempest tossed mariner in his frail bark on the waves of the turbulent ocean, feels its influence, and acknowledges its power. The sorrows of the slave are mitigated by its healing balm.—The languishing beggar clings to it in the midst of his wretchedness; though he may have no home in the wide world, no bed but the cold earth, and no shelter but the sky. The high and the low, the young and the old, yea, all men without distinction, venerate hope. Now if this be the case when the mind rests on transitory things; what must that hope be which they have, "who have fled for refuge, to lay hold upon the hope set before them in the Gospel"—that hope which is "an anchor to the soul both sure and steadfast, and which entereth in within the veil"—a hope that stretches beyond mundane things; "from things seen and temporal," and fixes its steady gaze upon the world of beatitude and glory, "upon things unseen and eternal." This hope it is which cheers the Christian on his weary march through the desert, where serpents hiss, and lions roar; it encourages him amid all his privations, sorrows and difficulties, that they soon shall end.

"He knows that all these fleeting things, must yield to sure decay;" but he looks forward to the time when he shall be admitted into "the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens;" where temptations shall never enter, and trials never come. There, there shall be no "more curse—no more death—no more pain; neither sorrow nor crying, for the former things shall have passed away. Reader, permit us to ask, have you the hope we have been treating of; the hope which maketh not ashamed?" If you have, you must be happy—if you have not, you must be miserable; for the Scriptures state, that there are those who live without "hope, and without God in the world." To encourage you we would refer you to the holy Job, xix: 25 and 26, who was enabled to say when in affliction, "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth; and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God." Likewise to the psalmist David, who said, "happy is he that hath the God of Jacob for his help; whose hope is in the Lord his God." May it enable us to say with an Apostle when all sublunary things are receding for our view, "I have fought a good fight; I have finished my course; I have kept the faith."

MADISON COUNTY CONFERENCE AT BRIDGEPORT.

It was thought best by some that were present, that this affair should not slumber without a passing notice. The reason of its receiving this notice from those who might be supposed to be less interested than others, will be discovered as we proceed.

Brs. Van Campen and J. S. Kibbe concluded that they would attend the Conference at Bridgeport, and arrived there about 10 o'clock of the first day of the Conference. Our friends had made the necessary arrangements for the reception of those who should attend. We had anticipated meeting our ministering and lay brethren from different parts of the county and enjoying an interesting season. But we found when we had arrived at the place of meeting, that the preachers from Oswego county, (Brs. H. Van Campen and J. S. Kibbe) had monopolized the Conference altogether. For there was not a preacher of the county of Madison, nor were there any of the trustees of the several societies present, (of which preachers and trustees the Conference is composed)—consequently no business belonging to the Conference could be transacted, nor could it even be organized.

Well, what was to be done? Some people from a short distance around had come in, and we were all anxiously waiting the arrival of those that could organize the Conference and proceed to say what should be done, but none appeared. After the forenoon of the first day was pretty well used up, Br. Van Campen and Br. Kibbe thought they had come almost too far not to have a meeting, and so disappoint the people in the bargain; so their "monopolizing" spirit again getting the better of them, they appointed a meeting at two o'clock in the afternoon, at which time there was a number assembled to hear the good news of the kingdom.

Br. J. S. Kibbe preached in the afternoon. Br. Van Campen in the evening, and Br. Kibbe two miles east in the evening. Our hearts were rejoiced at the arrival of Br. Foster before the time of evening service. The young Timothy's were not without a Paul to aid and encourage them.—Next day in the forenoon, sermons were preached by Brs. Van Campen and Kibbe, and in the afternoon a sermon was preached by Br. Foster. It was truly a good sermon, treating of the promises and the joys of the Gospel.

We have a few faithful friends at Bridgeport, who seem to enjoy Universalism—it seems to be a living principle in their hearts; for they practice as well as profess it. We would suggest the propriety of their forming themselves into a society—it will tend to strengthen their hands in the good work—unite them more closely for building themselves and others up in the Redeemer's kingdom, and give character and efficiency to their means and efforts for the spread of primitive Christianity.

We learned that our friends talk of securing the services of our venerable and worthy Br. J. Foster, a portion of the time. This is as it should be—it is but a short distance from them, and no doubt would be glad to dispense the word of life to them, and both pastor and people be mutually benefited and their spiritual welfare advanced. Let our friends there and elsewhere, not only talk but act, and act in good earnest, for it is action that does business in religious as well as other matters.

But how did we adjourn that Conference? Why, by mutual consent we adjourned the Madison county Conference of Universalists to Mexicoville, Oswego county—so that Brs. Kibbe and Van Campen shall not have to travel so far to attend it, when deserted by its own preachers. Yet, this adjournment is subject to any alteration, amendment or correction which those more deeply interested may deem proper.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JUNE 9, 1843.

CHRISTIAN UNION.... NO. II.

The Disciples, or Reformers, or Campbellites, as they are variously termed, also started to reform all the old churches, and unite them into one, only, and universal Christian church. They laid down the Protestant principles—that the Bible was the only creed of Christians—that obedience to Christ as our Master, was the only evidence of that faith, required. The right of private judgment was strenuously argued, and the absurdity of requiring the assent of various minds to creeds, and to any one construction of Holy Writ, was ably pointed out. Every thing was to be clearly explained and fully proved, before belief in it could be asked; and even if not granted then, if only the Bible was received and obeyed in faith and practice, charity was enjoined, and it was declared that the disbeliever was justified, because he had not power to believe, save as the evidence presented, compelled him.

This body of Christians also denied being a sect—though they did not monopolize the Christian name to themselves—but only claimed to be disciples, or learners, in the school of Christ. The only points on which they required agreement, was baptism by immersion, as the only proper mode of entering into the kingdom of the Redeemer. Universalists and Partialists, Unitarians and Trinitarians, were alike received, not to disputation, but to general fellowship. Each one was told, that he might enjoy his opinions unmolested, and discourse of them in the social circle freely—but as all various and differing interpretations of the sacred text, were but opinions, it was deemed best that each one should confine himself to the language of inspiration, in all public meetings, and leave private opinions alone. All would thus be engaged in restoring the primitive doctrine of God the Father—the Messiahship of Jesus—the resurrection from the dead, and the spiritual kingdom of heaven—and in bringing back again "the ancient order of things," the breaking of bread on each first day of the week, and initiation into the kingdom by immersion.

So far all was well—perhaps—but in a short time, the majority began to press a few particular passages of Scripture, most prominently into their public teachings, on which they put, and argued for, a particular construction. Those passages spoke particularly of hell—of everlasting destruction and punishment—and the construction was either the endless punishment, or the total annihilation of the wicked. And now, if any one is hardy enough to prominently teach those passages of Scripture which speak of the salvation of the whole world, and of all men, and to urge their literal meaning as the correct one, it will soon be said that he is preaching his opinions instead of the word of God—that he is therefore a schismatic, and must be cut off from—what?—The sect of Campbellites? Oh, no; they deny that they are a sect—but from the fellowship of the disciples of Jesus! Thus they virtually deny the Christian name to all but those who go with them, and exclude from the kingdom of heaven all who differ from them—thus rendering themselves more sectarian and more intolerant and exclusive, in despite of all their professions to the contrary, than the other sects of Christendom. And as it has been with these two classes of Reformers and Unionists, so has it been with every other class that has started on the mission of breaking down all partition walls, and lessening the number of sects. They have but added another partition wall to the numbers already built up around men, and become, each of them, a sect among the other sects.

I will not say that they undertook an impossible task in endeavoring to unite all Christians into one general union; but I do say, that in the present state of society, it is a very difficult task; and if effected at all, it must be by very different means from those they employed. The less never can contain the greater—hence a narrow creed can never receive into fellowship, a wide spread one; nor can illiberal measures ever embrace more liberal ones. But the greater can contain the less—hence the simpler and more comprehensive the creed, or, (if you prefer the term,) the belief of any body of men, the easier will it embrace in its fellowship those of contracted faith and charity.

The same may be said of ceremonies. He whose mind is narrowed down to consider, as highly necessary to the Christian character, the performance of any particular rite or ceremony—or its performance in any particular manner—will not, can not embrace as many in his fellowship, as one who regards them merely as one set of means among many to accomplish an end, that may be used or disused, or that may be performed in any manner, only so that the end is attained. But more in my next.

THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.

The Christian life is compared to a fight—not to a succession of combats, at long intervals from each other, with periods of entire peace with the enemy, between—but to a single fight—a continual, steadily waged warfare with evil principles and evil practices, and habits, and propensities. Hence those brethren who suppose that all the requirements of Jesus can be answered by rousing up from a sleep of apathy and indifference once in two, five, or ten years, and making a vigorous onset against the powers of darkness, and then lie down again to slumber—are sadly mistaken both as regards the duty required of them, and as regards the character of the enemy they are called to war against.

How is it with your passions and propensities? Do they slumber for years together, and then at once rise in arms against your moral feelings, and after that lie down in peaceful slumber again? No—far from it!—Day by day—even hour by hour, some or more of them are presenting their enticements, singing their syren song, and clamoring for a little, and yet a little more indulgence than reason, propriety or conscience are willing to grant. Constant watchfulness is therefore required. And mark, too, how deceitfully they sometimes seize the unguarded avenue to approach you, and throw the fetters over the will—and how artfully they can disguise themselves in various garbs, to steal unheeded to their gratification. Some clad as angels of light, plead a zeal for God, or a love for human souls, to do deeds of ungodliness and cruelty—others under the garb of justice, rob, and steal, and plunder, that they may share the gain with the Treasury of the Lord—others under the cloak of temperance hide a most intemperate zeal—and thus, under the very virtue whose dress they assume, they stab it to the heart! Now when we know that such are our passions and propensities—that thus constant are their assaults, and artful their disguises—how worse than foolish to suppose that a single great effort, repeated at an interval of years, will suffice to keep them in subjection to the moral powers God has given us, and to the law of life in Christ, by which he has enlightened our understandings. No—no—let us enlist for life in this glorious warfare against the enemies of our purity and peace—let us plant the unsleeping sentinels on the very outposts, and charge every power within us to sleep, (if it sleep at all,) with the harness on, and the weapons in our hands, prepared at all times for the onset, and the fight. In this way the mastery over the foes of our happiness can be not only gained, but constantly maintained; so that we will have peace, because always prepared for the fight.

The careful gardener does not wait in careless indolence, until the nettle, thistle, and every foul weed, has overrun his soil, before he wages with them the war of extermination; but, one by one, as rapidly as each appears, he plucks them up by the roots, and casts them forth to die. So in the garden of the soul. Wait not until the weeds have run up, and scattered abroad their seeds to produce a new crop—but while you easily may, seize the yet tender vice, and eradicate the root before it can send its shoots downward and on every side, to baffle your skill and power. Take every enemy as soon as he appears—wait not for a regiment to gather themselves in regular array before you call out your forces to do it battle—for the earlier, and the more frequent, and constant even, the fight, the easier the victory.

The Christian life is compared, also, to a race, it is not spoken of as a succession of racess—one to be run after the other, at intervals of many months, and even years. As the battle is made up of blow after blow, carefully aimed and successfully struck, (not uncertainly beating the air, and wasting the strength, but each one striking the enemy in some vital part,) so the race is made up of step taken after step—constantly advancing forward—never losing one, never turning aside but to gain an advantage—never halting while life is left to run. We are to pray without ceasing, and in all things to give thanks to God—by which is meant, that we are to maintain a spirit of supplication and of thankfulness to God, constantly uprising within us. I am perfectly aware that some persons are discouraged by the idea that our warfare and our race are to be so constantly maintained, so unceasingly pursued through life. This discouragement arises from a wrong idea as to the character of our labors. These labors are joyous, and the more constant, therefore, the better.

THE FREEDOM OF CHRIST.

“Verily, verily, I say unto you, Whosoever commiteth sin, is the servant of sin. And the servant abideth not in the house forever; but the son abideth ever. If the son, therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed.” John vii: 34–36.

The allusion here, is probably to the system of servitude, and the rights and powers of servants among the Jews. The servant did not reside perpetually, or always, in the house of the Jewish master—the year of jubilee, or term of service expired, set him free. The servant had, therefore, no part or lot in the family inheritance, and could not finally dispose of it. As an overseer duly appointed, he could direct the labors of other servants under him, but could not entirely free them. But the son of a family is a perpetual resident in his father's house—he has a part in the inheritance, and a voice in its disposal, and can set entirely free any servant falling to his lot.

Whether Jesus contrasted himself with Moses, as the servant of God in giving the law, or with sin personified, as the temporary and unlawful task master over the servants under its authority, the comparison is equally just, true, and honorable to the divinely appointed Redeemer. To the Son, only, do the children of men rightfully belong. All other powers and authorities into whose possession any of the human race may fall for a time, have no part or lot in their proper ownership, and therefore no right to dispose, finally, of a single soul of the race of Adam. Under the providence, and wise permission of God, they are servants in authority, but have no final disposal of those in their possession. But Jesus is the appointed and lawful heir of all things. He can make free, indeed—the liberty he bestows is according to the perfect law of the divine government, and all freed by him are perfectly free and perfectly obedient—enjoy perfect liberty to what they please, because they please to do only what is right. And this freedom he confers on his disciples by making known unto them the truth respecting the right, and the good.

The Jews were in bondage to the cumbersome rites and ceremonies of their Law—a bondage the more oppressive, because they rested in the letter of the Law, to the great neglect of its spirit—in the mere performance of its ceremonies, to the neglect of what those ceremonies were intended to effect in the present time, or to foreshadow in the future. And by thus resting in the externals and letter of their law, they confined their minds to a very narrow range of knowledge, and their hearts to an equally limited sphere of affection and sympathy, and were thus the servants of ignorance, including in this term prejudice and superstition.

Ignorance is the parent of sin—not total ignorance, but that partial knowledge of some subjects and partial ignorance of others, which unitedly renders the sinner's mind misty, and causes all acts and consequences to appear to him inverted in size, distance and appearances. And the Jewish mind being thus effectually rendered misty by the addition of human traditions and heathen fables to their imperfectly revealing Law, they were peculiarly under the bondage of sin—of error in theory and error in practice; for the latter is often the consequence of the former. It was therefore highly necessary that the Jews should not only hear the words of Jesus, but abide and continue in them (verse 31)—grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour—and then would they know the truth so experimentally and convincingly that it would make them free.

SLANDER.

The following decision possesses considerable interest to the Universalist public. It shows clearly the state of public feeling, the progress of liberality; and that judicial authority is independent of, and superior to orthodox detraction. Would that more juries could be found who possess the same degree of independence and regard for justice. Long enough have Universalists who have honestly and sincerely asked to be dismissed from orthodox churches, been imposed upon by trials, suspensions, excommunications and the like. It is high time we should maintain our rights, and teach these reverend slanderers that we live in a country of religious liberty, protected by “the laws that be.” The conduct of Capt. Hawes during the whole trial is worthy of the highest commendation. His wife was basely slandered, and it became his duty as a husband and a Christian, to repel these charges which were designed to destroy her influence and blast her reputation forever. His example is worthy of being imitated.

The following article is from the Trumpet.

The Rev. Charles Rockwell, formerly of the United States Navy, and author of quite a popular work entitled, “Foreign Travel and Life at Sea,” was tried at the May term of the Supreme Court in Barnstable County, last week, on the charge of maliciously slandering the character of Mrs. Elizabeth B. Howes, wife of Capt. Howes, of Chatham. The trial excited great interest, throughout Barnstable County, in consequence of the respectable standing of the parties. Mrs. Howes is connected with some of the best families in Massachusetts; and Mr. Rockwell is, as we are informed, of high family connections.

It appeared from the testimony of the witnesses, that Mrs. Howes was for many years a cherished member of the Church of which Mr. Rockwell is pastor; that about two years ago she became dissatisfied with the doctrine of Calvin, and asked a dismission from the Church; but instead of complying with this reasonable request, the members of the Church were persuaded by their pastor to suspend her from their communion for the space of six months, in the hope that she might be induced to give up her belief in the doctrine of Universal Salvation; and, thereby save them from the painful necessity of excommunicating her. But finding her faith firm and unwavering, Rev. Mr. Rockwell and a few of his Church members labored to destroy her influence.

Mr. Rockwell for a long time was actively engaged in propagating the most slanderous reports respecting her character; and for this an action was brought against him by her husband. After a full investigation of all the circumstances in the case, the jury, (one-third of them Orthodox church-members,) gave a verdict against him. Mr. Rockwell's counsellors were men of character, and legal attainments; and as a matter of course did all they could to save the character of their client. But they labored in vain and spent their strength for nought. His learned counsel in closing the defence, stated to the jury, that Mrs. Howes had not suffered in the least in her reputation in consequence of the statements made by Mr. Rockwell respecting her, because no one believed them to be true;—and that his client, like most other clergymen, is poor, and had as much as he can do to support himself and family; and from these two considerations he argued that the amount of damages should be merely nominal. The Jury, therefore, in consideration of all the circumstances, decided that he should pay all the expenses of the trial, and awarded damages to Capt. Howes, in the sum of $391. A small sum to be sure; but when we consider Mr. Rockwell's circumstances, we think it quite enough.

Let this decision be a warning to orthodox priests.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

P. H. G. will please send us the printed copy (in all cases where it is practicable) of the extracts she wishes us to publish. But if not practicable, she should be careful to designate what is selected from what is original; lest, by our mistaking and publishing it for hers, in consequence of a want of such care on her part, we bring upon her reproach and mortification. We came near doing so with an article in her budget now before us, before we discovered it to be selected.

P. H. G. is at liberty, of course, to have published the articles named by her.

APOLOGY.—My brother, C. C. P. Grosh, the Printer and part proprietor of this paper, has been confined by illness to his house, since the 1st inst. He is now recovering from his severe illness. That illness, added to the removal of the office, and of my own family, has probably caused some things to be neglected in our affairs. My absences from home, also, may cause some errors in our paper to appear. Those who read the proof sheet do well, but are not always well acquainted with the subjects treated of, nor in the habit of performing that duty.

DEATHS.

In this city, on the 29th ult., of an affection of the liver, Miss WEALTHY P. WRIGHT, in the 26th year of her age. In the death of this young woman, her relatives and friends have sustained a very great loss. She was an affectionate and active daughter, and sister, and friend, and lived highly respected and esteemed by all who had the pleasure of her acquaintance. But she hath finished her labors here, and hath gone to the land of rest and joy; and may the God of mercy through the consolations of the Gospel of his Son, comfort all who by this dispensation have been called to mourn.
H. B. SOULE.

In New Hartford, on the 1st inst., of consumption, Mr. HIRAM GREEN, aged 21 years. Funeral on the 2d, at the Universalist church. Sermon by
H. B. SOULE.

At his residence, in West Monroe, Oswego county, April 16th, of pleurisy, HENRY WILLIAMS, M. D., aged 56 years. In the death of Dr. Williams, the stale slander that Universalism will not do to die by, was practically, therefore successfully, refuted. He was enabled by its sustaining power, to converse freely upon those subjects, then of the greatest importance to him, and frequently remarked that he was ready to receive the summons of death—that his only pain was physical—that his work was done, and he was ready to depart. He was in possession of that faith which robbed death of all its terrors, and even robed it in the garments of a welcome messenger. A few months previous to the time of his departure he held a conversation with a sister of his, a member of the Presbyterian church, in which he stated that he felt that the "bitterness of death was past"—that he thought that, should death claim him as a victim that hour, he should fear no evil; and but a short time before he died, he referred her to the above conversation, and told her that the reality found him no less ready to go, than he anticipated. He seemed even anxious to go. His son, Nathan Williams, M. D., was with him during most of his illness, and at his solicitation frequently examined the state of his pulse, and from the frequency of such examinations was obliged to return much the same answers, when the deceased replied, that he felt anxious to hear him say that his pulse was gone; and when he was informed that pulsation had ceased, he answered, in a tone and manner that bespoke more than he said—"REJOICE!" Thus did the sustaining influence of the Restitution triumph over the fear of death. His funeral was attended on the 18th, and a sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Lenard, Presbyterian, by whom an obituary was published, in the secular papers of the county, an extract from which shall close this notice.

"In the death of Dr. Williams, the community have sustained a great loss. He stood high in his profession—eminent in the principles of philanthropy, and an exemplary Christian. About twelve hours before he died, he became sensible that his continuance here would be very short. But in the full possession of his reason, he frequently addressed his family and friends around him on the subject of dying, and other important subjects, and marked the progress of the disease that was fast closing up his life, with the greatest composure, exhibiting to the last moments of life, the power that an unshaken faith in Christ has over death."

* * Luminary please copy.
H. VAN CAMPEN.

In Mexico, May 22d, an infant son of Luther and Lydia Fowler, aged 2 months and 7 days. May the consolations of the Gospel of God's superabounding grace comfort those that mourn, and fill them with the fullness of peace. Sermon on the 24th, by the writer.
H. VAN CAMPEN.

In New Marlborough, on the 3d of March, of pleurisy, Mrs. FANNY GIBSON, wife of Mr. John Gibson, aged 57 years. By this dispensation of Providence, our brother has been called for the third time, to mourn the loss of an affectionate companion; and her relatives and acquaintances, a firm friend, and an exemplary associate. Mrs. Gibson was possessed of a sound and well regulated mind; modest and retiring in her manner, she was beloved and respected by all that had the pleasure of her acquaintance. She exhibited in her life, the elevating power, and happy influence of the faith that works by love, and purifies the heart; and her many virtues will ever be cherished by one, who fully appreciated the excellence of her character, the loveliness of her disposition, and the sincerity of her affections.
P. H. G.

In Ellisburgh, May 8th, 1843, Mrs. LYDIA POTTER, consort of the late Ephraim Potter, aged 65 years. She was only permitted to remain seven weeks after the death of her companion, before she was laid by the side of him who had shared her joys and sorrows from youth to a good old age. And notwithstanding they have left three sons and four daughters to mourn their loss, yet they are comforted by a remembrance of their good moral character, Christian deportment and the assurance that they have gone to that God who is good to all, and that they shall finally join them in chanting praises to God as the Father of all, and Jesus as the Redeemer and Saviour of man from sin, ignorance and death. The funeral services attended in the meetinghouse at Mannsville on the 9th, when the consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourners and friends, by the writer.

GENESEE ASSOCIATION.—This body will meet at Aurora, Erie county, N. Y., on Wednesday, June 21st, and continue in session for two days.

All, both clergy and laymen, who can make it convenient, are invited to attend. It is hoped we may have a full delegation as one effort more will be made to ask for this body the fellowship of the New York State Convention of Universalists. Brethren let us one and all pray over this matter and come together prepared to talk and vote in the unity of the spirit.
D. ACKLEY, Standing Clerk.

The Otsego Association will hold its next annual session at Fly Creek, Otsego county, on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday (28th and 29th) in June. The council will convene at 8 A. M., Wednesday—occasional sermon at half past 10, by Br. A. C. Barry. The usual invitation is cordially extended to ministering brethren and friends generally—they will find a committee waiting to direct them, at the Universalist church. O. WHISTON, Standing Clerk.

The Steuben Association will meet in annual session at Springwater, on the first Wednesday and Thursday (5th and 6th) of July next.

Our ministering brethren knowing our wants, will, I am sure, attend our meetings if practicable. Therefore, to them I repeat not the usual formality of invitation and request.—To our lay brethren, I should perhaps use a little more persuasion—especially to those within the limits of this body. Come up, then, brethren—let us bear from all, without reserve. Assist in our deliberations, that we may ascertain whether we shall stand or fall.

Those from a distance, who will attend the Conference, enquire for J. H. Stevens, J. Phelps, J. Goodno, J. Healy, where they will find feed for their horses, and something (not bread alone) for themselves. I am not acquainted at Springwater, therefore can give no directions. But I will venture to say, enquire for friends, and you will find them here.

THY WILL BE DONE.

BY HON. J. BOUVIER.

Thou source of wisdom and of power,
Thou God supreme, who from thy throne
On mankind dost thy blessings pour,
Knowing all things, thyself unknown—
Content to share thy heavenly care,
(Oh! bold presumption let me shun,)
And be this still my only pray'r,
Thy will be done.

I feel I'm weak, I know I'm blind,
And evil prone to ask for good—
Enlighten thou my darkened mind,
My faith in thee be still renewed;
Teach me, just God, to trust in thee,
(Oh! bold presumption let me shun,)
A mortal's prayer should only be,
Thy will be done.

Thou wilt not change thy just decrees,
Always, eternal God, the same,
If with thy will my prayer agrees,
I need not then implore thy name:
But should my heart with folly pray,
(Oh! bold presumption let me shun,)
Kind Father, teach my soul to say,
Thy will be done.

SCENES IN THE DRAMA OF HUMAN LIFE.

BY MRS. F. M. BAKER.

SCENE SECOND.

Mr. John Giles was a merchant of very respectable standing and property. He was considered an honorable business man, whose prime motive in action was the opinion of the world; and who troubled himself very little about religious or moral principles; who asked himself far oftener, what will Squire This, or Judge That, say, if I act so and so; than, Is it right? is it just?

Mrs. John Giles was a very fat, a very proud, and a very ignorant woman. It was only by marrying Mr. G., that she obtained access to the upper crust of society, (as Fowler, the Phrenologist, terms those who rank themselves above their fellows,) and where she did little either to her own credit or the profit of others.—“Can you assist me a little this evening?” said the lady to her husband, as he rose from the tea-table to go to his shop. “About what?” asked he. “Making arrangements for our party,” was her laconic though comprehensive reply. “Has our turn come?” asked he in no small consternation, and scratching his head as was his wont when casting up heavy bills.

“Why if we are to give one, we may as well do it now as wait longer,” answered the fat lady. “If we must give one. Ah! that’s the thing; where’s the necessity of giving one at all?” “Every necessity in the world, if you make a practice of going to other people’s parties. I told you when we were first invited, that we had better not go, unless we could return the compliment.” “I don’t like these fashionable jams,” said the husband in a pettish tone, after a long pause. “Neither do I,” replied his wife in a sympathizing tone, “when I have to give it myself. But it must be done, and we may as well begin first as last.” “I suppose the expense will be enormous,” said Mr. Giles, after a few moments calculation. “Not over one or two hundred dollars,” was the reply—“that is what Capt. Low’s and Col. Tibb’s cost.” “Well, that doesn’t grow on every bush that you and I pick!” said the now really startled husband. “Well, if you can’t afford to give a party, you shouldn’t go to one!” said the lady rather tartly—“that’s all I can say.”

Mr. Giles walked twice across the room, looked out at the window, and scratched his head furiously. “Who shall we invite?” asked he, turning quickly round.—“All who are in a habit of giving large parties,” was the answer. “Ah! that’s it, just for the sake of being asked in turn.” “Yes, for what else should we ask one half who help to make up a party. Regular botes are some, half fools are others, and many whose presence we could not tolerate in a private or domestic circle.”

The list of invitable ones was finally drawn up, and approved. Mr. G. gave his wife twelve ten dollar bills, and bade her make that meet all the charges, as he left the house. She had scarcely placed the money in her purse and prepared herself to go out to make the, to her, so important disposal of it, when a knock was heard at the back door. “A poor woman would like to see you,” said Kitty looking in at the half open door of the parlor.

Mrs. G. followed her to the kitchen, where she found a poor washwoman, who asked her for the small pitance which the lady owed her for washing six weeks before. “I have not one cent of change now, Mrs. Jackson. I am very sorry, but I shall want you all day to-morrow and perhaps all night; for I am to have company, and I want you to help prepare, and perhaps wait on them.” “I don’t see as I can come, Mrs. Giles, my little Dick is very sick with the lung fever. This is the seventh day since he was taken, and I could not leave him to go out to work, and our scanty stock of provisions is all gone. So I thought may be you would pay that little bill, and I could get something for the other children to eat and a little medicine for Dick.”

“I am dreadful sorry, Mrs. Jackson, I haven’t any small change now. But don’t say you can’t come to-morrow. You must certainly, and it is so near you can run home often and look after Dick. And then I will pay you for the whole, which you know will be quite a little sum,” said the lady smiling. “So remember and not disappoint me, for I shall depend upon you.” And she hurried from the room, either anxious to avoid hearing the woman’s reply, or to escape from her own reflections. “Oh! what shall I do?” groaned poor Mrs. Jackson. “I will lend you a little money,” said the kind hearted Kitty. “I wish I could afford to give it to you. And here is something to feed the children,” she added, as she gave the poor woman some broken pieces of food. “If mistress finds fault, I will eat the less myself.” The washwoman’s heart was too full to reply, and she hastened home, invoking blessings upon Kate.

How many a lesson in all the holier, kindlier feelings of man’s nature, might the rich and great learn of their despised, neglected servants! How thankful should we be that God judges by the heart, and that he is no respecter of persons.

Mrs. G. was gone all that day making purchases, and giving orders and invitations for the party. The next day Mrs. J. came. The faint hope of obtaining a little money which she so much needed, urged her to such a step, although her heart sank within her as she gave directions to her half famished children to be very quiet, and take good care of poor sick brother Dick; who, half unconscious, lay upon the bed more dead than alive.

Mrs. G.’s house underwent a metamorphosis from attic to basement, which with cooking and cleaning gave Mrs. J. very little time to run home to look at her sick boy. And Mrs. Giles seemed to have entirely forgotten the whole affair, so engrossed was she with the, to her, so much more important affairs of the party. She kept the washwoman till late at night, when she was sent home without her pay, because the lady could not leave her company to look for it.

Next morning early, according to order, she called; but the lady was not yet up. Who could be expected to rise early after such a day and night of fatigue and dissipation? The sick boy grew daily worse. His heart-sick mother almost discouraged, refrained from calling upon her employer for several days. When she came again, the lady had gone into the country on a visit!

In two weeks she returned. Almost her first inquiry of Kate was, “what has happened since I have been gone; any thing new or worth telling?” “Nothing in particular, ma’am, except that Dick Jackson is dead,” replied Kate. “Why, do tell,” said the lady with indifference. “well his mother will have one the less money to feed now.” “And little enough to feed them with,” thought Kate, “if all are like you.”

LOOK OUT FOR THE SNAKE.

The following striking illustration is an extract from the Lecture on Temperance, recently delivered by the Rev. Mr. Turnbull, in the Odeon:—

“Allow me, for a moment, to transport you, in imagination, to the banks of some lonely stream far off among the hills. There, beneath the shade of a wide spreading tree, you perceive a lovely boy asleep, in the soft security of unconscious innocence. The air is bland, the bees are humming among the flowers, the birds are singing among the branches, and all nature is instinct with beauty and gladness. That boy is dreaming of his home, of his mother, perhaps, or of his little sister, with whom he has been playing all the morning in the woods. But look again;—do you see that serpent gliding stealthily along, with its eye fixed upon the boy? It draws nearer and nearer;—there, it mounts upon his body,—erects his crested head,—swells and quivers with rage, and now—now, with the rapidity of lightning buries its fangs in his neck. Awakened to the danger of his situation, he screams with terror, and struggles for a moment with his enemy, but all in vain. A change comes over his countenance;—his bright blue eyes grow dim;—a convulsive shudder passes over his frame, and all is still. By and by, friends come to the place, discover the melancholy catastrophe, carry the child to his heart broken parents, and afterwards follow him with slow and mournful steps to the grave. What will be done to the serpent? One cries, ‘Kill it.’ ‘O, no,’ cries another, ‘that would be wrong. He is a creature of God; See how beautiful his colors, how graceful his movements! We shall tame him,—bring him under discipline,—use him very moderately and carefully, bring him into our houses or put him into the bar room of our village, and render him a source of infinite amusement.’ ‘But look,’ cries a third, ‘there is blood upon his jaws! he has killed the child, and ought to be stoned without delay.’ ‘Not quite so fast, my good friend,’ exclaimed the former speaker,—‘that was a mere accident, it was not the fault of the serpent, but of the child, who ought to have known better, or of his parents, who ought to have kept him at home.’ ‘But,’ says an old sagacious looking man—who till this time had taken no part in the conversation—‘I advise you all to look out for him, for he may bite again!’ ‘O!’ it is replied, ‘we shall take care of that.’ ‘I’m sure he won’t bite me,’ says one. ‘Nor me,’ says another. ‘Nor me,’ cries a third. So exclaim the majority, in their unparalleled sagacity. The serpent is therefore introduced to the family circle, and with some few precautions, is permitted to gambol with the children.

“Why is it, that in this city, the most polished, the most intelligent, and perhaps the most religious in the land, a more malignant serpent is not only suffered to roam at large, but is nursed and guarded by municipal regulations. Why is it that his trail is found in every street, that his fiery eyes look out from every tavern, and that he lies coiled up in every grog-shop? Why is it that he is permitted to plant his deadly sting in the hearts of our friends, our acquaintances and our children?—Have not we—have not our municipal authorities listened to the shrieks of his dying victims, and followed him in multitudes to the grave. Where is our benevolence, where is our wisdom, where, above all, is our religion, if we suffer this? Can we answer it to our consciences, or our God, if we longer permit the monster to roam at large, or even to exist?”—[Trumpet.

THE FUTURE LIFE.

A sermon preached at the funeral of Mrs. Maxfield, on January 3d, 1843. The text was selected by the deceased, and it was her desire that the sermon to be preached from it, might be printed, and kept by her children.

BY REV. A. C. BARRY.

"And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." 1 Cor. xv: 49.

This is but a repetition in the Apostle's argument, of what he had before affirmed. At nearly the commencement he holds the following language:—"But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept. For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive."

In this passage, not only is the number to be raised, determined, but also their after condition. That all bear the image of the earthy man; that all like him, are mortal, will not be disputed. In this sense, all die in him—they die bearing his likeness—mortality and corruption. What other inference then can be drawn, or to what other conclusion can we arrive, save that the Apostle was speaking of the resurrection of all mankind?

Christ, by his resurrection, brought life and immortality to light for every human being, and in this sense he is the first fruits of the great harvest of the resurrection. The first fruits, when gathered, showed that the whole harvest would be sure. So, by the resurrection of the Son of God, we are assured that life and immortality will be granted to every intelligent creature. This appears to be the sum and substance of the Apostle's reasoning in the 20th verse. His explanation in the 22d, renders this fact perfectly evident. "For, (because,) as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive."

We have introduced these passages thus far, to show that the apostle was speaking of the resurrection of all mankind. If we read on, this fact is rendered still more evident. Throughout his whole discourse he speaks in general terms; nor does he once give us the slightest intimation that his language, fully implying universality, is to be understood in a limited sense. It appears that there were those among the Corinthian brethren, who had apostatized from the true faith, and embraced Sadduceism, which taught that there was no resurrection of the dead. And it was in opposition to this erroneous and pernicious sentiment that the apostle wrote. It is plain, therefore, that in combating this species of unbelief, he must have spoken in general terms when he declared that the dead must be raised—that there must be life beyond the grave. We beg leave, however, to introduce one more passage. "So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, death is swallowed up in victory." That the apostle refers in this passage to the resurrection of every son and daughter of Adam, is at once seen. If he were speaking of the resurrection of a part only, how could he say with propriety, that then the saying would be fulfilled, Death is swallowed up in victory? Death, says Dr. Adam Clark, can only be destroyed and annihilated by a general resurrection; if there be no general resurrection, it is most evident that death will still retain his empire. It is obvious, on this view of the subject, that the apostle was speaking of the resurrection of all intelligent beings.

We now come to a more immediate consideration of the important subject contained in our text.

"And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly."

By the image of the earthy man or Adam, we may understand, first, those principles of dissolution stamped on the physical being, through whose influences the outward man perishes day by day. This will not be denied. Second, we may understand by the image of the earthy man; corruption, imperfection. That Adam was made subject to vanity, is plain. If he had been created perfect, he could not have sinned; but when the tempter appeared before him, he would have resisted him as did our Saviour, and like him would have gone through life, and through the world, and through temptation, unspotted and uncorrupted.—The very fact of his sinning is sufficient to establish the point that he was created imperfect; for if he had been holy, he could no more have sinned, than God can sin.

Mortality and corruption then, form, or constitute the image of the earthy man; and this image mankind universally bear.

By the image of the heavenly man, we may understand immortality and holiness. We need not go into proof of this fact—the simple statement is sufficient. This likeness is to be borne in the resurrection, by all who have borne in this state the image of the earthy man. In that clime, where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary find eternal rest, the vanities and corruptions of time will be laid aside, and a ransomed universe shall stand forth crowned in the glorious likeness of our Saviour and Lord. Sin shall then be finished, transgression find an end, the corruptible put on incorruption, and mortality be swallowed up of endless bliss.

This is not mere idle declamation—the language of the apostle amounts to this, if it amounts to any thing. View it as you may, it teaches the salvation of a world from death and sin. So surely as mankind have borne the image of the earthy, so surely shall they bear the image of the heavenly, which is Christ. This fact is not only declared in the text, but in another passage we have before quoted. "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." Now, if this proves any thing, it proves universal holiness and consequent happiness. If it be proof of the salvation of one individual, it is proof of the salvation of the human race. For the change referred to, is as necessary to one, as to another. All die in Adam—they die bearing his image—they die imperfect men and women, possessing the propensities and passions of our common nature. This is abundantly testified to by the apostle when he says, "It is sown in corruption.... it is sown in dishonor.... it is sown in weakness."

The argument we are noticing is introduced by the apostle in his letter to the Romans, where it is pursued to a much greater length. "Therefore, as by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life. For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous. Moreover, the law entered, that the offence might abound. But where sin abounded, grace did much more abound; That as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life, by Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. v: 18-21.

If this argument is not conclusive in favor of the final restoration, purification and happiness of a fallen and sinful world, we do not well see how one could be framed that would be. The apostle contends that the blessings produced by the obedience of Christ, shall more than counterbalance the evils produced by the disobedience of our first parent. The same many who were made sinners by Adam's transgression, shall be made righteous by the obedience of the Son of man; and where sin abounded, grace shall much more abound—i. e. extend beyond, and reign through righteousness unto eternal life.

This, then, is proof positive, that the change of which the text speaks, shall be experienced by all—proof sufficient to carry conviction to every unbelieving heart, and to give hope to every despairing soul.

We hazard nothing in asserting, that not one passage in all the Bible can be produced, which will go to show that a part only are to bear the image of Christ in the resurrection. We are aware that there is one which would probably be adduced, and is found in John v: 28, 29, "Marvel not at this, etc." But we have yet to learn that this passage has reference to a literal resurrection. To suppose it had, would be to array the Saviour and the apostle one against the other. And furthermore, we would have to account for the fact, that it was spoken of as an event near at hand, when thousands of years would intervene ere it would transpire. And again we would be compelled to show, that a certain portion of mankind had always done good, and the remaining portion evil; or else to admit that every individual would come forth to both resurrections at one and the same time.—By understanding the passage to refer to a spiritual or figurative resurrection, these difficulties all vanish. The passage, then, furnishes no proof that a part only will come forth, in the resurrection, in the likeness of the Saviour.

If the enemies of man were finally to triumph over the greater portion of the human race, why is the exclamation raised by the apostle? "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" The sting of death, he tells us, is sin; and if death is destroyed, will its sting remain to torture and torment millions of intelligent beings? If so, the triumphant exclamation can never be adopted.

That the resurrection is to be one to happiness for all, is fully shown by the fact that it is an object of hope. Thus St. Paul hoped for the resurrection, both of the just and the unjust. Acts xxiv: 15. But would he have hoped for the resurrection of the unjust, if they were to be endlessly the losers by it? Hope is a compound of desire and expectation, therefore Paul both desired and expected the resurrection of the unjust as well as of the just.—But could he have done this, if the former were to be raised to utter hopelessness and despair. We think not. Not even the most unfeeling and depraved being in the wide universe could desire such an event; how much less the apostle, upon whom the spirit of the living God was poured? He must have hoped to see them ultimately crowned with holiness and bliss at the right hand of the Father. And this all good men desire. They desire the salvation of the world, and the utter destruction of the enemies of man. This desire is exhibited in their prayers for the removal of darkness, and the leading of captivity captive. And we may all hope for the full accomplishment of the divine mission of the Son of God. We may hope for the dawning of that everlasting day, when an end shall be made of all transgression, when death shall be destroyed, and tears be wiped from off all faces.—For such a hope we have a sure foundation in the word of God. The voice of inspiration has declared the final ransoming of the captives, and the endless triumph of love divine. O, what a period will that be—what a time of rejoicing, when friend meets friend around the throne of God; when the mother is again united to her children; when the pealing shout of joy goes up at the return of the last prodigal, and the last tear of sorrowing humanity is wiped away! O! let me live and die in anticipation of so glorious a period, and I ask no more. If it be but a delusion, O, rob me not of it—suffer it to remain, to cheer me in sorrow, to tune my heart to praise!

These views, I understand were ardently cherished by our departed friend. She looked forward by faith to a time when the reign of sin shall be terminated, when the last enemy shall be destroyed, and the whole family of man stand before God, cleansed from all earthly pollution, and made as the angels. She believed that the plans and purposes of her heavenly Father would certainly be consummated, his promises be fulfilled, the mission of his Son prove successful, and a world be saved, to sin no more. And thus believing, she was prepared for all that awaited her in life and in death. Her whole trust was in the mercy of God through Christ, and she knew that that could not fail. And though for a long season—though borne down by the oppressive hand of disease—she looked upon all as the ordainings of a kind Providence, and considered that these light afflictions which were but for a moment, were designed to work out for her a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.—And with her unshaken belief in the salvation of a world, her firm trust in the living God, and her well grounded hope in his mercy, she was prepared for the dying hour. She felt assured that she was to be separated from her friends only for a short period. And what a blessed assurance is this! It robs death of his sting, and the grave of its darkness. It makes soft the couch of disease, and smoothes the dying pillow!

It now only remains for me to invite the mourning friends to the same fountain of consolation. I know it is hard to lay those we loved in the grave. I know how the heart is wrung when the last look is taken. But the belief that our sister cherished, has power to bear us up under the mightiest affliction, and to wipe the tears of grief away. Let it then be yours, my friends. It will yield you comfort in this your hour of sorrow; and when you come to die, it will point you beyond death's gloomy vale, to that happy land where parting is unknown, and where we all shall stand at last, in the image of him who gave himself for us. Amen.

MORNING.

BY MRS. P. H. GIBSON.

There is something in the sound of this word, that thrills in the bosom of every lover of nature. Even in the dreary winter time, there is an interest thrown around the advent of day, uninspired by any other portion of time. Amid the grim dominion of darkness and frost, is seen, first, the light of that gentle semblance of hope—the day star—sweet assurance of the approach of morn.—But the gentle light of the dawn soon gives place to the brighter glories of the rising sun. To the weary laborer, who, pent up among machinery, or in his shop, finds it necessary thus to spend his nights in toil, how cheering is the light of morn!—With what pleasure does he hail the day star!—How eagerly he drinks in the light of day! How it invigorates his toil-worn frame.

And to the enterprising student, who has sought knowledge while others slept, how refreshing to his aching eyes the better sunlight seems. How oft in his researches among the darkness of error, that prevades many a subject, has truth, in all its bright beauty, beamed upon his understanding, opening to his enraptured vision higher and holier fields for the exercise of his upward-bound mind. So now, the source of natural light, recalls the bright visions of truth, that have cheered his hours of study, and illustrates to his mind, the sweet harmony in the natural and moral world.

And if the frigid, wintry morning has so many charms, how much more interesting is the gentle breath of the summer; which, fraught with the odor of garden and field, kisses the early dew-drops from the tender plants. To wakening childhood—cheerful, happy childhood—how delightful the freshness of the summer morning! All nature rejoices with him, and the swellings of his own bosom, are but the vibrations of that all pervading system of harmony, that thrills through all the vast extent of creation. This is a reason for the cultivation of the better feelings of our nature. The bright sun, the balmy air, the carolling of the birds, and the dew drops, all conspire to relax the care-worn mind, and to raise our affections above the angry turmoil of life. To the sinking heart and aching head of the sick, the light of day and the coolness of the morning air, are truly refreshing. And to the weary watcher around the sick couch, the sister, the mother, or the anxious partner—who has counted the hours, and hung in agony over the loved one, during the tedious night—the hopes and cheerfulness of the day are peculiarly grateful. To all the busy tribes of earth, it comes as the messenger of mercy, the type of that eternal day that soon shall dawn to be obscured no more.

Go forth, unbeliever, and listen to the harmony of nature; witness the order, the beauty, and the goodness therein manifested, and bow in humble submission, before that all prevailing power which has created, sustained, and is now wielding this mighty, this complicated, but harmonious system. Know that the wisdom and goodness which planned, and the power which created and sustained the earth, and air, and sea, is manifested in thine own preservation, or redemption. Yield Him thy heart's adoration, and receive His pardoning love; and when this fair earth shall wither as a parchment, thou shalt have a seat with thy Redeemer.

Adjourned at the close of the services on Thursday, to meet in Madison on the first Wednesday in June, 1844. E. M. WOOLLEY, Moderator.

C. S. Brown, Clerk.

Sermons were preached by the following brethren; Z. Cook (occasional), C. S. Brown, M. B. Smith, H. B. Soule, J. K. Ingalls, J. Potter, O. Ackley, and A. B. Grosh who also gave the usual addresses. "Preaching about as good as usual on such occasions;" the singing very excellent, and, on the whole, the session was an interesting one.

Per order, H. B. SOULE.

ANOTHER SOCIETY.

DEAR BR. GROSH—You are probably aware that we have organized a society in this place, called the "First Universalist Society of Frankfort and German Flats." We now number 85 members, all worthy and valued members of community.—We are now prospering, and are receiving frequent accessions of such as are saved from the soul-harrowing belief of never-ending woe. And now our society is exerting a benign influence upon its members and upon surrounding community. The milder doctrines of our better faith are breaking down the influences of error, and destroying the temple which it had here erected. Benevolence, kindness and charity also are springing up in the place of superstition, religious hate and persecution. We are cheered by these things to believe that the time is approaching when the unholy fire which is now burnt upon the altar of devotion and religious worship, will go out for want of fuel, and true religion, Gospel piety, which breathes love to God and good will to man, will take its place.

Frankfort, May 24, 1843.

REMARKS.—The inquiry of the above letter, (omitted from our extract,) we answered privately to Br. E. T. M.—had not time to examine documents to answer it fully, nor to answer it by letter; on account of preparations necessary to enable me to attend our Convention and Association. A. B. G.

TO UNIVERSALISTS.

We have been kept so busy during these Convention and Association days, that we have not been able to notice all that deserved our special notice. Br. Thayer, however, has said about all we wished to say on one subject at least—so we give it in his own words, only premising, that Grosh and Walker have a number of copies of the Library for sale. They will receive each number as soon as issued, and be glad to furnish our friends with them. Only think of a book for which we formerly paid from 50 cents to one dollar (and cheap at that,) being sold now for, from 10 to 20 cents per copy! A. B. G.

"THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY"—ATTENTION!

I wish to call the attention of the readers of the Star, and of Universalists generally, to the enterprise of Brs. Gihon & Fairchild of Philadelphia. We have only had a glance at the first number of the Library, not having obtained a copy as yet, but the proposals are enough to satisfy us. The object is to furnish a complete Universalist Library, so far as practicable, by the republication of old and valuable works, and such new works as may be purchased in manuscript by the publishers. We know Br. Gihon well enough to be sure that his part, both as respects selection and mechanical execution, will be faithfully performed. Indeed the number already issued, and that in progress, is an earnest of this—the first being that excellent work,

"Winchester's Dialogues on Universal Restoration," and the second a valuable old work, wholly out of print, and probably never seen by one Universalist in a thousand, The "Everlasting Gospel," by Paul Seigvolk.

The Library is gotten up in a very neat style, royal octavo form, double columns, and printed in a fair letter, giving as great a quantity of matter as can be done without trying the eyes too severely with fine type. The subscription price is $1.00 for ten numbers, to be issued monthly, making a beautiful volume of 576 pages. The numbers will not be uniform, but, what is better, will vary with the size of the work, some containing 48 pages, and from this to 96 pages or more. In all cases however the requisite number of 576 pages will be given for the dollar. Those preferring to purchase by the single number, may obtain them at 12 1-2 cts. for the numbers of 48 pages, 18 3-4 for those containing 72, and in proportion for the others.—Thus the present number containing "Winchester's Dialogues," is of 72 pages, and costs 18 3-4 cents! a book which till now cost 75 and 62 1-2 cents. Seigvolk's "Everlasting Gospel" could not be obtained at any price.

We wish the greatest success to the enterprise, for we believe it to be fraught with immense good to our cause. It will throw into the hands of all, works which hitherto they have not been able to purchase; and the cottage of the humblest believer may now have its "Library" of well selected Universalist publications. In this way an immense number of engines will be put in play all over the land, and Truth will make its way into a thousand places where before only darkness and error have had their abodes. These pamphlet volumes can and will be, I trust, sent forth far and near as silent but successful preachers of God's truth and salvation; and they shall be heard in the quiet retirement of the closet, when the voice of the preacher in the temple shall pass unheeded as the wind.

I sincerely hope, that Brs. Gihon and Fairchild will be abundantly encouraged and sustained in this good work, and that by a long list of good paying subscribers, and a prompt and extensive sale. We shall be glad to forward the names of any of our friends who wish to receive the Library; and we feel confident there are many who wish and need it. Br. Gihon will "put me down" for five copies, to be retained till called for. It will be well to have an agent in this city, on the same footing with the Magazines, that the postage may be saved. Powers, Bagley & Co. will attend to it we presume.—Star of Bethlehem.

CONSTANT MEETINGS—NEW SOCIETY.

We are glad to perceive that our small country societies are beginning to feel the importance of holding meetings every Sabbath. Br. Roberts of Lakeville, N. Y., writes the Western Luminary that the Universalist Society in his place, which has formerly had meetings but half of the time, has now "determined to have meetings on every Sunday, and on those Sundays when no preacher is present, to conduct the services themselves, and thus they continue to grow in knowledge, and in the Christian graces, strengthening each other other in the work of the Lord."

A friend writes us that in Bennington, N. H. a Universalist Society has been recently formed, to whom the Baptists, who are unable to employ a preacher all the time, have kindly offered the use of their house one half of the time, on condition that the Universalists contribute a share, (about 40 dollars,) toward repairing it. They have accepted the offer and voted to hold meetings all the time that they can have the House. At a meeting held some time since, it was voted that the Clerk be requested to read Sermons to them whenever they are without a preacher, which will be most of the time, as the Society's means are at present very limited. The Clerk, W. R. Chamberlin, is a gentleman with whom we have some acquaintance, and who possesses a large fund of general information, and a very good understanding of Scripture truth. The Society's selection, for a Clerk is very judicious, and their proposition to hold regular meetings a good one. We are glad to be informed that the Clerk will comply with the Society's request, and we should not be surprised if it led him in the end to devote himself entirely to the work of evangelising the world.

Now we would earnestly recommend to all our feeble societies to consider well these examples, and "go and do likewise." It is the only way, brethren, that you can enjoy spiritual life. It is the most efficient means you can adopt for the promotion of individual growth in grace and in the knowledge of the truth.—Star of Bethlehem.

UNIVERSALISM IN CINCINNATI.

The Star in the West gives a cheering account of the progress of the gospel doctrine in that city. It says:—

"Believers are fast multiplying in the city from the ranks of our opposers. Almost every week one or more renounces endless misery, and declares his faith in Universalism. At our Thursday evening social meeting, week before last, two young gentlemen of much intelligence, and high standing, publicly declared their faith in a world's salvation.—One, a physician, has been until three or four weeks, a member of the Methodist Church on Fifth street. The other comes from the Baptist Church, although he was converted under Maffitt's preaching. Both of them are very zealous, and think of turning their attention to the ministry.

"We have had some conversation within a few days, with a young gentleman, a member of Dr. Beecher's church, who has come into the light of Universalism. He has been a member four years, and is still one. But he will soon leave it. Our church is thronged every Sunday evening with intelligent looking young men. Many are halting between two opinions, and many are coming into the light. Endless misery is destined to tremble and quake in this city. Multitudes within the next year will be delivered from its bondage.—There is in the community a general inquiry on the subject of Universalism, that can not fail to produce the happiest results. At present the cry among the people who attend our church is "give us room."

AN IMPOSTER.

The readers of the Union and Messenger will find an account of an imposter in the 26th No. of the 7th volume of the Union, (May 14, 1842,) who was known to have four wives then living, and who had been baptized six times. Since that date he has married in Buckland, Mass., has been converted, too, in a modern revival, and again deserted his wife!!

Will the papers please publish the following description, and thus place the community upon their guard?

CHAUNCY W. CLARK.

is about 5 feet 8 inches, thick set, of a stout muscular appearance, blue eyes and a low forehead, nose inclining to one side of his face, has a sinister expression of countenance, and has lost the first joint of his ring finger upon his left hand. He is a native of Petersburg, N. Y., sometimes passes by his real name, sometimes by that of William Clark, and, as is supposed, at times by the name of Morgan. He has a wife in Plustown, N. Y., one in Buckland, Mass., one in Vermont, and one it is supposed, in Colechester, Ct., and others, as his father says, of whose location I am not informed. Generally professes to have been engaged in lumbering, and to have lost much property in the burning of his cabin, and at times says that he has been engaged in smuggling upon our northern frontiers. Is ready to be converted at every protracted meeting, and at the time of his conversion generally renounces Universalism. Is very fervent in his prayers and exhortations. Let the community beware!—W. WILCOX,

SELF-CULTURE.

That this is a vastly important subject to all, will not, I presume, be doubted by any. It is not a mere imaginary thing, but something that is possible; and also something that we experience, to a greater or less extent, in all our peregrinations through life. It is that art in which we are all capable of making great proficiency, if we only have the desire. No one that has ever tasted the benefits arising from it, or has experienced its beneficial results, will in any case deny its real value and utility. Self-Culture as a means of accomplishing high and worthy objects, has been very generally tested throughout the world. Nearly all the eminent men in this, as well as in other countries, have gained their eminence, by diligently studying for their own advancement. This is invariably the fact. For where do we see a man that has risen to fill any important station in life, that has not sacrificed time, labor, money, and almost every thing, for his own improvement? We see him even shutting himself out from society, holding no communion whatever with his fellow man; and all, merely for the improvement of his own mind, and to endeavor to excel his fellows in some particular point. This we often see to be the case: and what is the result? Is it not beneficial? Do we not, as a natural consequence, see man rising from obscurity, to fill the highest stations of honor and renown that can be filled by him?—Certainly we do. We see the mind expanding day by day, elevating itself in the grandeur of high and pure aspiration, and soaring aloft, higher than the imagination can reach. This is but a faint idea of the self-made man. And may we not all rise to that eminence? The answer is, though we may not all be Franklins, and Washingtons, still we may place our standard on a level with them; and, although we may not be able to reach it, yet we shall rise much higher than we otherwise could have done. These, let it be remembered, are the natural consequences of self-culture, and of a life devoted to unceasing labor and toil.

Man may be regarded, in some respects, very much like the plant that springs out of the earth. He, at his first setting out on the untrodden journey of life, is a poor, feeble, and helpless being, entirely dependant on some higher power for his existence. But like this same plant that is nourished and cultivated by the husbandman, he springs up in a moment, as we may say, receiving great physical strength, and nothing seems to check or turn his bodily powers from their natural course: thus he advances to maturity, and very soon we see him grown to full strength—an image of his Maker.—Yet while all this has been doing, where has been his mind? Has it grown and expanded with his bodily strength? Has it been cultivated and improved in a manner that will make it useful to himself and to his fellow beings around him? No; very far from it. We find his mental faculties almost in their natural state, having made little or no advancement toward the acme which they are capable of attaining. This is the case with too many of us at the present day. We neglect to cultivate our intellects till the morning of our lives is past, till our golden opportunities are lost, and we fail to improve them. And this undoubtedly is one of the reasons why so few, in all ages, have arrived at that growth of intellect, to which they might have attained by thorough application and industry. But is there no remedy for all this?—We answer, yes. Yet it is only by applying ourselves diligently to the business of self-culture, that we can accomplish it. And every person, however obscure his condition, has it in his power to make great advancement in this course. Some will doubtless make greater progress than others; but all are capable of improving themselves more or less, as circumstances may permit. How very important, then, that we should give our heart and hand to this matter; especially those of us who are young, and, as yet, incapable of penetrating the deep recesses of the human mind.

But, says one, how can the laborer, the man that depends on his daily toil for his sustenance, how can he improve his mind? He has no time to devote to study. There may be a small part of the year perhaps, in which he does not have much leisure time; but generally, there is no laborer that can not apply at least one hour each day to his own benefit. And what can he not accomplish even in this short time, if he but make a proper and diligent use of it? If he spend one hour each day in cultivating his mind, he can hardly fail of success. And likewise he has a great chance for improvement while engaged in his labors: the business transactions of almost every day, (with a little reflection on them,) may be made to strengthen the mind, improve our feelings and condition, and make us in every respect better.

Again, the mind of man may be compared to a fruitful soil: if it is well cultivated, it will bring forth an abundant crop; but if, on the other hand, it be neglected, the richer the soil, the greater will be the growth of briars and thorns. Just so with the human mind: if it be well cultivated, its growth can not be limited, its expansion can not be circumscribed. Its upward light will be like that of the eagle, onward, and on to the great source of light, undazzled by its splendor and cheered by its beams.

And now, who is not willing to sacrifice time and labor for the culture of his mind? Who is not ready to banish from him the idle pastimes and fineries of which we are all so fond? If we have any regard for our own reputation or honor, or for the welfare of those around us, we shall not hesitate for a moment, or shrink in the least from the performance of our duty. The language of the poet is found very striking to illustrate this point.

Act well your part,—there all the honor lies."

This is a self evident truth. For unless we act well our part, how can we expect to get the praise of others. Therefore, let us endeavor to excel in all things, and we shall open a fountain for self-culture that will be of inestimable value.

Early education, then, is very essential to our rapid progress. It enables us to pass along with great ease, and to encounter difficulties, which otherwise would be hard for us to overcome. Still, if we have not had these early privileges, let us not despair, for greater is the work that yet remains to be done. If our circumstances will not permit our spending much time in study, let us join labor and study as companions, and never part them as long as we have muscular strength to perform the one, or a mind to effect the other. We find then, that the laborer has a chance of improvement nearly equal to that of the man that is continually poring over his books; and in many respects it is more than equal, for he generally enjoys good health, and has a much better chance of getting correct views of nature's laws; and if he get a few correct ideas of human nature, he becomes at once a man of very deep thought and meditation. Therefore let us not be discouraged, but rather exult in the glorious prospects of self-culture; for in most cases, the greater difficulties it has to encounter, the more rapid will be its progress, and the greater work will be accomplished.

The cultivated mind is also the source of much unalloyed enjoyment. The bacchanian over his cups, the debauchee in his revels, the unprincipled in their career of crime, have sometimes fleeting sensations, which they denominate enjoyment.—Now if these have their enjoyments, what may not the self-made and well cultivated mind expect? Can there be a doubt which enjoys the most happiness? The happiness of the latter is natural and certain. He that is possessed of knowledge, has resources at his command, of which the ignorant man is entirely destitute. Compare those that have been successful in life, that have arisen from obscurity to fame, or from poverty to wealth, with those that have always remained in obscurity, or have been reduced from wealth to poverty; and you will discover, that while the former have been possessed of cultivated minds, the latter have remained ignorant and unlettered. A little resolution, then, is all that is requisite to our obtaining one object. "Resolve that you will be something, and you shall be something," is the language of an eminent writer. A poor boy in ancient Greece, resolved that he would be an orator, though to appearance entirely unfit for the station; yet his resolution prevailed—he shut himself out from the world—in the caves of the mountains, and beside the boisterous sea he trained his powers, till success crowned his labors. Even in those days of eloquence he astonished all Greece, and left to the world the never fading name of Demosthenes.—Also the celebrated Dr. Murray, was the son of a poor shephard in Scotland. He learned his alphabet from the board of an old wool-card, whereon his father had marked them with the burnt end of a stick taken from the fire. From this condition, by an industrious and unwearied self-culture, he gained an eminence as a scholar, which few can expect to attain.

Hence we learn that poverty and humble origin need not be regarded as insurmountable obstacles to the improvement of our minds, or to an elevation in respectability and public esteem. Let us press forward, then, to our object; and not be lulled to sleep by the flatteries we hear, as if our wealth or our qualities of birth made us equal to the noblest of our race. We have many and great difficulties to be remedied; and the remedy lies not in our negligence of self-culture, but in faithfully educating ourselves, and exerting every facility for the improvement of our minds.

Let us awake then, and give ourselves to the business of self-culture, and make ourselves worthy of our free institutions, and strengthen and perpetuate them by our intelligence and virtue.

SHORT NOTES ON SELECT PASSAGES.....NO. III.

BY REV. H. H. WATSON.

Luke xlii: 24. "Strive to enter in at the strait gate: for many, I say unto you, will seek to enter in, and shall not be able."

The passage now under consideration, is quoted by our opposing friends to represent the number of those who shall be admitted to the joys and pleasures of that kingdom of beatific splendor at God's right hand, as very few. And those who shall not be able to enter in at the strait gate, shall be consigned to the regions of blackness and gloom forever. But by a careful examination of the text, perhaps it can be shown that it has no relation either to happiness or misery in a future state of existence.

First, it may be inquired, what is it to enter in at the strait gate? Second, what are the reasons that prevent the many from entering in, that seek so to do?

1st. By gate, we understand the entrance into an enclosure, or a walled city. And by strait gate, we understand the entrance into the kingdom of God or heaven; which kingdom is walled about by the requirements and commands of the Gospel. And hence to enter into this kingdom, is to pass through a strait gate; that is, it is to live in obedience to the requirements of the gospel; to love mercy, deal justly, and walk humbly before God. It is declared by Dr. A. Clarke, on the parallel place, Math. vii: 13, 14: "Enter in (to the kingdom of heaven,) through this strait gate, that is, of doing to every one as you would he should do unto you: for this alone seems to be the strait gate which our Lord alludes to."

2d. That those who seek to enter in at this strait gate, or kingdom of the gospel, and are not able; are in an opposite situation from those who do enter in, is very evident from the following testimony of St. John: "He that loveth his brother abideth in light," (which light is the strait gate, the strait and narrow way.) "But he that hateth his brother, is in darkness, and walketh in darkness;" and the reason that they do not enter into light, is, because they "love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil." They do not give heed to that brotherly love which teach es them to be "kindly affectionate one to another;" and hence while they are possessed of this hatred, this ill will towards their brothers, though they seek, they shall not be able to enter in at the strait gate, or kingdom of God.

Luke xviii: 17.—"Verily I say unto you, whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, shall in nowise enter therein."

Our Saviour said—"Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God." The signification of the term kingdom of God, has been given in a previous number; therefore it is not necessary to repeat it again in this place. In this passage our Saviour rebukes the ambitious desires of his disciples, which they undoubtedly possessed, as they made inquiry who should be greatest in the kingdom of heaven. See Math. xviii: 1. Therefore, instead of indulging in their vain expectations of dignities and honors to be conferred upon the members of Christ's kingdom; they must become as little children, and receive his kingdom as such, in order to enter therein. That is, they must be possessed of that temper, humility and meekness, which characterizes a little child; and which is so requisite an ingredient in a sincere follower of the Lord Jesus. And this characteristic must be enjoyed by every one who wishes to become a member of his kingdom.

PROFANITY...NO. VIII.

BY REV. S. J. GIBSON.

Heretofore I have addressed my language to all men who are in the habit of using profane words, with no reference whatever to the religious opinions of any; but at present it is my intention to speak to Universalists, or to those at least who have professed themselves believers in that faith. Too true it is, that there are many individuals, who give their countenance to the preaching of the "glad tidings of great joy which shall be to all people"—who attend the meetings of Universalists when they attend any, who are not so strict in reference to the language which they employ while pursuing their daily avocations, as we wish they were. They are frequently heard taking the name of the Creator in vain, and by so doing, bring disrespect upon our cause, in some instances to an extent sufficient to more than overbalance the support which they give by their attendance upon the meetings, and by the pecuniary aid which they extend to the preached word.

There may be, and in fact undoubtedly there are, as many believers in the doctrine of endless misery, (or at least as many who declare themselves such and support those meetings,) who are given to the habit of profanity, as there are of those who believe in and support our doctrine; and it may be supposed that this should form a sufficient reason, to induce men to charge not the practice to be the legitimate offspring of belief in either faith. Yet this is far from being true. Men are so constituted, or have cultivated their powers in such a manner, that they can, with the utmost ease, see a mote in a neighbor's eye, notwithstanding there may be a beam in their own; and not unfrequently is this mote so magnified, that it looks much larger than a beam, and secures the whole attention of the individual, so that he stops not to inquire if he is without sin himself, but forthwith lays hold upon the stone for the purpose of pelting the offender.—Such being the manner in which men are wont to look upon each other and their actions, if we would reduce the amount of evil in the world, we must commence in the right quarter—put away evil from among ourselves—correct our own faults, and then we shall be more successful in laboring to correct the faults of others.

In view of the foregoing, the profane man, who may be in favor of the doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all mankind—who may be desirous of freeing others from the evils resulting from a belief in the doctrine of endless perdition; may behold the difficulties under which he labors. Indulging in the use of that which is expressly forbidden by the precepts of revelation, when he would persuade others to abandon their errors, they will in turn only point to his, and urge him to look at home in preference to abroad. When he speaks of the beauties and pleasures attendant upon the doctrine of endless happiness and peace, others will point to his conduct—to the oath that often falls from his lips; and declare the same to be the legitimate offspring of his doctrine—the natural consequence following from a belief in the salvation of all people. The influence exerted by the man who proceeds in this manner, is not for, but against our faith—it is pernicious in the extreme, and serves to keep many who would be ornaments to the cause of truth, from embracing it; and a song is put into the mouth of the opponent of our faith, which will be sung in our ears in a taunting and triumphant manner!

Again:—The man who believes in the endless perdition of a portion of our race, can use profane language with a pretty good grace—he somewhat consistent in his course. He believes in an endless hell of fire and brimstone, or something equally as hot and dreadful—he believes that the Creator will damn a portion of mankind there to all eternity; and hence there is not much inconsistency in his calling upon the Creator to commence the work, by consigning his neighbor, who has had the audacity to offend him, to that place forthwith; though by acting in this manner the man exhibits to the world not a very lovely disposition, yet his conduct is in harmony with what he believes. But not so with the Universalist. Does he believe in an endless hell, or that the Deity will damn any one forever? Neither. Then how foolish, to call upon the Creator to do that which you know he will not do, and to send your neighbor to a place that does not exist! If this is not the height of folly, surely I am at a loss to know what would be so; and it is a proceeding derogatory to the character of one who has been endowed with common sense.

"A swearing Universalist!" How oft do we hear this phrase repeated, and how does it retard the advancement of our glorious and heart-cheering faith! but it does so unjustly; for no man is a Universalist, who is in the habit of uttering profane language. He may indeed call himself such; but he is very far from being one in truth. He may wish others to consider himself an adherent to the principles of this faith; but he is not, and will not be regarded as such by the sincere believers of our doctrine, until he abandons this foolish, vulgar, and pernicious habit; for none are Universalists but those who firmly believe in the doctrines of our Saviour—strive to follow the precepts of the Gospel, and speak only the words of candor, sincerity, and truth. And you, who may have professed yourselves believers in the doctrine of the final holiness and happiness for all, and who are in the habit now and then of using a profane word; we beseech you in kindness and sincerity, to pause and consider the disrespect which you thus bring upon that cause, which you would wish bearing away in the world, and do, to day, form the resolution, to abandon the practice and pursue a different course. If thus you act, you may rest assured that blessings from above, and the praise of your fellow beings, will be and abide upon your heads.

Thus have I endeavored, as far as my limited abilities would allow, to briefly refer to some of the evils arising from profanity, and to urge those who are slaves to the habit, to consider their situation candidly, and the influence which such actions exert upon the morals of society; and hoping that my remarks may be of benefit to some and not injurious to others, I bid the subject adieu.

DANGERS TO WASHINGTONIANISM. NO. II.

We remarked briefly last week on the danger to Washingtonianism arising from the readiness of some "steam-pressure" spirits to substitute force and law for the power of kindness and love. Having then intimated that we might resume the pen, and point out other dangers to which this great reform is exposed, we now would again call attention to this subject.

A second danger in the path of Washingtonianism, is the religious bearing of the enterprise, which will sooner or later be generally perceived, and which, when perceived, can not fail to arouse the feelings and opposition of mere sectarians all over the land. It is getting to be quite generally understood that the Washingtonian principle is the Christian principle. It is but living out the duties to which the Gospel called us long ago. It is putting on the garments of salvation, and like Jesus of Nazareth going forth to save our brother. It comes to the lost one, wherever he may be, and speaks to him in tones of kindness and love, and seeks to win him, to virtue's path. It utters no denunciation, no threat, no malediction; but as Jesus said to the woman, "neither do I condemn thee, go and sin no more;" so this says to the inebriate, "dash from you the cup, and walk in the way of peace."—Though it find him a lunatic, it bids him "be clothed and in his right mind." If it find him palsied by strong drink, and fallen by the way-side, it does not hurl thunder-bolts of wrath at him, but in the name of God bids him "rise up and walk."

"—by reasons strong,
Which draw his willing soul along,"

Such have been the means employed, and the success has been as unprecedented as unexpected. It is now practically demonstrated that love has a mighty power to reclaim. Yea, more. Those victims of sin, to reclaim whom wrath has confessed its inability, have been aroused by the gentle voice of love, and have been made to know the blessedness of reformation. The superiority of the one principle over the other in the holiness of its influence is thus made apparent, and throws so clear a light upon the long controverted subject of tendency of religious systems, that error itself, in spite of its bigotry, must open its eyes and behold it.

I can but think it has beheld this. And to this fact do I trace many of those symptoms of lukewarmness and revolt which are now and then manifested in the temperance ranks. The Washingtonian cause is so popular that it is felt that any direct opposition thereto would not be received.—The work therefore of overthrowing it, if done at all, must be done under the guise of friendship.—Hence the anxiety of many to substitute Law for Love, and the readiness of others to throw obstacles in the way of reform, and withhold those facilities which would tend to increase its energy and power. I would not assert, for I do not believe, that all who are in favor of returning to the law, act from the above motive; nor do I give credit for ingenuousness to all who assign a different motive. Where a difference of opinion may exist, charity would ever suggest the most favorable conclusions; yet even charity should not refuse to open her eyes, and use her judgment.

Though I always regret to hear sectarian views urged on temperance occasions, or in temperance periodicals, yet I do not look with half the anxiety thereon; as upon such movements as would effectually undermine the foundations of the cause itself. The one may be no more than a powerless blow aimed at the proper object, while the other is a blow, which may be more or less effectual, aimed to destroy the cause it would feign to support. Men may with propriety philosophize upon all the good movements of the age, and there is no good reason why the lesson of wisdom which they afford should not be given to the world, that mankind may thereby profit withal. But let them stand by the good and tried cause and see that no harm be allowed to befall it. And if those who love a sect more than they love God or mankind, be found among the traitors to righteousness, though the ranks of faithful warriors will be thinner, yet their strength will be greater, and God will fight the battle for them, giving perfect success to his own weapon.—Star of Bethlehem.

The providence of God is over all his works; He ruleth and directeth with infinite wisdom.

WHAT DUTIES ARE NOT RELIGIOUS?

The world has long confined the term religious to those duties especially, which belong to the worship of God; and have intermingled with that worship so much that is severe, unsocial and repulsive in character, as to render it a service gloomy and forbidding to the heart of man. Prayers must be mingled with tears, and groans and wailing—supplications must be uttered with a doleful beseeching, as if the petitioner were confident God would not grant them unless first subdued by the intonations of the voice—and even thankgivings must be offered up with trembling and hesitancy, as if it were doubtful whether they were acceptable to our Father in heaven. Now I honestly confess, that such ideas of religion, and such modes of worship have so few charms for my soul, that I would dread engaging in them for life—or even for a few weeks once in every four or five years of my life.

But, it will be asked, were not the disciples of our Lord engaged in such services—were they not men of stern features, and solemn visages, and melancholy demeanor? And was not even Jesus “a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief;” and did he not weep in grief when praying, and did he not agonize when supplicating God in the garden? Yes—certainly. And so will we do when we are placed in similar circumstances—but so long as we find the injunction to “rejoice evermore,” and “in all things give thanks,” we will even then cultivate a cheerful spirit; as did the apostles of our Lord before us—that, like them, we may sing joyfully in afflictions, rejoice in imprisonments, and bless God that we are accounted worthy to suffer for his cause, should we ever be placed in the circumstances that surrounded them.

I do not believe that the views held by the disciples of Jesus, ever made them melancholy, gloomy or stern; and I am certain they never had such an effect on my heart. Glad tidings full of joy for the whole human family, render me grateful to God, and more benevolent to my fellow men: And in such a spirit of gratitude for favors received, and of submission for gifts withheld, there seems to me no hardship, no suffering, but joy and peace.

And the duties such a spirit point out for performance, will not be deemed grievous but joyous. Let but love prevail in the family between husband and wife, parents and children, and brothers and sisters, and no sacrifices that may be called for, will be deemed a burden or a curse—but a blessing and a delight. Nothing the world calls pleasure can call the wife and the mother that truly loves, from her sick companion or children that need her care and attention—no joy society could bestow, is equal to what she receives when the eye of the sick one beams with gratitude, or the faint voice of the sufferer trembles with thanks for her kindness. And thus is it in every relation of life. Where love is, duty is a pleasure and sacrifices for those we love, are a privilege. And if we truly love God and our fellow men, no duty He requires, no exertion we can make for them, will be grievous, or destitute of its abundant joy. And let it not be forgotten that all duties based on, or enjoined by Christianity, are religious acts. This will not be denied.

What, then, hath Jesus and his holy apostles enjoined on men? Occasional great acts, it is true, are sometimes required of some men, as they were of the apostles—but not to the neglect of smaller ones. The common, every day, and even hourly duties of life, are the most frequently and earnestly enjoined—visit the sick, comfort the mourner, feed the hungry, clothe the naked, rebuke error, judge the widow, befriend the fatherless, relieve the destitute, plead the cause of the oppressed, bring up your children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, study to be quiet, and to do your own business, working with your own hands—these, and like injunctions are freely scattered over every page and through every Epistle of the Bible. These were the labors of Jesus, himself, great as was his mission, important as were his teachings, and high as was his station as the founder of a universal and endless religion. Yes, even his miraculous powers, especially conferred upon him by the Almighty—even these, which he would not use for his own benefit, he scrupled not to use for the performance of what are called common, every-day duties—duties that too many have excluded from the name and title of religions! To promote the festive joys of a Jewish marriage—yes, to promote hilarity and social enjoyment—he turned water to wine—and oh, how often were the dumb made to sing, the lame to leap, the blind to see through tears, for joy, at the exercise of his power in their favor! Let no one suppose that visiting the sick, ministering to the needy, and promoting social enjoyment and happiness in any innocent way, are not religious duties, when even the Son of God did not refuse to exert his miraculous powers for their performance. These are Christian duties—each one small in itself, but making up a life—a whole life of virtue, usefulness and joy by their continual succession—and brethren and sisters, let us remember them, and let us not be weary in doing them! Who is zealous for God? who wishes to be Jehovah's agent and servant? Here is work for all such. God has much to do—many commissions to give to such. He wants a kind word spoken to that desponding child—an encouraging look given to that timid scholar—a crust bestowed on that hungry sufferer—a garment spread over that shivering wanderer—and a beaming countenance lifted up on that melancholy prisoner who is beginning to hate the world that is frowning on him! Who wishes to serve God in these great works—with, not the fierce zeal of a Jehu, but the steady devotion of the Christian—who is there that wishes to be an agent in the hand of God—perhaps to make a Howard of the desponding boy—a Newton of the timid scholar—or to send a Ledyard on his way in that beggar's form, or to open the mind of a Bunyar, in that prisoner within the gloomy grate?

How many are there who profess great reverence for Christ, great devotion to his cause, and anxiety to obey his precepts. They are waiting to do some great work—to find some signal opportunity to show their love for him: Well—here it is! “Whosoever shall give a drink of cold water unto a disciple in the name of the Master, shall in no wise lose his reward.”

“Oh,” says one, “if I could but have lived in those days, how would I have ministered unto the wants of my Lord!” You can do it now. He that visits, the prisoner, ministers to the sick, feeds the hungry, clothes the naked, employs usefully the industrious, and deals justly and loves mercy, serves Christ—ministers unto his wants more truly than if he had fed his Lord in person. For that Master ever cared more for the needy, the suffering and the sinful, than he did for himself; and therefore we may rest assured, always, that whatever we do for those whom he so devotedly loved, we do for Him. His language is now—as it was 1800 years ago at the closing judgment of the Jewish dispensation—“inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me.” Oh ye who profess to be followers of Jesus—imitators of the Great Master—remember his example and his injunctions—be constant in well doing, be zealous always in alleviating human misery and lessening human ignorance and vice; be constantly watchful over your own passions and habits, and industrious in cultivating and developing every pure feeling and right affection. A. B. G.

The following dialogue was originally suggested by hearing Dr. Clowes relate the fable narrated in it, during the discussion in Clinton, last spring—and was written for a Sunday School Exhibition. Believing that it may do good to “children of a larger growth,” I give it place in our columns. There are a few more where this came from, that may follow this, should it be well enough received by our readers.

TWO CHANCES TO ONE.

James.—Well, Samuel, do you still hold to that dangerous doctrine of yours—that terrible Universalism? Samuel.—I am still a Universalist; but how you make it out so dangerous and terrible, I can not imagine.—Surely, it can not be terrible to think that “God will have all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth.”

J. That is the way you always misunderstand me, and quote Scripture to prove yourself right!

S. Why, what else would you have me quote? But wherein do I misunderstand you?

J. I did not mean that the idea of God's saving men was terrible; for I would rejoice, myself, as well as you, if it was so—but your doctrine is a dangerous one to trust to—dangerous to the souls of those that believe it.

S. What! dangerous to believe that God will make all men holy and happy—that God is good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works—that God is the Saviour of all men—that—

J. Yes—no—no—what I mean is this. If your doctrine is true, then I am as well off at last as you are; for if all are saved, I will be saved among the rest;—that you don't deny.

S. But I do deny it. You are not as well off while believing an error, as I am while believing the truth.—But I know what you mean—you mean, you will be as well off as I am when brought to believe the truth I believe, by being saved at last.

J. Yes—that is what I mean. Well—but if your doctrine is false, then you will be lost and I will be saved; so that, you see, I have two chances to your one, for salvation.

S. I don't see that clearly. Come, let us fairly understand your argument. Do you believe that salvation beyond this life, depends wholly on believing in the endless damnation of a part of mankind?

J. Why, not exactly—but on believing the Gospel as a whole, and on living up to it.

S. Well—do you believe that God will damn any one endlessly, merely for honestly and sincerely believing that Jesus Christ is the Saviour of the world?

J. I can not say I do—not exactly for sincerely believing that; for I hope many Universalists will be saved.

S. Well—what, then, constitutes your double chance for salvation?

J. Why men will be judged for their works.

S. Well—do you suppose that my belief in God's universal goodness will make me love him less than others do—or that my love for him will render me less obedient to his precepts?

J. What I mean is, that if my faith proves false, yours will save me; but if yours proves false, you have nothing to rely on, and must be lost.

S. Well, suppose that it should turn out, finally, that God was not impartially and universally good, what have you to rely on more than I, then, must rely on for salvation—is there any likelihood that God will love those most who thought him not as good as I think he will be?

J. Why, not that, you know—but I rely on the merey and grace of God.

S. So do I! There now, that is one chance we both have for salvation—now what is your other, your second chance for salvation?

J. Why, if my faith fails me, yours will take me up.

S. True—if nothing else will save you, the grace and mercy of God in Jesus Christ will—but what other chance have you?

J. Oh, you Universalists are always full of your catches!

S. To be sure we are—we must be, or how could Universalism catch every body, when every thing else fails to save them! But you have not answered my question. What other chance have you for salvation, beside the infinite goodness and mercy of God?

J. Why, you see, salvation is offered on conditions.

S. Well—and I expect all mankind to be saved according to the conditions on which it is offered—whether they be faith, or faith and obedience; for I have already proved that God will have all men come to the knowledge of the truth; and can show you that all will be reconciled (and of course, obedient) to God. So, where is your second chance, beside the infinite goodness of God who giveth men faith and repentance, for he is the Saviour of all men?

J. Well, I see it is of no use to talk to you; for I do not suppose I shall convince you of your dangerous error;—but oh, Samuel, if you would only repent of it, and abandon it, and turn to the Lord, that you might be saved of him!

S. Stop, my friend—stop;—exhorting me will do more good after you answer my question—after you show me any other chance for salvation beside the one you admit I already have in common with you. But the truth is, your “two chances to one,” reminds me of a fable I once heard, said to have been written more than two thousand years ago by Esop. Will you hear it?

J. I don't care, if it is not too long.

S. No—it is not very long. Esop says, that once on a time, a cat and a fox sat under the shade of a tree, conversing together about their modes of living and other matters. The fox very condescendingly pitied poor puss for her want of cunning and ingenuity.—“Now,” says he, “if a pack of hounds came along, you would have only one chance for escape—you would run up the tree, and that is all you could rely on. But see how many chances I have. I could run, and leap, and twist around this way, and that way, and turn on my track, and double, and so, by a hundred ways, I could escape them.” Just then a pack of hounds came upon them. “Poor puss,” as the fox called her, ran up the tree and was safe. The fox started off to try his hundred chances. He ran, he leaped, and turned, and twisted, and doubled, but at last was caught; and poor puss, safely seated in the tree, beheld the hounds tear Reynard in pieces!

J. Well—what has that to do with the subject?

S. Simply this—that unless you are saved by the one, only, all sufficient chance of salvation which rests wholly on the infinite mercy of God, a hundred other chances for salvation will all fail you, as did the fox's.—Flee then to the mercy of God as revealed in Jesus Christ—'tis sufficient to save you and all mankind—climb that tree; and you are safe—and until you do flee to that refuge, you are lost!

J. Well—I confess that I can see no other way of salvation than that—there is none other—what shall I do?

S. Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ as the Saviour of the world, and you will find peace and rest in believing. You will be saved now, and you will behold, by the eye of a pure faith, and a humble charity, all nations, kindreds, tongues and people saved in him, by the purpose of God, as it will be consummated in the resurrection, when all will be Christ's, and he will be the Father's, and God will be all in all!

J. I believe; Lord, help thou mine unbelief!

BOTH. Amen—and to God be all the glory!

MARRIAGES.

In Hamilton, June 7th, by Rev. Z. Cook, Mr. LARMON H. DUNHAM, of Utica, to Miss HARRIET MUEER, of the former place.

In Smithville, June 4th, by Rev. Wm. M. DeLong, Mr. CORNELIUS MCGEE, to Miss RHODA PHELPS, both of that town.

At the Episcopal church, Cleveland, Ohio, on the 26th ult., by Rev. Dr. Berry, Mr. WILLIAM J. GORDON, Merchant of that city, to Miss CHARLOTTE G. CHAMPLIN, also of that city, and only daughter of the late Wm. H. Champlin, Esq., of Erie, Pa.

The scene is o'er—accept my prayer;
That grief may never darken o'er thee,
That unbeam fount, and flowret fair,
May bless each path that gleams before thee!
May no rude storm Hope's anchor move,—
Nor love's bright flame be ever shaded;
But may the “passion leaves of love”
Breathe fragrance when all else be faded. H. B. C.

DEATHS.

In Buffalo, May 26th, of lingering consumption, Mrs. LURANIE, wife of Aaron Bean, aged 40 years, and 28 days.—Her indisposition has been constant for about nine years—and for the last two years, she was confined to her room and much of the time to her bed. During this long season she bore her sufferings with patience and Christian fortitude, and having mourned the death of six children, followed them to their final rest, in the triumphs of a hope that is “full of immortality.” So died another Universalist. S. R. S.

In Bristol, May 12th, ELLEN FIDELIA, daughter of Rev. Samuel and Mrs. Eveline Goff, aged 13 months. Services by the writer.

A SPRING FLOWER.

Auspicious thy birth, thou innocent form,
To open thine eyes on happy spring morn,
And hail the fresh scenes of summer's glad day
In sporting noon beams, that fickleless play
As were thy smiles on a mother's warm breast,
When softly her fondlings hush'd thee to rest;
Or joyful thou look'd on the world as a toy,
And dream'd of no woes thy delights to alloy.
Calm summer had gone—stern winter had come,
And swiftly it pass'd to hurry thee home;
For oh, its dread chills, presaging thy doom
Just lost in glad spring, had open'd the tomb,
As opening buds in their sweetness put forth,
Now nipp'd by the frost,—and the fragrance of earth
Was wafted to the skies by heavenly gales,
To scent the sweet fields, far, far from these vales.

Ye heart smitten friends! weep not for the stalk
That's crumb'd to dust. Call not the child back
Mid tempests and storms, to feel the cold blast
Of seasons revolving and soon to be past.
Far away from these scenes, where the spirit has gone,
A Father is smiling to welcome us home,
Beyond the dark stream, to fair verdant shore
Where mingling spirits are parting no more. U. C.

In East Hamilton, May 7th, of consumption, OLIVE LUCINE, daughter of Olive and Horace Usher, aged 9 years and 8 months. The bereaved parents mourn, but still hope in God, that a reunion awaits them: God grant it.

In East Hamilton, same date as above, WILLIAM EUGENE, youngest son of Wm. H. and Calphurnia Troop, aged one year and six months. The little sufferer breathed his last in the midst of a terrific hail storm, which marked the moment of their child's departure with a saddening gloom, never to be eradicated from their hearts. But they joy to know, that it has exchanged a stormy world for the calm of endless rest. Z. COOK.

In Earlville, Madison county, May 15th, Mr. DAVID EMERY, aged 62 years. If death ever found its victim ready, this was an instance. But a short time before his dissolution, he requested an interview with the writer, and never was witnessed more perfect composure and resignation.—“Preach,” said he, “my funeral sermon, and say to the people, death finds me ready. The faith I have enjoyed for fifty years, is as good in this hour as in any other.” He bespoke the use of the Methodist church for the funeral, waited the arrival of a large circle of relatives, and calm as a summer's morning, fell asleep in Jesus. Honor to his memory, and comfort to his surviving friends. Z. COOK.

In the town of Greene, Chenango county, on the 16th of May, last, Mrs. ELVIRA, wife of Major Gideon Sibley, aged 40 years. She lived and died, sustained by an unshaken faith in the doctrine of the Restitution. By that faith, her husband is supported under his bereavement, and by its consoling power, may all who mourn be comforted. On the Thursday following, her funeral was attended at the Universalist meetinghouse at Smithville Flats, and to a numerous congregation a discourse was delivered by

WM. M. DELONG.

SPRING.

The last cold breeze of winter's fled;
Once more the verdant field we tread;
Again the summer sun draws near—
Again the tender flowers appear.

And soon we'll see the waving field
In promise of its Autumn yield;
And soon the forest clothed in green,
Will be again, as it has been.

The happy warblers of the grove
Whose gentle cheering notes we love,
Will come again, from foreign shore,
To greet us with their songs once more.

How sweet to sit beneath some tree
As they move about so merrily;
How sweet to listen to their lay
At early dawn, or close of day.

And then I love the quiet wood,
So soothing to a pensive mood.
And hail it as a cool retreat,
From summer sun and noonday heat.

Then hail to spring, and songsters too,
Its flowery fields and fragrant dew;
Hail to its green and towering trees,
And hail—all hail each pleasant breeze.

SCENES IN THE DRAMA OF HUMAN LIFE.

BY MRS. F. M. BAKER.

SCENE THIRD.

How often it chanceth that the most heedless girls and miserable wives, are daughters of very exemplary mothers. This fact has often produced astonishment in the minds of more than superficial observers. With the precepts and example of a prudent, industrious, virtuous mother before them, (say such observers), a daughter should be like her mother; and because all are not so, the opinion has prevailed, and does extensively prevail in society, that mankind are created vastly different in mind and dispositions; some of which can not by any process of management be brought under salutary control. Indeed I am far from certain, that these differences between the dispositions and actions of parents and their offspring, or between children of the same family, was not the originator of the idea of total depravity.

Now although the accusation may seem severe, yet I am forced to believe, from observation and reasoning, that the fault of having such good-for-nothing girls, who make poor members of society and worse wives, is in a great measure attributable to these same mothers, however good they may be in other respects. In fact, perhaps almost their only failing may be mismanagement of their children. And that there is much mismanagement, even they themselves, as well as the rest of the world, must acknowledge.

I am not here about to enter upon a long dissertation with regard to the most approved method of training children; for it would be only thrown away—nay worse; for mothers not only think that they know best how to manage in these affairs, but nothing will sooner excite their "I'll-do-as-I-please" organs, than to hint at improvements in these matters. Besides, every mother should know when her child does wrong, and how to correct it; and she should correct it too; else its future evil conduct, the legitimate fruit of such neglect, will rise in judgment against her.

Mrs. T. was a pattern for housewives. In industry, prudence, economy, and all such household excellencies, few ever excelled her. She was a very benevolent neighbor, an affectionate wife, and seemed a kind mother. Nor was she destitute of abilities, both natural and acquired. All who knew her, loved and respected her. But her daughter Ruth, was far from a credit to her management with her. When but a mere child, she was obstinate and fractious. The mother told her she must do thus and so; she should do it or she would punish her. Ruth raved and stormed; the mother did not punish; but coaxed. Ruth believed nothing of the coaxing, unless it came in the tangible shape of some sweetmeat or dainty, which she greedily swallowed, and finally had her own way after all!

So she went on until she would do nothing decent without coaxing or hiring. She had been told so often, that she should be punished, and never had been, that she did not believe any such threat. As she grew older, she cared more for the gratification of her vitiated appetite, than for any thing useful or good—thought far more of a splendid dress or fashionable bonnet, than the improvement or ornamenting of her mind—sought the company of the rude, and unpolished, and ignorant, and avoided the intelligent and refined. She adopted as her maxim, "I can't," and acted upon it in whatever she disliked to do.

She was careless and indifferent about whatever would make her useful or respectable, and daily committed errors both in word and deed, which should have made any woman blush. She began with having her own way while young, and she persevered in so doing when older—the only thing in which she ever did exercise perseverance.

She finally married—a professional gentleman, of course—she would not think of a mechanic. While the honey-moon lasted, she was a very amiable, agreeable wife. Afterwards her old habits of selfishness returned. She did not like household duties, and she would not attend to them. If the "help" could do them, well and good; if not, they might go undone. She did like to walk, and visit, and spend money for finery, and she would do it whether her husband's means would allow, or not. So she neglected her duties as wife, mother, or housekeeper. The consequences were, her husband forsook her; the children became inmates of the poor house; and she died a miserable wretch, dependent upon the bounty of a distant relative. Neither individuals or society were ever the better for her life. What a comment! a person live and die, and yet never be of use to any one!

POLISH WOLF SHOOTING.

The following sketch by a French officer may not perhaps be uninteresting. It certainly gives the picture of a novel sport, and as such I consider it may be welcome to the pages of your magazine. Whether any paper on a similar subject has ever yet appeared, I really can not positively say, but I rather think not. I give it nearly verbatim.

After the peace of Tilsit, the corps d'armée of Marshal Davoust took up their quarters in Poland. My regiment was quartered near Blonde, in the neighborhood of Warsaw. Billeted myself in the house of Count Lasseur, in the village of Coxerki, I re-assumed as I had ever done when my duties permitted me to do so, the character of a sportsman. I frequently filled my game bag, and often met with much success. On one occasion I killed a wolf, a fact of which I was so proud that when the peasant brought it home to me, I carried it down in triumph to my host and boastfully exhibited it to him.

"Is that all?" asked the Count, with rather a sneer at the poverty of my sport; "Is that all you can do? Why my friend if you like that kind of shooting, I can at once gratify you. I will show you a mode by which you may kill ten or a dozen larger wolves than that, any morning you choose; that is, if you think it worth the trouble."

"The trouble! I'd travel a hundred miles to enjoy such sport."

"Well then, what say you to to-morrow?"

"With all my heart," replied I, and I retired to my room to prepare for the treat which awaited me.

The earth was covered with deep snow, and the weather was remarkably cold. At day break I was aroused and invited to enter a sledge, drawn by four horses, and in which I found the Count already ensconced, warmly wrapped up in furs. As we were starting, the servant threw under our feet a young sucking pig, which began squeaking out in such a manner, that I could scarcely hear its shrill cries.

"Good gracious, sir!" I demanded, "What is the noisy brute placed here for?"

"You'll see by and bye. Sit quiet, and I'll fulfill my promise."

"Ah! it is for our breakfast, I suppose. Surely if this be the case, you had better have it killed before starting."

"Be quiet, we have ample provisions without eating this little animal," and my friend again relapsed in smoking silence, drawing on his ample meerschaum for present enjoyment.

The horses now plunged into the forest at full gallop. The little pig tired of squeaking, had become mute. I confess the whole affair puzzled me.

When we had travelled about three leagues, the Count suddenly addressed me.

"Pull his ear."

"Whose ear?"

"The pig's."

I did so, and the little thing began crying out in the most piercing and piteous manner, making the whole forest around ring with its shrill voice. In less than five minutes three large wolves appeared, and started off in pursuit of our sledge. I now understood, for the first time, that our sucking friend was to act as a decoy to attract these ravenous animals.

Although as yet too far off to justify a shot at them, I was still doubtful whether I would not take a pop at them, when the chasseur suddenly threw down a small pig's skin stuffed with straw, which he had attached to the sledge by a cord some twenty or thirty yards long. The instant he did so, the voracious monsters, thinking that our little sneaker had fallen out, sprang forward to seize their victim, almost tumbling over each other to secure the prize.

In a moment more the Count and myself had fired with such precision that two wolves lay stretched on the road.

"What splendid sport!" cried I, delighted at my performance.

"Wait a little. I have not fulfilled my promise. We will not return until a dozen more are shot."

The sledge kept moving rapidly on. In about a quarter of an hour we again had recourse to our noisy decoy, and by repeating the same stratagem of the stuffed pig, once more inveigled the hungry inhabitants of the woods within the range of our rifles. This experiment we repeated at least a dozen times during our drive, which extended over about five leagues. Fourteen wolves were thus destroyed, which I left with much regret behind us. On this head, however, my friend assured me I need not be uneasy, as we should yet secure our prizes.

Tired at length with even this fine sport, we turned round, and at a more moderate pace retraced our way. On the spot where they had fallen we found eleven out of the fourteen animals we had destroyed. These our chasseur, in the most dexterous manner, stripped off their skins as he came up to them, the operation not occupying more than three minutes each. The other three wolves had actually been devoured by their hungry brethren.

ANNUAL ADDRESS,

Before the State Sunday School Association.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

Christian Brethren and Friends—I am not one lightly to shrink from a task, and yet I would that some one better qualified occupied my place, to speak to you on this occasion. But it only remains for me, while I shall draw largely on your patience, to fulfil the duty assigned me, as well as my abilities, and a hasty preparation will allow.

My subject is the SUNDAY SCHOOL ENTERPRIZE. Of this I may say, that it is peculiarly one of this age—an age already signalized for its benevolent operations. But of none may it be said that they exceed in importance, that which has for its object the moral and religious culture of a rising generation. We have societies formed for the suppression of intemperance, and we see them rolling back its dark tide of death, and rescuing many victims that it has overwhelmed. We have societies formed, too, for the suppression and destruction of other forms of vice, and for the restoration of the abandoned and the lost, to virtue and honor. Societies are formed for the relief of the poor and the distressed; for furnishing with food, and fire, and clothing, the famishing, and freezing, and naked of our land. These associations are blessed of God to the accomplishment of much good. From them issue streams which give greenness and life to the desert places, and make glad the habitations of sorrow. But in the Sabbath School Enterprize the objects of the various benevolent associations of the day are united, and form one great object, which is to establish correct and holy principles in the minds of the young; to bind them in love to the service of religion, and thus to prevent evil, diminish vice and crime, and lift up humanity toward the zenith of its destined perfection.

It is a noble employment, this, to train a young and rising generation for stations of usefulness and honor; to lead them to the fountains of heavenly wisdom, and present to their lips the pure water of life that flows from the throne of God and the Lamb. To deck the outward person of the child; to possess him with worldly advantages; to bequeath to him an inheritance of broad lands, and silver and gold, is all idle and vain, compared with moulding and beautifying the mind, imparting to it Christian excellences, and filling it throughout with the hopes and influences of the Gospel. This material frame work; this dusty lodging place, is less than nothing when placed in contrast with the inhabitant which occupies and animates it. It is the embodied soul that is above all price—the sentiments, faculties, principles which hold the mortal in subjection, and exalt it to honor, or bring it down to shame. "Wherever there is mind, there stands associated with it a nobler and more abiding interest than all the aggrandizements which wealth and rank can bestow." Possessed as he is of this thinking immateriality; of a soul that desires, and struggles, and battles amidst the materiality by which it is surrounded, and that is endowed with capacities for the teachings of God, and the knowledge that takes in the universe; we may make the child all that is good and great; we may so mould his very nature, as that when he has become a man, he shall reflect an honor on his teachers, a glory on humanity, and be, in consequence of his correct principles, and moral deportment, and meek, devoted life, a venerated member of society, and a blessing to his race.

From the moral and religious culture of the young, must flow, if it flow at all, the stability of government; the prosperity of the church of Christ;

the spread of righteousness; the triumph of the right and the true, and the elevation of man to the high station he is destined to occupy amidst the works of God. And where can this culture so well be bestowed and received, as in the Sabbath School? At home, amidst household cares, perplexities, and trials, but little can be done, comparatively speaking, toward imparting religious instruction, even where there is disposition and ability. Then, again, supposing all other advantages to exist, there is a lack in home instruction, of those powerful influences which are brought to bear in the Sabbath School. Here, the different members exert an influence on each other. The teachers exert an influence; the solemn and impressive service exerts an influence; the well selected library exerts an influence; the united song of praise exerts an influence. So that the balance, when struck, is decidedly in favor of the latter mode of religious instruction.

The importance of Sabbath Schools, and of the Sabbath School Enterprize, will be seen when we consider the influence they will have upon our nation. By the act, says Chalmers, of training in wisdom's ways the most tattered and neglected boy who runs upon our pavements, do we present the community with that which, in wisdom's estimation, is of greater price than (the) gorgeous inhabitant of a palace. And when one thinks how such process may be multiplied among the families that are around us; when one thinks of the extent of that mine of moral wealth, which deepens, and retires, and accumulates all over our broad land; and when one tries to compute the quantity of spirit that is embedded therein, and reflects of this native ore, that more than the worth of a monarch may be stamped, by instruction, on each separate portion of it; a field is thus opened for the patriotism of those who want to give an augmented value to the produce of our land, which throws into insignificance all the enterprizes of vulgar speculation?

Would we have our nation safe, prosperous and happy? We must elevate the masses, by moral and religious instruction. And here the original design of the Sabbath School meets us, which was to enlighten the minds of those who lived in the midst of vice and shame, and who enjoyed not the means of Christian improvement. It was to enlighten those whom poverty and ignorance had shut out from a participation in the privileges and blessings of the Gospel. It was to carry light to those who sat in darkness and to impart principles, and awaken energies which were to work out their amelioration. It was, in short, to teach those who had no instructors; to lift up the degraded, and to make men and women of those who had else grovelled and crawled in the dust and mire of squalid wretchedness and beastly sensuality.

In all our large towns, and in our cities, there are multitudes of children who know nothing of the sacredness of the Sabbath; whose footsteps have never echoed across the threshold of the house of worship; to whom the name of God is unknown save in profanity, and who have none to teach them useful knowledge, and to open to them the treasures of divine grace and wisdom. They are surrounded by unwholesome and debasing influences. They move in a contaminated and pestilential atmosphere. They have inculcated to them no holy and exalting sentiments, and the examples before them are such as unfasten restraint, and corrupt, and destroy. Thus their youthful powers are ripening for disgrace. Our criminal calendars will enrol their names. From among them our prison workshops, and penitentiaries, and almshouses will be filled; and because of them, vice, and crime, and pollution, and deep degradation and misery be perpetrated in our midst, marring the peace of society, and weakening the foundations of government.

To reach such, and to mould them into the willing and consenting subjects of their own amelioration, is the peculiar province of the Sunday School. And as intelligence and religion are the only safeguard of a nation, so every step taken to thus reach and mould the degraded and ignorant, is an advance toward rendering more safe and permanent the foundations of this great Republic. In proportion as ignorance and spiritual blindness increases, every important institution is endangered, and the safety of a nation invaded. I would have you look back over the world's history, and see what greep and fertile spots there are, where intelligence and the Gospel have wrought; how they have made tyrants tremble in their pride of power; overturned thrones of despotism; made nerveless the arm of cruelty and oppression, and achieved in their own might those wide and lasting triumphs in which the remotest ages shall participate. I would have you see, "How it was the force of mind, aided by moral principle, which laid out your own country, and even in its youth has made it the admiration of all lands." It was knowledge and virtue, in the power that God has given them, which swept away the wilderness, and reared those institutions of civil and religious liberty, which are justly the pride and boast of a free people; and it is knowledge and virtue, still wielding the same power, and uncrippled in their energies, that must guard the same, and smite the hand that should be lifted against them.

From this imperfect view of the subject, we may learn something of the importance of Sabbath Schools and the Sabbath School enterprize. To educate the children of this broad land, to instil the sanctifying principles of the Gospel into their minds, and thus to elevate the affections of their natures, and quicken their moral sensibilities, is but to place them on that commanding eminence from which they may look proudly down, and defy despotism on its throne. And we have need to strive to place them there, for as it regards this nation, mental excellence and moral worth are not what they once were. There is not only a mental and moral degeneracy abroad among the people, but the leaders of party and the high authorities of the land, no longer move in that brilliant and independent sphere of intellectual and moral dignity, which is alike unreachd, unassailed, and uninfluenced by the low and sordid principles of personal ambition.

Would you, then, correct these evils, and place a triple defence around about your free institutions? Educate every child in the land. Establish your Sunday Schools in every ward, and village and neighborhood; make them efficient, and gather into them those who are shut out from the means of information, and there enstamp the truths, and principles, and precepts of the Gospel on their hearts. Do this, and after a little time you shall hear intellectual and moral excellence speak in the commanding voice of legislative dignity. You shall behold it pervading the walks of private life, giving to wealth its splendor, and to luxury its sweetness; to domestic scenes its chaste adorning, and to the nursery, the enkindling hopes of a nation's elevation.

No less important are Sunday Schools in respect to individual happiness and peace. This will be seen when we consider that they serve to prevent a violation of the Sabbath. Where the duty to remember the Sabbath day and keep it holy is faithfully discharged, it leads to the discharge of all others; but when neglected and disregarded, we may look for nothing save the utter prostration of moral principle. It was a remark of Chief Justice Hale, "that of all the persons who were convicted of capital crimes, while he was on the bench, he found few only, who would not confess, on inquiry, that they began their career of wickedness by neglecting the duties of the Sabbath, and by vicious conduct on that day."

All the instructions, and all the influences of the Sabbath School, are laden with rich rewards for the individual. In the proportion that they imbue his young spirit with piety, they increase his happiness, and make his present joy full. And when he arrives at man's estate, carrying along with him this instruction, and these influences, he is prepared for time's changes and trials; and in the sunshine and the storm he will be in the possession of a peace that is divine. When others fall he will be upheld—when others faint, he will be strong of heart. The sanctifying and supporting power of the Gospel is around him and within him; and his path is as the shining light, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day.

The importance of the Sabbath School enterprise will be further seen, when we consider the bearing such Schools have upon the interests of our Zion. In proportion as moral goodness and piety spread and prevail in the church, will it flourish and gather strength. And when all its members are well instructed in Gospel truths, and are brought under their sanctifying influences, and are active in all the callings of a religious life, the church will possess a beauty and a power, which the splendor of wealth, and the adornments of fashion, could never bestow.

I have already shown how much the Sunday School may contribute toward this. It may be made a powerful means for the increase of Zion's prosperity. This prosperity is to a certain extent dependent upon the care which shall be taken, and the labor which shall be expended in the mental and moral cultivation of our children, and in engaging their hearts and hands in the service of our Lord. This will at once be seen when we consider that from the period of childhood to that of youth, "the habits of thought, and feeling, and action," are forming and formed, "that the inclinations usually become fixed; and the whole character assumes a definite complexion. It would seem probable, therefore, antecedently to experience, that, in general, the first impulse given to the mind and heart would be the decisive one. But what reason teaches, experience abundantly confirms. If we look abroad into the world, some indeed we shall find who have disappointed the hopes which they early awakened in respect to usefulness and piety; and others, whose early life was a scene of profligacy, who have been afterwards plucked as brands from the burning; but in the great majority of instances, it will appear that the direction which the character received in childhood and youth, is retained in every succeeding period of life. In far the greater number of cases in which you see old age cheered by the hopes and comforts of religion, you will find that the foundation of this tranquillity was laid in the morning of life; and on the other hand, where you see hoary headed vice shuddering in despair on the borders of the grave, it will usually be safe to conclude that the agony which you witness is to be referred especially to the early neglect of religion, and of the means of moral instruction and improvement.

We see from this how important the Sunday School is to the growth and advancement of the church, giving to it, through its instructions, a character and an influence, which without, it could not possess.

There is a power to be derived from the Sunday School, that is mighty in its demonstrations and which can be wielded with astonishing effect in behalf of pure and undefiled religion. That was no idle boast of a reverend divine, that by the aid of the Sabbath School, a million of voters, in a brief period of time, could be brought into the field to effect his proposed union of Church and State.—He knew well the power of this institution, and had rightly estimated its influence. To us it is much every way. In the Sunday School our children and youth will receive that instruction necessary to their usefulness, and from it will arise men of warm hearts and eloquent speech to plead for Zion in her desolation; to proclaim liberty to the captives, and salvation to a sinful dying world.

But without this instruction in their early years; without the aid of the Sunday School, can we safely say, that the rising generation will be to themselves, and to the cause, and to God, what we would have them? I know well the power of the pulpit to mould the hearts of men; to arouse the slumbering conscience, and lead the straying ones back to duty and to life. But if we can give the years that are spent in sin, because of this early neglect of religion, to the cause of truth and righteousness, we give a vastly increased strength and impetus to that cause, and lessen, in the same proportion, the amount of moral evil in our world.

In no way, perhaps, can we more powerfully and successfully second the efforts of the pulpit than by or through the means of Sunday Schools. The instruction of the latter so prepares as to give greater efficacy and success to the ministrations of the former. The mind, receiving its first impressions and its first lessons in truth and religion in the Sunday School, is prepared to receive the more exalted teachings of the pulpit, and under its direction, to graduate with honor, if I may so speak, in the school of Christ.

There is something in the very state of the soul during the period of childhood and youth, which favors the object we would effect in relation to the church. "The understanding not having been brought under the dominion of prejudice, is open to the reception of truth. The conscience, not having had its dictates frequently opposed and trifled with, is ready faithfully to discharge its office.—The various affections of the heart are easily excited, and more easily than at any subsequent period, may receive a right direction." Who will say then, that the Sunday School is not an important means for aiding and advancing the cause of universal and impartial grace, and of increasing the moral strength and influence of the church?—By it, ere the vanities of the world had led the footsteps astray, the germs of Christian piety may be implanted in the youthful heart, and the infant mind have so much of Gospel truth impressed upon it, as that its every power shall become attuned to harmony with its great principles. And thus as our children grow up around us, we may see in them those with whom the church may safely entrust the ark of its precious covenants; and who, while they lay us down to sleep in the grave, will be prepared to conduct the next generation to all that is wise and good.

As, then, you love your country, and its free institutions; as you love our spiritual Zion and would see it put on its beautiful garments; as you love your children, and would have them useful, honored, and happy; as you love humanity, and would remove its woes, and wipe away its tears; as you love God, and would have him honored by a more wide-spread homage of the heart; as you love the Saviour, and would see his willing subjects multiplied, and the triumphs of the cross extended; give your influence to the Sunday School enterprise, and let it lack in nothing by which it may carry out and accomplish the objects contemplated. Every society should have its Sunday School, and wherever one can be established and be made useful, means should be used to establish it, and time expended in imparting religious instruction to the young. You can not do too much in this respect, and you are guilty of a great wrong, when you keep back from the work. Those qualified may become teachers; others may lend encouragement by their presence, and all may extend that pecuniary aid necessary to the efficiency and prosperity of the school.

As a suitable plan for organizing and conducting Sunday Schools, I would recommend the one proposed by the Universalist S. S. Association of Massachusetts, which is contained in a pamphlet published some two years since. This plan contains all that is necessary to the full and efficient organization; and if carried out, can not fail, in our opinion, of rendering schools flourishing and prosperous. It is therefore recommended, until experience shall have suggested a better one.

Almost any plan will succeed, where there is a deep and abiding interest felt and manifested by the friends of the School. But, with the best plan, if this interest is wanting; if parents care not whether their children be present or absent; if they and believers generally feel indifferent as to the welfare of the School, it can not prosper, nor possess the vitality requisite to a prolonged existence. We appeal, therefore, to Universalist parents, and to Universalists generally; and we ask them to take hold of the work in earnest. Not only establish Schools, but see to it that they are made what they should be. Seek out the children of the poor, the degraded, and the abandoned. If they require clothing, furnish them with it, place them along with your own children, and impart to them all the religion of your Master, and store their minds with the principles of revealed truth. Do this, and you shall see the spirit of a mighty reform going abroad, moulding existing institutions in more accordance with the genius of the Gospel; uprooting that which is pernicious in the customs and usages of society; removing corruption and false doctrines from the church, diminishing the evils which prey upon mankind and draw them down to ruin; and causing that which is liberal and benevolent in sentiment and doctrine to triumph on every hand.

Thanking you for the attention with which you have listened to my few, imperfect remarks, and praying the subject of them, may have your serious consideration, I take my leave.

BE NOT HASTY.

BY REV. A. SCOTT.

"I said in my haste all men are liars."—David.

There appears to be an inclination in man to judge prematurely of circumstances and things.—A number of instances of the kind are recorded in Scripture. Jacob of old, was in deep trouble.—Joseph had long been among the lost. Simeon was retained a hostage in Egypt for the safe bringing of Benjamin to that country. Under these circumstances, Jacob exclaimed, "Joseph is not, Simeon is not, and ye will take Benjamin away. All these things are against me;" when in fact they were all ordered for his good, and the good of the whole family. A moments reflection would have taught him to have been still and known that it was God.

Elijah the prophet of the Lord acted thus, when in a cave on mount Horeb, the "word of the Lord came to him saying, what doest thou here Elijah?" In answer to which he said, "I have been very zealous for the Lord God of Hosts; for the children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant, thrown down thine altars, and slain thy prophets with the sword, and I only am left, and they seek my life to take it away"—when in fact there were, as the Lord immediately informed him, seven thousand left who had not bowed the knee to Baal neither kissed him. So also with David—he, in dealing with his fellows, it would appear had been deceived, which caused him in haste to make the denunciation which we find at the head of this article. In every instance we see a gloom cast over the minds of those people, and they for the time weighed down with sorrow. Notwithstanding, however the miseries produced by acting thus hastily, we see men continually following in these steps. I make bold to affirm that most of the offences committed against the laws of God, are committed without reflection; without meditation; without once thinking of the effects which will be produced upon ourselves or others.

Take any one vice, and it will illustrate this fact. For instance, take profane swearing. The person guilty thereof is, as a general thing, acting in haste. He does not reflect upon the propriety or impropriety of the expression, or of the effect it will produce upon himself. Were such people to reflect, but seldom should we see their mouths polluted with profanity. They would see that the effect was deleterious to themselves, and peculiarly calculated to drive his fellows from their company unless they too were guilty of the same foolish practice. Did he but reflect he would see that the course would cause his fellows to look upon him with contempt, also that strangers would form a low estimate of his character. Talk with the profane swearer upon the subject, he is willing and ready to confess that the practice is a bad one; and when he reflects, causes unpleasant sensations to pass through the mind; all of which arises from inadvertent speaking. We should be very much on our guard in regard to the use of our tongues; for "it is an unruly member, which can no man tame. With it bless we God, even the Father; and with it curse we man, made after the similitude of God. Out of the same mouth proceedeth both blessing and cursing. My brethren these things ought not so to be." It is a good motto, and one that should ever be kept in view. "Think twice before you speak, and you will speak twice the better for it." What has been said of profane swearing, may be said of the guilt of evil speaking. Calumny, slander, backbiting, lying, tale bearing, with the various other evils of the tongue, would no longer be persisted in, if people would but think first, and then speak. Then much of the trouble, disunion and dissatisfaction existing among mankind would be done away. Unity and peace would pervade the heart, shedding down its sweet influences therein, causing brotherly kindness to increase, enlarge, expand; and a bond of union stronger than the bonds of death, would encircle the vast family of man. How often has a word, a look, changed the future prospect of a fellow. Floated on the wings of calumny it has blasted the character of the youth, and caused them to sit down in despair—set brother at war with brother; planted the thorn of bitterness in the family circle; produced disunion among neighbors and friends as lasting as life; prostrated the happiness produced, by our connection with the world, and left man, to wander homeless, houseless, and forlorn.

Nor do the evils of haste stop here. There are other things done in haste. In selecting friends and associates, also in withdrawing our confidence, we often act injudiciously. We form an opinion of a man at the first appearance, either favorable or unfavorable, and as a general thing we act in conformity to the first impression received. Most people have seen, if not felt the effects of haste in such cases. Most people have been deceived by the first appearance, and caused thereby to clasp a viper to their bosom, or spurn a virtuous man from their company. This I will leave for the reader to carry out at his leisure, and proceed to a greater evil that arises from the same source.

This is a haste in forming our religious impressions. Our course in life is depending greatly, upon our religious views. The manner we look upon the divine character and our fellow man, should of all things be found judicious. I know, however, that this is a point disputed. The views and feelings of the mind have been shaped in a moment. It has been by excitement produced upon the feelings, rather than upon the reason and better judgment. The evil effects are to be visibly seen in the great move made in regard to the second appearing of the Saviour. By the operation of the principle, a spirit of partiality has taken possession of the heart, and the whole life made a scene of painful anxiety and distress. Reason has been dethroned, and all business forsaken. In short, the most disastrous consequences have been the result. People have run headlong upon their conclusions, and some of them have even confessed that they scarcely ever looked at their Bibles before they had formed their views. And more too, many are driven or rather are drawn into such a course by the direction of those who profess to teach the truth in righteousness.

Those things ought not to be thus. There should be more substantial food than that produced by excitement. There should be a knowledge derived from a daily search of the Scriptures. An affection of the heart produced by a contemplation of the great I AM, and of the connection existing among mankind. My brethren, let us be careful in our movements to act judiciously. Let us act knowing the results which will necessarily flow from our actions; then may we be enabled to pass smoothly down the stream of life—be permitted at our latest moments to look back upon a life well spent, and rejoice in our happiness and prosperity. After considerable discussion and general conversation on the subject, the following preamble and resolution were unanimously adopted.

Resolved, That Br. J. D. Adjourned to meet at Frankfort, Herkimer co.,

on the second Wednesday and following Thursday in June, 1844.

D. SKINNER, Moderator.

J. H. TUTTLE, Clerk.

During the session, sermons were preached by the following brethren: D. Skinner, (occasional,) E. M. Woolley, J. A. Aspinwall, C. S. Brown, J. D. Hicks and W. H. Waggoner. Concluding addresses by Br. P. Hathaway.

REMARKS.—This was a most delightful and refreshing season. The weather was very fine, the singing, by a large and well ordered choir, harmonious and delicious; the preaching generally of an interesting and impressive character, and listened to by a large and crowded congregation with apparently deep and heartfelt interest. The new and commodious church which has within the past year been erected at Newport and consecrated to the worship of the one true God and Father of all, was literally filled to overflowing. The society here seems to be in a highly prosperous and flourishing state under the pastoral care and efficient and faithful labors of Br. M. B. Smith. Their houses, their hands and their hearts were open to welcome the members of the Association and their visiting friends; and long will their hospitality and kindness be remembered. Harmony and peace pervaded our council in all its deliberations. Two flourishing new societies and one young and promising brother in the ministry of universal reconciliation, were received into our fellowship, and we trust will prove worthy the boon. Some of our societies were unrepresented, and some we fear are languishing, or cold and inactive. We hope all such will awake from their slumbers, put on the armor of light and stand in their places. Wherever there are believers, though they be but few, where the preached word is desired but not enjoyed, let them communicate with Br. Hicks, employ him to visit and preach to them, and raise what they can to remunerate him for his services. From small beginnings they may increase in strength till they shall be able to sustain preaching a good portion of the time. In short, brethren, let us one and all faithfully do our duty, and God will sustain the right and bless us in our deeds.

D. SKINNER.

BE SHORT—COME TO THE POINT.

We were much amused with the following paragraph from the American Journal. It is full of good sense. It contains excellent hints to editors of newspapers, and all others who write for the periodical press. We commend it to the attention of the young men who sometimes write for the Trumpet. A communication may be short or long, according to the amount of truth it contains. Some men will get as much truth into half a column, as others will into half a page. Remember the advice of the writer we quote—dash into the subject at the first sentence.—Trumpet.

"HINTS TO WRITERS IN PERIODICALS.—Much time, words, ink, and paper, are wasted on introductions. Periodical writers should be brief and crisp, dashing into the subject at the first sentence. Sink rhetoric. Nobody cares how you came to think of your subject, or why you wrote upon it; of course the exordium is unnecessary. Commence with your leading thought, and avoid irrelevant digressions. You may be less scholastic, but you will be more original, and ten times more amusing. Take it for granted, that your article at the first is four-fifths too long. Cutting it down requires resolution; but you gain experience as well as improve your article, by excision. For the mode of doing it, begin by crossing out all explanatory sentences. Leave nothing but simple propositions.—Young writers always explain a thing to death.—Never commence an article till you know what it is to be about. Some writers have an incontinency of words, and will dilute you an idea to twenty pages."

Envy, if surrounded on all sides by the brightness of another's prosperity, like the scorpion, confined within a circle a fire will sting itself to death

PRAISE THE LORD.

Methinks I hear a whispering voice
That bids my soul in God rejoice,
"That lifts the vale of future years,"
And points mine eyes to brighter spheres,
When glit'ring bands with one accord,
Attune their notes to "Praise the Lord."

The Patriarchs of olden times,
Whose age-crown'd heads, in eastern climes
Were laid beneath the valley's clod,
There sing the song of "Praise to God."

The men of God who chosen were,
To tell of Jesus—heavenly heir,—
To preach sweet peace—the holy word,—
Are also shouting, "Praise the Lord."

The harden'd Jew, whose wicked life
Was bathed in paths of bloody strife,
There sounds the trump of peace abroad,
From the sweet song of "Praise to God."

And not alone to such is given,
This song of joy and bliss in heav'n;
Alike the Gentle's voice is heard,
In chanting songs to "Praise the Lord."

The Heathen, too, who knows not why,
Is formed the earth, the sea and sky,
Shall there unite without discord,
In singing songs to "Praise the Lord."

Oh, who can not in God rejoice,
When thus all nations with one voice,
Shall swell the heavens with their song,
And Angels' notes their tones prolong
With soothing accents from the word,
While heaven echoes, "Praise the Lord?"

EXCLUSIVENESS.

One characteristic of the American people or "Yankee Nation," is said to be, "Jack-at-all and good-at-none;" and this undoubtedly is true—distinctively true—of them as a body. But when we look at individuals and localities, pursuing the objects pertaining exclusively to their province, sphere or pursuit—turning with cold disdain from everything they suppose will not immediately and exclusively augment their possessions, their honor, their importance or their influence, cold to the progress of that which is calculated to, and ultimately will elevate humanity and better the condition of the oppressed—we may with propriety remark, too exclusive. I do not wish to be understood as condemning exclusiveness, as such; for a certain degree of it is as essential as any other human characteristic. But when it chains the mind to something comparatively unimportant, or (it may be) reprehensible, and draws around it a partition wall between its possessor and suffering humanity, it then needs restriction. The world is groaning under the oppression of rank, artificial superiority and animal despotism. The poor, like the Son of man, have scarcely "where to lay" the "head;" and the rich take with them "seven other evil spirits," and "briers and thorns," strew their paths: the former using up all their physical energies while moral and intellectual power is undeveloped or inactive; the latter losing physical health and "moral worth," by the man-made circumstances under which they are placed. But if exclusiveness (deduced from the foregoing) is too dominant in the "worldly" world, how much more so is it in the Religious. Here the Presbyterian must have a prospective heaven, peopled with those who have obeyed his creed. The Methodist would exclude all the "unsanctified" and not "wonderfully wrought upon," from the heaven of his "graceful" God. The Baptist can not see how he who has not been baptized with his exclusive baptism can be saved. All must be isolated in their exclusive church, or among their exclusive people, before they can worship their exclusive God in an exclusive manner. Their prayers—their religion one would suppose—must be "boxed up" and labelled for Sunday—for "covenant meeting"—for "monthly concert"—for "God's special" and exclusive "visits." Their alms must be reserved, in spite of the suffering poor around them, for the heathen, (whose theology is better than their own,) the Bible, "Home Missionary," Tract, or some other exclusive society.—Their exclusive conversion must necessarily be preceded by the unregenerates passing an exclusive ordeal; assuming, if nothing more, an exclusive visage: shedding a few exclusive tears; sitting on an exclusive seat, and crediting the exclusive misconceptions, and direful prognostications of their exclusively sent and providentially chosen minister.

Well—how is it with Universalists? How with myself? Are they, and am I, too exclusive?—Not in theory; but there is a possibility—yea, a probability that we are so in practice. Of some of us it may be said in truth, we are "twice dead and plucked up by the roots." Our societies are languishing—our spirits are drooping—our minds are contracting—our exclusiveness is increasing in many places. While a man of medium wealth, can and does contribute his twenty-five or thirty dollars, and a proportionate amount of time and zeal in the furtherance and support of that miserable system of partialism, whose final overthrow is sure; the Universalist—if a society needs renovating and supporting, or its pastor encouraging, or a place to worship in, or whatever it may be—contributes one fifth, one fourth, seldom one half this amount of money—with less time and zeal! I do not wish to "sweep the whole board" of our name with these remarks; but such as I have swept (but now while I think of it, I suppose they will not be found reading this article, if it is printed—unless out of a borrowed paper—will they, Br. Grosh?) would do well to "tie" their "purse strings in a bow-knot," not in a hard one these "hard times." I would not wish to speak disparagingly of humanity—for in itself it is noble—but I wish to see it elevated. I would not frown upon and condemn this world in toto; for it is a great and beautiful world, while its Creator is wise and good, and has made man to be so; but I wish man to open his eyes, and behold, and carry into execution the means of becoming much wiser, better, and consequently greater than he now is. I would place within his reach the means of exercising the whole man, and especially his moral and his intellectual faculties. True science and religion tell us most plainly what man is at present, and what he should be to fulfill the purposes of his present existence. And when I see the apathy and darkness which brood over particular communities, I almost despair. But when I go out into the wide world, and see the noble and fearless spirit of inquiry and investigation which is abroad, by means of which a broader and more comprehensive philosophy is being established upon the true nature of man, and a less exclusive or an all-comprehensive religion also brought to light, and both made to harmonize and become practical with that nature as a part of it, I begin to realize in prospective the world's salvation, and fain would "Awake my soul, stretch every nerve,

And press with vigor on"

O man, hear the voice of wisdom! Thou art degraded. Thou knowest not the high capabilities, the noble faculties, the inherent energies thy God has created thee with; and which he designed thou shouldst exercise. Remember if thou art exclusive and hidest them in the earth, thy fate will be that of him with "one talent." On the other hand, an "hundred fold" in this life awaits you, and for aught I know this "hundred fold" is a necessary antecedent to that consequent which we can now only see with an "eye of faith." Go on, then, with increased activity in all that is good;—govern your passions; obey nature's laws; exercise your sympathies for humanity; be less worldly, and more virtuous, and more wise, more enlarged in your conceptions, and less exclusive in your tastes, your desires, your objects of pursuit; and you will approximate to Him,

"To whom no high, no low, no great, no small;
He fills, he bounds, connects and equals all!"

"FAMINE IN THE WEST."

Br. Grosh—I noticed under the head of "Secular news," in No. 16, current volume, an account of a "famine in the west," from the Rochester Democrat, in a communication from some one near Edwardsburgh, Cass co., Mich. Lest some of our friends should send on supplies, which, I assure you, are not needed, I beg leave to say, that the fears of the Democrat's correspondent have not yet been realized; at least so far as food for man is concerned. Wheat, corn and pork, are abundant and cheap—corn twenty-five cents per bushel; wheat, fifty cents; pork, $3 per cwt. in the hog; and $12 per barrel. For domestic animals, there was a scarcity during the latter part of winter, and the month of March; and for teams, during the time of spring seeding. But the scarcity in this respect has not been so great as was by many anticipated.

The communication in the Democrat, was evidently written at a time of high excitement, in consequence of the unusual length and severity of the winter. Since my residence here, winter has usually broken up by the first of March; so that cows and young cattle required but little care after that time. But now the middle of March had arrived, and not the least appearance of spring; the snow was from three to four feet deep, and coarse feed for cattle almost exhausted. It seemed, to many, that Miller's great hail storm had come, or was on the point of coming, and that the end of the world was at hand—to horned animals at least. Every day seemed a week, in length, and the following morning came but to mock the hopes indulged on the preceding day. Reports were also in circulation, that Miller had prophesied, and the prophecy was believed by many, to be now fulfilling, that the snow would accumulate to the depth of five feet, be then suddenly turned into oil, set on fire, (and no bad kindling stuff either,) and thus consume the earth and its inhabitants, excepting always the believers in Millerism;—and as a kind of preparatory step it had been also foretold, it was said, by a child, no more than three weeks old! at Detroit, that on the twenty-fifth day of March, a large number of persons and cattle would be frozen to death; and rumor said, that many along the great road, from Detroit westward, had actually dug caves into the sides of hills, and banks, in which to preserve themselves and their cattle on said day. In the mean time the snow continued to fall, the wind blew, and the cold was intense.

A neighbor woman who lived near me, informed my brother, that she had given up all hopes that spring would ever revisit the earth; and with much apparent concern, inquired of him whether he had heard me say anything about the end of the world. He assured her that I appeared perfectly calm, and that he had not heard me express a doubt as to the continuance of the earth, and the regular progression of the seasons. At this she appeared to be comforted.

The past has been a winter of great excitement on many accounts. We have had Millerism, and Mormonism, Methodism and Abolitionism, to Perfectionism; and lectures on all sorts of subjects; so that, in imagination at least, we have been frozen, and burnt, and starved, and frightened half to death for six months past; and some have run mad, and been ruined for life. Reports also have reached us of a person, "way down east," coming on, giving lectures on the possibility of living without either eating, drinking or sleeping; and that he offers to warrant his subjects to do well, after a trial of three weeks!

On the fatal twenty-fifth of March, I arrived at Paw-Paw, after a hard day's drive, through snow drifts and drifting snow. A large revival machine, on an improved scale, had been in operation, at Schoolcraft, and report said that "every thing had been run through and converted" on Big Prairie Round. The machine was now, and had been for a week past, in motion about six miles east of Paw-Paw. A Mr. Godfrey of the village, who had been highly excited, and was partially deranged, and incapable of attending to any kind of business, was on that afternoon missing. The family became alarmed, and search was made in the neighborhood. The unhappy man was at length found safely burrowed beneath his hay-mow, where he had taken secure refuge, as he supposed, against the cold on this prophetic day!

The 31st day of March arrived, and winter still raged in all its fury—many were entirely out of fodder for their cattle; and those who had to spare, refused to sell, for fear that they too might yet want. Others, taking advantage of the times, sought to speculate upon the necessities of their neighbors—corn was run up, from fifteen and twenty, to fifty cents per bushel, and cash at that; other coarse grains and hay in proportion. Thus it is that man seeks to prey upon his fellow man. No wonder that amidst so many causes of excitement and alarm, highly exaggerated accounts of ruin, and desolation should be sent abroad into community!

But the first day of April at length arrived, and stern and rugged winter yielded to the milder influences of spring. The sky became serene, the air bland—the sun arose in golden splendor, and gave fair indication, that the immense amount of snow covering the earth would soon be converted into water at least, if not into oil; and impart confidence to the hearts of the desponding, or verify the predictions of the latter day saints. On the 22nd of April, I made another clerical visit to Paw-Paw. The snow had disappeared—people along the road were quietly plowing their fields for another crop; and the voice of joy and gladness arose on every side. In the beautiful language of Scripture, “the winter was past, the flowers appeared again on the earth, the time of the singing of birds had come, and the voice of the turtle was heard in the land.” But what shall convey the voice of joy and gladness to the bosom of the maniac? What shall restore tone and vigor to the mind warped aside by superstitious fear—the influence of false religion? To such, the music of nature, and the voice of reason alike may plead in vain! Poor Godfrey is still insane—and the scream of distress, and the midnight cry of murder is sometimes heard from that dwelling.

LETTER FROM LAURA EGGLESTON.

Many of our readers will remember this name, and be pleased to hear from one whom sickness nigh unto death has silenced for many years from our columns. Though not intended for publication, yet we trust to be forgiven, because its publication will gratify so many.

A. B. G.

BR. GROSH—Dear sir, I trust you will excuse the freedom I take in addressing a few lines to you, to let you know I am yet a tenant of this fading clime, and still a believer in the ultimate triumph of my Redeemer's cause, and the final happiness of all intelligent beings. Yes, blessed be my heavenly Father, who in the plenitude of his love has caused me to rejoice with exceeding great joy; notwithstanding much opposition from my Partialist neighbors, who encircle me, and oft, too oft, raise the loud and dismal “popular cry” of endless misery. During the past winter, great excitement prevailed in this vicinity—in consequence of Millerism. We had a course of lectures from a gentleman of this romantic belief, who made a short pergrination in this town. I did not do myself the honor to attend his meetings, but several of my young friends, who are Methodists, were very much deluded by him. A young lady of sensitive feelings, after attending a lecture, one evening, retired to rest with me; but her slumbers I thought were not very peaceful. She started in her sleep and exclaimed, “Oh, see, see, the world will be burned before morning!” Poor, deluded creature, I mentally sighed, must the incubus of error press so heavily on you, who art both lovely and good?

The whirlwind of Fanaticism,
Is raging in our land;—

The “spectre ship” of Millerism,
With votaries is mann'd.

We however passed the night in safety; this beautiful earth of ours was not ignited, but still performs its revolutions among the many orbs that sparkle in the canopy of our heavens. How long will it be unto the end of these wonders—priestcraft, Millerism, and every other ism—I can not predict, but as sure as truth is mighty, and will prevail, the golden era will arrive, when “violence shall no more be heard in the land, wasting nor destruction in its borders—but joy and gladness shall be found therein, thanksgiving and the voice of melody.”—O, praise ye the Lord—for He alone is worthy of our highest adoration.

Dear sir, my health is still poor, but for the last 18 months I have been able to walk around the house, and do considerable light sewing and fancy work, study some, and meditate much on “the signs of the times.” My liberal friends, begin to enquire, “why do you not write for the Magazine and Advocate again?” I know you have correspondents more talented than myself, whose productions adorn your columns, and are perused with delight; yet still I feel willing to throw in my mite. Please publish the following should you deem them worthy a perusal.

Yours in the faith, LAURA EGGLESTON.

EDITED BY
Revs. A. B. Grosh, G. W. Montgomery and A. C. Barry.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JUNE 23, 1843.

GREAT DEEDS NOT GOODNESS.

The principles and motives which animate the world to action, and those which Jesus and his apostles bring to light for the guidance of man, are often in direct opposition to each other. The restless spirit of worldly ambition, is ever on the look-out for distinction and renown. Great and important events are looked for with feverish anxiety—some rare opportunity to perform a wonderful, if not an unheard-of feat of strength—to display some far-reaching sagacity or comprehensive knowledge—these are occasions that are sought for with intense anxiety, year after year, until life fades away unenjoyed and unappreciated, and the waiter goes out of the world with a heart sick with deferred hopes, and a soul enveloped in repinings and bitterness.

And while the impatient and unhappy watcher stood looking with feverish impatience at the tide of life, as it rolled its bright floods before him, vainly hoping soon to seize some great good as it came floating by—how many smaller blessings and joys floated past him all unheeded, or proudly despised! Because he could not behold the glitter of gold and the hues of imperial purple, he would see no beauty in the silvery wave, the flashing sunbeams, and the rain-bow hued bubble! Because he could behold no stately man of war ploughing in stern pride that ever rolling stream, he turned with contempt from the fairy barque laden, not with the engines of death, but the elements of joy. Because he could perform no feat that would destroy a nation to erect another in its stead, he would not build a cottage for contentment to dwell in, nor rear a bower in which humble peace might repose through life.

Such is the unhappy spirit of the world—such the deadly spirit of strife and ambition that ever cries, “all or nothing”—“one great act, or a life of idleness!”—You read it on the records of human history, where a single battle occupies pages, while years of peace and improvement are crowded into as many lines. The emperor who has oppressed his subjects, and employed the executioner, is named with distinction, if not with honor; while the philanthropist who has penetrated dungeons, erected asylums, and employed the schoolmaster, is nearly unnoticed, and if noticed, barely named. The Alexanders and Napoleons of our race, who have slain their hecatombs of human beings, and spread the fair earth for miles with their own gallant armies, perishing with famine and frost—oh, what a conspicuous station do they fill in those bloody annals called the history of our world; while the Howards, the Franklins, and the Oberlins can scarcely find a corner for honorable remembrance. And even the Alexanders, the Luthers and Calvins of ecclesiastical history, are there largely displayed in consequence of their struggles, strifes, and violent words and measures, while the more pious, learned and benevolent Melancthon—the man whose mild and tolerant spirit really did more for true Christianity than any of the Reformers, is named as a mere appendage of the Reformation. The world truly loves and cares for, its own. The feats which ambition strives to perform—the deeds and displays which the spirit of self and of strife most admires, will be most prominently held forth for the performance and admiration of others. Not who does the most good, and diffuses abroad the most happiness, but who makes the most display, and executes the greatest movements, whether for good or evil, occupies the largest space in the eyes of those who form what is called the world. And in the religion that is of the world, though called after him whose kingdom was not of this world, the same pernicious standard is raised up, and men square their conduct and opinions by it. For long years past, the Christian churches have been in alternations of chills and fevers—one time frozen almost to torpidity and death, and at another, burning up with a perfect fever of zeal and fanaticism. At one time all the efforts and energies of pastor and people are concentrated into one mighty effort to promote temperance, or abolition, or missions, or save souls from the wrath of an all-affectionate Father; until, by long dwelling upon the single idea, the mind becomes dizzied, the feelings lashed into fury, the passions heated, and reason and propriety are cast to the winds. Then a reaction takes place. The feelings subside, reason is ashamed of past excesses, the mind refuses to think any longer on the subject, and all is cold, and dull, and joyless in the lately crowded sanctuary. And well is it, in these spasmodic religious operations, if sensuality and low vice do not find a door opened by a zeal for God that is not according to knowledge, and enter in and pollute the sanctuary and the very altar of God's holy temple!

Now, do not misunderstand me. I say nought against the cause of temperance, or human freedom, or religion, or zeal, or any thing that God commands, and which the welfare of our race requires. I most cordially believe that it is good to be zealously affected in every good cause, and work, and word—but I speak against the too prevalent notion that all our duties to God, to our fellow men, and to ourselves, may be crowded into a few violent, spasmodic efforts, repeated at great intervals. I am endeavoring to show that the religion of the Redeemer requires not any great and astounding action—some deed that will cause the world to shout in wonder or grow pale in alarm—but that it requires a steady, constant, persevering course in the performance of the joys, the good, the useful. And I hope to satisfy you that the most useful and joyous deeds we can perform, are generally those very actions that never are mentioned on the page of history, nor enter into the world's estimate of greatness and goodness. The zeal which Jesus requires, is the steady flame that constantly rises up in a clear and calm atmosphere, from a heart well filled with the oil of divine grace. The moderation which he desires us to make known unto all men, is the calm, steady prudence that carefully considers every step before it is made, and yet advances onward. How different such a zeal from the consuming fever-heat that flushes the cheeks, and fires the eye, and dries up the springs of charity in the soul! How widely different such moderation from the apathetic coldness, that goes with icy formality to the sanctuary, and moves with leaden step in the cause of suffering humanity!

On reading the above, I rubbed my eyes to see that I had not mistaken the words. Then I conned over all my sins of joking about the Porringer; but could not make out the satire. Then I tried sins of omission of courtesies and the like; but still I could not bring the card to bear. Then I tried to consider the card as serious; but that was still "no go," for I could not call to mind any—not even the least "favor," or "mark of confidence and affection," or any "testimonials" whatever,

"of respect and good will." This is awkward—very! If Br. Smith is joking, I can not laugh at it—if he is raping my knuckles, I can not feel it—and if he is really thanking me, I can not, for the life of me, tell him what he is welcome to. I can only stand amazed, and stare vacantly at the card, and wonder what it means? Will the Warrior please to explain to my dull comprehension, by naming explicitly what "favors" and "marks of confidence and affection," and what "testimonials of respect and of good will" he ever has received from me—or what of such as were his due, I have failed or omitted to pay him? I know that my Dutch skull is not always the thinnest in the world, but I'll vow I never knew it so thick before as it is in relation to this "Favors acknowledged." So, speak plainly, Mr. Warrior, that if there is any thing wrong I may rectify it—or if any one has been sending you favors, etc., in my name, I may know it. Now, don't forget this! A. B. G.

THE GOSPEL BANNER states that there were but ten ministers and very few laymen at the last N. Y. Convention in Cooperstown—and pretends to quote the statement as being Br. Price's!!! Wonder what kind of spectacles Br. Drew uses—they must diminish the number as well as the size of objects.

N. B.—Br. Drew is still so much engaged in correcting other people's errors, that he has no time to take care of what he himself publishes. Who will weed his garden for him? A. B. G.

THE PENNSYLVANIA CONVENTION at its session in Catawissa, on the 6th and 7th inst., passed resolutions requesting the rescinding of the "Temperance test" passed at the last U. S. Convention. Three Associations were represented in the Convention, and five preachers were present. It adjourned to meet in Pottsville, Schuylkill county, on the first Wednesday and Thursday in June, 1844.

WASHINGTONIAN POCKET COMPANION.

Mr. B. S. Merrill of this city has just published the third edition of this collection of temperance hymns, songs, etc. The book has been enlarged by the addition of 32 pages to the second edition, and improved by the condensation of the definitions and principles and measures, the omission of some and the addition of other songs and hymns, and especially by the addition of about fifty five pieces of music, arranged specially for the work by Mr. W. F. Gould of this city. Simplicity, correctness and adaptation has been carefully studied in this new edition, and it is humbly believed that in point of chasteness, variety, number of songs, popular music, and cheapness of price as well as neatness of printing and binding, this Temperance Song and Hymn book has not its superior in the market. True, I am not the proper judge in this matter; but in this opinion I am not alone. I hope the temperance public will give the book a trial, and I fear not that the Publisher will suffer. I have not a copy at hand while writing, and can not do more therefore, than notice it thus generally at the present writing. A. B. G.

We thank the Editor or Publisher of the "Constitution and Manual of the 1st Independent Christian Church" of Richmond, Va., for a copy of that neat little pamphlet. It contains the Church Constitution, and forms for Ordination of deacons and preachers, Dedication of children, Marriages, Funerals, &c. The giving assent to marriage by dis-joining hands, we consider rather inappropriate. Our custom has been to have the parties signify their assent by joining hands. However, each one to his own taste in such matters. A. B. G.

INDUCEMENTS TO SUBSCRIBERS.—All of our subscribers who have not paid for the present volume, by sending us two dollars, free of postage, shall be credited in full for this year and be entitled to the first and second numbers of the Theological Library. The first number contains Winchester's Dialogues complete, and is sold in book form at 62 1-2 cents. The second is Petitpierre on Divine Goodness. The first we have on hand, the second we expect to receive soon.

PETITPIERRE ON DIVINE GOODNESS will be the next work published in the Theological Library of Brs. Gihon and Co., and will be afforded for about one shilling! The book formerly cost from four to six times as much. They have concluded to defer a while the publication of Ziegler's Everlasting Gospel; until Br. T. J. Sawyer can ascertain some further particulars about its author, and write an introduction to the work. This Library should be taken by every Universalist family—they can not get works cheaper. Winchester's Dialogues for 18 cents—Petitpierre for one shilling—is cheap as the cheapest. Cash orders supplied at this Office—one dollar will purchase the ten numbers of the series. A. B. G.

INQUIRIES ANSWERED.

Mr. Editor—Having the utmost confidence of your readiness and ability to explain all texts of Scripture which may be presented for information. I present the following questions, hoping to receive a reasonable and satisfactory answer from your most able pen. A LOVER OF TRUTH.

There, reader, is a sample of the soft soap and molasses with which Editors are sometimes daubed and dosed by their correspondents. The questions will exhibit the correspondent's notion of what subjects are scriptural. And the whole being without a name, will show his ignorance or disregard of editorial rules. We always require querists to give us their proper names, if they would have us answer their questions. Now to question 1st.

1st. Did God create light before the sun? If so, how could he divide the light from the darkness; since darkness is but the mere privation of light? How could time be divided into days before the creation of sun, since a day is the time between sunrise and sunrise?

Yes; for there could be light without the sun. If the light was not universally diffused, it was divided from the darkness, or places where light was not. The term day does not, in the Bible, always mean a "time between sunrise and sunrise;" for it sometimes means 12 hours, sometimes a life time or period of one man's mission on earth, and sometimes a period of time or dispensation.

2nd. If the world was once drowned by a flood, from whence came all the waters—since the weight of the atmosphere, with all its vapors, is equal to no more than a hollow sphere of four and thirty feet thickness, environing the whole globe, and consequently the whole of its contents, if condensed into water, could not deluge the earth to the height of an ordinary house. So we have but 34 feet of water to deluge the highest mountains, some of which are more than fifteen thousand feet high.

It would be as easy for the Almighty to create water sufficient, as to condense that already existing in the atmosphere—or to upheave the oceans so as to overflow the inhabited earth. If the flood was at all miraculous, the difficulty of natural means is not to be regarded at all; and the Bible represents it as a special event.

3d. How does it happen that Moses was sent to advise Pharaoh to send for his cattle and all that he had in the field to shelter them from the terrible hail storm, since they were all previously killed by the murrain? (Exod. ix: 3, 6, 19.)

The meaning briefly is, that of all the cattle perished by the murrain, all were of Egypt, and none were of Israel. The general phraseology used in both cases, does not require an absolute meaning; for the very account itself forbids it in both cases. It was not a total, but only a general destruction of cattle and of men.

4th. Why should God be angry at Balaam because he went with the men, (Num. xxii: 22,) since he went by God's command? (Num. xxii: 20.)

Balaam went by God's command, it is true; but he went also through a wrong motive, which wrong motive was what caused the displeasure. Balaam went, not out of regard to God's authority, but for the love of money. See 2d Pet. ii. 14-16.

5th. How could it be a crime in David to number the people; especially as it was by the instigation of the Lord? (2nd Samuel, xxiv: 1, 10, 12, 13.)

The Lord being angry with Israel, moved David to number the people; and on Israel fell the judgment.—In the Bible whatever happens is ascribed to the permission or command of God, the First Cause and Sovereign Ruler of all events and things. So the instigation of David, though it arose from Satan (an adversary, see 1 Chron. xxi: 1.), yet is ascribed to God.

6th. How does it happen that Matthew reckons twenty-seven generations from David to Christ, while Luke reckons forty-two, and the names totally disagree? Matthew traces the descent from Solomon; and Luke from Nathan; both sons of David.

It happens so, because Matthew reckons by one branch of the family, and Luke by another. If a Lover of Truth will count up his genealogy to Noah, by his father's side, and also by his mother's side, he will probably find as many and as great differences in the two tables of his descent.

A satisfactory answer of the above questions will be most cordially received through the medium of your most excellent paper, by a friend to truth.

I have answered the questions briefly, because several of them are not of a Scriptural nature, and appear to be of a cavilling character. Any works on the proper subjects, will furnish answers to them all. But thinking the querist is sincere, I have answered them truly, and referred to the proper scriptures for proof. I hope he will read and construe the Bible candidly, and let it be its own interpreter, in which case its answers will be satisfactory.

FOISSART'S CHRONICLES.—We have received the first and second numbers of this work, and from a hasty glance at the contents of its pages, we judge it to be what it has been before, justly considered, one of the most valuable historical works published. These numbers contain a memoir of the author, and chronicle the doings of the Kings, Queens and Knights of England, Scotland, and other countries, etc., from 1326, or the coronation of King Edward III, down to 1359, with numerous engravings. The present numbers contain 62 pages each. Ten numbers will complete the work, issued semi-monthly, at 25 cents per number, or $2.00 in advance for the entire work. Price of the English edition of the same work, $12.00. Address J. WINCHESTER, 30 Ann street, N. Y. All orders must be accompanied with the cash free of postage.

CALL.

Will Mr. James McKisson, who is now located somewhere in Wisconsin or Iowa, (or some friend that may know his location,) write a line to H. J. Miner, Esq. P. M., Camden, Oneida co., N. Y.; and let him know the address of James McKisson, that some inquiries may be made of him concerning one Rev. John Gray?

"Better Covenant, please copy.

DEATHS.

In this city, on the 9th inst., DAVID EDWARD, youngest son of David Owens, aged 4 months and 17 days.

"O ye, who, o'er your child's low bier,
Do shed the bitter drops like rain,
Hope that a brighter, happier sphere,
Will give him to your arms again.
For God does mark each sorrowing day
And numbers every secret tear,
And heaven's long age of bliss shall pay
For all his children suffer here."

H. B. SOULE.

Also, in this city, on the 10th inst., Mr. JOHN C. ROSENBERG, musical instrument maker, aged about 45 years.

H. B. SOULE.

In West Sherman, St. Joseph county, Mich., April 24th, LUCINA, wife of La Fayette Umstead, and daughter of Luther and Betsy Douglass, in the 23d year of her age.—

This dispensation of Providence has been peculiarly severe to Br. Umstead. He had been married but a few weeks, and his young and amiable wife has been torn from him by the hand of death, before he had, with her, enjoyed the sweets of domestic happiness, in the home he had prepared for her reception. May the hopes and consolations of the Gospel sustain him and the relatives of the deceased, amid the trials they have been thus called to endure. J. G. 2d.

Rev. Jabez Woodman, one of our old, able and good preachers, died May 15th, in New Gloucester, Me., aged 67 years. He was a graduate of Dartmouth College—entered the Baptist ministry—but about 22 years ago was converted, and connected himself with our denomination.

A. B. G.

In Binghamton, on the 13th of Nov., 1842, Mr. OLIVER C. BRADFORD, aged 42 years. In the death of Br. Bradford, our cause has lost one of its most warm and active supporters, community a worthy member, and his family, a kind husband and father. His disease was diabetes. To him death had no terrors, and he died fully believing, that what God has promised he is able also to perform. Notwithstanding he died full in the faith of the "restitution of all things;" it has been reported, by those who know better, that he renounced his faith, or doubted the final holiness and happiness of all mankind. May God forgive those who would thus speak of the dead.

W. M. D.

At Little Meadows, Susquehanna county, Pa., Feb. 20th Mrs. ZERUBAH, wife of Mr. David Barney, aged 62 years. Never have I been called to administer the consolations of the Gospel to hearts more deeply stricken with sorrow, than were those who mourned on this occasion, the loss of a companion and mother. The large concourse of neighbors and friends who met to pay the last tribute of respect to the deceased, told how highly she was esteemed and beloved.—May the aged and afflicted husband, and the sorrowing children be supported under their bereavements, by that holy faith which looks forward to a better and happier world, where there will be no more death, and where they shall meet her, who has gone before them, to part no more forever.

WM. M. DELONG.

The Steuben Association will meet in annual session at Springwater, on the first Wednesday and Thursday (5th and 6th) of July next.

Our ministering brethren knowing our wants, will, I am sure, attend our meetings if practicable. Therefore, to them I repeat not the usual formula of invitation and request.—To our lay brethren, I should perhaps use a little more persuasion—especially to those within the limits of this body. Come up, then, brethren—let us hear from all, without reserve. Assist in our deliberations, that we may ascertain whether we shall stand or fall.

Those from a distance, who will attend the Conference, enquire for J. H. Stevens, J. Phelps, J. Goodno, J. Healy, where they will find feed for their horses, and something (not bread alone) for themselves. I am not acquainted at Springwater, therefore can give no directions. But I will venture to say, enquire for friends, and you will find them here.

THE CLERGYMAN.

BY MISS M. E. TILLOTSON.

The preacher rose—with solemn air and look,
That awed the concourse into reverence dread,
His favorite text, in all the Holy Book,
“Depart ye cursed,” slowly, gravely read.

Then paused awhile to note the good effect
Of the denouncement—plainly did he trace,
In anxious look, the safe, self-deem’d elect—
The fancied outcast, in the placid face.

Short time could be allotted to portray
The saints’ delight, and right hand elevation;
For hell’s eternal tortures he’d display,
As task indeed devolving on his station!

The writhing heart fast held in serpent coil,
As rigid Milton, and young Pollok dream’d;
The hydra personalities of hell
And his description of the sinner doom’d!

Who could listen longer? whom the ear
Can brook not tale of time, with mis’ry fraught,
How of eternity? hence shall mine hear
The precepts which in mercy Jesus taught.

His was the voice that gave relief from fear;
That superstition’s darkest midnight broke;
That raised the spirit faint, and bade it cheer,
For lo! “a God” salvation’s dawning woke!

Oh! piteous dupes of systems error based,
Of Calvin’s cruel creeds, and Miller’s schemes;
Can ye not see the darksome ways ye’ve traced,
Are but delusions—terror’s wildest dreams?

Turn to the Saviour—note how vastly wide
The difference in your dire horrific lore,
And His, your rightful specimen and guide,
Who meekly counselled, and forgiving bore!

He taught “glad tidings” which like radiance fell
On gentle blindness—souls with ignorance dim;
A glow which mental darkness could dispel;
Your ministerial duty learn of Him!

SCENES IN THE DRAMA OF HUMAN LIFE.

BY MRS. F. M. BAKER.

SCENE FOURTH.

Look at yonder antiquated cottage, surrounded by trees, and overgrown with vines venerable for age.—Not long since dwelt there, an aged couple, who seemed almost a part of the cottage; so associated were they with every thing about it. And old Grandfather and Grandmother Hume, as every body far and near called them, were among the best, and kindest, and happiest old people the world ever saw.

Methinks I see them now, seated in their high backed chairs; she with her knitting, and he reading the old family Bible to her, or with his spectacles in his hand, looking at her, and conversing with her, as fondly and gently as in the palmiest days of their youth. Ah! theirs was an affection which neither life nor death could destroy; which grew with their growth and strengthened with their strength. Perhaps they loved less passionately than years before, but their love was more deep and holy.

They had never been separated twenty four hours at a time since their marriage; which was when they were quite young, and now they were on the utmost verge of a century. Each seemed uneasy and sad when not near the other. Together they had cultivated their small farm, and together enjoyed its products. They planted their own fruit trees, and tended and nurtured them until they were dear to them. Indeed, together they had always lived, and labored, and together we always said they would die. Nor were we mistaken; but a few hours separated the flight of each spirit to its better home. It seemed for a long time, as if each but awaited the company of the other, upon that last journey; and to take it together, had ever been their most anxious desire.

A large family had risen around them; had grown to manhood and settled in life; every one an honorable, useful, and respected member in community. Well might this family rise up and call these parents blessed! An almost perfect pattern was Grandmother Hume for a mother. From my own mother I took my lessons, she would say, nor have I ever found them to fail. We never disobeyed our parents; not because we feared them, but because from our love for them we had no desire to. Nor was ours that kind of love which is generated by a hope of reward, and which can only be kept alive by promises, and bribes, and flatteries. They never bid us do a thing but once, before we did it; because we had learned from long experience that they never required aught but what was for our good. They did not begin by trying to hire us to do our duty, or threatening us if we neglected it. Therefore we never acted from any hope of reward or fear of penalty. A desire to please them and do right, was our only motive; nor was our duty ever left undone. Indeed each child strove to do first and best what he knew the parent desired. And we never waited for another to do what each was bid. Our delight was to see who should act first and best. And could we but anticipate a wish of our father or mother, and perform it before being asked, we were doubly happy.

Upon such principles I have endeavored to train my children; with what success you can see. Particularly we wished they might see in us a faint shadow of that more perfect and better way, in which the Great Parent of all deals with his children.

Oh! thought I, what a pity that every parent could not here take a lesson. How many more happy families should we have upon earth.

Canterbury, Ct.

A SAD SPECTACLE.

On our way from Philadelphia to this city on Friday last, upon our return from Baltimore, our attention was arrested by the appearance of a fellow passenger, who chanced to sit near us in the cars. He was apparently not over 30, dressed in coarse and seedy garments, and evidently in the last stage of consumption. Upon his face was stamped the seal of death more clearly and terribly than we have ever seen it upon another living countenance. He was wasted to a skeleton, and the livid paleness of a corpse had driven from his face every hue of health and life. His eyes were restless, and glared with dull but eager stare upon what was passing around him. We did not hear him speak till we had reached Jersey City, and then upon the ferry-boat, we observed him talking to a number of gentlemen, who were standing around him. He spoke feebly, but with great earnestness and excitement. He said he had just been released from the Penitentiary in Pennsylvania, where he had been a long time confined. He had never before confessed his shame, but now, he said, he could not help it. He had been a great villain in his life; but, said he, as his eyes swam in tears, and his thin, blue lips quivered with emotion, that’s all past, and I have got to die in a day or two. His mother, he said, lived at No. — Greenwich street; he had not seen her for many years, and the only favor he asked of God or man was, that he might reach her home and die in her arms. He seemed in a perfect agony of apprehension lest the police officers of the city should see him as he landed, and detain him till it should be too late to see his mother. They all knew him, he said; to be a great rogue, and if somebody did not aid him, he knew he should die in the City Prison instead of his mother’s house. He seemed greatly relieved and truly thankful when several gentlemen offered to send him at once to her residence. We know not what became of him, but think it scarcely possible that he should be living now. But who can picture either the joy or the agony of that last meeting between the widowed mother and her wretched son—coming from the dungeon to her arms only to be laid somewhat more gently in the grave? The excitement of the hope of meeting her seemed to be all that kept him alive; and it appeared scarcely possible that his feeble frame could survive the excitement of the meeting itself.—N. Y. Tribune.

Deliberate long upon that which you can do but once.

MODE OF EXECUTING CRIMINALS IN LIMA.

The day previous to the execution of a malefactor in the city of Lima; a sheriff goes round with a white scarf thrown around his shoulders holding a small silver plate in his hand, asking alms for the person that is about to suffer—that the priests may conduct him safely through purgatory. To every person that gives any thing the sheriff rehearses the crime he has committed, who he is, etc.

The prisoner after his sentence is past is conducted into what is called the Cappella or Confessional Chapel; in front is placed the image of the Virgin Mary, and a crucifix. He has two priests who remain with him all the time, exhorting him to put his trust in the image before him. He confesses his past deeds, and owns the sentence passed on him as just. He is allowed every thing that he wants during that time. On the morning of his execution which is generally about the hour of ten o’clock, he is taken from the chapel into the court yard, where, his hands are tied, and a small crucifix placed therein, with the image of his patron suspended round his neck. He is led between two priests surrounded by soldiers to the place of execution. The music plays the dead march, and they all proceed to the public square, when the troops are formed into three platoons. The culprit is then brought forward; he kneels down and kisses the seat as an acknowledgment of his crime. His sentence is then read aloud, forbidding any person on pain of death to oppose it. He is placed on the seat with his eyes blindfolded; the relics of the saints are taken from him; the priests all the time are recommending him to the Virgin Mary. He cries for Misericordia after them when the priests retire slowly, raising their voices. The soldiers advance within 8 or 10 paces of him; the priests walk backwards with a white handkerchief in their hands, as a signal for the officers to command the soldiers. The officer has his sword drawn, and when the priest raises the handkerchief the officer raises his sword; the sword falls; the soldier fires; the victim falls. The bell of the Cathedral tolls; the music plays merrily; the troops disperse amid the huzzas of a populace. But one lies there still; his spirit has gone to God who gave it. The body is left lying on the ground till about 4 o’clock, with a small plate on it, and an aged person asking alms for the deceased, that the priests may say mass for him to be conducted safe through purgatory. He is then taken to the grave yard, and thrown into a large pit, without funeral rites or ceremony.

“All work, even cotton spinning, is noble; work is alone noble; be that hence said and asserted once more. And in like manner, too, all dignity is painful. A life of ease is not for any man, nor for any god. The life of all gods figures itself to us as a sublimed sadness—earnestness of infinite battle against infinite labor. Our highest religion is named the “worship of sorrow.” For the son of man there is no noble crown, well worn, or even ill worn, but is a crown of thorns!”

If you see a man grossly ignorant and superficial on points which you do understand, be not over ready to give him credit on the score of character which he may have attained for any great ability in points which you do not understand.

"Man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?" Job xiv: 16.

The past, as it rises up before the mind, presents a subject of deep and thrilling interest to the observer of human progression and decline. The superficial observer, however, sees nothing but a blind fatality working the rise and ruin of empires and kingdoms, while the strict observer of the human race discovers in every change which has been wrought, an overruling Providence, that ruleth among the inhabitants of earth, and turneth the hearts of the children of men as the rivers of water are turned.

The past may be unveiled, and beneath its deep coverings which time has wrought, may be discovered the workings of a mysterious Providence mingling with human affairs—from corruption and decay bringing forth life and beauty, and from weakness, strength—from gross darkness has emerged the light of day, and from political and religious desolation, systems that are congenial to the feelings and desires of immortal beings.

Let us call to mind those distant ages when Syria contained a hundred cities, and abounded with towns and hamlets. Every where one might have seen frequented roads, cultivated fields, crowded habitations, and her people surrounded with all the glory and grandeur of this lower world. Let us picture to ourselves the Assyrian empire, on the banks of the Tigris; the Persian, whose kings swayed their sceptres over their down-trodden subjects, from the waters of the Indus to those of the Mediterranean—enumerate the kingdoms of Idumea, Damascus and Samaria, and the tribes of the Philistines, and the republics of Phenecia. Where is Judea, the land of the Prophets and Seers? The place where once her holy city stood, the pride of the favored Jew and wonder of the world, is now become a rendezvous for wolves, and a hiding place for owls and dragons.

Where are those stupendous walls of Nineveh—those ramparts and hanging gardens of Babylon? The wild beasts of the desert lodge there, and satyrs dance among her ruins. Where are those palaces of Persepolis—those temples of Balbec and Jerusalem? Where are the cities of Rome, Carthage, Athens, and Thebes with her hundred gates? Where are the fleets of Tyre, and the dock-yards of Arvad? And where are the multitudes of Egyptians that reared those gigantic pyramids in which to entomb their cruel sovereigns? Alas! we behold nothing but solitude and desolation—the temples are thrown down; the walks, palaces and gardens are demolished; the forts filled up; the cities, towns and hamlets destroyed; and those lands stripped of their inhabitants, seem dreary burying places.

Where are the multitudes that thronged the streets of the ancient cities—the richly dressed, the poorly clad, their sovereigns surrounded with the gaudy trappings of wealth, and royalty with the peaceful laborer at his daily task, toiling to support the wants of nature? The high, the low, the rich, the poor, the base, and the brave, have all to the grave gone down, and become food for the beetle and worm!

Where are the mighty armies that trod the streets of the eternal city; butchering its inhabitants, laying waste the surrounding country, and spreading devastation and ruin in their train? By their deep probings they brought death and ruin upon the mistress of the world. They too have fallen, and exist only in name.

Where is the mighty man, "whose eye terrified the glance its magnificence attracted. Grand and gloomy, he sat upon his throne a sceptered hermit, wrapped in the silence of his own originality. At one time nations were his outposts and kings his subjects." In a moment he was entombed amid the barren rocks of St. Helena. He died a wearied captive—he gave up the ghost and where is he?

Where are those Spartan bands of soldiers that were led forth to battle when liberty lay bleeding at every pore? Their bones lie bleaching on our mountain sides, or beneath the green turfs of their own loved soil. Where are our Washingtons, our Adams, our Jeffersons and Franklins, together with that host of worthies who rocked the Infant (Liberty) and bore it up till their children should honor it? Where are they now? Does the senate chamber still echo with the sounds of "liberty or death?" Are the swords and bayonets still seen glittering in the sunbeams at Lexington, Trenton, Monmouth, Bennington and Saratoga? Do the halls of science still reverberate with their music-tones, raised in defence of reason and human rights; or are the pages of literature still fed from those bright luminaries that gave such an impulse to the great ocean of mind? No—they are gone! but where?

Behold the infant upon its mother's bosom, sleeping in infancy. Upon that child the parent expects to lean in her declining age for support.—We gaze upon him—he looks beautiful as the rose of spring; Or, like the vine encircling the huge oak, monarch of the hills, blooming in sweetness—and while we gaze, the fell destroyer comes and nips the opening flower. "He giveth up the ghost, and where is he?"

Behold that young man or that young woman sporting with life. Days pass smoothly on, and nights are spent in festive halls—at the giddy dance, or at the lamp light poring over the records of the past in endeavoring to store their minds with knowledge that will fit them for greatness and worldly applause. They have not drank deep of sin; but this is not their abiding home. Consumption lays its palsying hand upon them—they sicken—they struggle for the mastery—but they go! And where?

Behold the man of middle age, who has passed the days of infancy and youth, and has arrived at that stage in his life of all others most to be desired—his physical powers have gained their strength, his mind can almost grasp infinity, and his heart beats with a generous warmth towards his fellow beings, and he ranks high in the estimation of the good and virtuous. But alas, how uncertain are all things connected with our earthly existence. At a time when we least expect it, the hand of death is laid upon us, and we, though reluctantly, obey the summons. The body returns to the earth as it was; and the spirit is—WHERE?

See that old man leaning upon his staff, in order to support his tottering limbs. His eye looks dim, but still he has life. He was once seen by the cannon's mouth, fierce as the lion when from his lair he leaps to devour his prey, fighting for his sons and liberty. His brother warriors, one by one, have gone to another land—his wife, his children have been swept like the dew before the rising sun, from earth to another home; and he a remnant of another generation, still lives to celebrate with his children, "with thanksgiving, with festivity, with bonfires and with illuminations," that day on which a nation dared to declare themselves free! But ere to-morrow's sun shall have set, he will have passed away, and be deposited by the side of the companions of his youth—he will have "given up the ghost, and where is he?"

Oh, what a changing world is this!—One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh—life and death—virtue and vice—prosperity and adversity—hope and fear, succeed each other. Go where you may—search the deep recesses of the heart—look aloft to those bright luminaries that have as yet shone with undiminished splendor—look around, and see the beauty and harmony that prevades the works of God—enter the bowels of the earth; and see life and happiness pervading the universe of matter as well as that of mind—on all things, save the throne of the Eternal, is written change and death!

Oh my God! What is man without a hope? Like the ship at sea without an anchor, that is driven to and fro upon the briny deep, until sail, and mast, and all have gone beneath the heaving billows. So man without hope is tossed to and fro upon the sea of life; in fear, and doubt, and conscious forebodings, he gropes on in darkness, until the grave gives rest to his weary frame. The friends and companions of our youth have gone, forever. Parents, brothers, and sisters have left the shores of time, and all past generations have gone to their long home. The grave holds them in everlasting silence—they have given up the ghost, and a world of sentient and sympathising beings asks, where are they?

Mankind are so intimately connected, that if any serious injury happens to one of our race, and if made known to the rest, it causes an instantaneous burst of sympathy, and no human power can check this universal expression of our feelings, until the object of our affections is beyond the power of the destroyer. And just so long as man is in possession of these holy feelings—as long as he loves his race—just so long will he look with deep and holy feelings for man's future good; and no answer to this question can ever produce joy to the soul, unless it assures us that our destiny is to be glorious.

"Man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?" I answer—He dies, and death is the end of all the living. As the flowers bloom for a season, and send forth their sweets, to regale the senses—as the mineral, vegetable and animal creation live to support man; and then droop, and die, and mingle with the dust—so man was created with hopes big with immortality, exclusively for this state of being, and for no other. Though he possesses intellect that is susceptible of an infinite progression in knowledge and virtue; yet this intellect must die. Though he loves, and endeavors to do good; yet in the end, all these virtues must mingle with the general mass of corruption. "The sun, and moon, and stars will rise, and set, and rise again; but when man dies he is to rise no more!"

"A long, long, dark, oblivious, silent sleep—a sleep which no propitious power dispels, nor changing seasons, nor revolving years," is to hold him in its embrace forever!

If this is to be our destiny, why, I ask, did the infidel's god make us as we are? Why did he plant deep in the human soul a desire for immortality? Why did he create us susceptible of either loving, rejoicing, or weeping and mourning over the misfortunes of others? Why did he make matter subservient to mind, if both share the same destiny? If true, does it ease the mourner's smart—does it bind up those avenues from which the tears of anguish gush when nature and affection bleed? No! it contains no balm—it affords no joy, and gives no relief.

Again I answer, that we were created for a higher destiny. God created our first parents, in his own image. They, however, in consequence of the frailty of that nature which God had given them, rebelled against him, and in consequence of such violation were exposed to the wrath of the Almighty. They lost their image, and God subjected them to "all the miseries of this life, to death itself, and to the pains of hell forever." In due time, God out of his own good pleasure sent Jesus Christ, his well beloved Son, to restore that image to the children of men, and reconcile them to God, and raise all men from the dead, and make them holy and happy in the immortal world. And as Jesus is the resurrection and the life, he will raise mankind from the sleep of death, and give them immortality. But in consequence of some rejecting the Saviour, they shall sink into endless despair, while the righteous shall bask in the sunbeams of unchanging love. Yes, all that have lived and loved shall be raised from the dead; but in order for God to be just as well as merciful, the unbelieving wife must be separated from the believing husband—the parent from the child—the brother from the sister, and friend from friend!—The ties which exist here, must be sundered; the connections which are formed on earth, must be broken up; the endearments of associations must all be destroyed—all for the glory of God, and the destruction of more than half of our race.

What better is this answer than the former?—The first takes our existence from us; the other prolongs it, but by prolonging it takes from us those fountains of happiness—friends, affections and associations—without which life would be a curse!

'Tis said, that notwithstanding God destroys the connections and associations that are formed here, he will give the righteous, in lieu of the same, endless happiness and eternal delight in God, and in worship and service. But is it not given to them at the expense of the wicked? The unrighteous are endless losers—their existence is an infinite curse, and annihilation itself would have been a blessing to the fairest portion of our world.

If my nature is to be so chained in the immortal world, from what it is here; so that I can delight in the misery of my race—if immortal happiness consists in feasting self upon the bread of life, alone, without regard to the welfare of others—if love for man, (yes, even the worst of beings), is all to end with this life, it is my prayer that I may sleep on, and on forever, without a consciousness of my own, or the destinies of others.

But if this system must be true—if I must be raised either to endless life with the elect few, or sink in endless night with the expectation of no reprieve—I say (after an examination of my own heart) that I had rather sink to hell than dwell in such a heaven, where I can look down upon my fellow mortals, and see them writhing in the agonies of ceaseless despair.

But, my friends, 'tis false—'tis false as hell. It never originated with God—it never was sung by prophet-bards, or brought by angels to men. The tidings which Heaven sent to mortals was good—'twas "peace on earth, and good will to man."

"Man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?" "The dust returns to the earth as it was, and the spirit to God who gave it." Such is the language of Revelation; and such is the language of nature, reason and experience. There husbands greet their wives—there parents greet their children—there friend greets friend—and there will each learn his highest duty, to love his neighbor (though he were his enemy) as himself. "The spirit returns to God who gave it," to go no more out forever—but it will go on from strength to strength, from perfection to perfection, and from one degree of glory to another, throughout an endless round of ages on ages, till one song shall burst from the universal whole, a family saved in heaven. Amen.

EXCLUSIVENESS.

BY REV. S. J. GIBSON.

"I will have mercy, upon whom I will have mercy; and I will have compassion, upon whom I will have compassion.—BIBLE.

Under the Mosaic dispensation, the Jews were the chosen people of the living and true God. One may go back, and follow them from their rise throughout all the windings of their pathway, until but a short period prior to their subjugation by the Romans, and it will be found that they enjoyed many blessings to which other nations were strangers. All of their plans were successful, so long as they remained in obedience to him who, it would seem, took them under his especial charge. In vain was it that the oppressive hand of Egypt's hardened monarch was raised against them; for he found himself baffled in every attempt to impose slavery upon them. In vain did the nations of the promised possession, lift against them the battle-axe; for in so doing they warred not with man, but with Him whose arm was able to sweep the world with the besom of destruction, and under his protection the career of the Israelites as a nation, was onward, to prosperity, to power, and to glory!

We know not but that such might have still continued to be their happy situation, had they rightly improved those blessings with which they were favored, and had not other people become in a station, to secure the especial favor of the Deity. The wisdom of the supreme Being ever fathoms the depths of an infinite futurity, and lays the foundation of things to transpire in the ages to come, and in consequence, when his purposes relative to mankind were being so far matured, that he required the Jews no longer to be a separate and chosen people; their prosperity was soon upon the wane, and they were travelling the road to adversity as speedily as they once did that leading to prosperity and honor.

Their being subject to many blessings to which others were strangers, and thus continuing until generations one after another had come and gone, at length rendered them proud and scornful. They imbibed and nourished a haughty spirit—were many times oppressive in their conduct—the beauties of humility shone not out from their actions, and doubly true was the proverb rendered relative to their situation, that "pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall."

The time for the winding up of the old dispensation, at length appeared, and the chosen agents came with the promulgation of the new and better covenant, which was to be established upon better promises; and then was heard the pleasing sound of the glad tidings of great joy which spoke peace to all people. At this the Israelites commenced their murmurings, which at length ripened into hatred and downright persecution. Their system of divinity had long spoken to them in a different manner—they had long supposed themselves the chosen subjects of the living God—that they were perfect in works of righteousness, and none others were worthy of blessings from above. This being their supposition, it may well be supposed that when the time for the promulgation of the Gospel arrived—that when it was declared that Gentile as well as Jew, was an offspring of the Deity, and that the Saviour came with the proclamation of peace to a whole world; the Israelites would resort to fault-finding, and repudiate the idea of the covenant of God being founded in such a manner. Yes! this was galling to their pride. It was not in harmony with their sentiments of haughtiness which had sprung up within their minds on account of the privileges which they had long enjoyed. And hence, they forthwith regarded those who proclaimed such doctrines, as enemies of Heaven—as blasphemers, who should be looked upon as strangers to the protection of the laws—regarded as outcasts and vagabonds; and in thus doing, forgot that the Deity had declared, "I will have mercy upon whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion upon whom I will have compassion."

Yea; the favors of the supreme Being are not to be ruled by man—that man has never seen the light of created existence, who can sway the infinite will of the Almighty, and compel him to mete out favors or curses upon whom he, (purblind and impious man,) may choose to favor or condemn! No; the Deity looks through all space—comprehends all being—guides the vast creation, every part of it, man not excepted, with a precise and unerring hand, and will mete out to all that which will be productive of the greatest good. But the Israelitish world had suffered this truth to become lost to their minds—they had become bewildered with pride, and were not as wise as the erring prophet who exclaimed, "how can I curse whom the Lord hath not cursed?" And this proved their temporal and national ruin; for though the most conclusive and tangible evidence that could possibly be placed before the human mind, was brought before them—though the sun, moon and stars above, united with the world beneath, in proclaiming the universal love of God—though every breath of the passing breeze and object over which it swept, spoke of his unchangeable goodness; and though miraculous power was exerted in a special manner, working wonders before them, and all in support of the beginning of a new dispensation, which should break down the partition walls between man and man, and bring all within the pale of love divine and protection from above; yet the Israelite barred his mind against the whole—set aside all these instructions—wrapped himself still more closely in his self-adoring pride, and put far away the idea that the Deity should have mercy upon whom he pleased, and compassion upon whom he thought proper.

Such were the circumstances in which the Jews were placed, and such the opinions by which they were guided, but do we not behold the same exclusive spirit governing a great share of the Christian community at the present day? The prevalent doctrine of endless misery has long held almost an absolute sway, and if we look back to the period in the which it became the established belief of the church, and from thence to the present day, we shall find that this arrogant pride, has faithfully kept pace with the times, lifting its votaries high upon the stream of self-importance, and scorning the traveller of a different faith, and regarding him as being unworthy of the Christian name.

There are, I know, some individual exceptions, and I am happy in the thought; but I wish there were many more imbued with the true spirit of religion, than we at present behold. Prosperity may have long been the inheritance of a denomination, and if they have maintained their humility during the time, they have acted well; but in that instance where it has only been productive of pride and arrogance, the day-star which has long beckoned them onward, is waning, and like Israel's of old, it will soon sink beneath the horizon, and be lost forever! But there are those who will be taught in no school, save that of experience, the dearest of all; and now, even in too many instances we find the manifestation of that spirit which seems to have forgotten that the Deity has declared that he will have mercy upon whom it may please him, and compassion upon whom he thinks proper.

Reader, do you not behold the manifestation of this exclusive spirit almost every day of your life—a "stand by, come not near, for I am holier than thou"? Yes, there are hundreds upon every hand who presume to look up to the heavenly regions, and behold themselves the favored objects of the Eternal Mind, and that none have a right like themselves to blessings from above. How often does the question come home to us:

"Do you believe that all mankind are going to heaven?"

"Indeed we do." "Well; look at that man. True, he was once an ornament to society, but those days have long since passed away; and mark that bloated visage—hear that horrid oath, and see him wallowing in the mire, a drunkard and a brute. Ah, sir, if such men are going to heaven, I don't want to go there!"

Such, we say, is the language with which the Universalist is frequently assailed. Yet, are people who speak in this manner aware, that the Savior has painted their character in its true light? It is even so, and we will spend a few moments in contemplation of it.

"A certain man had two sons, and the younger of them said to his father—Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me." With this request the father complied, and not many days thereafter, the young man took his journey into a far country in order to trade for himself; but being young and inexperienced, he was at once surrounded with the most vicious company which soon led him astray. He joined in their revels—squandered his property—became the most degraded of any, and at last hired himself to a citizen of the country, and was put to one of the meanest of employments, so regarded by his countrymen; and, in a word, saw was the fate to which he had fallen.—But now look upon the other son. He went forth one morning to his labor from his father's house, and as the sun sunk behind the horizon and the shades of evening were stealing around, he rested from his labors, and journeyed homeward; and at a short distance from the house he heard sounds which betokened no little joy. There was, according to the custom of the country, music and dancing, and indeed all was merry. This to him was surprising—he called a servant that stood without, and enquired the cause of this rejoicing, and was answered that his brother had come home. When this came to his mind, he refused even to go into the house; and why? Because that poor wandering brother of his, degraded though he had been, yet had received favor from his father. In imagination he looked upon his brother while in a foreign country. He saw him wild and vicious—squandering his property—wallowing, as it were, in the very depths of iniquity, and if such men were going into his father's house, he did not want to go there!

There is the fac simile of that man who now points to the wanderer from the path of rectitude and virtue, and says, "if such men are going to heaven, I don't want to go there." But had the elder brother looked into his father's house, he would not have seen the degraded being he once saw in a foreign country, but would have beheld him a changed being—his tattered garments removed, and a robe in their stead—a ring upon his finger, yea, a brother, the same as before he left the scenes of his childhood. And the man who now declares that he does not wish a seat in heaven, if the man of iniquity is going there, would do well to consider, that the being whom he now so much loathes, will, ere time is swallowed up in eternity, be changed even like the prodigal son—the tattered garments of sin which now hang around his mind will be taken off, and a robe of virtue appear in their stead—a ring, the signet of undying love, will be given him; and all by the mercy of a Father!

How pleasing it is, to see the lovely virtue of humility shine out from the actions of those who have professed religion, and at all times, to behold the manifestations of that spirit which looks upon all with a compassionate and merciful eye, and ever extends to another that which it would wish in return. And, reader, let not the idea ever enter your mind, that you are the only object of favor in the sight of Heaven, or that his blessings are to be bestowed upon none, but those of your own peculiar faith. Put far away this day of insufferable, sinful pride; and, above all things, never attempt to interpose your arm between mankind and their Maker, saying that his favors shall rest thus and so; for that office he has reserved exclusively to himself. "I will have mercy upon whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion upon whom I will have compassion."

THE CHRISTIAN'S TRIUMPH.

BY MISS MARIA L. STACY.

I stood by the dying bedside of an aged man.—Many long years had he been a tenant of our earth. He had enjoyed the calm sunshine of prosperity, and stemmed the fierce gales of adversity. Sons and daughters had sprung up around him—he had lived to enjoy a good old age—his head had long been blossoming for the tomb—his earthly pilgrimage was well nigh ended, and he was about to be gathered to the garner of his God. For many years he had been a believer in the popular religion of the day—reconciliation had taken place between him and his offended God, and now that the last sad trial had come, we had gathered around to take the parting farewell, and witness, in the dread hour of death, the Christian's triumph! Already the cold damp of death was on his brow, and the lamp of life flickered in its socket. "Ah!" said he, "I grieve not to leave this vain world. I have found its joys to be fading and transitory, and I long to be released from this frail prison-house of clay, and taken home to the mansions of my Father.—But oh! there is even now a thorn rankling in my bosom which can not be eradicated. My children, my beloved children are traveling onward in the broad road to destruction, and I fear, awfully fear, they will be cut off in their mad career, and cast down to people the dark regions of the damned! Oh, my Saviour and my God! Snatch them as brands from the eternal burning! Have mercy, and forgive them!" He ceased! all was still! the sun of life had set! The Father's last anguished prayer had ascended to heaven in behalf of his erring and wayward children! And is this the Christian's triumph? I asked; and the answering response came back upon my heart—Ah, no! This is not the Christian's triumph, but the vague and fearful doubting of the unbeliever. He had forgotten, alas! that his Saviour was their Saviour; and his God, their God; and that a being of all mercy and goodness, could have that intensity of pity and feeling for his children which burnt in his own frail bosom! The glad hope of the believing Christian illuminated not his pathway to the tomb. Dark and fearful were his forebodings—the dark valley of death was rendered doubly drear by the dismal faith of his doubting heart. And I felt that for a cold and selfish heart, this faith might answer to live by; but for a dying mortal, about to bid adieu to all which seems most near and dear, 'tis a canker worm of desponding and despair. No bright hopes of blissful reunion with beloved friends and associates hover round his heart; dearh is to him a dark, deep stream which he fears to fathom. But ah, how unlike to this is the glad faith of the true and believing Christian! He knows his Saviour, and trusts to his mercy and goodness. If the dear and beloved ones of his heart stray from the path of duty and rectitude, he feels that there is a good Shepherd watching over them, who, when the evening shall come, will conduct them back again to the fold. And when the sands of life run low; when he is called to take his last final exit, he goes rejoicing in the bright and cheering hope of a brighter and better world, whose kindred spirits shall be reunited, and with a redeemed world, sing praises to Him who sitteth upon throne, and to the Lamb forever. Yes, here, in very deed, is the Christian's triumph!

Voted that when this body adjourn, it adjourn to meet in Chili on the first Wednesday and Thursday in June, 1844.

The following preamble and resolution were then introduced, and unanimously passed.

Whereas this body has a desire to have a uniformity of articles of faith in the denomination, therefore,

Resolved, That this Constitution be so amended as to have introduced the Profession of Faith of the General Convention of Universalists of the New England States, which was adopted by that body at Winchester, N. H., 1803, which is as follows:

"1. We believe that the holy scriptures of the Old and New Testaments contain a revelation of the character of God, and of the duty, interest, and final destination of mankind.

"2. We believe there is one God, whose nature is Love; revealed in one Lord Jesus Christ, by one Holy Spirit of Grace, who will finally restore the whole family of mankind to holiness and happiness.

"3. We believe that holiness and true happiness are inseparably connected; and that believers ought to maintain order, and practice good works, for these things are good and profitable unto man."

Voted that the Standing Clerk prepare the proceedings of this body for publication in the Western Luminary.

Ministers Present.—C. Hammond, J. Chase, J. M. Cook, and E. W. Locke, Rochester; S. S. Curtis, Gaines; S. Goff, Bristol; L. Knapp, P. Philleo; B. B. Bunker, Lockport.

Remarks.—Taken together, we had a very profitable meeting, and we can but hope that our friends in Middleport, who exerted themselves to make our stay with them comfortable, were well paid by the services of the Sanctuary. Their warm hearts will be remembered by those they entertained. We hope the brethren will be prepared to act on the Resolution that was passed, at the time provided by the constitution. Sermons were preached on the occasion to large audiences, by Brs. P. Philleo, Cook, Spaulding, Locke and Goff. The sermons were well calculated to reform and come at the heart.

B. B. BUNKER, Standing Clerk.

LETTERS OF THE NEW-ENGLAND
SPY.....NO. VI.

—, Mar. 20, 1843.

My Dear F:—Again I resume my pen, and as I have yet somewhat more to say on the subject of Universalism, I again resume that subject.—And you will permit me to say, that no class of Christians have been more generally misrepresented than have Universalists. One could hardly believe that one Christian sect could so far forget their duty to another as to descend to such low and vile slanders as have been propagated relative to this sect. They have been emphatically “every where spoken against.” And yet their course is onward. From a small band they have become a numerous host.

Their clergymen are generally high minded men. There may be exceptions, but as a general thing I have found them a highly cultivated, and very talented class of people. I do not speak here unadvisedly, or without knowledge. I am personally acquainted with some hundred or more of New England Universalist clergymen. And I pronounce them to be a people that will not suffer in comparison, either morally or socially, with any class of people with whom I have ever associated. There are some doubtless that feel their unworthiness, and would gladly retire from the ministry if they knew how. This class feel their deficiency in both talents and acquirements, and are satisfied that they can not meet the wants of the present advanced state of society. But then their services are demanded—they are not idle—there is not a respectable clergyman of the order we speak of, whatever his attainments may be, but what finds employment and a competent support. There are a very few, perhaps, who do not meet with that encouragement which they have anticipated; but the reason of this is, they have over-estimated their abilities, and set too high a value upon themselves. The people will not accord to them what they claim for themselves, and this is a very unenviable state for a clergyman to find himself in. Vanity and foppish look deplorable enough any where; but in a clergyman they are intolerable. Of this class, however, I have become acquainted with very few. I think there are not many in the order. Nor have I noticed but a very few attempts to appear learned. I have seen young men quote from old English manuscripts, and profess to be familiar with them, when I did not believe they had ever seen the book from which they quoted. This I call an attempt to appear learned, and in a clergyman of any denomination is disgusting in the extreme. I never hear it but what the conviction is forced upon me that there is a soft spot somewhere in the region of the top of the head. But with a very few exceptions of this kind, I can most heartily accord to the clergymen of this denomination, a very high degree of intellectual and moral worth.

As a social people I never knew them excel. It does one's soul good to meet them, with their warm grasp of the hand, and share in their hospitality. I hate an unsocial religion. Give me the frank expression of the heart. I can not away with a religion that does not make man a social being as well as religious. And for this reason, I can not find it in my heart to condemn in toto New England Universalism. I think the great error of this denomination lies in the fact that they have been too cold. Christianity as they unfold it, aims high; it aims at a universal, permanent, moral conquest. And as believers in a religion that aims thus high, I think they have been quite too cold and formal. They have not felt in their devotions as if they would go even unto Bethlehem and see this thing that has come to pass there. They have not loved that star, as they ought, which appeared in the east 1800 years ago, and which has guided so many to the cradle of the Infant Redeemer.—That star! that star! Methinks I see it now, hanging over dark and benighted Galilee, and looking down upon the son of Mary. And methinks, too, that I can hear the voice of those whose feet are beautiful as they come over mountains, proclaiming good tidings, good tidings of good, to all the sons of Adam. God in mercy help us all to hear the tidings of a risen Saviour, and may that star—that bright morning star, guide us all where the infant Jesus lay. May our thoughts burn within us as did the disciples, when on their way to Emmaus; and may we all put on more of Jesus; more of Christianity; more of that burning zeal which makes religion a personal matter between man and his God.

I would not have people fanatics; but I would have them Christians. I would not have them bow down before their heavenly Father as if they were bowing down before the marble gods of Greece. But I would have them worship him with an earnest purpose and with a heart warmed into life by a sense of individual responsibility.—Men have something to do to be good; Christians have something to do to live their religion. And you may say what you will about creeds; it all lies here; in this living it out. Here lies the whole duty. And this I rejoiced to hear insisted upon very eloquently, the other day, in one of the most powerful discourses to which I ever listened. The speaker seemed an Ajax overturning mountains of unbelief and tossing them into the sea. I for one felt his power; and from the tears that stood in the eyes, I judged that others felt it too. Never before did I feel so sure that there was a power and might in Universalism that made it omnipotent.

“O then,” said the speaker in conclusion, “let us not be so cold. Let us act as if we felt the fire of God's love burning in our hearts, and beheld the light of his glorious countenance beaming upon us. Then shall we worship him with full hearts, and with a zeal and warmth that shall be an example to those around us. Not till then shall we recommend our religion by our lives.” With such a ministry, thought I, what has New England Universalism to fear? It must spread, and all the powers of earth can not prevent it. Dost thou believe? Thine as ever,

THE SPY.

THE TWO FOLD NATURE OF RELIGION.

BY REV. M. E. SMITH.

“Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father, is this; To visit the fatherless and widows in their afflictions, and to keep himself unspotted from the world.”—James i: 27.

You will readily perceive, that there is in this religion two distinct features, so distinct that they may exist independent of each other: and accordingly we find in our intercourse with the world, that while there are a few who exhibit both in their daily practice, and a few also who practice neither one nor the other, there are many who practice one part and neglect the other.

To illustrate. Here is Mr. A., noted for his practical benevolence. Is there a poor family in the neighborhood? He is the first to discover and relieve their wants—in the most silent and unostentatious manner, his little acts of kindness are performed at the proper time and place—his heart and his hand are always open; and without waiting to be solicited, his alms are bestowed with cheerfulness. Sickness and suffering seldom exist long, especially among the poor, without his knowledge—he seems to be fortuitously present wherever such aid as he can give is needed—like the good Samaritan he never passes by on the other side, leaving a fellow-being in trouble, or want, or distress, if it is in his power to render him any service. In short he exemplifies in the most perfect manner, the religion described by St. James, so far as it consists in “visiting the fatherless and widow in their affliction.” He does not obtrude his visits upon such merely to gaze upon their destitution and misery, and aggravate their grief by shedding a few sympathetic tears in their presence. He is seldom in the crowd who often visit there, to show off their genteel sensibilities and tender sympathies in a few idle and heartless expressions of condolence. He intrudes not within the sacred precincts of affliction, unless he has reason to hope he may contribute to its mitigation.

Doubtless, you are ready to conclude that this Mr. A. is a very good Christian; and truly, so far as we have traced his character, it is as becometh a disciple of Christ. Bright and beautiful is this character; and well would it be for our race, if there were more of it in the world. To commiserate the sufferings of humanity, to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to relieve the distressed, is certainly one part of religion; and (may I not say?) the greatest, the best, the loveliest part.—But then there is another part, distinct from this, embraced in these words—“And keep himself unspotted from the world.”

Alas, how many good, kind, generous hearted men there are, whose characters are spotted over with the pollutions of the world! Such was Mr. A.—sometimes he would swear most foolishly and wickedly. Always courteous, civil, and respectful to his fellow men, yet he would cast indignity upon the Majesty of heaven, by taking his name in vain! And profanity was not the only dark spot upon his character. He drank, and sometimes to excess.—But drunk or sober he would never wantonly molest or disturb the peace of any one; and the people said “he was his own worst enemy”—and he was his own worst enemy; and perhaps meant no harm to any body by his profanity or intemperance. But in truth, by the bye, he was not his own enemy only. No man can injure himself, without either directly or indirectly injuring others! Such a man as Mr. A. might wish indeed, that the injury were all his own. We sometimes hear very bad men say, “I wish that nobody were wronged by my vices but myself.” This feeling is truly honorable to human nature, and we cheer it as an indication of something noble even in bad men, but so it can not be. “No man liveth to himself alone”—the conduct of each individual helps to constitute the character of the whole community in which he lives; and even if his vicious acts go no farther than to degrade himself, they still detract that much from the good character of that community. But the injury of individual vice stops not here. “Evil communications corrupt good manners.” The profane man may think, when he utters his unbecoming, ungenteel, ungodly expressions, that he does no harm, because he means none.—But his meaning no harm can not render his foul language any less odious to the ears of the genteel, nor prevent its wounding the feelings of the pious; neither can it counteract its corrupting, vitiating influence upon youthful minds.

And certainly the evil effects of intemperance are very far from being confined to the person of the intemperate. His family, his friends, yea, the whole community are made to suffer in some way, in consequence of this degrading and loathsome vice. Let no moral offender flatter himself that he alone must suffer the evils of his conduct. He does himself a wrong, indeed, at which he should shudder; but he should weep tears of contrition, too, for the wrong he does to others. But it is not necessary for my present purpose to extend this reflection—nor is it necessary to say that Mr. A. had other spots besides the two vices named, upon his character; by the bye, however, he probably had; for it would be rather a novel case in morals, to find a profane, intemperate man free from all other worldly pollutions. There are, we know, many vices and crimes that usually follow in the train of these. But these are enough to show, that however, charitable, humane and benevolent he really was, he was no Christian, certainly not a perfect Christian. The blessings of multitudes, who were the recipients of his benefactions, were upon him—the prayer of the orphan and the lone widow, ascended to heaven in his behalf—and rich, indeed, must have been the reward enjoyed by his heart, when the sweet remembrance of the tears he had wiped away, the sorrows he had assuaged, and the hearts he had caused to leap with joy, came rushing into his mind. For, as I have said, he practiced not only to the letter, but, to the very spirit, the one part of pure religion. And it is not to be presumed that he failed of his reward, in the consciousness of having been in anywise instrumental in mitigating the woes, or adding to the happiness of a fellow mortal. But he kept not himself unspotted from the world, the dark stains of vice and folly were upon him—the leprous spots of iniquity—detestable even in his own eyes, rendered him a marred and “damaged piece of humanity”—his heart, though generous and noble, was polluted; his affections, though kind and lovely, were crushed by vicious habits, and his joys mingled with remorse and sorrow. For though his charity was broad enough to cover from public view, a multitude of sins, it could not prevent them from stinging his own bosom, nor obviate their withering effects upon his own peace. Because in this matter, you know there can be no compromise—no offsetting a virtue against a vice, thinking thereby to make it even—each has its appropriate reward, which must be received. The rewards of virtue are no more certain, than the penalties of vice; and both are fixed by the immutable laws of Him who governs the moral, as well as the physical universe. We may be sure, therefore, that while we are partly virtuous, and partly vicious; sometimes religious and sometimes irreligious, our cup must necessarily be a mingled one. This idea may seem like representing sweet waters and bitter issuing from the same fountain; but the truth is, there are in the human breast two fountains, a fountain of good and a fountain of evil. The relative magnitude and depth of these may vary much in different individuals, still I apprehend every person may find something of each in his own bosom.

The reader is at liberty to fancy the character of Mr. A. to be fictitious; but I trust he will admit that such are actually to be found in real life. But to finish my illustration, I wish to present another character we sometimes meet with, also—one who exemplifies the other part of religion—does that which A. should have done, but did not. Mr. B., is zealous in the observance of the ordinances of religion—mourns over the follies and vanities of the world, and is ever faithful in warning the wicked of the awful doom that awaits them in the world to come. By industry, economy and much pains-taking, he accumulates largely of this world's goods—yet, no one can prove that he has not been legally honest in all his business transactions—no one can charge upon him any immoral conduct—he uses no profane language, is temperate in all things, speaks truth to his neighbor, fulfils his promise, is free from vicious habits of every kind, and no stain of vice can be found upon his garments—in a word, he keeps himself “unspotted from the world.” He looks upon himself, and the world looks upon him, as a very exemplary, pious man.

But does he visit the fatherless and widow in their afflictions? Yes. No man, perhaps, oftener makes such visits. Has he a neighbor upon a sick bed fast declining to the grave? Mr. B. is there in time, and very officious is he, in his labors to prepare the soul of the dying man for its exit into eternity. He exhorts, and prays very fervently and feelingly with him, and bestows many admonitions and much good counsel upon the afflicted family. He says nothing in regard to their worldly wants or temporal necessities; his mind was doubtless too spiritual to dwell on earthly things!

He knew, indeed, that poverty was there, but it did not occur to him that the family might be actually suffering for want of the necessities of life; or, if it did, he refrained, may be, from mentioning it, lest he might wound their feelings by alluding to their destitute condition! And, besides, the sick man had been intemperate; and Mr. B. made it an invariable rule never to bestow charity on the unworthy, because he might thereby be guilty of encouraging vice and profligacy!

And after the demise of this poor man, does Mr. B. pay any attention to the afflicted widow and fatherless children? Yes, he makes them another visit; and that, too, in a very few days. With many honeyed words of condolence and not a few Scripture quotations, he kindly manifests his anxiety to soothe their grief—and upon this visit it is discovered that he had one more object to effect in his former visit than met the public eye at the time. He now presents a mortgage upon the only cow of the family, executed by the deceased to secure a small debt which he owed to Mr. B., and signed by his trembling hand a few days prior to his death. The bereaved and destitute family are in despair, Mr. B. sympathises deeply with them, and can hardly express the commiseration which he feels for their wretched condition. But if he takes not the cow, he loses an honest demand and might be amenable to the charge of neglecting to “provide for his own!” He would gladly let them have the use of the cow a while, but a friend of his wishes to purchase just such an animal, and it will not do, in these hard times, to miss all chance of selling property for cash. So the cow is driven away; and Mr. B., after again praying with the family, commending them to the care and protection of Heaven, and promising to state their case to the Superintendent of the county poor, departs.

Now I desire you not to think Mr. B. a hypocrite. He was doubtless sincere in his religious faith and profession; his constant devotion, unwavering integrity and moral deportment were not assumed, but real. True, his charity was too contracted to cover a multitude of sins; but then he had not a multitude of sins to cover. If the sting of conscience from apprehensions of guilt arising from a consciousness of duties to the poor, omitted, was sometimes severe, his conscience could not accuse him of any palpable injustice to the poor. He employed them much, and ever paid them as he agreed—and he gave them his prayers, and good counsel gratis.

Which of these two characters is the best, I will not undertake to say—I leave the question for each one to decide for himself, or to leave undecided as he chooses. These men have both gone down to the grave in the condition described, and a popular theology has written the epitaph of Mr. A., “gone to hell”—of Mr. B., “gone to heaven.” And thousands will sanction this, as a correct decision, until the light of eternity shall show that, in point of merit, there was not so great a difference between them—until then, we will cast the mantle of charity over their failings, while we endeavor to imitate their virtues, and hope, at least, that they have both gone where they will be far more perfect than they were here.

For the Magazine and Advocate. SHORT NOTES ON SELECT PASSAGES.....NO. IV.

BY REV. H. H. WATSON.

John iii: 8. “Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born again, he can not see the kingdom of God.”

The ideas entertained by many professing Christians respecting the new birth, are as vague and absurd as were those of Nicodemus when he asked—“How can a man be born when he is old?” It is supposed by many, that some supernatural power is employed to bring about this new birth or change of heart; and that man can not be admitted into the “kingdom of God” or immortal glory in a future state of existence, unless he meets with such a change. But that the text has no reference to an admission into the kingdom of immortal bliss, will presently be shown. First, in order to gain a correct opinion respecting the new birth, it is necessary to have a definite understanding of the term “kingdom of God.” And second, show in what a new birth consists.

1st. A few remarks were made in No. 2 on the signification of the term “kingdom of God;” but a few remarks more, perhaps, may be necessary in this place. We find in Matt. iii: 2, this expression used by John the Baptist, “the kingdom of heaven is at hand.” Again, Matt. iv: 17, our Saviour makes use of precisely the same language, “the kingdom of heaven is at hand.” And also in Matt. x: 7, Christ says to his disciples, “As ye go, preach, saying, the kingdom of heaven is at hand.” Again he says Mark i: 15, “The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand, repent ye, and believe the Gospel.” From the foregoing quotations it is very evident, that the “kingdom of heaven” or “kingdom of God,” was not far distant; that is, it was about to make its appearance. It was not exclusively in another state of existence, it was here on earth; it was the moral reign or government of our Lord Jesus Christ among men.

To the above testimony I would add the remarks of Dr. Lightfoot. He says—“That the kingdom of God, or of heaven, are terms convertible in the evangelist, is obvious to every one that will take the pains to compare them; and that by the kingdom of God, or of heaven, is meant the kingdom and times of the Messiah, is so plain, that it needs no argument to prove it.” And on the passage under consideration, he says, “Speech is there had of Christ’s kingdom of heaven upon earth, or the state under Christ.”

2d. I will now endeavor to show what a new birth consists in. For instance, take a man that is engaged in all the wickedness that his imagination can devise; let him be guilty of whatever crime he may; let crime and infamy weigh heavily upon him, then let the conviction arise in his mind, that “the way of the transgressor is hard,” and that the path of peace has been unknown to him; let him reflect that wisdom’s “ways are ways of pleasantness,” and all her paths are peace; let him break off from sin by righteousness, and like the prodigal in the parable, return to his Father’s house, and the new birth will be accomplished, and he be a member in the kingdom of heaven. That this is the true meaning of the new birth, I think there can be no doubt.

PUNISHMENT IN THE EARTH.....NO. I.

“But as for me, my feet were almost gone: my steps had well nigh slipped; for I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked.”—DAVID.

This is not the language of the Psalmist, only; but it has been that of your speaker; was probably used by many who now hear me, and is yet frequently felt by many of our Christian brethren, who, misled by false views of God’s government, and rendered thereby heedless of the lessons of observation and experience, neglect the lesson taught by the Psalmist himself, in this very psalm, and still cry out, that the righteous suffer more in this life than do the wicked—that the sinful and ungodly enjoy all that heart can wish in this world of ours. This is a melancholy thought to enter into any pious heart; for it will intrude in the hour of devotion, and produce unreconciliation to God—in the day of enjoyment, it will be a mist before the eyes, to blind them to all the bright and glorious blessings God has provided for his obedient children—in the dark hour, (and it, alone, will make many a bright hour, dark,) it will tempt to murmuring, repining, and envy of the wicked, and to sin itself. All who entertain it will feel with the Psalmist, that they have cleansed their hearts in vain—that uselessly they have washed their hands in innocency—for they have been plagued all the day long, and been chastened every morning; when they might have done as did others, and prospered in the world, and increased in riches, and at last repented and been saved.

Now such feelings in any good man’s bosom are terrible—hard to bear, and to resist—and they cast a deep dark shadow on the earth around, envelope the bright blue heavens in a mantle of gloom, and fill the very air with thick black clouds of despondency and fear. Even though the good man believes that in another state of existence all this wrong state of things will be reversed, and the good be duly rewarded and the wicked endlessly punished; still, he feels that God is not just and righteous now—that this world’s affairs are not governed on the principles of goodness and equity—and that while the good must drag along a weary round of years waiting anxiously for some happiness to strengthen their virtue and cheer their souls, the depraved man is enjoying all the beauties, and bounties, and blessings of this life, and by a brief repentance at death, will equally with the good, be made the inheritor of the glories and felicities of heaven. The truth is, we are so much the creatures of time and sense, that we need a present exhibition of goodness and justice to strengthen us in our love of God and regard for his government. Nor are the righteous the only persons concerned in the false views whereof we have been speaking. They are most pernicious and demoralizing in their influence on the careless, the irreligious and the sinful portion of our race.

Convince men that God takes no interest in human affairs in the present time—that he is regardless of human actions and motives—that men may conduct ill or well as best it pleases them, without any fear of chastisement in this life, and that all the bliss of the next state of existence may be secured by a brief and late repentance, and iniquity will—does abound. For that has long been the popular doctrine of Christendom, and has brought forth its terrible fruits of fraud, and cruelty, and blood. Men have listened to the delusive teachings of the carnal mind, “Ye shall not surely die”—and have too fully believed the doctrine that there is peace, pleasure and prosperity in violating the dictates of conscience—and so zealously have they followed the teaching, that they have disregarded their own experience which contradicts the flattering delusion every day of their lives. And thus has the good man fixed his eyes on a heaven in eternity, and the bad man on an imaginary endless hell beyond the grave, with such intensity of attention, as to be blind and heedless to all the abundant retributions of time.—And the consequence has been, that virtue grew faint and weary, and lost its energy and zeal; while vice was greatly encouraged, and grew bolder and stronger, day by day.

But it may be asked, does not the Psalmist inculcate this very sentiment—that the wicked flourish and prosper in their wickedness; and that virtue goes unrewarded and unblessed on earth? I answer, that in one part of the psalm from which we have taken our text, he does fall into this error—or, rather, records the fact that he had once entertained this wrong opinion; but in the remainder of the psalm he declares that it was an error—that God had now taught him better. And so deeply convinced is he of his former error—so penitent and ashamed of it—that he calls his ignorance of God’s judgments in the earth, beastliness and folly. And every man who will lay aside prejudice, and carefully and philosophically examine God’s dealings with man, will come to the same conclusion.

It appears to me as if every person who had merely read (I will not say studied) the Bible—yes, who had merely looked into it here and there, and barely glanced over a few of its pages—must have perceived its declarations on this subject—must have noticed God’s constantly varying declarations, but all purporting the same great truth, that “in the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die”—that “God will by no means clear the guilty”—“though hand join in hand, the guilty shall not be unpunished”—“there is no peace to the wicked”—“besure your sin will find you out”—“the wicked are like the troubled sea when it can not rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt”—“tribulation, wrath and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil; to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile.” And I feel as if my readers would feel to censure me for dwelling even as often as I do on this subject—that you may say it is useless to make it a subject of discourse so frequently, for no one denies or can deny it—every casual reader of the Bible must know it to be a doctrine of divine revelation—every man and woman who observes what passes around and within them, must know it to be the truth of God.

Yet I turn to the papers of the day—especially to those journals devoted to teaching religion—or to books published to advance the people in divine truth—and there I find this plain doctrine disregarded—perhaps denied—yes, and in many cases ridiculed, jeered and sneered at as the crotchet of a visionary’s brain; or severely denounced as an invention of the devil, taken up and advocated by us Universalists, for the express purpose of leading souls into immorality and vice here, and into endless damnation hereafter! Now what must we think of such teachers? And what must we think of those unfortunate fellow beings who rely on such teachers alone for instruction? Oh, my God, it is enough to make the philanthropic heart bleed, to see the blind thus lead the blind! May they not fall into the ditch together! And certainly such teachings, and the objections that so frequently are urged against this very doctrine of Holy Writ—and the numerous practical evidences furnished every day in the world around us, that many do really believe they can sin, and be happy, and escape punishment—all these things, admonish us of the necessity that yet exists of teaching what God has declared to the world—that He is the Judge of the whole world, and judgeth in the earth—that, therefore, we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ and receive in body according to what we have done, whether good or bad.

Bear with me, then, brethren and sisters to whom this great truth is already so evident—bear with me, while I attempt to impress it on the minds that have not yet seen—the consciences that have not yet felt it. For I am persuaded that there are thousands of Christians around us, who, on this very subject, are deceiving themselves as did the Psalmist—and that their similar erroneous views lead them to feel the language of our text—“But as for me, my feet were almost gone; my steps had well nigh slipped; for I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked.”

And that they may be induced to review the teachings of the Bible, from beginning to end, on this very subject—and to call to mind the teachings of their own experience, from early youth to the present time—and to notice the outward punishments visited on the evil doers, expressly on account of their sins—and to remember the severe dealings of the inward monitor in their own cases—we will in our next, exhibit the cause of their present errors, and remove some collateral errors, which yet blind them to facts on this subject. A. B. G.

“THE UNIVERSALIST MISCELLANY.”—Alfred Mudge, 21 School street, Boston, Mass., proposes publishing a monthly, by the above title, to be devoted to “carefully written sermons; critical, doctrinal and moral essays; labored articles on biblical literature, scriptural words, phrases and texts; and pungent addresses to the heart and conscience”—all in 32 pages each month, (about as much matter as we usually furnish in a number, or a number and a half, of the Magazine and Advocate.) for one dollar per annum. We tell Br. Mudge, it can’t be done—he has not room enough, to make his Essays, etc., of any greater length than those of the same kind we furnish in our weeklies. Nor has he the ability engaged which such a work (designed to fill the place of the Expositor) demands. BRS. E. H. CHAPIN and OTIS A. SKINNER, are good writers, we know—the first an original and forcible one, the other smooth and easy in style, but common-place in his subjects—and so are three or four of the contributors named, as H. Ballou, H. Ballou 2d, (who should be the Editor of the work we need,) and BRS. ANSTIN and THAYER; but the rest are not very celebrated for great originality of thought, or profundity of research, or extent of learning—and some of them, (no doubt very good men, and acceptable preachers,) are not known as writers at all beyond the precincts of Boston. So that, on the whole, we have made up our mind that this Miscellany is not likely to merit more support than did the Expositor. It is not what we want, either in size of the work, or in the ability and reputation of its contributors. Nor is it even in cheapness what it should be, to expect a list of “five thousand subscribers;”—if it gets one thousand, it will receive more than we think the plan is entitled to, seeing that said plan differs not greatly from that of our newspapers generally; and certainly we would not “swap” our contributors for theirs.

Now, if we must have a new work, give us such a one as our denomination needs. Combining the popular with the learned, if you please, to secure it a more extensive support; but in size, and price, and talent engaged in it, let it be worth a general effort to support it. Let the very best talent of our whole denomination be enlisted in its pages, before fifth and tenth rate writers are employed as its contributors. With such men for contributors as BRS. H. BALLON 2d, S. R. SMITH, DR. CLOWES, A. C. THOMAS, T. J. SAWYER, S. C. LOVELAND, and several others that might be named—men not confined to the vicinity of Boston, but selected for their talent and ability wherever they may live—the work would commend itself to general patronage, and, we believe, would receive it. Without such men, it can not succeed; or if it does, its success will not be very creditable to us. Such, at least, is the opinion of several persons whom I have heard speak of the Miscellany in this section of the country—and so decidedly was it expressed, that I think it worthy the attention of our Boston friends. A. B. G.

P. S.—The “pungent addresses to the heart and conscience,” named in the Prospectus of the Miscellany, reminds us of an anecdote we lately heard of Br. B.—He was travelling in some public conveyance, when an old lady, finding out he was a Universalist preacher, wished to know if he preached just as did Christ and his apostles. He replied in the affirmative. “Well,” said she, “are you sure you preach exactly as they did; and what they did?” “Yes, madam?” was the answer. “And do you ever say, Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can you escape the damnation of hell?”—“No, madam,” was the quiet and quaint reply; “them kind of people don’t come to my meetings!” We think it doubtful whether those needing the “pungent” addresses will subscribe for them! But perhaps the publisher only means “duns for delinquent subscribers”—if so, it would have been well to delay the promise for the prospectus for the second volume. A. B. G.

THE SERMON in this paper will be found well-worthy of perusal. It is brief, well written, and interesting.—Even those who remember well Br. Fisk’s sermon on the same text, will be pleased with this; because it offers entirely new illustrations and arguments, and handles the general subject in a different manner and a different style; yet pleasing and touching. We are obliged to Br. MOREY for the sermon, and to Sister MOREY for copying it for us; and would really like to be laid under such obligations again, if they please.

Our readers are also requested to give earnest heed to the article by Br. M. B. SMITH. It is a faithful portrait of two classes, each of which is only half religious. Universalists, who believe in a whole Saviour and a full salvation, should be wholly, fully and entirely religious—religious in benevolence and in purity. A. B. G.

THE INFLUENZA has had its due share of influence in our office last week. Nearly every family in the city has had it—in some cases, every member of the family has suffered by it. We consoled ourselves with the knowledge that “some of our neighbors have worse corn than we have!”

VALEDICTORY RECOMMENDATION.

Whereas BR. JAMES S. PALMER has left us for the “far West,” to seek a new field of labor in behalf of our glorious cause, we take this opportunity of expressing our full confidence in him as a good moral man, and fully believe him worthy the confidence and encouragement of the Universalist public as a minister of the Gospel. By order of the Society. A. N. BULLARD, Sec’y.

DEATHS.

In Remsen, May 11th, of dropsy on the heart, Mr. DENISON COATS, aged 56 years. He selected John xiv: 27 as the text for his funeral discourse, which was delivered by Rev. E. Buckingham, pastor of the Unitarian society in Trenton.

In Eagle, Clinton county, Mich., on May 5th, 1843, of consumption, Mrs. EUNICE, consort of Chester Brown, and daughter of Henry Gibbs, Esq., aged 29 years. By this dispensation of Divine Providence, her husband has been bereft of a kind, affectionate companion; her parents of a dutiful and loving daughter, and brothers and sisters of a sister indeed. Mrs. Brown emigrated with her husband from Orleans county, N. Y., in 1840—became a professor of Christianity, and united with the Methodist church, and lived as such until she became satisfied that her stay on earth was short. About three months before her departure, she was asked her opinion in regard to punishment. She declared that she could not believe in ceaseless damnation; but believed that God would reconcile all to himself, and all mankind would partake of one blessing in the world to come.—She failed rapidly in bodily strength, but her spirit grew stronger and brighter as life faded away. A week previous to her decease, she selected the text and hymns for her funeral services, and arranged her grave clothes and other earthly affairs with her mother and sisters, and then said she was resigned to God's will. She died rejoicing in Jesus as the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world.

In this city on the 12th inst., Mr. DANIEL NESTELL, aged 27 years. Mr. Nestell's death was caused by a collapse of the lungs and heart, occasioned by exhaustion from over working at a fire engine, and was almost instantaneous. He leaves to mourn his sudden exit, a wife, one child, a father and one sister; to all whom may the God of grace verify the promise, "blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted." While living, Mr. Nestell sustained a good character, and was respected and esteemed by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance. His funeral was attended on the 14th, when a very large collection of our fire men and citizens assembled to express their regard for the deceased, and their sympathy for his mourning friends.

H. B. SOULE.

On his passage, 30 days from Buenos Ayres S. America, for New York, May 3d, Wm. T. Cox, aged 23 years, son of Mr. George Cox, of Sherburne, Chenango county, N. Y.

In Newark, on the 17th inst., Mrs. PERCIE SICKLES, wife of Mr. David Sickles, aged 27 years.

Sister S. was brought to the grave by bitter and protracted suffering, but her lofty and heavenly faith in the great Restitution, sustained her triumphantly through the most trying seasons, and made her cheerful and happy in death. In every sense of that significant word, she was a CHRISTIAN. She adored the Christian character, and enjoyed the Christian's reward. The Lord bless and comfort the sorrowing relatives.

Our ministering brethren knowing our wants, will, I am sure, attend our meetings if practicable. Therefore, to them I repeat not the usual formality of invitation and request.—To our lay brethren, I should perhaps use a little more persuasion—especially to those within the limits of this body. Come up, then, brethren—let us hear from all, without reserve. Assist in our deliberations, that we may ascertain whether we shall stand or fall.

Those from a distance, who will attend the Conference, enquire for J. H. Stevens, J. Phelps, J. Goodno, J. Healy, where they will find feed for their horses, and something (not bread alone) for themselves. I am not acquainted at Springwater, therefore can give no directions. But I will venture to say, enquire for friends, and you will find them here.

PROSPECTUS of the seventh volume of the New World, Edited by Park Benjamin. The proprietors of the New World announce to the reader, that the coming volume, in addition to the attractions, recorded in the Prospectus, will contain a Romance, by the late celebrated Dr. Maginn, entitled John Manesty, the Liverpool Merchant. Also, a series of papers on the Literature and Politics of France, by the Count Alfred de Vigny, author of Chatterton, Cinq Mars, &c., translations of which will be made under the immediate superintendence of the author; also, a Romance by Henry Cockton, Esq., author of Valentine Vox, Stanley Thorn, &c., entitled The Sisters, which will be reprinted from the Illustrated London News, with all of the beautiful embellishments. Several Original stories, by the very best authors in America, are also in preparation, which will greatly enhance the interest of future numbers. As it is not our habit to keep a supply of back numbers, and they can not be reprinted, subscribers are requested to send in their orders and remittances without delay. Let it be remembered that the New World, Blackwood's Magazine, and Monthly Supplement, can all be had for one year for the sum of $5.00, paid in advance. Also, that any present subscriber to the New World is entitled to both Blackwood and the Supplement, for an additional sum sufficient to make his subscription amount to five dollars. It is not too much to say that more pleasing intellectual entertainment is to be had from these periodicals than from all others, though published at ten times the price. The reader will please to glance at the new advertisements of the Magazine and Supplement, as well as of the New World, and judge for himself. The new volume commences on the 8th of July.

NEW WORLD SERIAL SUPPLEMENT. Two new romances! One by G. P. R. James, Esq., author of Darnley, Richelieu, the False Heir, &c., and one by W. H. Ainsworth, Esq., author of Jack Shepherd, Windsor Castle, the Miser's Daughter, etc., will be commenced in the next (July) number of the New World Monthly Supplement, which will, hereafter, contain six instead of five of the most popular serial romances of the day. The new novel by Ainsworth, which is to appear monthly in his magazine, is entitled Modern Chivalry, or a new Orlando Furioso.

Of the other, which is to be published in the Dublin University Magazine, edited by Harry Lorrequer, no title is given, but it is by the best novelist of the day, G. P. R. James, Esq. It is to be hoped that the public will fully appreciate the great additional attractions, thus given to the Monthly Supplement, which will in future, as occasion requires, contain several more pages. To the number for the present month, (June,) eight pages are added, for the purpose of concluding Windsor Castle, so as to make room for the insertion next month, of the first parts of the two new romances above mentioned. Thus, for the nominal sum of $1 a year, paid in advance, will all the popular serial romances now in the course of publication, be given with punctuality and dispatch—namely, Martha Chuzzlewit, by Dickens; Tom Burke, by Lever; L. S. D., by Lover; Arthur O'Leary, by Harry Lorrequer; Modern Chivalry, by Ainsworth; and the new novel by James. Of some of these, the advance sheets are purchased, at great cost to the proprietor of the New World, and nothing but the most generous and extensive circulation, can repay them. Address J. WINCHESTER, 30 Ann street, N. Y.

BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE for June, is one of the most able and interesting numbers which has been presented to the public in a long time. The leading paper, "Marston, or the memoirs of a Statesman." Part I., is evidently from the pen of no mere novice. It promises much: grave, sententious, sarcastic, the statesman shows a power which at once conveys to us the assurance of deep interest in his future history. "The Vigil of Venus" is a very happy translation of one of the most fragrant ballads of antiquity. "Amnat Bek," a capital Russian story, is brought to a conclusion. Mr. Bailey's article on "Berkley's Theory of Vision," a paper remarkable for its clearness as for its subtlety, shows the writer to be more than a match for his antagonist. "Chapters on Turkish History," embraces the rise of Kiuprili Family, and a graphic description of the siege of Candia. "A passage in the life of a Maitre d'Ames," will prove a rich treat to the lovers of this species of literature—and "Ignacio Guerra and El Sangrador, a tale of Civil War," will fully satisfy those who delight in scenes of blood, it being as tragic as Spanish cruelty and Spanish revenge can make it. The "Attorney's Clerk" is an exposition of the genius of Chatterton. The writer pulls off the disguise, and exposes the pretended Rowley. "Commercial Policy" is able, elaborate and instructive.

THOUGHTS.

BY MISS M. E. TILLOTSON.

"Love indeed is light from heaven,
A spark of that immortal fire,
With angels shared, by Alla given.
To lift from earth our low desire."—BYRON.

Oh love! what art thou, who shall tell?
Shall youth divine the mystery
Enshrouded in the veil, which part conceals,
But shows enough through interstices small,
To proclaim thou art; and yet, so much
As makes thee more mysterious, hides.
Written, have bards of thy strong spell—
The artist too, in chisel'd beauty striven
To make tangible thy soul; but,
Poet's glowing lines of honied eloquence—Sculptur'd marble's sweet, unrivalled finisings—
And canvassed beauty's elegance,
Tho' Raphael's master finger brushed it,
Have but portray'd a little fraction of Thy eternal whole. But, as much as to
This little globe, and mortal ken pertains,
Great Shakspeare hath belike defined,
And Byron felt!—Philanthropy—
"Oh heavenly principle! hath raised,
And still shall raise her powerful arm;
And poor humanity, a star discerns
Beyond oppression's black, but sinking cloud.
A Howard's voice, tho' he be dust—
Through every clime, and age to come,
Unceasing speaks, in strains of love and mercy!
Here we behold the operations
Of blest benignity! we see that man
May exercise a purer principle,
Than earth could e'er implant within
His nature. See sympathy,
Which can impart unearthly consolations;
Can soothe the afflicted heart,
When other kind attentions
Would even seem reproof!
Now, whence are these divine bestowments,
Which make us shudder at the thought
Of sorrow; and ecstatic smile,
Even, at the tale of happiness?
Are they not the wandering heralds,
From the exhaustless, deathless, and Eternal fount of beatific Love?
Ask each sentient and enlightened mortal,
And let each element devout and holy,
Enshrined within the heart—aspire, Yes!
Ask nature's (to us) spacious temple;
And hear each snow-capt mountain,
Each subterranean vault, each
Rushing river, and the unfathom'd
Deep, proclaim a retractless, Yes!
It must be so!
Then, let all souls with gratitude
And love be filled, to know that these Precursors of unending rest,
By a heavenly Parent are bestowed,
Upon us puny pilgrims,
Sojourning on this frigid dot,
In the sublime immensity
Of creation's boundless space!

TALES OF THE PASSING WINDS. NO. I.

BY MRS. S. ELIZA GIBSON.

Reader, didst thou ever at evening's hour, when tumult is hushed and fancy is wont to take her airy flight, seat thyself in some quiet retreat, to catch the murmurings of the passing winds? And didst thou ever at such an hour listen with attentive ear, and half suppressed breath, to tales of these viewless messengers? Oh, they have rich tidings from other lands, and sweet and sad rehearsals of other scenes! Ah! many a time and oft, when listening to their whispered recitals, have I pressed my heart to still its tumultuous beatings, and shut close my eyes to keep back the sympathetic tear.

Some of these tales I will repeat, and I fain would do so by all, but this may not be, for mortals can not catch the language in which they sometimes speak. The bearer of the first, came on soft and gentle wing, and its breath was filled with fragrance, from the new-born leaves of spring. Its voice too, low and musical, was full of melancholy, and thus it spake of

A DEATH-BED SCENE.

"'Twas at the hour of sunset, when I entered through the open lattice, a chamber, where were heard the low wail of mourning and half suppressed sobs of anguish. My mission was, to fan the breath of life for one, upon whom consumption had laid its withering hand; and she, too—though she had witnessed the budding of but twenty-three springs—a wife and mother. The throes of death were already passed, and she lay exhausted on a cot-bed drawn up in front of the low window, with a light counterpane spread over her attenuated figure, her hands clasped over her gently heaving bosom, and her eyes closed as if in peaceful slumber. It could not be but sad to think, that one so young, so beautiful and so truly beloved, was thus early passing from the vale of life. But she knew the hour had come, and she would speak of her departure.

"Whispering to one who bent over her, she was raised up; her temples bathed and her dark hair smoothed back from the high and pallid brow. 'The Beloved One has called,' said she, 'and I obey, and but for thee, Herbert, in all willingness; for there no more pain shall rack my frame and no more sorrow rend my heart.—There I know all will be happiness and joy, and there we shall again meet to part no more—but who in thy stay will soothe the cares and sympathize in the sorrows of thy lot—who, as I would, will seek the peace and study the wants of the nearest and dearest of my earthly friends?'—and she rested for strength upon the bosom of the afflicted one. 'Did I say but for thee,' she continued after a moment; 'I have yet another tie which binds me to earth;' and she motioned for her child to be brought.

"O it was a mournful sight, to see that bright-eyed and cherry lipped infant, entwined in the arms of a mother pale in death! One tear dropped upon its round and dimpled cheek, and then she sank back upon the pillow. Once she gasped, and once more I fanned her cheek, and then an angel on lighter and softer pinions than mine, bore her spirit aloft to the blissful home of the 'Beloved One!'"

THE FEMALE DRUNKARD.

Passing along a street in the upper part of our city, a few evenings since, I observed a woman gazing wishfully at a row of decanters which graced a grocer's counter. A strong light came through the window and shone upon her features, as I passed—they seemed somewhat familiar to me. I turned back and looked at her again, and was pained to see that I had conjectured rightly. She was one Mrs. T—, but what a wreck!—could it be possible that the bloated face and misshapen being before me was the gay and blithesome creature who was the pride of all her acquaintance, but a few years ago?—It was even so. She was thinly clad, and the cold rain was pelted upon her most pitably. Desiring to speak, and not wishing to be recognised by her just then, I muffled my face to my eyes and asked her why she stood there exposed to the storm.

"Sir," said she, "I have no place to go to, and I want some liquor—will you please give me three cents?"

I expostulated, and inquired if she had a family. This question, as I expected, at once touched her tender feelings.

"Oh, yes," she answered, "I once had a family, a kind and loving husband, beautiful children and a happy home. But now, wide rivers and high mountains separate us, and there"—pointing to the brandy and rum—"there is the cause of all—that drove them from me, and now I am an outcast upon the world, with not even a place to lay my head!"

Such was her tale of misery. Methinks had any rim-seller been standing by in the little circle around, he never could have dealt out another glass of the accursed poison without being severely twinged by an accusing conscience.

During the year of 1833, the writer became acquainted with Mrs. T—, at that time Ellen B—; she was gay as the lark—had been well educated—was accomplished, and indeed beautiful—eyes as blue and clear as the sky above, and cheeks that might vie with roses—the joy of her parents and delight of her friends. At this time, Mr. T—, a young gentleman possessing sound principles and a generous heart, and manly altogether in his deportment, became her suitor; they were two just such beings as seemed designed for each other;—parents and friends approved—and they were married. No one commenced life with more flattering prospects than did this pair! Little did any one suppose that she was fond of the wine cup. In company she had contracted a taste for cordials and wines, and secretly she indulged in them while under the parental care, and the taste was so firmly established, that after her marriage she continued the practice. Her indulgent husband did not discover it for a long time, and when he did, remonstrance seemed in vain. She argued that her love for him and her self control, etc., would prevent her from going to excess.

Time rolled on, and two lovely children had been given them—a boy and a girl. At this time the appetite had gained such an overwhelming sway, that the intoxicating draught must be indulged, and was, to the neglect of the family duties. Then were the eyes of friends opened—then they plead and persuaded with her, for her own sake, for her husband and children's sake, and for friend's sake, to abstain,—she promised to do so, and tried; but ah! she could not withstand the appalling demands of unsatisfied appetite, and she again relapsed, worse than before, till one night her husband returned home and found her drunk! What a blow was here for all his youthful and future prospects, and his joyous anticipations! Every effort was made to reclaim her, but without effect. More than once he tried living away from her awhile, when she would endeavor to do better, and partially reform; but finding that she seemed bent on destruction, he, with the advice of friends, deemed it best for the interest of their little children to depart from her forever; which he accordingly did, although with a broken heart, and is now beyond the Alleghanies in the fertile valley of the Mississippi. Thus were ended the bright hopes of this once promising young family. She was left in kind hands, but finally broke away from all restraint, and is now a houseless wanderer about the streets of our city, resisting all efforts made for her rescue, destined in a few weeks to go down to a female drunkard's grave—"unhonored and unused."

Who, ten years ago, would have thought this to be the fate of the enchanting and lovely Ellen B—?

FOR HUSBANDS.—A man's house should be his earthly paradise. It should be, of all other spots, that which he leaves with most regret, and to which he returns with most delight. And in order that it may be so, it should be his aim to provide every thing convenient and comfortable for his wife. With every provision he can possibly make, her's will be a life of care and toil. She is the sentinel who can seldom, if ever be relieved. Others may sleep, but if there be one who must watch, it is she. She ought therefore to be furnished with every comfort within the means of her husband.

A FUNERAL DISCOURSE,

[Delivered in Antwerp, on the death of ROGERS WESTON, Esq., a Revolutionary Soldier, who died in Mason, New Hampshire, March 9th, 1843, aged 86 years, 5 months, and 9 days.]

BY REV. A. WOOD.

"Your Fathers, where are they?"—Zech. i. 5.

The term fathers is used to represent persons who fill a variety of relations to those who make use of it. By one application or use of the phrase, we are to understand Patriarchs who lived before the deluge, or those who, after that era preceding the giving of the Law by Moses, acted in the capacities of parents, law-givers, protectors and counsellors—by whom also the history of men and of important events were handed down from the man Adam, the father of Cain, Abel and Seth, to the time of Moses. That man Adam appears to have been the first human being to whom the Divine Being communicated the information with respect to the order of creation, and gave to him also the means of acquiring the knowledge of good and evil—not of evil only, but of good and evil. He gave a succinct but correct account of the then past transaction to Seth, and he communicated the same to his son Enos.

This information from father to son appears to have inspired the minds of Adam's offspring with love to their heavenly Father—for "then began men to call on the name of the Lord." And probably in consequence of those acts of devotion, in which the name of the Deity was so frequently invoked, they came to be denominated "the sons of God;" whereby they were distinguished from the numerous tribes of mere men, who descended from the first created pair whom God called (both male and female) Adam, in the day in which they were created. But in process of time, and near to the birth of Noah, "those sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair," (though ignorant of God and consequently destitute of the spirit of devotion,) and "they took to them wives such as they chose."

By this union of light and darkness, knowledge and ignorance, it seems that piety dwindled away and became almost entirely extinct; insomuch that "the imagination of man's heart was only evil continually"—which was the cause of the deluge by which the whole race (eight persons only excepted,) were swept from the earth. The patriarchs continued the practice of transmitting, by oral traditions and hieroglyphics, the chain of events until the days of Moses. Many of those events were highly interesting on several accounts, but principally in demonstrating the gradual though tardy improvement of human nature, or advancement of intellect, and of forming social habits.

2d. The term fathers alludes to parents of particular families or nations, particularly Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, to whom the Divine Ruler kindly communicated more clearly his paternal character and gracious purposes—"that in the seed of Abraham all the families of the earth should be blessed." So that men began to worship the Supreme Being, not as a powerful creator, only, but as a kind protector and gracious benefactor. Yet a great portion even of the Jewish family who received the law, and to whom the promises were given, still indulged contracted views concerning the loving kindness of God in whom they trusted; supposing that his divine favors were exclusively towards their nation—and finally, at or near the close of their national existence, they conceived the absurd opinion, that divine favors were confined to to a small portion even of their own nation—"that the Nazarenes who knew not the law were accursed."

3d. The term father alludes to the spiritual Fathers or originators of religious doctrines, sects or communities—to wit: Abraham, who is styled the father of the faithful—because in him and in his seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed—and the early fathers in the church, who kept the records of the church and transcribed, from time to time, the writings of the Apostles and of their early successors. Also Luther and Calvin, and Servetus, (whom Calvin caused to be burnt because he could not believe the doctrine of three persons in one God,) and their cotemporaries, who are styled the fathers of the Reformation from Popery. They burst the galling chains of worse than African slavery, and kindled the flame of inquiry which was destined, eventually, to disperse the clouds and mists of superstition, and false notions of the God of boundless and impartial love. True, clouds and thick darkness of unavoidable error enveloped that foundation, which called forth all the energies of human intellect in subsequent ages to clear away from the religious horizon—such as particular election and reprobation, by which our heavenly Father was represented to have formed a part of his weak and helpless offspring for endless suffering—and subsequently, Arminianism, from which two isms sprung hosts of kindred isms. Notwithstanding all this, the progressive march of intellectual improvement unfolded its benign influence—perhaps expedited by the pious labors of the later fathers of the various sects, both in the pulpit and through the press—perhaps in modesty we may name a Murray, a Winchester, a Ballou, and their cotemporaries and successors, whose minds enlarged and illumined by the brilliant rays of Gospel light, appear to have taken a more expansive view of the revealed mind and purpose of the Father of all mercies.

But here taking our leave of those imperfect spiritual fathers, let us contemplate the character, the labors and triumphant success of the glorious Founders of the pure and purifying Gospel of the impartial grace of his and our God; and of the Christian church, who was named by the prophet, (among other names and titles) "the everlasting Father," and by an Apostle, "the head of every man"—the Lord Jesus Christ, who received the holy Spirit without measure—to whom Jehovah committed all power in heaven and on earth, (by which we understand all authority over men and judgment of men, both in heaven (the church) and on earth (out of the church). He unveiled the lovely character of the almighty Creator and kind Benefactor; teaching his followers, and all men through them, to address the Holy One with the endearing and appropriate name of Father—directing them and us, when we pray, to say, "Our Father." He (Christ) is the Messenger of the new and better covenant established on better promises. He is the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world. The Spirit of the Lord God was upon him; because the Lord anointed him to preach glad tidings to the meek, to proclaim liberty to the captives, the opening of the prison to them that are bound, to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord, and the day of vengeance of our God—to comfort all that mourn. Observe the year of good, and only a day of bad. The days of vengeance of our God, he said (Luke xiii. 22.) was the awful destruction and unparalleled sufferings attendant on the siege and final destruction of the city and temple by the Roman army under Titus—the sight of which caused the heroic heart of Titus to shudder, causing him to raise his eyes towards the heavens, and to exclaim, "O God, thou knowest I am not the cause of this."—Indeed Titus had repeatedly entreated the rulers of the city to surrender, and thereby save their beautiful temple and city, and the unheard of effusion of blood (it being computed that more than a million of lives were sacrificed at that terrible day of the Lord's vengeance). Our Saviour testified, Matth. xxiv. 21, that there never has been before that, and never should be after that, such a time of suffering—still, Mr. Miller predicts a far greater calamity in this world, and many teachers proclaim infinitely greater in a future state.

Jesus was truly and properly a Father to the Christian Church—High Priest, Lord, and Law-giver—King, Judge and Saviour—he brought not only light and liberty, but life and immortality to light through the Gospel. He gave no ground or intimation calculated to lead any nation, sect, family or individual to infer, legitimately, that either they or any one of them were exclusively the favorites of Heaven, or sole heirs of the incorruptible inheritance. He gave demonstrative evidences, repeatedly, of the impartiality of his love in receiving with kind commiseration, gentle sympathy and speedy relief, all poor, wretched and forlorn sufferers. We glory in acknowledging him Father, Founder, Guide and Instructor of our religion; who, when he shall have subdued all things unto himself, will deliver back to his God and Father the power and authority with which he is invested—will take the rank of, and be appropriately called, the first born among many brethren.—He is the highest, wisest, mildest and most perfect of all the creation of God—the express image of the invisible God. (The image of a thing is not the thing itself, although it may verily resemble it.)

4th. We come now to the consideration of the term Father as it appropriately refers to the subject for which this discourse was delivered, and is now written for the press—to wit: the Fathers of the American Revolution.

Here give me leave to remark, or to premise, that I have ever thought since I became acquainted with, and a professor of, the Christian religion, that war and bloodshed are opposed to that religion! Yet I verily believe that those illustrious patriots who fought and bled in the war of the Revolution, were prompted by good motives and acted in good faith, and were owned and prospered by the God of peace who accepteth the sincere sacrifices of his erring children. Those heroic, self-sacrificing, and flinching patriots—those lovers of freedom and their country's right, who scorned to bow to tyrannical dictation, scorned tamely to yield up their natural, inalienable rights, and to be stripped of their hard earned property. But, more especially they felt themselves called upon to decide manfully between the alternatives either to entail (by servile submission to the haughty demands of their self-styled master) the galling yoke of tyranny upon their unborn posterity, and thereby to effectually fasten upon them an impregnable barrier to any further advancement of intellect, and thus to perpetuate majestic domination forever. Or like men jealous of their rights and those of their offspring, they raised their manly voices and claimed their liberty and independence. Formerly they wielded their arms in defence of their sovereign—in defence of the power that now threatened to deprive them of all that could constitute them men: but now they employed them for the defence of that which they held more dear than life, viz: political and religious freedom. They hesitated not, they decided promptly—they could not hesitate for a moment between, liberty and slavery!

The courage they exhibited, the privations they suffered, the toils and pains they endured, must have been viewed by all with sensations not to be expressed by pen or tongue. Who could look on such an unequal contest between a powerful nation, possessing thousands of men and means, and trained to the use of arms; and a few, a mere handful of yeomanry, without money or other necessary means of defence, and exposed to the treachery and machinations of persons dwelling amongst them who were opposed to the measures of the revolutionary heroes—who cared not for freedom? Who, we ask—what man or angel, could for a moment look on the contending parties and consider the cause and the pending consequences, with cool indifference? Those in favor of tyranny must have felt a deep interest in the result of the contest; for if so powerful a nation as Great Britain could be shorn of her control over the small band of colonists, what had not other monarchs to dread? Much more so, all who favored freedom's cause, must have felt the deepest interest in viewing the unequal contest; for to such it would be considered as a decision for ages, between liberty and tyranny. But happy for our nation, and remotely so for all nations, the Spartan band, undaunted and undismayed by losses and gloomy aspect—encouraged and led on by the immortal Washington and his bold, persevering brother officers—triumphed after seven years of awful suspense, and of almost unparalleled toils, perils and sufferings, during which time many bloody scenes occurred, the bare recital of which, by the war-worn soldier, will produce the most thrilling emotions in the bosom of the lovers of American liberty and independence.

They fought not for conquest—not for honor or for military glory—not to be admired—No; they fought for freedom—for the freedom of unborn millions—for the defence of natal rights; they fought for life—for the life of parents, the life of wives and children—they fought for their country's future peace. By the favor of high Heaven, and by the sympathetic aid of the generous Lafayette, and many of his noble nation, they gained the victory, and secured their national freedom, and individual liberty and safety.

The venerable Rogers Weston, Esq., whose death was the occasion of the particular subject of discourse of this day, bore a part in that important drama which we have been calling to mind. He enlisted in his country's bleeding cause—he served under the standard of his country; (if I am correct in memory of the information given me) he witnessed a number of the awful bloody scenes, where life was held in jeopardy, where many of his countrymen groaned and died. But preserved by the invisible Power, he was carried through in safety, and was favored with the possession and enjoyment of the peace, the liberty, the independence, and the attendant comforts thereof, which he and his compatriots by their persevering valor had achieved. These blessings he was permitted to enjoy almost 60 years. He lived to enjoy the happy effects of the best and most perfect constitution and code of national and state laws, which were ever suggested and adopted by human beings—the arranging and adopting of which national constitution, put in requisition all the energy of intellect, all the firmness of character, all the moderation and all the honest candor of the soldier turned to the statesman—in which labors many sectional prejudices and habits had to be combated and sacrificed: many discordant opinions respecting the best measures for general good were to be disposed of to mutual satisfaction, and many generous concessions were made by firm but noble, patriotic spirits.

He lived to see the foundations of his country's liberty tremble before the devastating effects of party strife. He lived also to see those threatening omens dispersed by the mutual concessions of the parties themselves. And while this yielding among opposing statesmen is adhered to scrupulously, and intelligence disseminated through all ranks of community, our institutions and liberty are safe.

He lived to see the wilds of New Hampshire converted to fruitful fields—he lived to enjoy the approbation of his country, and to fill stations of honor and profit. He lived many years an approved member of the Presbyterian Church, though in his last days, for some reasons, he saw fit to unite with the Christian Church, so called.

He lived to see a numerous progeny of descendants, to whom he transmitted what his forefathers had handed down to him, viz: the faithful family records by which his posterity learn that they descended from the first man by the name of Weston that set foot on the shores of America. He lived to see and feel the approach of second childhood. The memory of his name is dear to his surviving offspring—peace to his sacred ashes!

May you, my brother, by whose request I have penned this discourse—may you and all the survivors of your venerable father, duly appreciate the sacred fruits of the bloody toil, which he and his brethren in arms endured. When you revolve in mind the glorious privileges we enjoy, delivered from the exposure to be called by haughty Britain to hazard your life in their defence, reflect that this security was purchased by blood. When you contemplate the happy prosperity of your country, know that it is the happy fruits of independent liberty, purchased by toil in the field of blood. Finally, whatsoever we quietly enjoy is in part the product of the American revolution.

The fathers where are they? The most of those we have referred to, have long slept in silent repose. Their spirits, the offspring of God—the God of infinite love—undoubtedly rest in the encircling arms of Heavenly felicity, beholding without a dimming veil between them and the resplendent glory of the once crucified but now exalted Saviour of a world of sinners; for an Apostle has said, "This is a faithful saying, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." And the Saviour himself said, "I came not to judge the world, but to save the world." And God is styled "the Saviour of all men, especially them that believe"—to whom be honor and glory everlasting. AMEN.

WASHINGTONIAN STATE CONVENTION.

This assemblage of reformers met in this city on the 14th of June, and during a session of two days, passed the following resolutions, which, as we deem them very important to that good cause, and interesting probably to a very large majority of our readers, we publish.—They were adopted, generally by large majorities—some unanimously—and the most important one, and that which caused the longest discussion, was finally adopted with but one dissenting vote. It was, of course, a resolution defining principles. These resolutions embrace about all the business accomplished by the Convention.

There were about 325 delegates, from about 20 counties, in attendance. The season having been backward, brought the meeting at a very busy season for our farmers, so that delegates from several counties who appointed a delegation, did not attend. The Convention appointed Syracuse as the place, and the last Wednesday in May, 1844, as the time for the meeting of the next State Convention, which will be constituted of a limited number of delegates from each county.

We copy the resolutions from the Central New York Washingtonian of this city. A. B. G.

Resolved, That the interests of the cause of temperance—the elevation and advancement of our most active and efficient brethren—the prevention of imposture which would destroy public confidence and subvert our principles and measures by frequent violation, and the very preservation and increase of our societies, demand a system of organization which shall embrace the whole state, and bring together frequently the societies of each county and town, for purposes of mutual aid, counsel and encouragement.

Resolved, That the Washingtonian movement, so eminently liberal and popular, demands an organization which, while it is efficient and useful, shall carefully preserve all power in the hands of the people, under the control and regulation of the societies, delegating it only to properly chosen representatives for special purposes and brief periods, and requiring its speedy return to the source where it legitimately resides and may safely abide.

Resolved, That we recommend an immediate organization in every county in this state of all the Washingtonian societies into a County Convention, to be constituted of delegates chosen by each society. And we also recommend that the county conventions hold quarterly or semi-quarterly delegate or mass meetings in various sections of the county, for the purpose of cheering and keeping alive the zeal and promoting the welfare of the societies.—And that in those counties where there is no regular organization it shall be deemed the duty of the officers of the society located at the county seat, to call said mass or delegate meeting.

Resolved, That we also need an annual assemblage of the most active friends throughout the state, in the form of a State Convention, carefully constituted of representatives of the county conventions, whose power shall cease with each session, and return back again to the source which granted them.

Resolved, That the Washingtonians in each county in the state be requested to hold a meeting of their county convention (if they organize one, if not, a mass county meeting,) on or before the 22d of February in each year, and then and there choose delegates to the next annual State Washingtonian Convention.

Resolved, That each county convention be entitled to a delegation in the State Convention equal to three times the number of representatives such county is entitled to in the House of Assembly of the state Legislature.

Resolved, That for the purpose of securing a complete unity of purpose among all our societies: a harmonious spirit among their members; as well as allaying any feelings of distrust or doubt in community in regard to our objects and measures; and for the purpose of effectually disarming of its power any opposition that may be got up against us by selfish, designing, or mistaken men; we earnestly urge upon all Washingtonian societies to act upon the great distinctive principles of Washingtonianism, viz:

I. The cure as well as the prevention of intemperance, by the social efforts of all moral agents in community.

II. Urging by precept and example the adoption of the pledge of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks as a beverage, as the only effectual remedy for and prevention of intemperance.

III. Keeping in view the promotion of the temperance cause as the single and only object of all our meetings and proceedings, and carefully avoiding the introduction therein, or mingling therewith, of any other moral or religious question, which is made a separate cause in community.

IV. The rejection of compulsion, force, or coercion in any form, whether that compulsion or coercion be created by threatening or working injury to any one's person, property, or reputation; whether he be coerced or compelled, under color of law or by social combination; whether such compulsion or coercion be used in business life or at the ballot box;—and the use of moral suasion, (i. e., truth and reason, urged in the spirit of kindness to all,) love, and active benevolence, as our only reliance to convert our opposers, reform the erring, and induce the indifferent to unite and act with us.

V. The exclusion of everything like sectarianism or party politics from our meetings and proceedings, so that all persons, of all parties and creeds, may meet, unite, and act with us, without fear or danger of having their views and feelings on those subjects, assailed or wounded.

Resolved, That by moral suasion we do not mean appeals to men's love of money or of office, on the one hand; nor mere coaxing and flattery on the other; but we mean by it appeals to the understandings, consciences and affections of men, urged in the spirit of kindness to those addressed and to those dependant on them; we mean "speaking the truth in love every man to his neighbor," and backing it by acts which shall prove our love to not be, in word only, but in deed also; we mean all those appeals, and those appeals only, which are calculated to reach and awaken any or all of the higher and better powers of man's nature, or the moral powers of humanity, and bring them into active exercise, for the benefit of the individual and the race, in the cause of temperance.

Resolved, That while we recommend these great and highly important principles to be constantly acted upon by all Washingtonian societies, we do not desire to interfere with any convictions of duty which may be entertained by any person as an individual. While acting in our societies, and officiating as a member thereof, we hope every person will regard and observe these principles; but when acting as a member of community, a citizen of state, or member of any church or other association, each one is deemed at perfect liberty to follow the dictates of his own judgment.

Resolved, That our societies be recommended to make these great principles of Washingtonianism the fundamental law of their practice—to maintain their separate and distinct organization on that ground alone, and to extend these principles without partiality or limitation to all classes and conditions, whether they be makers or vendors of intoxicating drinks, or temperate men, who for other causes than appetite or gain, have arrayed themselves against the Washingtonian reform.

Whereas much difficulty has been experienced by some of our societies in consequence of not having a judicious and proper rule of conduct toward those members who have broken the pledge—and whereas too great severity and unnecessary exposure increases the difficulty of reformation by inflaming the passions of the delinquent and inflicting on him a sense of injury; while too great laxity is inconsistent with our desire to reclaim the erring, induces an idea of our indifference to his welfare, and lessens the salutary restraints which our society government exerts over others—therefore,

Resolved, That we believe no violation of the pledge can ever annul its claims on the individual who has taken it, or lessen his obligations to observe it—it is a promise for life which no man of honor can annul by any violation or disregard of it—and all renewals of it, are only to be regarded as a recognition of the original moral obligation, and a return to the performance of what honor and veracity have been duly pledged to perform.

Resolved, That we do not believe the violation of the pledge, of itself, a sufficient reason for expelling a brother from our affections, regards, and society relations—that on the contrary, though a persistence in its violation may ultimately, for his own sake and out of regard to the welfare of our cause, compel us to suspend him until reformed, from the privileges of debating and voting in our societies, yet his frailty and his vice should but render him the more the object of our compassion, and the subject of our reformatory labors; and while his obligations to keep the pledge remain, ours to aid him back to the way of temperance and peace, and to enfold him in our society embrace, also remain in full force.

Resolved, Therefore, that we recommend to all our societies increased fidelity to the motto, "Never forsake a brother"—that when a brother fails, it be not noised abroad, or spoken of with lightness, contempt or anger, but in sorrow, if at all—that private labor to induce him to cease his violation, be first patiently and perseveringly tried by all who may have any influence over him—that should he continue to violate it, his case be then communicated to the officers of the society, that they may direct further trials to reclaim our brother—and should he still persist in violating his pledged honor and truth, that his case be reported to the society, which may direct any new trials to be made for his reclamation to temperance and peace, after which he may be suspended from the privileges of voting and debating in the meetings of the society, until he renews his pledge, or gives assurance that he has recommenced the observance of its obligations—but it is further earnestly recommended to our brethren, that in no case is a brother to be gived up as irreclaimable, while life and reason remain—that in no case are we to cease to compassionate his weakness, his folly or his misery, or to labor for his reformation.

Resolved, That we earnestly recommend to our Washingtonian brethren throughout the state to maintain as many meetings in their respective neighborhoods as possible; and that all proper efforts should be made to render them interesting, believing that they possess not only a redeeming, but a preserving, tendency, highly essential to the process of reform.

Whereas the soldiers and sailors of our gallant Army * and Navy are engaging nobly and heartily in the temperance cause, and whereas they are dependent in a great measure on citizens for an expression of their wishes—therefore,

Resolved, That this Convention respectfully and earnestly request the Secretaries of War and of the Navy, and all officers of the Navy and Army, to use their influence in aid of these our brethren, by encouraging the formation of Washingtonian societies among our soldiers and sailors, and removing any obstructions that may exist in any existing regulations on the subject.

Resolved, That we rejoice heartily at the progress of Washingtonianism in our Army and Navy, and that we cordially bid our brave soldier and sailor brethren God speed in their salutary example and labors.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions, signed by the officers of this meeting, be forwarded to the Secretaries of War and of the Navy.

Resolved, That the deep interest our fair country women manifest in the progress of Washingtonianism, is a strong evidence of its ultimate and complete success.

Resolved, That this Convention deem it the imperative duty of each delegate to use extraordinary exertions to procure subscribers to the "Central New York Washingtonian" in his own county.

The matter of collecting statistics was referred to the old committee, viz: A. B. Grosh, John F. Seymour, George Tracy.

Resolved, That the female temperance benevolent societies of the state of New York, by their organization and unprecedented labors in reforming the poor drunkard, in relieving his distresses, and in supplying the wants of his family, have given an efficient aid in the cause of temperance, therefore they are deserving of the warmest gratitude of the whole country, and are worthy the imitation of all the fair sex who have not already enlisted in the same cause.

Resolved, That the thanks of this Convention are due to our friends of this city for the hospitalities so kindly tendered us on the occasion of this meeting.

Whereas there is imposition being practiced upon the temperance public by men who are traveling the country as itinerant lecturers, entirely unworthy of confidence, of corrupt moral character, and who are actuated by merely mercenary motives, therefore,

Resolved, That we recommend temperance societies and communities to be well assured of the good character and sound Washingtonianism of the lecturers who come among them, before they receive them into their confidence.

Resolved, That the thanks of this Convention be and are hereby tendered to the officers of this Convention for the fidelity and impartiality with which they have discharged their duties.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this Convention be signed by its officers, and published in the Central New York Washingtonian, printed in Oneida county, and copied into such other papers as will give them a place in their columns, and that the superintendence of the printing be referred to the committee on publications.

C. A. JONES, President.

Vice Presidents.—Dr. Henderson, D. J. Hughes, R. P. Horton, D. S. Wendell, Mr. Baker, H. McAllister, W. Cowen, N. Rogers.

Secretaries.—C. Cooper, H. Millard, G. Dawson, E. T. Hayden.

I may as well add here, that there were many reformed inebriates present—active, intelligent, clear-minded, large-hearted men, and right to a line's breadth and the smallest variation of shadow on every point of principle—every one of them that spoke or made known his views on the subject. If the cause can only be kept resting on their shoulders and breasts, and moving by their hands, this glorious Reform is safe—yes, must go on conquering to conquer. We had very excellent singing, by a trio of vocalists from Auburn, and several individuals of the delegates from abroad; and two first rate meetings on Wednesday and Thursday evenings—the latter particularly, which was mainly an "experience" meeting, had just about the right mixture of pathos, humor, fun and song to cause the tears to start in commiseration, and then start them to rolling, with a kindling eye for lightning and a hearty laugh for thunder—after which came a song from our choir, or the Auburn Trio, or our good Methodist Brother James Seaton, the reformed inebriate and well known lecturer, of Sauquoit, or from the whole body of singers. Oh, it was a blessed time!—Proof, a large number came forward and took the pledge, among whom were several rum-sellers and rum drinkers.

* There was a representation from the U. S. Army present in the Convention—D. S. Hughes, of Company G., Fort Ontario at Oswego—an excellent representative of an excellent Washingtonian Society. Dr. Henderson, delegate from Oswego county, is also of the Army. A. B. G.

THOUGHTS ON THE DEITY.

The mighty Maker and Preserver of all worlds!
Whose presence fills immensity of space—
And sways his universal sceptre wide,
Is robed in boundless mercy, love and grace.
He is the great eternal sire of all mankind,
And all immortal souls his offspring are;
To him they have their being, live and move,
The lively oracles of truth declare.
All creatures are the objects of his love and care,
From the bright seraphs that stand round his throne;
To the mean reptile groveling in the dust;
Both angels, men, and all things are his own.
Who can behold "his handy work," and not discern
His boundless love and impartiality?
The glorious sun that lights this beautiful earth,
Proclaims the goodness of the Deity.
The queen of night that walks along the heavenly plain,
The star that sparkles in the azure skies;
The ponderous rolling earth and seas beneath,
Declare that God is infinitely wise.
Then let us ever trust in our great Sire and King,
For he is able to redeem and save;
He gave us his best Gospel which reveals Eternal life for all, beyond the silent grave.

SHORT NOTES ON SELECT PASSAGES.....NO. V.

BY REV. H. H. WATSON.

John iii: 36.—"He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him."

This passage is occasionally quoted to prove the endless suffering of the unbeliever. But how that cheerless system can be sustained from the above text, is to me passing strange. Now in order to get a correct understanding of the matter contained in the passage, it will be requisite to show—First, what are we understand by "everlasting life," which the believer is in possession of. Second, show why the unbeliever shall not see life. And third, show what we understand by the phrase "wrath of God."

1st. That the "everlasting life" here spoken of, is enjoyed in this state of being, is evident from the connexion in which it stands with the preceding language. It is said, "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life," not he will or may have "everlasting life" in a future state; but he is then, at the time he believes, in possession of "everlasting life."

And to show more fully what this life consists in, I will quote the words of our Saviour. He says—"And this is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." John xvii: 3. Hence the believer in order to enjoy everlasting life, must know the great Author of his existence, and the Author's Son; but not as man knows his fellow man. But he must know them by obeying the laws and requirements which God has transmitted to him through his Son Jesus Christ."

2d. It has been shown that everlasting life is the result of obedience; hence to be in a state so as not to see life eternal, is to be in a state of unbelief or disobedience. But that this is to be the condition of the unbeliever eternally, and in consequence thereof he is to be doomed to unmitigated torture, is wholly and totally opposed to the words of inspiration. For it is declared that "all shall know me, (the Lord,) from the least to the greatest.—For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more." Heb. viii: 11, 12; Jer. xxxi: 34.

3d. "The wrath of God." It can not be that this phrase can be understood in its literal sense; because it would be derogatory to the ascribed attributes of Deity. It is affirmed by the apostle John that "God is love." 1 John iv: 16. And the apostle James says he is without "variableness, neither shadow of turning," James i: 17. Hence it can not be that Infinity is ever moved by anger towards his offspring. Therefore to be under the "wrath of God;" is to abide in unbelief. That this is the evident meaning of the phrase, may be inferred from the connexion in which it stands with that which precedes it; viz. "he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him." That is, it has not been removed by a belief in the doctrine taught by the Son.

Appointed Brs. T. J. Smith, D. Biddlecome, and D. K. Lee, committee on fellowship and ordination.

Appointed Brs. T. J. Smith, N. Sawyer and O. Roberts committee on discipline.

Resolved, That each society within the limits of this Association, be requested to take up a collection at least three months preceding the session of the N. Y. State Convention, and that the funds thus collected be forwarded to the clerk of this body, to be appropriated in whole or in part, as the case may be, to defraying the expenses of our delegation, to the aforesaid Convention.

Resolved, That the New York State Convention be requested to institute the necessary means to procure and publish a yearly list of all ministers in this State, enjoying the fellowship of the denomination, and being in regular standing as ministers of the Gospel—and none others.

REMARKS.—We were blest with a season of joyful refreshing. The weather was beautiful, and the congregations were immense. There were seven sermons preached, beside the usual addresses. On Wednesday evening we had a conference meeting, in which the blessed fathers in the faith, strengthened and edified us in the joyful expression of their minds. The spirit of love presided over the deliberations of the council. One aspect of the meeting, I beg leave to name as singularly cheering, to the permanent advancement of the cause of our religion. Five out of the seven sermons, were eloquently devoted to an unfolding of the practical beauties, and an enforcement of the experimental duties, and enjoyments of the Gospel. A growing spirit of devotion and every day piety was manifest on the part of both laymen and ministers, which indicates a new era and a new and unbounded prosperity in the heritage of our adorable Redeemer. The Lord bless and strengthen that spirit, and the wilderness and solitary places will be glad; for them, and the desert will rejoice and blossom as the rose.

D. K. LEE, Standing Clerk.

P. S.—Societies desiring conferences, will please publish an appointment of each in any paper that they may choose, over my name, as clerk of the Association.—Will Br. Price please copy?

ADMISSIONS ON MATT. XXIV AND XXV.

The 24th and 25th chapters of Matthew are referred to, in almost every controversy on Universalism and Partialism, as proof of a future judgment day and of endless punishment; especially verses 29, 30, 31, of chap. xxiv, and the latter part of chap. xxv. Universalists have referred the passage to the dissolution of the Jewish body politic and religious, the full establishment of Christ's kingdom in the world, the temporal calamities to be endured by that rebellious people, and the commencement and progress of the reign of the Messiah, especially as Judge. Our enemies have affected to ridicule this interpretation, and sneeringly talked about our applying every Bible threatening to the destruction of Jerusalem, and stupidly, with a poor attempt at wit or sarcasm, told us that we ought to label the New Testament, "The Destruction of Jerusalem."

Millerism is bringing thinking men in the Orthodox sects, to their senses, particularly in relation to the real meaning of the 24th chap. of Matthew, as will be seen by the following article taken from the Louisville "Baptist Banner," and written by Rev. J. M. Peck, one of the principal Editors of the "Banner," and a leader in the Baptist ranks in Illinois. The article—copied—entire—is commended to all our readers, especially the Orthodox. Notice particularly what this Baptist preacher says about the "coming of the Son of man," "the end of the world," verses 29, 30, and 31, of chap. xxiv., and the effects of Millerism.

E. M. P.

"Among the portions of Scripture, misunderstood, misapplied, and consequently perverted, the 24th chapter of Matthew is conspicuous. Not only the Millerites, who apply the whole chapter to the end of the world and day of Judgment, but many of our learned and able commentators and biblical critics, have been at fault likewise, respecting the 29th and following verses. The whole chapter prophetically relates to the destruction of Jerusalem, the dissolution of the Jewish polity, and the dispersion of the Jews. Much of this is predicted in language highly symbolical. It should be kept in mind, that the disciples of Christ, as did the Jews, expected a great revolution at the coming and setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah. Their minds were deeply imbued with an idea of the establishment of a kingdom on earth, at the termination of the Jewish government—one vastly more powerful and of much greater extent. When the Saviour announced prophetically the destruction of the temple, till there should not be one stone left on another, his disciples asked him privately, "tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" These questions had a direct relation to the prediction of the destruction of the temple. It is obvious they understood the coming of Christ and the end of the world, as connected with that event. Persons not acquainted with the original language of the New Testament, are liable, of course, to misunderstand the term "world." The term employed, if we mistake not, is never applied to this earth, or mundane sphere. It often signifies the age or period. The reply of our Saviour, from the 4th to the 28th verses inclusive, has been understood by every enlightened expositor as relating to the destruction of Jerusalem. It would be a waste of words to controvert this application with the Millerites. They have adopted a theory and make the Scriptures bend to it. But the peculiar phraseology of the 29th, 30th, and 31st verses have led many to suppose that with the destruction of Jerusalem, our Saviour was led on to the awful scenes of the final judgment. And hence, no small amount of ingenious criticism has been, added to dispose of the term "immediately."

"Immediately after the tribulations of those days, shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken."

"And then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven: and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory."

"And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect, from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other."

Here are a series of symbols employed, and the interpretation must be according to the laws of symbolical language.

"Heaven" is the symbol of the whole body politic—of the whole government in its organized form. The "sun," represents the sovereign power—the "moon" denotes the people—"stars," subordinate governors, rulers or officers of government. The prophet Joel, in reference to the same event, uses the same symbols, except the moon, instead of suffering an eclipse, "turns to blood."

In the use of this language of symbols, our Saviour predicted the destruction of Jerusalem, the complete subversion of the Jewish civil and political organization, the deposition of the sabbidrim, and of all public officers. All this took place coeval with the flight of the angels, with the gospel trumpet. The carcass was ready to be devoured, and the "eagles," an expressive symbol of the Roman invaders, were soon gathered around it.

In order to understand the 24th chapter of Matthew, the reader must carefully consult Mark xiii: and Luke xvii: 20, and to the end of the chapter. Let him compare each with the other, and he will find a most wonderful prediction of a series of events, all of which transpired before the death of John. Let him note how often the phrases, "coming of the Son of Man," "days of the Son of Man," &c., occur.

These phrases, in this connection, certainly do not mean the personal coming of Christ, but his direct providential agency. They are symbolical expressions, and should be interpreted by symbolical rules.

The parable of the virgins is another shocking instance of Scripture perversion. Hence hundreds are passing from place to place raising the "Midnight cry." This parable has not the least reference to the "last day," or the "end of the world," in the Millerite sense. It is a most beautiful and instructive parable of the condition of the Jews during the days of John the Baptist, of Christ and his apostles. Then the midnight cry was made—the "wise virgins," (believing Jews,) arose and trimmed their lamps, and the others were rejected. Other parables of the like import are also perverted and misapplied,

We are aware that many of the churches in the northern states who do not accord with the Millerite theory, suppose it is not of an injurious tendency, and may be therefore tolerated. How far forbearance should be exercised in Church discipline, when ministers leave their appropriate work to preach the personal coming of Christ in 1843, we pretend not to say, but for multitudes of private members to turn out public lecturers, or preachers and teachers, without even the license or approbation of any Church, is certainly a hazardous innovation on good order, and ought not to be tolerated.

Of the injurious effects of Millerism ultimately, we have not a shade of doubt. Nor do we hesitate in lifting the note of warning against it, as one of the most cunning devices of the devil.

1. It has already unsettled many minds, and must produce much vacillation in Christian principle.

2. It will ruin, as to future usefulness, many ministers of the Gospel. A few who have run into these prophetic vagaries, may recover the confidence of the people, but we have read the ways of human nature in vain, if many good men are not effectually ruined as to any real usefulness in the church. It may be expected that not a few, when they learn their present mistakes by the revelations of time, will be left to go off into some more extravagant vagary.

3. It is to be feared that multitudes who are now bamboozled with such superabundant proofs of the end of the world in 1843, will turn out Infidels and deny the truth of all Scripture predictions.

4. Millerism has already produced derangement in not a few persons, and suicide in some cases.—We know of some cases of insanity within our personal observation.

5. Millerism is one of the most formidable enemies to missions and all organized systems of benevolent operations. Of this we had convincing proofs last season, not only from the lectures of Fitch and Hines, to which we listened under the "big tent" at Albany, N. Y., with painful interest; but it is developing its fruits in the entire indifference of a very large part of its devotees. They give—not a mere tithe of their income, but their whole stock to publish papers and pamphlets and raise the "midnight cry"—and doubtless think they are doing God service, but they have lost all interest in the efforts to spread the gospel of Christ and reform the world.

6. Yet, possibly, Millerism may be the occasion, incidentally, of some good. It may awaken up the public mind to a more sober and rational investigation of the prophecies—certainly in some instances, its movements are like a great shark that swallows up all the fish in its path. So with Millerism. It makes a "clean sweep" through divers other ultraisms. It is instructive, as furnishing a further insight into the vagaries of that singular thing called human nature, to witness the sudden and surprising transformations through which individuals have passed on becoming thorough converts to the doctrine of 1843."

THE MOTHER—A TALE OF TRUTH.

How much misery does a belief in endless woe cause those who believe it for themselves or their own dear kindred. I was once acquainted with a circumstance of this kind. A lady, who was a member of the Presbyterian church, had a wayward son, who, at the age of fifteen, was apprehended for some trivial offence, and cast into prison. She went to see him in his confinement, and came home with the awful idea fastened on her mind, that her son was a subject for endless despair. Her Presbyterian friends learning the state of her mind, came in to comfort her. As soon as she recognized any one she knew, she would immediately cry out, "Oh brother, or sister! My son, oh! my son is going down to hell! I saw him just dropping into hell!" One of her brethren, a prominent member of the church in whom she had confidence, thought to comfort her by citing her to her faith, which was Calvinistic. "Why sister," said he, "you are willing that your son should go to hell if it be God's will, are you not?" Never shall I forget what agony of mind was depicted in her countenance, as she vehemently and frantically exclaimed, "Oh! I can't have my son go to hell!" And she resolved not to eat or drink, but constantly pray, until her son should be converted. But ere eight and forty hours had elapsed, reason was driven from her throne. I am happy to state, however, that her reason again returned, when she saw her son safely at home again.

Here we see how little satisfaction a faith in endless misery can yield those, who believe it for their own dear kindred. This woman had no apology to offer, for the conduct of her son, that he was less wicked than others whom she fancied deserving endless pain; but he was her son, this thought was distraction. We think the gentleman who offered this consolation to the unhappy woman, could no more endure the thought that his own dear child must, positively, be consigned to endless pain, than this poor woman. We think if a faith, when fairly canvassed, and brought home to our feelings, will not bring peace, but misery, it can not be the true Gospel faith; as that is "good tidings of great joy" which shall be to all people." That truth proclaimed by the angel to the shepherds of Judea; and confirmed by the benevolent Saviour, consequently must bring peace to the afflicted heart whenever believed. But where is the peace? or where the joy in a faith like the foregoing?

PUNISHMENT IN THE EARTH.....NO. II.

"But as for me, my feet were almost gone; my steps had well nigh slipped; for I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked."—DAVID.

I can not say, as our opposers do of us, when they attempt to account for our adoption of what they deem errors, that their willful wickedness, or depravity of heart leads them to believe thus; for with many of them, the error commenced in early youth—they imbibed it from revered parents and instructors—and have cherished the error in all sincerity of soul, ever since. They have been taught that this life is a state of probation, where men are left free to choose good or evil, that their characters may be fully and freely formed for eternity; and that after this life, God will reward the good and punish the bad. They are told that because God will judge men only in eternity, therefore he does not punish and reward them in the earth—and (to prove the same by adding from top to bottom!) because men are not punished and rewarded fully in this life, therefore God will punish and reward them in another! The rule seeming to work both ways, they have looked at the teachings of the Bible, and the events of life, through this medium, and saw every thing accordingly. They found a few seeming exceptions, and assumed them to be the general rule—and the clear cases that formed the general rule, they put to one side, as the seeming exceptions.—To confirm their minds still further in what had been taught them as divine truth, they mistook afflictions for punishments, and punishments for afflictions, by disregarding the plain distinction between the several orders or classes of laws which God has established on the earth. Thus consequences resulting from violations of the laws of wealth, of health, and of intellect, were considered to be mere afflictions—and the sufferings endured by reason of another's sufferings, were supposed to be what we call punishments.

With minds thus confused, it is not to be wondered at, that they should wander in error; for every plain teaching of Revelation, and even every example furnished in actual life, was perverted to their minds by being seen through this wrong medium—just as objects are distorted out of all shape, by being seen through warped glass—or colored wrongly, by being seen through a highly colored medium of any kind. Every denunciation of punishment on the evil doer, (or nearly every one,) was supposed to refer to the eternal state;—and however clearly it might be expressed and positively denounced, it was supposed that there were conditions implied in it, by means of which it might at last be evaded. For, examine the creeds of men, taught in nearly every denomination of Christians, and you will find the forgiveness of punishment a very prominent item;—then turn to the Bible, and examine it from Genesis to Revelation, and you will never find that doctrine so much as named in it.

This is a remarkable fact. The Bible teaches the forgiveness of sin; but the certainty of punishment; but the creeds of men teach that the forgiveness of sin means the uncertainty of punishment. The forgiveness—the remission—the blotting-out, of sins is a Bible doctrine; and has been supposed to mean the forgiveness of punishment, (which is not a Bible doctrine,) solely through the force of education.

Another correlative error, already hinted at, was in confounding the laws of inanimate and of organic matter, with the moral laws, and mistaking the effects of each. A saint disregarding the laws of gravitation, fell and broke his leg;—a sinner regarding them, preserved his legs whole, and thus avoided all the sufferings the other endured. "There," said they, "see how the righteous suffer, while the wicked live in enjoyment—surely the doctrine that God judgeth in the earth, is false!"

A good man, placing too much confidence in a friend, is defrauded out of his dues, and lives in poverty—the artful rogue, having studied the art of making and keeping money, revels in luxury and wealth. "There," say our erring brethren, "is another proof that Universalism is false—the righteous is poor and afflicted; the wicked man has all that heart can wish."

So we might go on, and adduce a thousand cases, each of which, being wrongly considered, confirms these brethren in their errors. But let us ask, are whole legs the reward of moral virtue? If so, every man who has perfect limbs must be a good man. Or are broken limbs the mark by which God designates who are his saints on earth? If so, few are the saints—and some of them hard to be distinguished from sinners! Again—Do men serve God merely to make money, to gain food and clothing by it? Surely, even these brethren will not pretend so!

But even these cases prove our views correct, when the various laws of God are not confounded. Obedience to the law of gravitation, had its appropriate reward; and disobedience, its consequent punishment.—So, an observance of the laws of wealth had its reward—and disobedience to them was punished in kind. And while the sinner with whole limbs, and the fraudulent man with full purse, were suffering the penalty of the moral laws they had violated; the good man was reveling in that inward peace of conscience—that sunshine of the soul, which is worth more than all the gold of earth, or the luxuries that ever pampered the body into disease and death.

We have thus considered the seeming exceptions, as our opposers would present them to us—but let us now take the generalities. Nearly all the moral virtues are so allied to the well balanced mind, and the correct bodily and social habits, that the blessings of sufficient means for bodily comforts, and of health, accompany their practice. It is but seldom that you find the good men and women in society very poor, very sickly, or very much persecuted in consequence of their goodness. Many who were not morally good, have become so by these evils being inflicted on them, and have remained poor and afflicted—but in this case, even these afflictions are recognized by them to be great blessings in disguise.

So, on the other hand, nearly all the vices among men are closely connected with habits of body and of mind, which, sooner or later, involve loss of wealth, health and reputation, and so add these evils to the sufferings of mind. It is but seldom that you find a healthy, wealthy and respectable bad man in society—I mean one who remains such all his life-time. You may find a man with a single, or a few vices, and many virtues, who, on the whole, is healthy, prosperous and respected; but just so far as he is vicious, he is not respected; and probably just so far his health is also injured, and his prosperity retarded.

These, you may rely upon it, are the general rules of rewards and punishments. They are ever open to your own observation—you may see them on the right hand and on the left—in your rear and before you, as you pass through life. And should a number of cases appear that, at present, you can not perceive in this light, wait but a few years, and the result will prove this general rule correct.

It seems necessary, in the moral government of God, that all roguery should not be effectually nipped in the bud—totally broken up at its very fountain. But sooner or later, it will be effectually checked—the way of the wicked he will turn upside down, and cause the transgressor to eat the fruit of his own doings. The same is true of the good. Virtue is the result of trial—of successful resistance of temptations. Consequently goodness is not immediately triumphant—not at the beginning, rewarded to its full extent. For neither rewards, nor punishments, are bestowed before they have been merited. Wait, then, the result—and in every case you will learn the lesson the Psalmist learned in the sanctuary of God. Such at least is the case in the Bible, in all instances where the result of human actions are traced out for our instruction.

And should there be a case here and there, in the scope of our personal observations, where the wicked man appears to be happy; or the virtuous man miserable, in a moral point of view—or where the curtain falls, and closes from our sight the last earthly scene of the great drama—we may rest assured that it is not really, but only seemingly an exception to the great, general and invariable rule of God's moral government. And that it is even seemingly an exception, is only owing, either to our wrong estimate of moral character—or our blindness—or to the superior art of hiding his real feelings, possessed by the object of our watch.

We are liable—very liable to form a wrong estimate of moral character; because we judge every man, not by the light and knowledge he possesses; but by that which we possess;—not by the views he has, and the circumstances in which he is placed; but by our views of the case, and the circumstances we suppose to exist around him. Accordingly we say or think how much, how long, and in what manner he should be punished; and may suppose, if he is not punished precisely thus, that he is not punished at all. But God is his judge, and he will by no means clear the guilty; but will continue his strange work, till he has made every sinner the partaker of his righteousness.

And now, in conclusion, let me exhort every one to remember this great doctrine of Revelation, and of rightly observing experience. Let it not be forgotten for a single moment, that no human wisdom can possibly contrive how to do any wrong act, so that a far worse consequence to the actor shall not follow it.

Remember the solemnly impressive declarations of God, by his wise men, and prophets, and his Son.

Remember the examples of old, thickly strewn over almost every page of the Old and New Testaments.

Remember the numerous beacons that blaze like living mementoes on the pages of history.

Remember the lessons your ears have heard, and your eyes have seen, as you passed along in life.

Remember the burning and withering brands which sin has deeply impressed, to constantly burn with a living power, in your own hearts—and if sinners entice, consent thou not—if temptation assails, resist it—yield not—waver not, or you die!

By every hope of happiness which virtue promises—by all the affections God has given you for friends and kindred dear, who must suffer in your downfall, and who will glory in your virtue—by the tender mercies of our God, and the love of Jesus, who has given you a life-giving example in his own person, fall not into the error of believing that sin is pleasant, or that its retributions can be escaped, or be easily borne. Be virtuous—be wise for yourself always, and you will be happy, and a source of joy to others. A. B. G.

THE DOCTRINE PREACHED BY PAUL.

"Whereunto I am ordained a preacher."

A prominent point in that doctrine preached by the apostle, was, that Christ came into the world to save sinners. He represents him as giving himself a ransom for them; as suffering the agonies of the cross on their behalf; as becoming obedient unto death that they might live. Enemies as they were to God, degraded by vice and spiritual ignorance, blinded by superstition, enslaved by corruption and sin, hopeless and godless; yet the apostle tells us, that the love of the Father was commended toward them, in that he sent his Son to die for them. This was an unpopular doctrine to preach; for it was thought, at that day, that Messiah would come to save only the righteous—that toward them his grace would be manifested, and on them his chief favors would be bestowed. Hence, when the Saviour was seen to mingle with the sinful and the degraded—to eat and drink with them—to lay his hands on them and heal them—to speak to them of pardon and life; he was at once set down as an impostor, who could not have been sent of God; for Heaven, it was thought, could have no smiles and no mercy for the sinner. Such were the low and dishonoring views entertained by many concerning God and his government. They supposed that all beside themselves, had, somehow or other, forfeited all claims to the least notice or regard from their Maker; and were cast off, and destined to live and die, uncared for by men and cursed of God. When, therefore, the apostle testified, as a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners; he found himself exposed to the scorn and wrath of former friends, and even to a violent death from their hands.

But none of these moved him. His calls were to the sinful and the straying. He pointed them to Calvary—to the cross—where, amidst mockery and insult, the Son of Man laid down his life, a reconciling offering for an alienated world; and told them that love for such as they had led an innocent Saviour to deliver himself up to death, and pour out his blood freely.

Another point in the Apostle's doctrine is, that sinners shall be saved, and the object of a Saviour's coming be effected. It is thought and believed by many, that the sinner can have "no interest in the atoning blood of the Son of Man," and can not therefore be saved. But this is denying salvation to those who, only, are the legitimate objects of it—to those by whom, only, it is needed. The whole need not a physician—the righteous need no Saviour. As the physician can not be said to heal a man who is in perfect health; so no individual can be saved by Christ, who is not a sinner. He, only, is a subject of salvation; and you might as well say that the sick man has no claims upon the physician, as that the sinner has no Christ; and it would be no more fallacious to say, that the disease of the sick man is a good and sufficient reason why he should not receive medical aid, as that the sins of the sinner should be a bar to his salvation. In the one case, if the man was well, he would not require to be cured; and in the other, if he was righteous, he would not need to be saved. It is as gross a fallacy to say of a righteous man, that he shall be saved, as to say of a well man that he shall be cured.

The Apostle taught the salvation of sinners. After contemplating the sufferings and death of the Saviour in behalf of a world lying in wickedness, he turns to his glorious exaltation, and beholds him reigning in power, and the principles of his government triumphing in every human heart, until finally every knee bows in humble submission, and every tongue confesses him Lord, to the glory of God the Father. See Phil. ii. 9, 10, 11. Every creature in the wide universe is thus subjected to him—not by physical force—but subjected to him as he will be to the Father—drawn to him by the invisible influences of his great love; and made willing by the power of the same.

The apostle evidently contemplated no sin, no death, no misery, after the resurrection, as may be seen by referring to the 15th chapter of his 1st letter to the Corinthians. In that descriptive scene denominated "the end," every enemy, even to the last, was destroyed, rebellion had ceased, a redeemed world been brought in, and God in all his holiness and love filled and pervaded all hearts. The plans and purposes of Infinite Wisdom are thus consummated—the Saviour's work finished—a universe redeemed, reconciled, saved. Pain shall never more be felt, nor death destroy, nor tears flow, sorrow and sighing have fled away, and are succeeded by songs and everlasting joy.

This is the doctrine proclaimed by the illustrious preacher of the Gentiles; and what a blessed and blessing doctrine is it! It is not too good to be true; for all truth is good, and designed to bless the world. It does not rob the Saviour of his due, nor God of his honor. It is a light to the soul, when all around is dark. It yields support in the hour of adversity. It gives peace in sorrow. It sustains the heart that is burdened with grief, makes soft the dying pillow, and smooths the couch of death.

AGENTS READ!!!

We have several times requested our friends and agents, not to send us certificates of deposit in payment of subscriptions, for the reason that there is so much loss on them, but some continue to do so, either from not having read such request, through forgetfulness, carelessness or other causes. A friend at Elmira, sent us a certificate on a Bank in his vicinity a short time since, of seven dollars and a half. We paid the postage on the letter, (12 1-2 cents) and then had to allow the Bank where we deposited the certificate three postages more, besides 1-2 per cent. for collecting, making a loss of fifty-four cents, equal to about eight per cent. Another instance. A friend at Lyons, sent us his written check on the Bank of Geneva, for four dollars and a half, subjecting us to the postage, (12 1-2 cents) and we have to allow three postages more, as in the other case, making the loss fifty cents, equal to about 12 1-2 per cent. Our Banks here do right to charge treble postage, as they have to enclose the certificate or check in another sheet, send it to the Bank from whence it came, (making double postage) and receive an acknowledgment from said Bank in return, making one more postage, all of which they have to pay, and which of course they charge to the depositor. Now our friends will see by a moment's reflection, that it would be far better for us, if they would enclose Bank notes, instead of sending certificates or checks, unless they are on the Banks of this city, and we really hope they will pay a little attention to this matter. If Bank notes are sent, make up the amount in as few bills as possible to save postage. Instances of the heedlessness of subscribers and agents in this respect have occurred. If six or eight dollars were to be remitted, the sum would be made up of some half a dozen bills of small denomination, thereby subjecting us to postage on each piece contained in the letter, while it might have been avoided by enclosing one, two or at most three bills. Drafts, on Banks of our city, Albany or New York, payable to our order, may be sent us, as we can deposit them at par, without any charge for postage. They can generally be bought for a premium of from 1-2 to 1 per cent. Send drafts then, or Bank notes, and in all cases get your Post Master to frank the letter if possible. A word to the wise, &c.

ANOTHER DEATH-BED RENUNCIATION.—That obituary notice signed by Br. Shipman—turn to it and read it—it is brief—and then if you have a neighbor who says "Universalism will do to live by, but will not do to die by," just hand the notice to him, and advise him to strike out "Universalism" in his oft-refuted objection, and insert "Partialism."

THE MINUTES of the Black River and Otsego Associations received too late for insertion in this number. The hands in the office will not work on Independence day, so that the matter for the paper had to be all up by Monday night, ready for the press on Wednesday morning—and the first form was up even as early as Friday morning. This, with the length of the proceedings of the former, prevented an insertion. They will appear in our next.

BR. BARRAY—Your express must have failed to deliver your MSS. I have not seen, nor can I hear of them.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

LETTER TO REV. MR. DANIELS.

Dear Sir—I have been very credibly informed, that since our discussion last winter, you have made the following statements, viz: 1st. "That much good was done by the discussion." 2nd. "That some converts were made by it to the doctrine of endless misery." 3d. "That the Universalists dare not hold another discussion with you." 4th. "That you are much better prepared for such a discussion now, than you was then." And I have also been told, that on one of your visits to Maryland, you very tauntingly asked of certain persons there, "why I had not been to Maryland to pick up my converts in that place," &c., &c.

On these statements I remark as follows:—In the opinion that the discussion was the means of doing much good, you and I are perfectly agreed. But I presume you understand by this, something very different from what I do. If it is really your opinion that the discussion did "much good" in your sense of it, then, as you profess to be anxious to do good, if you think such discussions are calculated to promote the cause which you advocate, you ought to engage in them whenever and wherever an opportunity presents. In order that you may not complain of a want of opportunity, I propose that you engage in another with me. As I met you before on your own territory, it is no more than fair that you should meet me now on mine. I therefore propose that you come to Bainbridge, and discuss with me the great question of the final destiny of the human race, in the Universalist Church in that place. If you decline doing this, then you can choose either of the following proposals. I will discuss the question with you in your own Church, in Westford, or in the Methodist Church in Decatur; or in any other place which may suit your convenience. As I am perfectly satisfied with the results of the discussion in Maryland, I should choose to go before a new audience; but if you prefer it I will meet you on the old battle ground, in the Baptist Church in that place. Yea, more, if it is your wish, I pledge myself, if life and health are spared, to hold a discussion of four days continuance with you in each of the towns in Otsego county. Here now is a chance to do "good" which the wide field of Indostan does not offer.—Let us, then, hear no more about want of opportunity. Your answer to this letter will determine who are afraid of discussion, the Universalists or Methodists. As I do not claim to be any better prepared for such discussion than before; if you are, you will have an important advantage which you had not then, and this should be an inducement for you to engage in it.

I am willing to believe that you did not state that some converts were made to your doctrine, by the discussion last winter, knowing it to be false; nevertheless, I must think you are mistaken. I have made diligent inquiry, and can not learn that there was a single one. If you know of any, will you be so good as to give their names? If you ask me the names of those who were converted from your doctrine, I can give them.

In reply to your question, "why I have not been to Maryland picking up my converts?" I answer, I have sufficient confidence in the intelligence and stability of the converts to Universalism, to believe that they stand in no need of drilling to keep them in the traces. It is very seldom that an individual who has been "delivered from the power of darkness" ever desires to become "again entangled with the yoke of bondage."

Any reply which you see fit to make to this letter, you can communicate to me through the Post Office, or through the same medium that you receive this. Wishing you health, happiness, and the enjoyment of every needed blessing, I subscribe myself

Yours truly

DEATHS.

In Erieville, on the 7th of May, ESTUS H. BARDWELL, aged 32 years. He has left a wife and child to mourn the loss of one, good, tender and true. May God, who heareth the cry of the afflicted, sustain and support them in their bereavement.

Br. Bardwell was a man highly respected by all who were acquainted with him. Upright and just in all his intercourse, his conduct marked by perfect integrity and moral honesty, he gained the confidence of all. For one long year, disease of a very painful character preyed upon his vitals; and for a portion of that time at least, he endured mental and spiritual anguish far more acute than that which tortured his body. A short time previous to his death, the writer of this, being in the vicinity—received through a mutual friend, a pressing request from him, to visit him. I accordingly called, and spent several hours in conversation with him. Shortly after entering his room, he remarked that he was "sick unto death—that he never expected to recover." I then asked him, "what were his feelings in regard to the change that awaited him?" He answered—while the big tear of agony trickled down his emaciated cheek—that he was "miserable and unhappy." I then asked him if he was free to tell me the cause of his unhappiness? He said he was. "I have," said he, "been educated in the belief of the doctrine of endless misery. To me it seems that the Bible teaches it. Yet the thought makes me deeply wretched and miserable. It seems to me that I can not die believing it. Although I have hope for myself; I have friends, and I can not die and leave them, with no prospect of meeting them in another and better world." He then asked my views of Mat. xxv. 31-46, which I gave him at some length. He expressed himself convinced of their correctness, and desired to know some of the proofs on which I based my faith of the salvation of the world. I pointed him to the nature of God—the attributes that form his character—his fatherly tenderness to mankind in the earth—to the labors, mission, death and resurrection of the Saviour—and finally to many of "the exceeding great and precious promises" given by prophets and apostles, and sealed by the precious blood of Christ, all of which I endeavored to show pointed forward to that grand and glorious era, when "all shall bear the image of the heavenly." He gave the most fixed attention to the proof, and as it multiplied, a smile of heavenly joy and satisfaction lighted up his countenance; and as I closed my remarks, he said, "such a prospect is joyful. I have always heard that Universalism would not do to die by. But if this will not, I know not what will." Although he was not then fully convinced of the truth of Universalism, yet before his death all doubts were removed from his mind, and with cloudless prospect he saw by faith a world redeemed and saved from sin. His funeral was attended on the 8th, and in accordance with his dying request a sermon was delivered by the writer, assisted in the services by Br. J. H. Stuart.

CHAS. L. SHIPMAN.

In Mason, Halesborough county, N. H., March 9th, 1843, ROGERS WESTON, Esq., aged 86 years, 5 months and 9 days. Esquire Weston was a regular soldier in the war of the Revolution, and was in the battle at the taking of Burgoyne. He served his country through that eventful struggle for freedom, and at the close of the war he settled in Mason, where he resided the remainder of his life. He repeatedly represented his town in the State Assembly and filled the office of a magistrate to general acceptance. He lived to bury four wives in the town of Mason, he left the fifth, a widow over eighty years of age.

In Venice, Cayuga county, June 5th, after an illness of about six hours, Mrs. LUCY FISH, widow of Capt. David Fish, who deceased five or six years ago. She was in her 82d year since the 20th of May last. She had formerly walked in the communion of the Baptist church; and to the close of her life, her name remained among the list of their members. But for several years past, refusing the restraints, of "the faith and order," she had in her benevolence and charity of her heart, accorded the fullest fellowship to all Christians irrespective of the peculiarities of faith; and whether in turn she were fellowshiped or not, she was universally esteemed for her social, friendly and Christian character.—Cox.

EYES.

BY MISS M. E. TILLOTSON.

Not as we wished did speak the eyes,
And yet, the tongue sweetness expressed;
Those gave but cold, unfelt replies.
But when that spoke, it moved the breast.

'Tis then no marvel if we feel
That tongue with siren tones is laden;
Since eyes alone, the heart reveal,
And by the tongue the heart is hidden.

Anon the tongue may err, perchance,
All mortal life, of clay a part—
But seldom does the radiant glance
Belie the movings of the heart.

Then know, when others vow to bless,
Thou hast a kind, unfailing guide;
'Twas so of yore, and now no less;
Consult the eye, or not confide.

TALES OF THE PASSING WINDS...NO. II.

BY MRS. S. ELIZA GIBSON.

THE HALL OF MIRTH.

The messenger of the following, came with frolicsome glee. Now it stooped to the ground, and bending the delicate flower-stalks, shook from the cups the scented dew—now it danced gaily over the smooth rivulet, and reversing on its surface the order of its flow, sent the bright ripples up to meet the moon-beams; and anon, it rose with merry voice to the aspen tree, and moving amid its branches, stirred the leaves with its own merriment.

"I came," it said, "from a hall, where mirth and gaiety reigned supreme. The proud beauty was there, and her eye was more brilliant, and her cheek tinged with a deeper hue than they were wont—the pale maiden too, flushed with excitement; and youths, and manly forms; and all, wearing the roseate hue of gladness.—Gilded lights beamed from chandeliers, and music with its exhilarating influence, touched, as with magic, every heart.

"'Twas a bewildering scene. Eyes, which before looked on others with coldness or indifference, now glanced affection—lips forgot their scornful curl, and smiled recognition; and tongues, before chained by pride, spoke congratulation. I too, was in the midst, and wafted perfume from flowery festoons, and kissed away the blush which rose to the cheek of one listening to the tale of love. I tossed back the curls of the sportive maiden, and cooled the temples of those, who with linked arms circled through the many windings of the dance, and with busy feet measured time to lively airs."

Now the merry voice of the messenger, sunk to a saddened murmur:—"But none of that gay throng thought of the sorrow and suffering which that expenditure might have relieved. None thought of the poor student, who was even then searching by pale fire-light, for the hidden treasures of science, and none thought of the afflicted, then mourning for the loss of some near friend and dear; or of the needy who were tottering on the brink of the grave for want of proper sustenance and support! No; nor was a reflection bestowed upon the widow, who was even then toiling to appease the cries of the famishing group at her knee. But by the morrow's dawn, their gaiety will be turned into languor and regret, and their gladness to gloom and despondency, while those whose thoughts and missions were to relieve suffering and affliction, will drink from a well-spring of joy, which neither day or night; life or the pangs of death, can exhaust."

Saying this, the messenger left me and passed on, to tell the tale and repeat the moral in some other listening ear.

MRS. FRY, NEWGATE PRISON, LONDON.

The following extract from "Heigh's Picture of London," we take from the Trumpet. It sets forth most clearly the practical influence of Universalism: I know not that Mrs. Fry acknowledges the theory of Universalism, but its practical power she very clearly demonstrates.

A. A. M.

"Amongst the females, wonderful improvement has been accomplished, by the efforts of the benevolent and persevering Mrs. Fry, the banker's wife. To benefit those unfortunate women, a committee was formed, who undertook to attend in the prison, and find employment for the prisoners. The committee consisted of the wife of a clergyman, and eleven members of the society of Friends. They suspended every other engagement and avocation, to devote themselves to Newgate. With no interval of relaxation, and with but few interruptions from the call of other and more imperious duties, they lived amongst the prisoners. At first, every day in the week, and every hour in the day, some of them were to be found at their post, joining in the employments, or engaged in the instruction of their pupils; and at this very period, some of the ladies daily visit the prison. The next requisite was a matron, and a respectable elderly woman, in every way competent to the office, was found willing to undertake it, and has discharged its duties with exemplary fidelity.

"Mrs. Fry then fully represented to Mr. Cotton, the ordinary, and to the governor, her views, the plans she proposed to adopt, and the difficulties with which she saw herself surrounded: Mr. Cotton told her that this, like many other useful and benevolent designs for the improvement of Newgate, would inevitably fail. Mr. Newman, who was then governor, told her not to despair; but he has since confessed that when he came to reflect upon the subject, and especially upon the character of the prisoners, he could not see even the possibility of success. The sheriff, Mr. Bridges, expressed himself willing to assist her, but told her that his concurrence, or that of the city, would avail her but little—the concurrence of the women themselves was indispensable; and that it was in vain to expect such untamed and turbulent spirits would submit to the regulations of a woman, armed with no legal authority, and unable to inflict any punishment. She replied, 'Let the experiment be tried; let the women be assembled in your presence, and if they will not consent to the strict observance of our rules, let the project be dropped.' On the following Sunday, the two sheriffs, with Mr. Cotton and Mr. Newman, met the ladies at Newgate. Upwards of seventy women were collected together. 'One of the committee explained their views to them; she told them that the only practicable mode of accomplishing an object, so interesting to her and so important to them, was by the establishment of certain rules. Each gave the most positive assurance to obey in all points. Work was next obtained for them; a room was provided, and speedily underwent the necessary alterations; and in a very few days, the ladies' committee assembled in it all the tried female prisoners. One of the ladies began, by telling them the comforts derived from industry and sobriety, and the pleasure and the profit of doing right. She then dwelt upon the motives which had brought the ladies into Newgate; they had left their homes and their families, to mingle amongst those from whom all others fled, and that the ladies did not come with any absolute and authoritative pretensions; that it was not intended that they should command, and the prisoners obey; but that it was to be understood, that all were to act in concert; that not a rule should be made, or a monitor appointed, without their full and unanimous concurrence. Several rules were next read, and they received the approbation of the penitent women. 'The plan has succeeded beyond the expectation of the most ardent.

"About six months after the establishment of a school for the children, and the manufactory for the tried side, the female committee received a most urgent petition from the unfried, entreating that the same might be done amongst them, and promising strict obedience. The ladies made the same arrangements, proposed the same rules, and admitted in the same manner as on the other side, the prisoners to participate in their action. The experiment has here answered, but not to the same extent. They have had difficulties in procuring a sufficiency of work, the prisoners are not so disposed to labor, flattering themselves with the prospect of a speedy release; besides, they are necessarily engaged, in some degree, in preparations for their trial. The result of the observations of the ladies has been, that where the prisoners from whatever cause did no work, they derived little if any moral advantage; where they did some work, they received some benefit; and where they were fully engaged, they were really and essentially improved.

"But a few years have elapsed since the operation in Newgate began, and those most competent to judge, Alderman Wood, Alderman Smith, the late governor (Newman), and the present (Brown), various grand juries, the chairman of the police committee, the ordinary, and the officers of the prison, have all declared their satisfaction and astonishment at the alteration which has taken place in the conduct of the females. Many have received the rudiments of education, and have learned for the first time, the truths of the Christian religion. Several have left them, who are now filling stations in life uprightly and respectably; and but one discharged from the prison has been again committed for a transgression of the law.

"In order that the reader may form some idea of the excellent results of Mrs. Fry's system, we quote the following from that lady's evidence, given before the Commons' Police Committee in 1818: having stated that she tried the scheme for one month, previously to its being formally mentioned to the court of aldermen, Mrs. Fry added: 'Our rules have certainly been occasionally broken, but very seldom; order has been generally observed; I think I may say we have full power amongst them, for one of them said it was more terrible to be brought up before me than before the judge, though we use nothing but kindness; I have never punished a woman during the whole time, or even proposed a punishment to them; and yet I think it is impossible, in a well regulated house, to have rules more strictly attended to than they are, as far as I order them, or our friends in general. With regard to our work, they have made nearly twenty thousand articles of wearing apparel, the generality of which being supplied by the slop shops, pays very little. Excepting three out of this number of articles that were missing, which we really do not think owing to the women, we have never lost a single thing. They knit from about 60 to 100 pairs of stockings and socks every month, and spin a little. The earnings of their work, we think, average about eighteen pence per week for each person. This is generally spent in assisting them to live, and helping to clothe them. For this purpose they subscribe, out of their small earnings of work, about £4 a month, and we subscribe about 8, which keeps them covered and decent. Another very important point is, the excellent effect we have found to result from religious education; we constantly read the Scriptures to them twice a day; many of them are taught, and some of them have been enabled to read a little themselves; it has had an astonishing effect; I never saw the Scriptures received in the same way; and to many of them they have been entirely new, both the great system of religion and of morality contained in them; and it has been very satisfactory to observe the effect upon their minds; when I have sometimes gone and said it was my intention to read, they would flock up stairs after me, as if it was a great pleasure I had to afford them.'

BAPTISM.

Extract from a discourse preached before the administration of the ordinance.

BY REV. DAY K. LEE.

"For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jew or Gentile, whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit."—1 Cor. xii: 13.

The baptism of the spirit, the truth, the love of Christ, is the all-essential, all-important baptism. We should feel assured that we have received this, before we call for the outward ceremony. Better experience this inward, soul-immersed renewal, and never submit to the outward ordinance, than perform the ceremony, and never feel, never experience the influence of the gospel on the heart. The outward sign is at least, but a type, but a symbol of the inward immersion of the spirit of Christ; and if the spirit be wanting, the ceremony is but a hollow mockery.

All TRUE Christians, whether Jew or Gentile, Partialists or Universalists, have received this baptism of the spirit and love of Christ, whether they have observed the outward ordinance or not. All genuine believers, have by one spirit been baptized into one body of disciples—into one church—the church of Christ, and enjoy the same newness, resurrection of life—the same wakeful sympathies, ardent devotions, and lofty hopes, with what particular sect soever they may be found identified. And many who are most eminently Christian; many in whose hearts the spirit, and love, and joy of Christ richly dwell, immersing their whole souls, softening their affections, ennobling their desires, and inciting them to worship God in service most acceptable and well pleasing in his sight,—many good Christians, I say, there are of this kind, who never have esteemed it either their duty or privilege to be baptized in water. I appreciate their sincerity, I revere their intelligence, and respect and regard their sacred right of conscience; and would say, give me ONE SUCH CHRISTIAN in preference to a multitude of others, who make their baptism to consist chiefly in the outward form, while they never have experienced the indwelling spirit, and never have experienced the practical virtues, or performed the moral duties of the gospel. I care not how deeply I impress this idea—I care not how seriously you all take it home to your own answering hearts; for I do most strenuously insist upon the inward baptism, and most largely do I prize it. There is too much outward, ritual religion; and too little of the generous spirit in the soul. There is too much judging by outward appearances,—by what a man performs upon the house-top, and sounds to the four winds with a trumpet; and too little judging as God judgeth, by knowing the inner man—by looking on the heart. Let us, therefore, warn and teach every man, who professes to have had his soul and his understanding immersed in the truth which makes free, and the love which is the bond of perfectness; to sit in prayerful judgment upon his own conscience, and see if it may not, after all, be out of mere opposition to other persuasions, or from a hasty reflection, or a desire to escape the performance of service in the vineyard, that he has adopted such conclusions. There should be no surface Christians among us. No one should profess our doctrine to escape Christian labor.—Our very profession obligates us to be built up in faith as upon mountain adamant, and to do more in obedience to God, and in imitation of Christ, than any other sect of believers. Our religion is a system of the most practical, the most enlarged, and wakeful benevolence and devotion; and whoever enlists in such a cause, must put on the whole armor of God, and sanctify his life to the supreme love and unceasing service of his maker, and the greatest possible benefit of his fellow creatures.

And when an individual has, by the true spirit, been baptized into the one body of true believers, and his whole soul warms with its pentecostal fires, and kindles with its quenchless and unfathomable love, he anticipates a glorious earnest of the skies, while he walks upon earth. His heaven is begun below. He enjoys a moral, spiritual resurrection, He sits, and walks, and rejoices in heavenly places with Christ Jesus; and lives in a newness of understanding, a newness of life. He discovers a freedom of mind that transcends in splendor the glory of the outward universe, with all its suns and systems. All real glory is in Mind as found in purity—as found unfolded, with no fetters or circumscriptions upon it. He discovers a new and animating connexion between himself and heaven, himself and God. He "reads his title clear, to mansions in the skies."

Such I consider the spiritual, and the all-essential baptism, and its effects upon the human soul; and if experienced, it renders us disciples of Christ, and members of his spiritual kingdom in the earth. But there is a baptism—an immersion in water which was sanctioned, and observed by our Master, and transmitted to his disciples, as an outward sign of their inward renewal,—a visible figure of their moral resurrection—that many of us choose, as calculated to do us good, and as in obedience to him who gave us the Gospel. It is an institution whose perpetuation in the church we think we can trace back to the very time when the Saviour taught, and suffered and bled, and therefore we esteem it as one of a cloud of witnesses, that stand for the truth of Christianity. This institution calls up associations at once the most sacred and blessed. It seems to bring us nearer to Apostolic times, and unfolds the significance of many sublime scriptures. I love the ordinance. I love to see it observed, specially by our own brethren and sisters. It seems to receive a new meaning, a new and ennobling influence when observed by our people. I think it increases, perfects, expands our faith, strengthens the conviction that the Bible and its glorious doctrines are true, and lays us under stronger, and more solemn obligations to go forth in our pleasing duty, stand fast in our heavenly hope, and never fly from the banner of the cross.

It is a beautiful type of burial, and resurrection with Christ. In the water we renounce the old man and his sinful deeds, as in the grave we put off this corruptible body. In the water we represent the death that Christ died, the death that we must die; and coming up out of the water, we typify our resurrection from corruption to incorruption, from sorrow and tears to blessedness and glory. "Buried with him," said Paul to the Colossians—"Buried with him in baptism, wherein ye are risen with him through the faith of the operation of God, who hath raised him from the dead."

I believe that those who receive this institution, choose an excellent part. I believe they will be strengthened in their religion, chastened in their affections, and brought in their minds to a more intimate, a more endearing communion with God and Christ. And I hope, while they prefer this thing as a privilege for themselves, and a supposed duty for them to perform, that they will think charitably of others who do not esteem it either a privilege or duty to observe such an ordinance. I hope they will be so far Christian as to respect the right of others to believe as it shall seem good to themselves, and censure them not for maintaining that right. Let the little difference of sentiment that we entertain on this subject, be the last to create divisions in worship, interest, faith or love. Remember, brethren, that the Scripture sentiment is this—by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body of believers, and let us therefore dwell together in harmony, charity and peace.

PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY.

BY REV. H. TORREY.

The practical duties of Christianity can not be too often urged upon the attention of Christians. There is no danger of our being too good, or of walking too closely in the footsteps of our divine Master.—The "glorious Gospel of the blessed God" has been in the world for more than eighteen centuries, and yet, even the professed believers are far from living in perfect obedience to its requirements. They make but a faint exhibition of the glory of God, and are but slightly acquainted with him who is "the way, the truth, and the life." It is true, Christianity is now exerting a wider and more glorious influence than it ever before exerted, and achieving triumphs over the kingdom of darkness, unparalleled in the history of past ages; but still there is a great deficiency in the practical godliness of its disciples.

And the important question here arises, Why is this? The answer evidently is: Because the divines, and Christian writers, spend the greater part of their time in controverting abstruse and metaphysical points in theology, which are of small practical utility; instead of devoting it as they should, to the illustration and exhibition of the moral precepts of the Gospel, which alone can cleanse the heart, and moralize the life. Here lies the difficulty. Let the Christian world cease their wrangling—throw aside their implements of war—forget their petty differences in opinion—leave their theoretical contentions, which have caused so many walls of division in the fair temple of our Zion; let them turn from all these, I say, and sink down upon the broad basis of Love, and there unite their efforts to better the human heart, and to make man a practical follower of the Saviour; then will the Gospel move onward over the earth with a mighty tread, converting the hearts of the children of men, and leading them from the "way of the transgressor" into the paths of holiness and virtue.

I do not so much complain that men should theorize, and engage in metaphysical speculations, as I do that they should consider their abstract ideas and principles of such paramount importance, as to enlist the whole of their mental energies, regardless of the tangible parts of religion.—The world can only be reformed by the preaching of great truths which can touch the heart and enlighten the mind, and these truths must be of a practical tendency.

All Christians profess to love the Saviour, and they should never lose sight of his language—"if ye love me, keep my commandments." A disregard of this injunction of our Master, is the sole cause why so many in the present age, like Peter, "follow him afar off." Let us, then, my brethren, love Christ, and keep his commandments—let us follow him and do after his likeness, and while others are agitating doctrinal questions, let it be our peculiar province to exhibit the moral beauty of the Gospel in "doing unto others as we would that others should do unto us." And thus will we live consistent with our profession, and, prove ourselves the humble disciples of him "who ever went about doing good."

THE DARK DAY AND LIGHT NIGHT.

BR. GROSH:—Major Z. Flower, a friend and brother of ours, has recently brought to my notice a chronological error in an article published in the Magazine and Advocate, 21st April, No. 16, current vol., which he thinks ought to be corrected.—The article alluded to was taken "from the Herald and Journal"—in which it was stated that "the dark day" happened on "May 19, 1780."—This our friend thinks to be an error, and he adduces pretty good evidence in support of his belief. He gives me the following statement:—"On, or about the 1st June, 1778, I enlisted for 9 months as a soldier in the war of the Revolution—was not discharged until the 1st March, 1779. The 1st April the same year, I enlisted again for 9 months. I am confident the dark day happened while I was at home, during the month of March, 1779, or it took place before I enlisted into the service in 1778—for certain I am, that the dark day was not while I was in the army—because, in the early part of January, 1780, I entered for the third time into the continental army, to serve during the war—consequently, I was in the service about the whole of the year 1780, and got my final discharge the 12th June, 1783."

I am strongly inclined to believe that Major Flower is correct in his statement—that the dark day did not happen on the 19th May, 1780. If it happened at all, in this year, it must have been near the 1st day of January. I was 6 years old on the 19th May, 1780; and young as I was, I remember the dark day, distinctly. I recollect that lighted candles had to be used on that day. I remember, also, that my mother was a little frightened, finding day to be turned into night. It is also strongly impressed on my mind, that the ground was frozen, and that it was quite cold weather.—But,

Our friend has also something to say about the LIGHT NIGHT, which appeared the same year in which he received his final discharge from the army of the Revolution, viz. 1783. He says he was out all this night working in a saw mill, in Stillwater, in company with another man. He says the lightest part of this night was after mid-night—at which time it was so light that he believed he could distinguish objects as plain as he ever could in the day time. When the saw stopped, the man that was in company with the Major, contended that he heard sounds abroad, and frequently asked his companion if he did not hear the sounds—he said the sound was like the word, woof, woof, continually repeated. Possibly weaving was running in this man's mind stronger than sawing. Be this as it may, our friend says he heard no sound that night, except what was made by the water, and the saw mill.

The dark day, and light night, have been often alluded to as remarkable phenomena; and it seems to me it would be well if the exact date of their taking place could be established. But, is there any one that can do it? J. K.

"A PITCHER IN THE WELL."

Says the Baptist Register of June 2d, 1843, "This is the caption of a short article published in a Universalist paper in September last."* A young lady attended church where a Baptist preacher in his discourse brought up the comparison between a pitcher and a child being in a well. The lady became convinced that it was only the pitcher that caused the excitement, and expressed her thoughts in rhyme. The correspondent of the Register, "S. J.," says, "As a reply to the fair authoress, the following lines and scripture references are presented.* Then follows quite a lengthy poem, in which the author expresses his opinions as freely as the young lady did hers. And thanks to kind Heaven, that this is a country where each has a right to enjoy, write and publish their own sentiments: and we can agree with which we please, or dissent from both. With the doctrine of either we have nothing to do at the present time; but there were a few lines at the commencement of S. J.'s poem which we would like to notice.—We give them just as they were found.

* If the reader will turn to the Magazine and Advocate, No. 15, present volume, he will find an article which we presume is the one alluded to. LETITIA.

"When age shall lose wisdom, and youth become teachers,
And maids turn logicians to lecture our preachers,
Oh, then may we look for a loss in the gift,
And virtue and wisdom to fail in the shift.
Theology, sinking, may lose its old track,
Religion, grown feeble, will retrograde back;
For such are the dogmas our world doth afford,
There are many strange ways people construe the word,
A thousand false schemes, that are far from the truth,
Kept up in old age though imbibed by youth;
A maid has turned poet, and took up the pen,
We thus among damsels find teachers of men."

If there is any truth in the saying, that "every generation grows wiser," the author of the above lines must have forgotten it; and even if there is or is not, there are some of every generation that are older in years than in wisdom, and who would not lose by condescending to learn a little from those younger than themselves; for before our day it was said, that many things were revealed unto babes which were concealed from those who were considered wise and prudent. And if maids turn logicians to inquire for themselves, whether the preacher who is liable to errors of opinion as well as others, declares the whole counsel of God or not; or if they venture to expose his fallacies, or rebuke him if he sin, they do no more than a certain lad of about twelve years of age did something like eighteen hundred years ago; and if by this means a preacher is to lose the gift of making people believe without inquiry, that every thing he says is true as the sun in his daily course, then the sooner it is lost the better.

Far be it from us to say aught against the Gospel minister; on the contrary, often do our hearts sincerely invoke the Most High for blessings for him who publishes peace, who brings us good tidings, who leads us with love to the affectionate arms of our Father, who implores Him to blot out our transgressions and to give us a seat among the sanctified in Heaven. But the time is fast hastening to a close, when the preacher is thought to be infallible, or when he has the sole privilege of reading the word of God. Yes, and very thankful are we it is so; and we pray that the time may soon come when the whole world will enjoy the same blessing that we of this goodly land do; for here every one, even maids and children, have His message within their reach, and we have the privilege of thinking, too.

As for Theology, it is time for some of it, not really to lose its old track, but to retrace it, till it sinks to its origin, dark oblivion's waves; and and there may it be forever buried in nameless nonentity.

Is it possible though for Religion to grow feeble and "retrograde back," when the female, the young lady, takes the Bible, retires to her closet, and there, in the calm, still hour, reads it attentively and prayerfully—meditates on its love and life-giving precepts, and imbibes its hallowed and * Ps. ix: 17; iv: 15; lxxxvi: 13; cxxxix: 8; Prov. iv: 11, 24; Isa. v: 14; Amos ix: 2; Matth. v: 22; xviii: 9; x: 28; xxiii: 33; Mark ix: 43, 45, 47; Luke xii: 5; xvi: 23; James iii: 6; 2 Pet. ii: 4; Rev. i: 18; xx: 13, 14; &c.—proofs of a hell which we do not deny. But how different this from the hell we are told of by some now-a-days, in which are millions of poor weak mortals, who for the errors or crimes of a very brief existence, are driven in wrath from a Father's love, to writhe and groan, and toss in anguish, on waves of liquid fire; and when ten thousand millions of millions of years shall have witnessed their torment, their cry for mercy or their blasphemous groans will be exceeded only by the fiendish yell of the master demons crying out, "Never—never—NEVER shall your misery end!—The bowels of God's mercy is closed against you! you are our's forever—forever! roll them—roll on in anguish, long as eternity endures!" LETITIA.

sanctifying influences? Is it possible, we repeat, when this is the case with the young lady, she who induces her brothers by example and kind persuasions, to love the house of God and fire side home, more than vice and dissipation's haunts; who is to influence her husband for good or evil; who is to implant every tender and pious feeling into her sons and daughters, ere they learn to lisp the lovely name of mother; to infuse into their minds that spirit of partialism which is to nerve their arm, to defend their country from the aggressions of every foe; who is to teach them to see the hand of a great and good Being in every thing around them, and to love to meditate on the joys of that bright Heaven for which we were destined?—She who is to watch long and patiently at the bedside of pain and anguish, to smoothe the dying pillow, and is often herself to drink of affliction's deep and sorrowing waters; who is to bear every trial, to turn the wanderer from the error of his ways, and give tone and manner to society; is she unfit to "turn logician and become teacher?" Mothers, sisters, girls, shall we let "Religion grow feeble and retrograde back," when there is so much for us to do? O, permit it not! Let us kindle its holy fire on the altar of our hearts, fan it with love divine till the flames shall extend its celestial brightness to the uttermost parts of the earth; till the world of mankind shall be linked with one bond of brotherhood, acknowledge one Father, be baptized with the purifying waters of salvation, and drink deep at the fountain of everlasting life, love, and happiness; then may seraphic beings shout again the anthem, "Glory to God in the highest;" then may we see that heaven is indeed begun below; then will "damsels" and "men" both be willing to receive instruction from each other, even as a little child in the arms of its parent.

MINUTES

Of the proceedings of the St. Lawrence Association.

Met in Potsdam, June 28, 1843. Prayer by Br. J. D. Hicks. Chose Br. L. Buck, Moderator, and A. Day, Assistant Clerk. Bns. Waggoner, Parker, and Miles, Committee of arrangements. Read credentials of delegates. Invited visiting clergy to participate in our deliberations. Adopted report of Committee of Discipline—"no complaint." Appointed Bns. M. Jenison and N. Parmeter, Jr., L. Buck, Committee of Discipline for ensuing year.

Received First Universalist society of Hopkinton, and Lawrence; do., of Morristown; do., of Somerville, into fellowship with this body.

Voted that there be six Conferences the ensuing year—viz: at Nicolville, the last Wednesday and Thursday in July—at Columbia Village, 2nd Wednesday and Thursday in September—at Somerville, 4th Wednesday and Thursday in September—at Malone, 2nd Wednesday and Thursday in January—at Henville, 1st Wednesday and Thursday in February—at Fowler, 3d Wednesday and Thursday in February.

Voted to rescind the resolution passed in Massena, last September, requesting Br. Hall to return his letter of fellowship; and resolved, that Bns. Potter and Hicks be a Committee to settle and adjust the matter between Br. Hall and this Association; and that their decision be handed in writing to the Standing Clerk of this body, and that he furnish Br. Hall a copy, also the Chairman of this council.

The Committee above named, made the following report—"That this Association having rescinded a resolution passed at a previous Conference, requesting Br. B. Hall to return his letter of fellowship, (he having previously, through the medium of the public press, declared himself as having withdrawn from the Association,)—that Br. Hall feeling a disposition, (as reported by friends,) to have all difficulties occasioned by misconception, misunderstanding or otherwise, amicably settled, has proposed to abide the decision of your Committee, which is—That said Hall retain the same standing in the Association that he held immediately previous to his giving notice of withdrawal therefrom—and that said Hall be considered in fellowship with this Association, and an applicant for ordination." Adopted said report.

Committee of fellowship and ordination reported in favor of granting ordination to Br. S. W. Squire, D. Mott, and B. Hall—that they, per request, be ordained in their respective societies, where Conferences have been appointed. The Committee also reported in favor of granting a letter of fellowship to Br. A. M. Werden—all of which was accepted and adopted.

Appointed Brs. Waggoner, T. Hazleton and M. L. Parlin a Committee on fellowship the ensuing year. Brs. Waggoner and Squire, (ministerial) and Brs. L. Buck and D. Mack (lay) delegates to the next State Convention, with power to appoint substitutes and fill vacancies.

Voted, that we recommend to all our societies the proper observance of the ordinances, believing them to be an instrument of much good.

Resolved, that the following be adopted as an amendment to our constitution—viz: "That the Committee of Discipline shall receive no complaint against a minister or society, until the party aggrieved shall have first taken measures to settle the matter, so far as practicable, according to the rule pointed out by our Saviour in the 18th chapter of Matthew."

Appointed Br. Mott to preach the next occasional sermon. Br. Waggoner to prepare the minutes, etc.

Adjourned to meet in Canton, the fourth Wednesday and Thursday in June, 1844.

L. BUCK, Moderator.

A. DAY, Clerk.

Ministers present.—J. D. Hicks, Job Potter, S. Jones, G. S. Abbott, W. H. Waggoner, G. Swan, D. Mott, S. W. Squire, F. J. Briggs, A. M. Werden.

Delegates present.—D. Mack, L. Buck, Canton; Addison Giles, C. Betts, Gouverneur and Fowler; J. Cogswell, W. McEuen, Madrid; A. Gibson, A. Beach, Massena; I. Parker, J. Miles, Potsdam; J. C. V. Northrop, T. Olmstead, Ogdensburg; Sol. Walrath, D. Robinson, Heuvelton; J. Ferris, L. Ellithorp, Hopinton and Lawrence; S. Hazleton, J. Pyon, Fowler; M. Thatcher, G. Wait, Somerville; B. Walrath, J. Davis, Morris-town.

REMARKS.—This session of our Association was probably the best it ever held. It was a season of great interest and profit. It was estimated that there were as many as 1500 people present. And the brethren and sisters came in the spirit of union and Christian love, and with hearts of thanksgiving bathed their souls in the waters of life and salvation. Certainly it was good for us to be there. Interesting and impressive discourses were preached by Brs. Mott, Abbott, Jones, Swan, Hicks and Potter—addresses by Br. Potter; and the baptism of eight candidates, and administration of the Lord's Supper by Br. Waggoner. Brs. Squire and Werden also assisted in the services of the occasion.

In council the most perfect harmony prevailed, and the business performed by it shows, that the cause of truth and righteousness is onward in our midst. Three new and prosperous societies united with this body, and were represented in council, (as were all the others,) by delegates who are good men and true. A letter of fellowship was granted to a young brother who has recently been born into the kingdom, and who has proclaimed to good acceptance, the word of truth for a time past. And it will be seen that ordination was granted to three approved laborers in the vineyard, and which solemn and ever interesting service is yet to be conferred on the respective brethren. May God grant us wisdom and strength for the discharge of every duty.

Upon the whole—although our friends anticipated a great and good meeting, yet their expectations were much more than realized. The weather was pleasanter, the congregation larger, the preaching better, the singing more excellent, and the society at Potsdam more amply prepared to receive their brethren from abroad, than the most sanguine of us had reason to expect. The services of this heart-cheering and soul-thrilling occasion, were closed on Thursday P. M. by singing those impressive lines, commencing with the words,—"When shall we all meet again." A solemn joy pervaded the mind, as the eye beheld this great scene—never, never will it be forgotten.

A GOOD COMMENT.

It is agreed by biblical critics in general that many words and phrases which occur in the Scriptures have been improperly translated into our language, and are therefore liable to be misunderstood. A manifest proof of this fact is found in the common rendering of Phil. ii: 6. "St. Paul is commonly understood to declare in this verse that Jesus Christ claimed to be equal with God." And though this mistaken view of the subject introduces strange confusion into the sacred record, and represents the apostle as uttering the words of foolishness, many honest persons still feel bound to believe that the Son of man made a great display of his wonderful humility, in claiming an equality with the highest Being in the universe! The verse in question reads thus in our version, "Who [i. e. Christ] being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God."—Now what was the subject of the apostle's discourse? The humility of Christ; for it is added in the following verses, "But made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross," &c. Was the act of claiming to be equal with the Supreme Jehovah a display of humility? Did Christ, by setting up such a claim, make himself of no reputation? But the whole difficulty is at once removed, when it is understood that the word harpagmon, here rendered robbery, means a thing eagerly to be seized, coveted or desired. Though the fullness of the Godhead dwelt in Christ, he did not desire or covet any thing like an equality with God. So far from harboring such a disposition, he made himself of no reputation, and appeared in the world as the servant of man. This was his humility; and the apostle has therefore said, "Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus."

But the "Good Comment," indicated by the title of this article is still to come. In Titus iii: St. Paul ascribes the salvation which he and his Christian brethren enjoyed, to the great love of God, manifested to the world through Jesus Christ our Lord. But the expression which Paul used is still stronger than simple love. And owing to this fact, Dr. A. CLARKE has favored us with the following comment on Titus iii: 4, "But after that the kindness and love of God our Saviour toward man appeared:"—"By chrestotes, [kindness,] we may understand the essential goodness of the Divine nature; that which is the spring whence all kindness, mercy and beneficence, proceed. Love towards man—Philanthropia, philanthropy. It is to be regretted, that this attribute of the Divine nature, as it stands in relation to man, should have been entirely lost by a paraphrastic translation. Philanthropy is a character which God gives here to himself: while human nature exists, this must be a character of the divine nature. God loves man; He delighted in the idea, when formed in his own infinite mind; He formed man according to that idea, and rejoiced in the work of his hands; when man fell, the same love induced him to devise his redemption; and God the Saviour flows from God the Philanthropist. Where love is, it will be active, and show itself. So the philanthropy of God appeared; epephane, it shone out in the incarnation of Jesus Christ, and in his giving His life for the life of the world."

We are pleased with this comment, because we conceive that there is a very essential difference between mere love, and philanthropy. God loves all the creatures of his hands. But in addition to his general benevolence, he possesses infinite phi- lanthropy, or a peculiar love bestowed upon man. He formed man in his own image, to be the object of his fatherly goodness. He has gloriously manifested his love for man in the great plan of redemption through Jesus Christ, "the Saviour of the world." And if this love, thus freely commended to the ungodly and the chief of sinners, will always be "active," may we not confidently hope and rejoice to believe that God "will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth;" so that He at last "may be all in all," and rejoice with infinite satisfaction that though he gave the Son of His love to be "the life of the world," that Son died in vain for none? A. M.

A CARD.—I hereby acknowledge, on behalf of my family, the receipt of a very beautiful, neat and splendidly wrought bed-quilt, the gift of our sisters and friends in Sullivan on my last visit to that society. The gude wife thinks it occasions very pleasant dreams of Sullivan whenever we sleep under it; and we feel, accordingly, very grateful for this token of sisterly affection.

I WOULD BE AT REST.

Oh, that I had an angel's wing,
Or e'en the pinion of a dove,
I'd leave the changing scenes of earth,
And soar to realms of light above.

I'd go where peace forever reigns,
Where sin and sorrow never come;
Where weary, wandering mortals find,
A peaceful rest, a happy home.

My friends and kindred, all, I'd leave,
The cords that bind us here untie;
With love more pure we'll meet again,
In that celestial world on high.

I'd bid adieu to all of earth,
Its hills, its plains, its seas, its skies,
And every plant, and shrub, and flower;
And go where beauty never dies.

I'd go, and leave earth's fairest gems,
Its honor, fame, and all its store;
I'd go, and dwell in that bright land,
Where pleasures flow forever more.

But, ah! our spirits here are bound,
In mortal bodies to the earth;
And we must wait our Master's will,
Receive from him our heavenly birth.

When death my weeping eye shall close,
And still the throbbing of my breast;
I'll mount upon a seraph's wing,
And fly away, and be at rest.

NORTH SALEM.—Teachers, 7 or 8, from 35 to 40 scholars—small library.

NEW YORK CITY.—3d school.—Whole number of scholars on register is 242—average attendance, 200. The officers are 1 superintendent, 3 assistants do., 1 librarian, 1 assistant do., and 26 teachers. The library contains 653 volumes. The school holds two sessions on each Sabbath, and is in a flourishing condition.

4th School.—1 superintendent, 3 assistants do., 10 teachers, 100 scholars, and a library of 100 volumes. The lesson books used in the school are the New Testament, Baker's Gospels Harmonized, Balch's Life of Christ, Skinner's Child's Catechism, and Skinner's Easy Lessons. The school may be considered in an improving condition.

2d School.—The number of names now on the register of the school, including only those who actually attend with more or less regularity on its exercises, is—of boys 114, of girls 143—in all 257, being a gain over last year.

The number of teachers is, males 16, females 18; in all 34; being a gain over last year.

The average attendance of teachers during the past year has been males 12, females 13; in all 25.

The average attendance of scholars has been boys 88, girls 101; in all 189, being a gain over last year of 26. The greatest number present at any one session was 234; the least 26.

The number of volumes in the library is 406, being an increase of 86 volumes. The number of readers is about 200.

SALISBURY.—1 superintendant, 2 assistants, 6 teachers, 30 scholars, and a library of 60 volumes.

WATERTOWN.—15 or 20 teachers, 50 or 60 scholars, and a Bible class of 50 or 60 members.

BUFFALO.—The Sunday school connected with the Universalist church in the city of Buffalo, was organized on the second Sunday in April (12th day)

1835, with 40 pupils and 11 teachers. The school prospered, and in the following August had increased to over 100 pupils and 22 teachers. Br. R. Tomlinson was pastor of the society, and attended and encouraged the school with his characteristic zeal and fidelity. This school was suspended on the 15th April, 1838, having been in progress for three years.

The Sunday school was re-organized on the 24th May, 1842, having been discontinued a little over four years—the society having no regular meeting during the greater part of that time. The school was small at its re-commencement, there being but 32 pupils and 11 teachers. It prospered however, and before the close of the year, numbered 121 pupils and 28 teachers. In the mean time, a respectable collection of books had been effected, and the library consisted of some 300 vols.

The school now consists of a "library and finance committee," one male superintendent and assistant, one female superintendent and assistant, a librarian, twenty-nine teachers, and 140 pupils, with a library of 543 vols.

UTICA.—1 superintendant, 1 librarian, 10 teachers, about 60 pupils, average attendance about 45, library of about 150 volumes.

There are many other schools in the State, but as they furnished us with no reports, we can say nothing with regard to their condition. We trust that at the next session of the association it will be otherwise; and that all schools will report by delegates or by letter, the mode of their organization, the number of officers, scholars, etc., etc.

So far as reports have been received, we learn that Sabbath schools are having an important bearing on the interests of the denomination in this State. This was to be looked for. But greater results than have yet been produced, are to be anticipated, when they shall become widely established among us, and are fostered by the kindness and charity of the friends of our cause.

MINUTES

Of the proceedings of the Black River Association, for 1843.

Met in Ellis village, June 21st. Prayer by Br. Sias. Chose Br. P. Morse, Moderator, Br. G. S. Abbott, Clerk, and Br. J. S. Kibbe, Assistant Clerk. Read and approved the proceedings of last year. Received credentials of delegates, and read letters from various societies. Appointed Brs. D. Stearns, H. Person and B. Thayer, Committee, to arrange public services. Voted to invite ministering brethren from abroad to take part in the deliberations of our Council. Voted to receive the First Universalist Society in Dexter into our fellowship. Voted, to alter the 12th article of the Constitution of this body thus—instead of the words, "or by a council appointed for that purpose by the church or society over which he is to be ordained," to read, "or by the authority of a standing Committee on fellowship and ordination to be annually appointed by this body; and said Committee shall have power to grant letters of fellowship during the recess of this body, and shall annually report their proceedings to this body for their acceptance or rejection." (The whole article now reads thus:—"Any person, in order to receive the fellowship of this Association as a preacher of the Gospel, must have preached in an acceptable manner six months, and must possess an unblemished moral character; and every preacher must have been an approved laborer in the ministry for six months after the reception of his letter of fellowship, before he can receive ordination, which may be conferred at the annual session of this body, or by the authority of a standing Committee on fellowship and ordination to be annually appointed by this body, and said Committee shall have power to grant letters of fellowship during the recess of this body, and shall annually report their proceedings to this body for their acceptance or rejection.") Appointed Brs. P. Morse, H. Van Campen, and T. A. Granger, standing Committee on fellowship and ordination.

Received and accepted the following report of the Committee of Discipline, viz:—Your Committee of Discipline for the past year, report, that no new case of difficulty has been presented to, or acted upon by them; but your Committee's report of 1841 embraced two cases of difficulty, one, viz: that of Br. Wm. Martin, was disposed of last year, by the dissolution of his connexion with this body. The other, viz: that of Br. W. H. Waggoner, we are sorry to be obliged to say, has been received since the Committee's report in 1841, by the extraordinary conduct of the accused, and has unfortunately not since been disposed of in any rational way, not even as a whole, investigated at all. If Br. Waggoner had abided by his confession, or had not renewed his offences, all would have been well. But such was his conduct, that your Committee felt bound to furnish the facts of the case to be presented to the Committee of Discipline of the St. Lawrence Association last year, and which were presented by Br. Briggs. But that Committee declined acting upon all the charges—and that Association not consenting to an examination of the evidences, &c., an appeal was then made to our State Convention, which failed to secure an investigation of Br. Waggoner's case, on account of an informality in the manner of presenting the charge to that body—that is, because the charge was presented, not by an Association or by the Committee of an Association, but by an individual. Inasmuch, therefore, as this unpleasant affair has remained for years without an investigation, and has been the occasion of increasing fruits of bitterness and disunion; your Committee now present the complaint and testimony in this case, which has been presented by one of their number to the State Convention, to be disposed of according to your wisdom.

Adopted the report of the Standing Clerk in relation to funds for the expenses of delegates to the State Convention.

Appointed Brs. H. Boughton and P. Morse (ministerial,) and T. A. Granger and R. D. Murray, (lay) delegates to the State Convention in May 1844, with power to appoint substitutes or fill vacancies. Appointed Brs. H. Boughton, O. Wilcox and P. Morse, Committee of discipline for the ensuing year. Recess till Thursday morning.

Met in council; prayer by Br. Wilcox. Voted that the Standing Clerk appoint Conferences according to requests and at his discretion. Voted that our preachers solicit collections to defray the expenses of delegates to the next State Convention, and forward the same to the Standing Clerk before the first of May next, to be paid by him to the several delegates, before, or at the time of the Convention. Accepted the report of the Standing Clerk in relation to returns of monies, etc., received for our afflicted and excellent Br. C. B. Brown. Voted that our ministers and friends continue their exertions in favor of Br. Brown, as his necessities may require. Voted that the Clerks of all our societies be requested to furnish full and immediate statistical accounts of their respective societies to Br. Morse, the Standing Clerk of this Association, that the condition of our whole body may be distinctly known. Appointed Br. H. Boughton to preach the next occasional sermon with power to appoint a substitute. Voted that when this Association adjourn, it shall adjourn to meet at Mexico village on the third Wednesday and following Thursday in June, 1844. Voted that no member of this council be allowed to speak more than ten minutes at any one time—nor more than twice on the same question till all others have had the opportunity to speak.

The papers referred to in the report of the Committee of Discipline, having been read before the council, and the subject duly examined and discussed, the following preamble and resolution were adopted.

Whereas Christianity, and the principles upon which our social organization rest, require an unblemished moral character in a minister of the Gospel—and whereas our Committee of Discipline has heretofore been subjected to reproach for their faithful discharge of duty, especially in the case of Br.

W. H. Waggoner, while the proceedings of that Committee have been sanctioned by this body, which is bound to protect its officers in the discharge of their imperative duties—and whereas there appears to be abundant evidence to believe that said Waggoner has been guilty of falsehood and unchristian conduct since his written acknowledgment made in Feb. 1841, of a criminal or an unjustifiable attack upon our Committee of Discipline—and whereas more mischief, dissension and bitterness have resulted to this body from his misconduct, than from all other causes combined since the organization of this Association in 1823—and whereas complaints were presented last year against said Waggoner to the Committee of Discipline of the St. Lawrence Association, a part of which complaints only were acted upon by that Committee—and whereas the council of that Association refused to hear the evidence in his case—and whereas an appeal has been made to the N. Y. State Convention of Universalists, whose special Committee on this subject decided that the 4th article of the Constitution of said Convention, excluded the consideration of the facts in the case of said Waggoner, and confined their examination to the proceedings of the St. Lawrence Association, because the charge was made to that Convention by an individual and not by an Association—and whereas the charge against the St. Lawrence Association was with reference to their proceedings in the case of said Waggoner; and was withdrawn because the main design was to obtain a hearing and decision in Br. Waggoner's case—and whereas strenuous efforts have been made to put off or elude an investigation of said Waggoner's case; which investigation seems to be demanded by the rules of the Gospel and the interests of our denomination—and whereas this body feels bound to respect the laws of social order, secure a full investigation of this case before the constituted tribunals of our denomination; and equitably terminate this discreditable difficulty. Therefore, Resolved, that our Committee of Discipline be instructed to present the facts and testimony in the case of Br. W. H. Waggoner to our delegation to the next State Convention, and that said delegation present the same charges and testimony to the Committee of Correspondence of said Convention, which were presented last year by Br. Morse, (first giving Br. Waggoner three months from this date—June 22, 1843, to settle the affair with our Committee of Discipline) and that said delegation be also instructed to use their best exertions to obtain a fair hearing and an equitable decision by the Convention in the case of said Waggoner.

The Committee on fellowship and ordination reported in favor of granting a letter of fellowship to Br. J. Averill—and ordination to Br. G. S. Recess for public worship. Adjourned.

P. MORSE, Moderator.

G. S. ABBOTT, } Clerks.
J. S. KIBBE, }

Sermons were preached by Brs. French, Van Campen, Skinner, Abbott, Douglass, Kibbe and Morse.

Delegates present.—Henderson, L. M. Hawes, H. Bates; Ellisburgh, D. Stearns, R. Cheever; Mexico, B. Thayer, F. Davis; Sandy Creek, N. W. Noyes, P. T. Titus; South Champion, R. D. Murray; Champion, T. A. Granger; Watertown, W. Patridge, J. M. Clark; Dexter, H. Pomeroy; Fulton, C. Case.

Ministers present.—J. French, O. Wilcox, P. Morse, S. Jones, W. Sias, H. Boughton, C. G. Person, G. S. Abbott, J. Averill, J. Sax, H. Van Campen, J. S. Kibbe, J. Douglass, and W. Skinner, of Vermont.

REMARKS.—It pleased the bountiful Parent of the universe to grant us an overflowing cup of spiritual blessing at this annual feast of fat things pertaining to the holy kingdom of his grace. The weather was fine—the singing and preaching truly acceptable to the constantly increasing crowd of worshippers—the hospitality of our friends at the place of meeting was bountiful—the presence of the Lord was most sensibly felt—the tear of love and gratitude beamed from many an eye—integrity, independence, and good will were universally exhibited in our council—and no discord disturbed our deliberations except what grew out of a deficiency of light (and all men act by the light they have, rather than by that which they have not) and which was certainly removed by the light of truth—and we saw and felt how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity. We admit the vast importance of knowledge and virtue; therefore we labor to extend the light of truth and vindicate its everlasting claims upon rational beings. It has long been proverbial that ignorance is the parent of vice; hence he who contends for any thing in the darkness of ignorance, may ultimately find to his own disadvantage, that like an ancient brave knight, he has been fighting “wind mills.” God has established an unalterable distinction between good and evil; and it is worse than useless for vain mortals to disregard this distinction. “Wo unto them that call evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light, and light for darkness: that put bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter.” Let the doctrine that, there is little or no difference whether mankind do right or wrong prevail any where, and ruin will ensue. Man must learn to listen to the voice of God with a disposition to obey his requirements; and Christians are bound to walk as children of light and love. A judicious organization, with a full determination to regard it, accompanied with good will to all mankind, are indispensable to the well being of associate Christians. If a denomination of professing Christians can find no way to bring an offender (and offences must and will come) to justice, nor even to trial; but must allow him, like the scuttleship, effectually to hide in the darkness he creates, while they as a religious body endorse his character before the world, their bond of union becomes a rope of sand; and their pretensions to the promotion of righteousness, like the perishable hope of the hypocrite. But charity, heaven-born charity, which is greater than all faith, is the special ornament of the Christian character, and is destined to reign in fadeless bloom and glory—when prophecies shall fail, tongues cease, and all earth-born knowledge vanish away—must not be forgotten: no, nor should it be prevented, till its form is lost and its very nature changed. Charity is ever lovely in its exercise, and eternal in its nature and operation; but it is by no means blind: nor does it ever require or allow us to abolish or disregard the immutable difference between good and evil—truth and falsehood. When a tower has leaned so much as to tumble down, it is no longer a tower. When parental kindness degenerates into unrestrained indulgence, to the lasting injury and disgrace of the child, it becomes parental cruelty. Any attempt “to strengthen the hands of the wicked,” or prevent the exercise of justice, should never be dignified with the name of charity it should be ascribed to its true cause—human weakness. Let us, my Christian friends, not be weary in well doing—and may the divine blessing ever rest upon us and all people.

REMARKS.—Truly this was a “season of refreshing from the presence of the Lord.” We had fair weather, good singing, and first rate preaching; which was listened to by a multitude of devout and pious hearers. The Council met with the best of feelings, and separated in the kindest manner. The brethren at Fly Creek understood how to make provision for a crowd, to whom they dealt out their bounties with unsparing hands.—Their doors like their hearts were to open to receive us. They exerted themselves to make every one happy. Above all, the “author of every good and perfect gift,” vouchsafed us a refreshing shower of heavenly grace: and caused the light of his reconciled countenance to shine upon us. We enjoyed a rich Gospel feast—the feast of love. The wavering were confirmed, the frail were strengthened, and the weak animated; every soul was made glad; many declared that they never enjoyed a better meeting before, because they there found Him of "whom Moses and the prophets did write, the son of Joseph." Let us pray, then, for the prosperity of our Zion; "that God who hath loved us, and given us good hopes through grace, would comfort our hearts, strengthen our hands, and establish us all in every good word and work,"—that the word of his Gospel may run to and fro and have "free course and be glorified"—that willing converts may be added to the church which his right hand hath planted, like drops of evening dew—that he would take up his abode in our hearts; and hasten the time when the "stone cut out of the mountain" shall fill the whole earth—when "peace shall be within our borders, and prosperity within our walls"—yea "when his saving health shall be known among all nations." So mote it be.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JULY 14, 1843.

LOVE OF MAN AND GOD.

"If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?"

The celebrated Pestalozzi, the founder of a new and much admired system of education, and distinguished for his unwearied and self-sacrificing philanthropy, has furnished us with a beautiful illustration of our text, which I shall take the liberty of quoting. "How does the idea of the divine Being arise in my soul? Whence is it that I believe in God—that I throw myself into his arms—that to love Him, to confide in him, to thank and obey him, is infinite bliss to my heart? I find that the feelings of love, confidence and gratitude, and the habit of obedience, require to be developed in man, before they can be directed to the divine Being as their object. I must love men, confide in men, be grateful to men, and obey men, before I can cherish the same feelings, and practice the same virtues toward God."

After some further remarks, he adds—"All these virtues originate in the relationship established between the infant and its mother. The mother is impelled, as it were, by instinct, to nurse and foster her child, to afford him shelter and happiness. She satisfies all his wants—she removes from him all that is unpleasant to him—she assists his helplessness; the child is provided for, and happy; the seed of love begins to be unfolded. A new object strikes his senses—he is astonished, afraid—he cries; the mother presses him more fondly to her bosom—she plays with him, amuses him—he ceases from crying—but the tears remain in his eyes. The object reappears—the mother throws round him again her protecting arms, and comforts him with a smile—he cries no longer; his bright, unclouded little eye answers his mother's smile: the seed of confidence has taken root in his soul. The mother runs to his cradle whenever he has any want; she is there in the hour of hunger; at her breast his cravings are hushed—when he hears her step approaching, his whinings cease—when he sees her, he stretches out his little arms—while hanging at her bosom, his eye beams with satisfaction—mother and satisfaction are to him but one idea—it is that of gratitude. The germs of love, confidence and gratitude grow rapidly. His ear listens to the mother's footstep; his eye follows her shadow with a smile; he loves whoever resembles her; a being that resembles his mother is, in his idea, a kind being. He beholds the form of his mother, the human form, with delight—whoever is dear to his mother is dear to him—he embraces whomever she embraces, kisses whomever she kisses: the love of mankind, brotherly love, springs up in his heart."

Thus far the testimony of that great and good man, who himself became as a little child, that he might the better instruct little children—and who, from the stores of his own abundant experience; as well as from a life spent in observing the development of infant capacities of affection and thought, so clearly traces self-love up into universal benevolence and affection—the exercise of which is so necessary a precedent to the love for God himself. And though we may not exactly agree with Pestalozzi in the minute details—their order and origin—of the human affections—nor yet their absolute identity with the same affections toward God—yet it is easy to perceive that what causes man to love his fellow, will cause him to love his heavenly Father. Let him but learn the all-affecting truth that God is a far better parent than the tenderest mother—that all the affection he loves in his mother—all the goodness he admires in man—is but the gift of the great Fountain of all Love and Goodness, and he will love God as well as man.—But "he that loveth not his brother, whom he hath seen"—whose affection, whose goodness, he hath experienced—who is the object of God's unchanging love—"how can he love God whom he hath not seen?" Such is the inquiry of our text; and in answer to it shall be our remarks in this article.

So prominent a requisite is the love of mankind in the divine economy, that even under the Mosaic law, it was commanded—"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." But the narrow and wicked minded Jews contrived a way to elude the command, and to construe it into a permission to hate those of their neighbors whom they were pleased to term their enemies.

And in our own day, we find those whose hearts prompt the questions—"Who is my neighbor? Who is my brother?" in order to find some way of confining their affections to but a portion of our race. Blessed be Jesus, who has prevented the possibility of evading his precepts by a quibble, in that he has commanded us to love our enemies—thus including all men, without exception, as the objects of our love. We all have but one father—even God—hence all men, without exception, are our brethren. But what, in man's nature, are we to love?

We are not to fix our hearts on evil and unloveliness. By no means! But we are to love man—our brother. Look, then, at the unfathomable, and sublime powers inherent in man, by which, when cultivated, his intellect may grasp the universe, travel from system to system, subject nature's elements to his control, call life from death, people space with its creations, converse with all ages—anticipate the future, read the history of creation in the changes of the globe, follow the comet in its wanderings, live through eternity, and approach with filial reverence in eternal approximation to the Deity. Look at man's moral capacities, which being filled with the fulness of the Gospel become a partaker of the divine nature, an image of God, and the practising child of heaven. Surely these qualities of man—this, his true nature—should excite admiration and love! They are ours—they are our brother's—all, we, have this same nature—all are children of God, and the destined inheritors of boundless and immortal holiness and bliss.

Now if we can love these—and we must love them, for they are our own nature—we can love our brother. And if we love these, we must love God—for what these are finitely or derivatively in man, they are infinitely, or inherently in God.

But there is another view of man, in which we must love him, before we can truly love God. Look at this noble creature before his intellectual capacities are filled with knowledge. How blinded—how ignorant! Oh, who but must pity such an empty void! Look at his uncultivated moral powers—what an Eden despoiled of its beauty! Who but must ardently desire that it be filled with loveliness and light—with blossoming and fruitfulness! Man's dependence and wants—who does not long to aid and supply them! Every consideration of what man is, when ignorant, erring, frail and needy, fills the benevolent and holy soul with deepest pity and compassion—such as led Jesus to die for us, and God to at-test his love for sinners.

Do you feel these emotions? Then are you prepared to realize what angels, Jesus and God feel toward you in your best earthly estate;—for what ignorant and sinful man is to you, are you, with all your wisdom and all your piety, to our Father and our God. And those feelings of benevolence, mercy and goodness, which bind us so closely to our fellow being as to make, as it were, even his weaknesses and his wants our own—and which elevate us to the height of pure spiritual goodness—those feelings that in us are but finite, in God are endless and boundless. They constitute his very nature, and exist with his very existence. He who can not feel them toward his fellow being, can not know their loveliness and beauty; and can not therefore, adore and love them as they exist in their infinite Fountain, our Father who is in heaven.

In view of these undeniable positions, how clear—how irrefutable is the declaration of our text! "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?"

If our views of the subject are correct, and the text may be relied upon, it will necessarily follow—that we are to love, in God, the substance of which man's goodness is but the shadow—the original, of which all man's exalted intellect and moral powers are but the small miniature. Our compassion and kindness to the children of want and misery—of vice and folly—which render us so blissful and godlike, are small trickling rills flowing from the exhaustless ocean of his endless love to the same miserable objects. And it follows, that by tracing these faint resemblances up to the great Original, and by following these minute streams up to their infinite Fountain, we are led to love the Creator in man, and man in his heavenly Father. Loving our brother in all wherein he resembles God, we love God the more fervently and deeply, the more we perceive how infinitely greater are his perfections than those he has imparted to his creature and offspring. The love of the divinity is the love of all that is great and good in humanity, but exalted to infinity, and freed from all earthliness and imperfection.

In this there is a wise adaptation to human imperfection and weakness. None of us can comprehend infinity, or by searching, find out the Almighty to perfection. Hence to ask us, at once, to love infinite loveliness, before we have attained to any knowledge of finite loveliness, would overpower, confuse, and paralyze our affections. As well might we ask a child to read, before it had learned its letters—or to calculate an eclipse ere it had learned to count its fingers. But by leading us to discern the loveliness of finite beings around us—to admire and rejoice in our own finite goodness as it is developed and grows up within us—we can be led forward and upward, to comprehend one degree of love above another, until we can form a faint but transcendently happy idea of infinite goodness, and to call the Being, of which that universal goodness is an embodiment, our Father and our God.

SALVATION.

It is a matter of anxious inquiry with many, how it can be, that those who live and die hardened and impenitent, can be saved—that if the Gospel can not reach them in this state, and subdue the heart in its kindness, how they can be reached and subdued in the world to come. And there are those, who, because they can not see how the sinner can be cleansed of his pollution in the future state, are resting in a belief which is in direct contradiction to every good desire of their hearts, which crushes every hope, and makes "life itself a cruel bitter." It is not enough for them that God has promised to bless all in turning every one away from his iniquity—it is not enough that he has bound himself by an oath to fulfil his promise—it is not enough that he has purposed in his immutability to gather the whole human race to himself, and link them together in love, as one body—they must know how, and by what means all this will be effected and brought about, or they can not believe. Now this is asking for more than is revealed, and more than any individual has properly a right to ask. All we can know is, that, in accordance with his promise, and oath, and purpose, and will, and pleasure, God, in his own time, and in his own way, will change every vile heart, and bring every wanderer home.

It is not for us to say, because we can not see how God will bring about a certain event, that it will never come to pass. People once thought and believed that there was no hope for the drunkard—that there was no influence or power that could reach him in the depth of his degradation. The poor, fallen man was abandoned, because people could not see how he could be lifted up from the bottom of infamy, and restored in the pride and dignity of manhood to his proper station in society.—And yet they were not to blame. There was a deep darkness resting upon this subject, through which no human eye could penetrate. But when God says, "Let there be light!" there is light. When he said, Let the drunkard be reformed! his voice reached a few down-trodden and miserable men, whom intemperance had stripped of hope and character, and the Pledge was drawn and signed; and from that moment a mighty reformation was in movement, bearing upon its front the impress of God, and carrying light and life where darkness and death long had reigned. So when the Almighty says, "Let the reign of sin be finished! Let death be swallowed up in victory! Let the wandering come back! Let tears be wiped away! Let my love triumph!"—that voice will be heard and answered, and the plans and purposes of God be consummated in the salvation of a world. We can not tell when all this will be—we can not tell how it will be; but this we do know through the word of truth, that the principle of love which constitutes the nature of God, will at last, in the right time, and in a right manner, root out every opposing principle—purify every heart—bind man to man, and each man and all men to God; thus fulfilling what the prophets have spoken—what the Father has willed and purposed—what the Saviour came to do, and what the Christian hopes and prays to be true. A. C. B.

BAPTISM.—The extract from a sermon on this subject, sent us by Br. Lee, and contained in this paper, is worth perusing by all. It breathes the right feeling—to meet such a truly Universalist spirit, my soul reaches out both her hands across many waters. And it is only when I meet with this spirit, that I almost feel a half-way regret that I can not coincide with all the opinions of my brethren and unite in their ceremonies—while the opposite feeling, when manifested by those who are tenacious for formal outward signs, can not but make a man thank God that he has nothing to do with a tree bearing such fruits! We thank Br. Lee much for his article—it is evidence needed at this time, that there are some who advocate baptism among us, who retain the spirit of Christ—that we have brethren from whom we can differ in opinions and ceremonies, while we agree in feelings of fraternal love to each other. A. B. G.

We refer our subscribers to the short article headed "Inducements to Subscribers." We make that offer to let them know that we really need the small sum of money due us, to make up large ones due from us, and which we soon have to pay. Also, that we are willing to sacrifice something for their good, if it will induce them to do justice to themselves, for our benefit.

INDUCEMENTS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

All of our subscribers who have not paid for the present volume, by sending us two dollars, free of postage, shall be credited in full for this year and be entitled to the first and second numbers of the Theological Library. The first number contains Winchester's Dialogues complete, and is sold in book form at 62 1/2 cents. The second is Petitpierre on Divine Goodness. The first we have on hand, the second we expect to receive soon.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

In reply to several letters, I would state that I conceive it my duty to publish any communications that are sent me officially as the proceedings of one of our regularly constituted ecclesiastical bodies, as a church or society, an Association, or a Convention. It is not my place to sit in judgment, and re-judge their doings, and refuse to publish what they have ordered published.—As an individual, I may dissent from them, and deplore their wrong doing, and labor to procure the reversal o their acts; but as an Editor, my duty is to publish what they send me, and to throw the responsibility on them alone. Should individuals dissent from them, like myself they have that right, and must seek their remedy by applying to the proper tribunals for redress and correction. But as I have not allowed individuals, heretofore, to make use of our columns to attack an Association while there was any other way open, I shall not do it now. In plain terms, I can not and I will not open these columns to a discussion of personal matters by individuals with individuals, nor by individuals against an ecclesiastical body. I have looked this subject in the face long enough to understand my duty; and have felt the peace of right-doing, and the ultimate triumph of proper motives over all misunderstandings and misrepresentations, long enough and often enough, to do my duty. Last year I was deemed wrong in my course by one side—this year it is possible that the wind may change; but, brethren, my course is the same! I trust I am understood. A. B. G.

From the Christian Warrior.

BR. GROSH IN AMAZEMENT!

In the last number of the "Magazine and Advocate," Br. Grosh copies from the "Warrior" the short paragraph I wrote, in which, as I then stated, without even asking the permission of Mrs. T. B. Thayer and A. B. Grosh, I returned my most sincere thanks to my "good friends" who had bestowed upon me so many marks of confidence and affection. Br. "A. B. G.," laboring under the false impression that I intended the article for himself, and "T. B. T.," is exceedingly puzzled to know what it means—and calls on me to tell him plainly what was the intent of the article. This I now proceed to do. And—

1. "A. B. G.," in connection with "T. B. T.," said so much upon the supposed impropriety of publishing "cards of thanks," that I was forced to the conclusion that it might be deemed a violation of editorial courtesy to publish an editorial card of thanks, without first asking their permission—but I had received from my Richmond friends so many tokens of kindness and affection, that I was constrained to thank the donors publicly, without first asking either "A. B. G." or "T. B. T.," to grant me the liberty to do so.

2. The term "good friends," the propriety of which "A. B. G." could not find out, was not intended for "A. B. G." and "T. B. T.," but for the persons from whom I had received the many favors: And I am astonished that a man of "A. B. G.'s" cleverness, did not immediately conclude, that, inasmuch as he had exhibited towards me no particular feeling of friendship, the reference was not made to him—for although I might possibly admit that "A. B. G." and "T. B. T.," are my friends, the idea never entered into my mind, that they are my "good friends." Dost thou understand me, this time, brother? If not, signify it, and I will make the effort to be more plain and pointed: Perhaps the article of thine to which I now have replied, was written for your own amusement, to exhibit the pertness with which you sometimes attempt to weed your neighbor's garden! Is it so? D. D. S.

REPLY.

No, Br. Smith, it is not so—but so—that is to say, it is as I about half-suspected. The truth is about one half of our Editors, about one half of the time, do make such abominably careless blunders and mistakes about facts and other plain things, that it is a little more than the other half can do in half their time to make straight what has been thus crooked about. Among these blunders Br. Drew, Professor of ps and qs and Corrector General, stands about "A, No. 1;" and we are now obliged to put Br. D. D. Smith into the same list of blunderers. For instance:—

1. Where will Br. Smith find a line of my writing on "the supposed impropriety of publishing cards of thanks," except what I wrote in reply to Br. Thayer's proposal against the practice, after it had been endorsed by Br. D. D. Smith himself?

2. Does not Br. Smith remember that I, for publishing two cards of my own, and one or two for my brethren, was linked with Br. Drew, by Br. Thayer, as one notoriously guilty of that "supposed impropriety," and was named as one of the Editors of that card-of-thanks paper? Surely, Br. Smith, you can not forget that you endorsed Br. Thayer's proposals for the paper, and his nomination of me as its Editor; and that I declined the nomination in your favor, inasmuch as you excelled even Br. Drew and myself unitedly, in the number of cards you published! Do you not remember it? I am sure our readers do, if you will but name it for them.

3. And now, finally, will you be so candid, and frank, and generous, as to inform your readers that my thick-headedness was all owing to your mistake in this matter—that I and Br. Thayer were not in "connection" in opposing cards of thanks—that unlike yourself I was all on one side of the fence in that business? If you will do me this act of justice, I will consider you sufficiently plain for the present, whether my remarks are pertinent or impertinent, and whether your garden needs weeding or not. A. B. G.

DEATHS.

In Stockbridge, May 17th, Mrs. ELECTA A. CURTIS, wife of Br. Seymour Curtis, aged 29 years and 11 months. In the death of Sister Curtis we have another example of the power of Universalism to support the living and dying in their afflictions. It was to her a source from which she could draw abundant pleasure, in reflecting that God had provided a better state of existence, where a world of intelligences shall meet to enjoy the favor of our heavenly Father. Her sickness was long and painful—yet she murmured not; trusting in her God she would often say, "I found the doctrine good in health—it supplied every spiritual want; but I find it far better now." Once after speaking to me in reference to the duties of Universalists, she said, "I thought that I was about as happy as I could be when I could attend meeting; but I find that it was but a foretaste of what I feel now. My faith grows stronger and stronger, and all I want is patience to wait until God shall see fit to take me home." And she did wait with patience for many months, giving testimony to the most superstitious, that a firm confidence in God, and faith in Christ as the Saviour of the world, are enough to prepare the soul for its entrance into the immortal world. She died leaving to her husband and friends, the evidence that to live right is peace, and that to die in the triumphs of the Gospel faith, is pleasant. And may He who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb, give peace to the afflicted, faith to the doubting, and hope to the sorrowing. D. S. MORREY.

In Augusta, May 17th, of scarlet fever, JOSEPH C., only son of Polly Root, aged 6 years and 7 months. Thus the fondest hopes of a tender mother, and the strongest ties of an earthly nature, are broken. P. B. A.

At Henderson, Knox county, Ills., January 12th, 1843, after a protracted illness of three years, Miss SUSANNAH, daughter of Stephen and Sarah Hitchcock, aged 15 years and 7 months.

HOPE.

BY J. SHERIDAN KNOWLES, ESQ.

Hope! ready promiser, unsure performer;
 Unequal architect, that builds the mole,
 Which breaks the mountain billows into spray;
 Or fabrics fragile, as the gossamers,
 That come and vanish with the dews of morn;
 Bitter betrayer yet sweet counsellor,
 Voucher, believed, with thousand broken oaths!
 Friend false, yet, with a fair face, trusted still—
 Why do I listen to thee? Joyful dream,
 That turns oft, on waking, blank despair,
 Why do I trust thy visions, and dream on,
 Grasping the good I never may enjoy?
 Yet thou art blest so far—the naked wretch Goes clad by thee, the while—the hungry feasts!
 The wo-begone forget their tears and smile!
 The better part of being is fill'd up
 With solace by thee, and the load, that else
 Would break the back, is borne with patience still!
 Thou art the anodyne which lulls the pang,
 That should not chide thee, tho' it wake again!
 The stimulant which breaks the lethargy,
 Which, tho' it close on us again, thou robbst
 Of so much being, else were swallow'd up!
 Thou art a good, altho' a doubtful one,
 And, wanting thee, this fiftful course of life
 Were never half run through. I'll deal with thee!
 But yet, with question; so, by thy default
 I suffer less, and if thou keep'st thy word,
 Lose nothing of the gain thou promisest!

TALES OF THE PASSING WINDS.....NO. III.

BY MRS. S. ELIZA GIBSON.

THE SHIP WRECK.

It was a gloomy evening hour, when the bearer of dread tidings approached. Dark and portentous clouds, which shut out even the faint glimmering of stars, and a hollow deep toned voice from a distant forest, had foretold its coming, and now that it was near, bearing on its wings the roar of the raging ocean, the towering sons of the forest bowed submission to its power, and tossed back their branching arms to widen its pathway. And yet, though all so stern and haughty, I would listen to its fearful message.

"I bear tidings," it said, "of disasters, ship-wreck, and death—of disappointments too, and anguish, and despair! Two brothers, young and brave, the only sons of a widowed mother, were returning from across the sea with treasures gained in other lands, to diffuse peace and happiness around the hearth of the lonely and long neglected one. But black clouds gathered above their heads—fierce lightnings flashed; and thunders, which sounded to their frightened ears, as though they came up from the horrid abyss, reverberated from every quarter. Closely they neared each other, and trembling beneath the angry frown which bent on them from above, they cast anxious glances upon the dreadful space between themselves and the waiting mother."

"But thicker and faster the dangers gathered around them. The ocean, lashed into fury, at one moment carried the unresisting vessel to a fearful height, and at the next, precipitating it to a more fearful depth, threatened to engulf them. Masts were torn from their upright stations, and hurled headlong into the deep, and the once proud vessel rent with frightful seams, drank in deep draughts of the briny waters! Shrieks, and cries, and burning words of supplication mingled with the wild tumult of the raging elements, and yet no succor came! Another blast and the seams were wider rent—the dark wave oped wide its yawning chasm to receive the shattered barque—the brothers clasped their arms around each other's necks, and in that last and clinging embrace, sank down deep into the dreaded grave!

"A deep, whirling pool showed for a moment where they disappeared, and then I hastened to the childless widow's home. She trod the desolate rooms with disordered step, and as the frail tenement rocked to and fro, and she saw the threatening heavens, she paused in fearful agony, and wringing her hands in anguish, cried,

'O my sons! my sons!' Ah! she knew not that the loved ones were even then sleeping!"

This is a horrid and heart-rending tale—but reader, did you never fancy when the fierce winds told their might, and threatened destruction, that you listened to such recitals! Alas, the truth is often thus! When we are singing the glad song of safety, others are encountering dangers and death. Let us think of this, and with the song of safety, raise the hymn of thanksgiving.

RATTLESNAKES.

A physician, one of my intimate friends, passed a night in a state of great perplexity, of which the following account may give the reader some idea. He had, like me, entertained the desire of observing the particular ways of these terrible reptiles, kept in a cage, and succeeded in furnishing himself with four of them, of various sizes. For fear of some accident on account of the negligence of his negroes, he had placed the cage which enclosed them in a spacious room, which he made his bed-chamber. A negro was selected to feed and attend them. It was my friend's custom, on his return home, to take a glance at his animals, to assure himself of their being properly fed, and their cage door being well shut. One night, having come home very late and tired, he neglected this precaution and went to bed.—The weather was very hot, and, notwithstanding his state of fatigue, several hours glided away without his obtaining any sleep. He suddenly heard a light, sliding noise on the floor along the wall of the apartment, which left off very soon, and he ceased to give any more attention to the circumstance. After some moments, the same noise revived, and he then cautiously looked out of bed to ascertain what might be the cause of it. The moonlight shining full into the room, he observed the largest of the snakes [he had 18 rattles] roaming free along the floor. I leave the reader to imagine what were his impressions at this unexpected sight! What was he to do in this case? A loaded gun was hanging at the extremity of the room. How to reach it was the question. Farther: was this animal the only one out of the cage, or were all the others, too, at liberty? The whole of the servants were asleep. He resolved to wait for the morning; but first took the precaution of slowly and carefully drawing up his mosquito curtains around the bed; afterwards he sat down and patiently watched the issue. The animal continued to make some undulatory movements through the room; after which the Doctor heard him approach the bed, and at last all became silent.

At daylight, he heard the steps of a servant who was coming according to his custom to perform his morning duty. The Doctor cried out to him not to open the door, but to go for an old African negro, named Isaac, who was known to approach these reptiles without fear. The latter arrived, entered confidently, and saw the snake rolled up under the bed. The three others had remained in the cage, although the door was open—his first care was to shut it. My friend insisted on his shooting the snake. Isaac refused, and declared himself able to seize the animal, without the least fear of being bitten by him. In effect, he advanced to the bed, whistling softly with his lips, pronouncing some words in English in a caressing tone, and then, after some minutes, he ventured to pass his hand over the back of the snake, all the time trying to soothe him. Afterwards, lifting him gently by the head, while he continued to whistle, talk and soothe him, he induced the animal to place himself on his arm and body. The snake let the negro carry him thus through the chamber, without betraying either fright, or any offensive motion. The Doctor asked Isaac to replace the reptile in his cage—"oh master, this is impossible," says he; "if I attempt it, the snake would be angry and bite me—look." Indeed, scarcely did Isaac stop and lean towards the cage, before the animal began to move briskly and sound the rattle.

Isaac immediately got up, began again his soothing caresses, and the animal fell calm. He then asked for a strong sheet; by degrees accustomed the snake to the view of this object, and then passed one end of the edges out between his arm and the animal's body, continuing his wheedling and walking about all the time. As soon as he was certain that he could in a moment, envelop the animal in the sheet, he rapidly threw it around him, and thus was the snake mastered. All that remained now to be done was to reinstate him in a cage; of which the door was very small comparatively with the mass which formed the animal so wrapped up. Isaac displayed the same dexterity in unrolling the sheet that he had done before in all his interesting manœuvres. He succeeded, by a series of quick and skilful movements, in getting him back to his old quarters, without receiving the slightest injury, shut the cage, and thus my friend's unpleasant affair terminated. The negro, however, said, if a similar affair happened again with the same snake, he could never venture to approach him for fear of being bitten, because he had in this manner deceived him.

These facts are of undoubted authenticity, since I had them from the mouth of my friend. But I confess that I do not know how to comprehend the perfect security of the old African, and still less perhaps the sagacity which he attributed to the snake. To be able to establish the fact necessary to found any serious discussion on this subject, it would be necessary to try the same manœuvres employed by the negro, to observe their effects, and afterwards attempt an explanation of them. This is a hazard which I certainly do not choose to risk.

There is an attribute peculiar to the hog, in relation to the rattlesnake, the mention of which will not, I trust, prove entirely uninteresting to the reader. On his approach, the latter seems terrified and tries to escape.—But the grunter pursues, seizes and devours him with the most absolute indifference of his rattle and his fangs. If it be a sow, accompanied by a litter of young ones, she even divides the prey amongst the little squeakers. It is also usual in certain localities where those reptiles abound, to drive forward a hog fastened to a leash to remove them from the places to be visited. The doctor questioned the negro if he had something about him belonging to this animal, or other substance equally efficacious in intimidating or appeasing the snake. Isaac directly replied that he did not employ any other means than the caresses which he had witnessed.

I will close these remarks with the relation of another adventure, which threatened in its effects, perhaps, to be still more terrible. A hunter of my acquaintance, used to amuse himself whenever he met some fine specimen of the rattlesnake, with endeavoring to catch him. This he was enabled to do by means of a long stick cleft at the end, with which he was accustomed to seize him by the back of the head.

One day, as he was posted at some distance from his friends, watching for his game, (deer,) he perceived one of these reptiles; he seized him in the above mentioned manner, and then, after having firmly placed his fingers behind its head, he diverted himself by opening his mouth, in order to examine his teeth and fangs. In the mean time the snake, quite unobserved by my friend, who was entirely absorbed in his inspection of the creature's head, had twisted his body in numerous folds round his arm. Little by little he was conscious of a pressure, accompanied by an alarming numbness in this member. He immediately endeavored to disengage his arm, but at the same time the pressure and numbness kept augmenting—he by degrees felt with horror that his fingers were losing all power of retaining their hold. At last the head of the animal began to slip away, gradually drawing near the palm of his hand, and the thoughtless hunter had just made up his mind to the horrible consequence of his imprudence, when his companion a the next post, alarmed by his cries for help, most opportunely arrived, hastily pulling out a little bottle of ammonia, and, uncorking it, poured its contents into the rattlesnake's mouth. Suddenly this frightful scene was completely changed; the animal unrolled himself, fell to the ground and was killed.

I will just mention, en passant, for the information of the uninitiated, that some hunters in these regions are accustomed to carry with them a bottle of this alkali, to provide against the chance of their dogs being bitten by the snakes.—[Southern Sportsman.]

RELIGIOUS VIEWS OF DEATH.

BY REV. E. H. CHAPIN.

"There the wicked cease from troubling; and there the weary be at rest." Job iii: 17.

A short time since I passed through the winding paths of Greenwood Cemetery. Around me lay the great City of the Dead, where nature and art seemed striving to strip death of its gloom, and to present the grave in the aspect which it wears to the true Christian—not so much the dreary charnel and the sepulchre of crumbling mortality, as it is the goal of earth's weary, changeful pilgrimage—the very gate-way to a bright, immortal heritage. Around me lay the City of the Dead—the earth was clothed in its resurrection garments, and the sunlight of heaven rested peacefully upon it.—Voiceless and silent were the sleepers there. No rude mirth, no boisterous revelry, no clack of labor, no groan of sorrow, jarred that serene stillness, where the green things that grew around the mansions of the dead seemed conscious of their sacred guardianship, and death kept, in silence and in beauty, his solemn mystery. Around me lay the City of the Dead—but not far was the great metropolis of the living, full to overflowing with the hurrying surges of life. A few steps further, and you might pass from the quiet of the tomb to the confusion of the clamorous Babel, where the great realities of existence, masked or unmasked, were that hour accomplishing their several destinies.—Here, the heart was still and cold; there, it throbbed with all the high ambition and all the longing aspirations that urge man to his plots and to his toils—there, glowing with success, or aching wearily with pain, it still beat on, as though there were no grave—as though, so real is life, death were indeed a shadowy thing, and you row of white and glistening tomb-stones, a picture or a show. And beyond, blended and lost in the far horizon, swept the sea, its waters glancing in the morning light, fit emblem of that eternity that encompasses alike the living and the dead—the sea, that mocks with its everlasting heaving the hopes and the labors and the life of man, and that shall roll there in its changeless being and its unfathomable sublimity when his very monuments have crumbled! Thus, life, death, eternity, the three great mysteries that encompass us, and in which we live, appeared before me by their appropriate emblems—the crowded city, the quiet tomb, the everlasting ocean.

It is a beautiful idea of the present day, to select the fairest spots of earth for the repose of the dead, and while avoiding every thing incongruous with the intrinsic solemnity of the tomb, to deprive it of that dreary horror which has been thrown around it. There are, doubtless, emblems peculiarly appropriate for the place of graves, and these are always of a reverent and subduing character—but they need not wear the aspect of gloom and terror. In the flowers, and the sunshine, and the green arches of the forest, there is no rude contrast with the shadow that has fallen on the brow of the dead, or with the grief that reigns in the mourner's heart. There is no rude contrast, yet there are consoling associations, that blend softly, that mingle sweetly with the memorials of the stern reality. They do not shock reverence, but they forbid horror; they do not conceal death, but they reveal its intimate harmony with all God's works—they exhibit it as part of the great plan that is going on under the control of Infinite Goodness, and they send up the green shoots of Spring, and wreath the flowers of Summer, in beautiful sympathy with those who have bowed to that great law of decline and decay that subdues all things—yet in their own calm cheerfulness they would teach us that this is not for a terrible but a beneficent purpose.

And if thus they harmonize with and explain the circumstance of death, they also kindly console the living. This is what the mourner needs. He does not want that which shall harrow still deeper his lacerated heart—he does not want that which shall add to his gloom by exhibiting death associated with every thing repugnant and stern; with the mouldering clod, and the dank grass, and the frightful revelations of the half-open charnel-house. He requires that which shall pacify and comfort, which shall sink into his heart with balmy healing and infuse a calm and holy trust. And the beautiful objects that cluster in our modern cemeteries are calculated to produce these results. No one can enter their green and silent paths without acquiring calmer and better ideas of death. They will check even the thoughtless and the young, and fasten the attention of the giddy soul upon the great fact with which it must come in contact. They will win to solemn reflection, they will penetrate by sweet influences the spirits that would have shrunk from the damp sepulchre and the dreary vault—they will sink with gentle monitions into their thoughts, and will be remembered with blessed efficacy amid the more dissonant and diverting scenes of the world. And the mourner's soul, though insensible to so many appeals, can not resist that which nature makes. Soothingly its teachings shall console his grief—kindly it shall win him to resignation—in the beauty with which it decorates death it shall suggest the great truth of immortality; and though it may melt to tenderness and tears, they shall not be wrong from the heart in pain, but fall in balmy drops that purify and heal.

The loveliness with which modern taste has enwreathed the grave, then, has in it nothing discordant with the dead who lie there, or the mourner who visits it with the offerings of affection. It is only discordant with those sterner views of dissolution which do not belong to Christianity. Why should we go behind that which we see, and conjure up all the stages of decay, and all the secrets of the closed vault, in order to make death disgusting and horrible? Why should we exhibit our idea of him as a skeleton form, which is only the result of natural causes that operate upon the inanimate and corruptible flesh? Why should we go behind that which is apparent to us, and search out that which God has kindly veiled from us, in order to make death more terrific? Death, so far as it is known to us, is cessation of life—a viewless messenger, that stills the pulse, stops the blood, closes the eye, and seals with dumbness the lips. A strange alteration comes over the loved and the familiar. Those who but now were communing with us, commune with us, visibly, no more; and that which saw, and felt, and responded, has gone—mysteriously gone! This is all we know of death, and sad as its visitations are, I know not that we should go beyond the hour when the form that was dear to us was laid in the grave, and rake up all the processes of change and decay that go on in the silent earth, hidden from mortal eyes. Our Gothic emblem of death—the skeleton and the dart—is not so Christian as that of the pagan Greek, who, in the graceful spirit that pervaded his mythology, represented him as a boy, weeping, with his torch reversed and dragging on the ground.

I said this idea of modern taste in regard to the burial-place, is accordant with the Christian view of death. It is that Christian view of death to which it is calculated to lead us. Let us, then, at this time, even as if we stood among the green and sunny graves—as though we were musing amid the silent Necropolis—let us attend to a few brief thoughts of death, which religion, in accordance with such a scene, may suggest to us.

And the first idea that may strike us, under such circumstances, is that of rest. "There the wicked cease from troubling; and there the weary be at rest." The calmness of nature is calculated to inspire this thought—the prevailing stillness suggests it. Yes, there, in those silent chambers, is rest—repose. I pause not now to discuss the point whether those who have lived here, actually remain inert for any length of time, after death. This involves a long and complicated argument, which is not in unison with the sentiment that I would at this time excite. But, in the first place, the idea of rest is suggested by the repose of the body, by its motionless stillness, so like to sleep—that rest which we gladly seek at the close of the tiresome day. Motionless, with eyes closed and hands folded, rests that tabernacle of the soul, whether the spirit that inhabited it rests with it or not—as though it had lain down to slumber until the blast of the resurrection trumpet. But, again, that there is rest is true in a higher sense.—There is rest from the burden of this life's toils, rest from the pursuit of this life's sins, rest from the weariness of this life's cares. A new sphere has been entered—a new course of action ordained—and from the earthly, as from that which has forever passed, the soul rests. The mortal strife is ended—the sins of mortal frailty are committed—the burden of all the grief that this pilgrimage inspires has been laid down at the doors of the grave. Life-long that labor may have been—those sins may have run on with the sands of every hour—that burden may have tightened around the heart at every advancing step; but when death came there was a release from all this—from all this there is now rest. So the tomb suggests repose—and it is a great truth.

There the wicked do cease from troubling; there the weary are at rest. How many clamorous passions are laid to sleep in yonder dust! How many visions of ambition hath the closing of those lids sealed up forever! What active energies lie prostrate and helpless here! What weary, footsore labor lies stretched out in breathless repose! "There the wicked cease from troubling; and there the weary be at rest." The old man lies there. Feebly did he drag out his latter days. His senses became faithless and betrayed their trust. The once flashing eye grew leaden and purblind. The once manly frame stooped until it doubled; the vigorous strength departed, feebly the wrinkled and palsied hand groped for its staff, the voice crackled and became an inarticulate hiss, the vivacity of intelligence wasted into more than childlike apathy, and not even the features of children and companions could call up a smile of recognition upon that withered face. The mechanism of the body had run down, and from its darkened casement the soul could no more look out, and in its inanimate enclosure it was like a thing of naught. But the old man has gone at last. His grey head lies low with the sleepers. How appropriate for him, the silence and peace of the tomb! "There the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary be at rest."

The young girl lies there. She drooped and faded like an early flower. Yet even at the heart of that flower the spoiler was at work. Years had been condensed into days, and the pangs of disappointment and the experience of earth's hypocrisy and sin had already shed their blighting there. Evil lay before her. The hope on which she leaned was broken. The dearest friends she knew had gone to their silent home. The shadow was upon her brow, and the pallor in her cheek. But peacefully she lies there now. There is no deceitful smile in heaven's sunshine—there is no hypocrisy in the tears of the summer-rain. It was well that heart should be stilled when it was. It was well that beauty should go down thus early to the tomb. Life would have been a dreariness—but “there, the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary be at rest.”

The man of ambition lies there. How beautifully the humble grass and the tender flower contrast with that rash and stormy life! How meekly they come to adorn his tomb, who, while living, never read a lesson from their humility—never paused to consider their instruction! Yes, the strong man is very still there, and the throbbing heart is strangely quiet. The dreams that thronged that brain have all vanished, and left that dome of thought tenantless, to moulder back to dust.—The fierce nature has all become spent—the tissue of schemes and efforts has ended abruptly here.—The chafed and foaming waves have suddenly sunk and become blended with the tranquil repose of the tomb. Let the flowers grow fearlessly above his head—let the sunshine linger upon the doors of his sepulchre. He, too, is at peace like them. No aspiring thoughts will visit him in the tomb—no giant passions rouse him from his sleep. “There the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary be at rest.”

The careworn mourner lies there. Strained were the chords of that poor, aching heart even to breaking asunder. Those hands were lame with toil, those eyes were dim with weeping. Sleepless were the nights, and gloomy the days of her who sleeps so pleasantly now. Did she not see the fair and the beloved die before her? Did she not watch by the bed-side of the departing child? Did she not grasp the feeble hand of the dying husband? Did she not see the common source of human happiness drying up and becoming choked with dust? Did she not behold sin early twining its hateful and treacherous coil around those to whom she looked for consolation and honor? Oh! who did not pity the suffering of that poor, weary soul—sufferings borne, perhaps, without murmurs, borne without any prayers for death—yet none the less deep and keen for all that. But release has come, and the tried heart is still. There was one shelter that God had appointed for the storm-beaten head—there was one place of repose for the drooping and shattered spirit. “There the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary be at rest.”

But time would immeasurably fail me to consider all the varieties of human action and passion that lie hushed and motionless there—it would immeasurably fail me to enumerate the sins and the sorrows from which the tomb has given release. All schemes, all toil, all cares, all interests, all thoughts that agitate the human soul, are there laid at rest. The waves of human life may surge by the doors of the tomb, but they can not enter it—there all is stillness and repose. And I ask you if this truth, which the teachings of nature in association with the burial-place so vividly suggests, is not, after all a blessed truth? Here is rest from earth's toils, and trials, and sins. Concerning this fact we can not be deceived. Our hopes may be blighted, our sorrows may deepen, our burdens may accumulate—but there is an end. Foot-worn pilgrim, there is an end! Toiler up life's rugged hill, press on with courage; there is an end! Sufferer from human wrong, there is an end! Is it a gloomy thought? Nay, even to you, most happy of men, is it a gloomy thought? In the midst of all thy joy, is there not weariness—in the round of all thy prosperity, is there not the truth that these are temporal and fleeting? Does the idea break in rudely upon you, oh young man!—man of health, and hopefulness, and many friends? It is all wisely ordained. Our reforms, our remedies, remove not one half the heart-sickness and the heart-evil there is in the world—but death removes them. There must be a cessation to pain and grief and toil—a cessation which even thou mightest rejoice in—for thou too mayest live to grow weary, at least to grow trustful and resigned. Rest! yes, there is a place of rest—a time when repose and silence close in around the sins, and the follies, and the cares that agitate and heave the bosom of human life.—To many—how many!

“Life is the torrid day,
Parched by the wind and sun;
And death the cool, calm evening hour,
When the weary day is done.”

But, again, a religious view of death, will suggest to us the reality of our own dissolution. Ask any man if he knows he must die, and he will be amazed at your question—amazed that you should inquire concerning such a universal and palpable fact. Let me ask any one of you—“Do you know that you must die?”—and you answer, of course, “Yes.” Yet, my friends, do we realize the fact of individual death? Do we realize that this heart that we can now feel beating, beating, in its curious frame-work, must become still forever? Do we realize that we too must lie, as we have seen others, with dim, glazed eyes, gasping, struggling, for breath?—that we, ourselves, must pass through this change? We know it. We know that it is not absolutely certain that you sun will rise to-morrow, yet it is certain that we must depart. Yet, life is now so intimate with us—we are in such close contact through our senses with this beautiful and animate nature—we hear so audibly the voices of our friends, we press so palpably their hands—we are so veritably in communion, a life with the great tide of life—can we realize an extinguishment and dissolution of these facts? And yet it must be so? No matter how busy we may be—there will come a call from our labors which we must obey—there will come a time when we must lay by the implements of our toil, and touch them no more forever. There will come a time when the light of the pleasant sun will fall upon our brows, and we shall know it not—when the fragrance of the air shall breathe into our nostrils and we be heedless—while with muffled step and suppressed whisper, they will gather about us and say—“he is dead!” One by one, the sign-boards in our streets shall be taken down, and men shall point to our names and say—“he is dead!” They shall come to our empty chair at home, to our vacant place at the board and the hearth, and say—“he is dead!” And by and by some friend will call up our memory to another, and he will reply, “Oh, ay, I remember—he died a long while ago!” And little children will prattle through the streets where we now tread, and will not know that we ever existed. And the flowers will bloom on, and the sunshine fall, and the tide of happiness and pleasure and care rush by—and we shall heed nothing of it—we shall be “where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary be at rest.” Solemnly yet beautifully has the poet said,

“Yet a few days, and thee
The all-beholding sun shall see no more
In all his course. Nor yet in the cold ground,
Where thy pale form was laid with many tears,
Nor in the embrace of ocean shall exist
Thy image. Earth, that nourished thee, shall claim Thy growth to be resolved to earth again.
And lost each human trace, surrendering up
Thine individual being, shalt thou go
To mix forever with the elements,
To be a brother to the insensible rock,
And to the sluggish clod, which the rude swain Turns with his share and treads upon.”

I ask again, Do we realize this? Do we make it an actual fact to our minds? Thy blood flows—it must stop! Thy heart beats—it must cease! Thine eye sees—it must become dim and dark! We should learn to realize these facts more than we do. It is not wise never to think of death—to put it by, as a subject too disagreeable to occupy our attention. We should reflect much upon it, and act in reference to it. And surely when we go abroad among the mansions of the dead, the thought must rush vividly upon us. Here are no distracting circumstances to draw us from it—every thing leads us to it, gently, yet earnestly, and we can look upon death amid the beautiful accompaniments of nature, with a steadier and calmer mind. And as nature exhibits death, so does religion. It is only a false view of death that makes it all gloom and terror. Our repugnance arises from lack of thought—more thought would correct it. If death is an ordinance connected with our lot, let us remember that it is, like all such ordinances—of God; and let us believe that the messenger that stills our hearts, and calls us from the associations of this life, is a messenger of the, very Beneficence that has ministered to every joy and made us glad with many mercies. This is the train of thought into which religion will lead us. While it will help us to realize the certainty of death, it will also help us to contemplate it with calmness and resignation, to strip it of its gloom, and to perceive its sober harmony with all God's works. Is it wise, then, to neglect this theme? We do not alter the fact thereby, though we may fail to realize it. Look yonder! There, “the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary be at rest.” Yet that life that has now ceased, was once like ours—vigorous and active. That mouldering dust was once animated with a soul, and the form that lies prostrate in the mansion of its rest, was once erect and busy amid a crowd, that like it, now are still. We tread in the foot-prints of the dead, our children shall tread in our foot-prints when we are dead. We must leave the path behind us in which we have trodden—we can not stay in it forever. Do we realize this? And yet, why should we view it through shades of gloom? True, there are mysteries connected with death—painful mysteries. It is hard to say the farewell-word, and to take by the hand the hand that has often pressed ours so fondly, and to feel that we are launched and they on the shore—that we are receding, fast receding. It is hard to take a death-look at the dear faces of those who depend upon us, whose very life is woven with our's, and whom we could strain to our hearts forever. This is the pang of death, that perhaps no philosophy can utterly assuage, and there are mysteries, too, in regard to many who are taken away. It is not always the wicked and the weary, but the useful, the happy, the young, the much-needed father, the only friend, the counsellor and support. Yet how shall faith be born without mysteries? Were all things apparently good, what merit in trusting God? Enough breaks in upon us to see his wisdom and his love, even in this the saddest dispensation—the dispensation of death. Shall we not, unfalteringly, trust him who can guide through its shadowy valley? Learn to look upon death in the light of God's character, and it shall be relieved of its gloom, and wear an aspect in accordance with that which modern taste has given to its outward circumstances.

But death! What is death? Is it the end? Oh Christ! thou speakest from the sepulchre—“No!” The spirit can not die! That which loves, and thinks, and communes with us, can not die. Death! is it not the gate-way to rarer glories? Its dark and noiseless surges bear us to the shores of a better land. Thou art here, oh! man, in a narrow sphere. But see yonder! There are worlds innumerable—they are golden ladders—steps of an immortal progress. What glories lie beyond us! What sights our eyes have never seen!—what sounds our ears have never heard. And to these death is the avenue. Lo! this changes the sound of wailing to a triumphant jubilee, and the gates of the tomb open like the wings of cherubim. Rest sweetly, oh! pale sleeper, in the light that Jesus has given. In that light death is a herald of immortality, and the tomb but a place of calm repose, “Where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary be at rest.”

But only the religious man can enjoy these views—only the religious man feels their efficacy. Is it not wise, with death all around us, such an undeniable fact, a fact that must come to us, too—is it not wise to acquire religious views of it, by living religious lives? I ask you, and the very doors of the tomb echo my question—is it not wise? oh!

“So live, that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan that moves
To that mysterious realm where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry-slave at night,
Scourged by his dungeon; but, sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave,
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.”

CONTEMPLATION.

BY REV. H. BELDING.

In the works of nature we behold the impress of an all-powerful hand. We can cast our eyes to no part of the universe, without being sensible, that there is, somewhere, an almighty Intelligence whose wisdom is unbounded, whose resources are unlimited. "The heavens declare his glory; and the firmament sheweth his handy work." We are not confined to our earth, as the sphere of our speculations. Travelling outward, we find indubitable evidence, even in the remotest star, that this same being has been there—there to create—there to show the evidences of his wisdom and power.

But leaving the contemplation of other worlds, and other systems, let us come directly to what more nearly concerns ourselves. We know that all that our eyes behold stand in some relation to him that spake them into being: and we, existing as we do, must stand in some relation to him also. Viewing things only through the medium of his works, that relation seems quite distant. We do not feel as though we were entirely forgotten by him; for the continuance of our existence assures us, that we are, in some measure, the objects of his care; but there is in us a disposition to consider ourselves as holding but a common place among his works; and hence must, of necessity, be well nigh lost amid their immensity.

By stopping here, and indulging our contemplations no farther, we should soon become a prey to gloom, doubt, and fear; but by catching a glimpse of his providences, by taking into consideration that wonderful provision that is daily, nay hourly, and even momentarily made—provision so ample, and so well adapted to our wants, we seem to approach comparatively near to our Creator.—A new relation is here brought to view; and we feel that so far from being overlooked, or forgotten, we are continually noticed by him, and supplied with every needed good.

Here then we stop, and enjoy ourselves in pleasing reflections. We know our own weakness and destitution; but, contemplating upon the power, the wisdom, and the munificence of him who is our Creator and Preserver, we seem lost in the vastness of the scene before us. That amazing fulness discovered in him, becomes measurably ours, in as much as it tends for our benefit, and is exerted in promoting our happiness.

But all this regards only the past and the present; and, without other light, the future would still present but a dark and dreary waste. The wheels of time must move on; and soon our present existence must be terminated. And what then? Is this all? Here we are; and without something to point us onward, here we must remain in the midst of uncertainties. This same kind Being, for the purpose of relieving us from this condition, was pleased to make a more perfect revelation of himself; and, in that revelation, we are made fully acquainted with that relation that exists between him and us. We gain a clearer view of his character, and attributes: and had we nothing farther, whence to infer his designs toward us in future, little doubt could remain.

But these his designs are not left to be inferred. They are stamped, in legible characters, upon the pages of inspiration. They assure us, that we are rapidly advancing toward the centre of all perfection; and that the time is coming, when man, universally, shall be pure as angels, clothed with immortality; and hence fitted for the highest enjoyment of which his nature is susceptible. Here then let us rest, satisfied with the blissful hope of a future, happy, immortal existence.

ORDINATION SERVICES.

Sermon Br. N. Stacy (John xxi: 16.) Ordaining prayer Br. E. Beals; charge and delivering of the Scriptures, L. Payne; right hand of fellowship Br. E. Beals.

REMARKS.

The weather was pleasant and we had a good, and we trust profitable meeting. Six preachers were present, viz: N. Stacy, E. Beals, L. Payne, E. Dayton, O. D. Wade and B. F. Hitchcock.—The Meeting House was filled to overflowing, and a more intelligent and devotional appearing assembly we have seldom if ever witnessed. Our friends in Randolph received us with all cordiality and welcomed us to their homes in such a manner as to give us a demonstration of the power of Universalism to open, refine, and expand the affections of the soul. May they never be weary in well doing; but continue to press forward in the good cause, increasing in numbers and in all those graces which will render numbers efficient in the upbuilding of "Zion, city of our God."

Brethren of the Lake Erie Association, allow me to call your attention particularly to the recommendations of your council in relation to Sabbath Schools and religious worship. There can be no doubt we think, in the minds of any that reflect upon this subject, that an increase of attention to the things, on the part of those who profess to be Universalists, would tend to the rapid and permanent establishment of the cause of truth and righteousness in our midst. Let those then who profess to love the doctrine of God's impartial and boundless grace, and would be consistent, take these things into consideration and act with an eye single to the glory of God in the upbuilding of his cause, and the happiness of his creatures. Finally brethren, go on and heaven bless your labors. May you enjoy many happy meetings on earth and ultimately be brought to meet all the nations, families and kindreds of the earth, in the General Convention above, to part no more forever.

TALES OF THE PASSING WINDS.....NO. IV.

BY MRS. S. ELIZA GIBSON.

FROM HOME.

Ah! with what pleasure did I greet the messenger, which came on one golden eve with tidings from home. Other breezes had whispered of Italian skies—of classic scenes, and pale artists, toiling in distant lands, apart from friends and home, to win the smiles of fame; and theirs were cherished words; but this wafted the warm breathings of friendship, and the sweet tones of enduring affection, and I would turn from all others to listen, to even its faintest murmurings.

"And wouldst thou then," it said, "learn of home's loved scenes? They are as tho' but a day instead of a year, had passed since the eve before thy departure.—The same carpet of living green is there as widely spread, and the trees clothed as then in the beautiful and variegated dress of pink, white and vernal hue, send forth the same fragrant perfume, and the same glad carol of birds. The sky, clear as then, reflects back the gorgeous dyes of the setting sun, and the same rose-bush beneath the window, is cherishing its buds for early blossom.

"But is it of home's inmates and friends that thou wouldst more gladly learn? They are there, the loved ones and dear, and she the dearest of them all, is in their midst—yea, in their midst, for they know that she is a mother, and they have gathered about her to win the maternal smile. Joy has many times beamed in her countenance, during thy absence—tears have often wet her cheek, and pains have sometimes called for a soothing hand; but health, and peace, and cheerfulness are shedding their smiles upon her, and upon the lovely group. With happy voices, they each recounted the incidents of the day—the sunshine which had illumed their pathways—the hopes which had promised future joys, and then with one consent, they spake of those whose places in their circle were left vacant. They numbered the weeks since their departure, and counted the days of their stay, and then spake of the joys which would accompany their return. Of thee too, they spake as one of that number, and of the pleasure which would attend thy coming, and then I kissed the cheek of each, and hastened hitherward to bear the tidings."

Reader, art thou far away from the home of thy love and the friends of early youth? If so, would not a message like this, even though it were interpreted only by the low and beguiling voice of fancy, make thee for a moment forget the regrets and repinings of the day; and would it not awaken all the joy and thankfulness of the heart, to feel that a home was yet open to receive thee, and a few at least of its friends, were even then anxious to welcome thy return? Ah, yes; feelings such as these could not but gladly greet its reception. Listen, then, to the low whisperings of the passing winds; for such tidings thou mayest sometimes hear, and sweeter tales and more precious than those which I have repeated, will oftentimes be rehearsed; and never, no, never, will their spirit-voices instil into thy heart, less ennobling emotions than love, gratitude, and devotion.

DEATH.

BY MISS M. E. TILLOTSON.

Although Death is the lot of all, and the theme of familiar converse; though his call is the consummation of earthly sorrow, and the dawn of eternal felicity, he still wears the same formidable aspect—still his approach is terrible to many, who reluctantly submit to his unyielding grasp! But why is it so? Is it because he has no respect to persons? Truly he has none—age and childhood; youth with flushing cheek, and expectation high; middle age with lion strength, and genius fired with emulation, are the daily subjects of his dread triumph! Wealth and fame are no obstacles to his approach; though man's possessions may extend from shore to shore—his hoards of wealth appear like massive mountains in human view; and his mental store-house overflow with erudition, he must relinquish all, and receive the pale visitant.

But why, we asked, does his approach bring terror; and why is the grasp submitted to with reluctance? It is not so much, that we are taken irrespective of circumstance and station, as, that there is fear: fear that he is not a messenger of peace to bear us to realms of bliss, but of vengeance to drag us down to regions of despair and anguish! Would that the fearful and unbelieving could contemplate with unprejudiced mind, the beauty and consistency of a love which casteth out fear, and a faith which maketh free. Then might the "king of terrors" haply be transformed into an angel of mercy.

Then might the "joyful anthem" rise,
Hosannas echo from the skies:
That love no sting in death shall leave,
That faith no victory in the grave!

The following named brethren appeared as delegates from their respective Societies: Wm. J. Ferris, Heman Olen, Perry; Moses Baker, A. C. Moore, Buffalo; J. Sprague, Jr., Alpheus Wait, Pavilion; Cyrus Pond, Alabama; S. Crane, Thomas Prentice, Aurora; Freeman Chapin, Stafford; Earl Kidder, Alexander; N. M. Jones, Wm. Andre, Boston; J. Hastings, Pembroke. The Alabama and Pembroke Societies, through their delegate, asked and received the fellowship of the Association.

Ministerial Delegates present—S. R. Smith, J. S. Flagler, S. A. Skeele, J. S. Brown, S. Remington, B. Hunt, J. Simpson, J. M. Day—8.

Ministers from other Associations—K. Townsend, N. Brown, W. J. Goss, J. M. Cook, G. S. Gowdy, S. Goff, E. W. Locke, J. Todd, A. B. Copeland—9.

The following resolutions were passed unanimously:

Resolved, That the respective Societies in this Association, be requested to report annually to this body its number of members, whether it owns a Church—what part of the time it has preaching—whether it has a Sunday School, and what number of pupils—together with such other information as may be deemed proper.

Whereas, The Rev. E. W. Locke, having for a season suspended his labors as a minister of the reconciliation, and whereas his present desires and views impel him again to devote himself to the work of the ministry, therefore Resolved, That having full confidence in the moral integrity and ability of Br. Locke, we approve of his determination.

Committee on Fellowship and Ordination, reported no application. Accepted.

Voted that the Committee on Fellowship and Ordination, consisting of J. S. Flagler, D. Ackley, and N. Reynolds, be re-appointed to serve another year.

Brs. S. R. Smith, J. Sprague, Jr., and W. J. Ferris, were appointed a Committee on Discipline to serve the coming year. Council then took a recess.

Thursday morning—Met at the appointed hour, and joined in prayer with Br. Goff.

Committee on Discipline reported no regular complaint. Passed the following resolutions:

1. Whereas, We have heard with regret of the indisposition of Br. Ackley, which has prevented him from attending upon our deliberations, and whereas, Br. Ackley was appointed to deliver before this Association, at its present session, a discourse on the subject of Sabbath Schools, therefore

Resolved, That we deeply sympathise with Br. Ackley in his afflictions, and respectfully request that he publish his discourse in the Western Luminary.

2. Resolved, That this Association appoint three Conferences within its bounds during the current year, the first to be held in Boston on the fourth Wednesday in September. The second on the fourth Wednesday in January, in Buffalo. The third on the fourth Wednesday in February, in Alabama.

3. Resolved, That this Association recommend to the respective Societies within its limits, to take into consideration the propriety of asking the fellowship of the New York State Convention of Universalists for this body, and by their delegates report their decision at its next annual meeting. This resolution, after some debate, was passed with one dissenting vote. Immediately after its passage, Br. Flagler read the following paper, which was adopted by a unanimous vote of the Council.

Whereas, it is asserted that this Association has heretofore refused to unite itself with the New York State Convention of Universalists, for the reason that one of its ministers, Br. J. S. Flagler, is opposed thereto.

Be it therefore Resolved, by and with the consent of the said J. S. Flagler, That if it is the desire of the Association to be a member of said Convention, he, the said Flagler, hereby declares that he wishes himself exempt therefrom, and that he remain in fellowship with said Association as heretofore, and no further.

Resolved, That the above be expressly understood, that the said Flagler has no fellowship for, nor is he to be considered as being under the jurisdiction of said New York State Convention, or a United States Convention.

Voted that the Clerk prepare the minutes for publication in the Luminary, and request that the Magazine & Advocate publish the same.

Adjourned to meet in Morganville, town of Stafford, Gen. co., on the third Wednesday and Thursday of June, 1844.

J. S. FLAGLER, Moderator.

J. M. DAY, Clerk.

REMARKS.—The late session of our Association was the most interesting one I have ever attended. The congregation was very large, and the meeting must have been highly gratifying to our friends in Aurora. One year ago, there was but a handful of them—now they are a large society, and have a beautiful house of worship. The dedication of the house took place on Tuesday, an account of which will be furnished probably by Br. Hunt.—We think our cause is in a prosperous condition within the limits of our Association. Two new Societies were received into fellowship at the session just closed. Nine, of the eleven Societies belonging to the Association, were well represented. During the past year, two Churches have been organized, one at Alexander, and one at Perry.—Five, of the eleven Societies, sustain preaching the whole of the time. There are ten preachers belonging to the Association, one of whom, however, Br. Remington, expects to remove soon beyond its limits. We hope his place will be soon supplied. Since our last Session, one Meeting-house has been built, and another commenced (in Boston) to be completed in August. The condition of our cause, then, within the limits of the Genesee Association, is prosperous. In view of the past, we have reason to thank God and take courage. We hope to see all our ministers at Morganville next year, and have a Council composed of delegates from every existing Society, and a good many new ones. It is highly important that there be a full representation.

J. M. DAY, Clerk of the Council.

D. ACKLEY, Standing Clerk.

Our conversation should be such as to afford youth improvement, women modesty, the aged respect, and all men civility.

MINUTES

Of the Proceedings of the Allegany Association of Universalists, June, 1843.

This body held its annual Session on the 28th and 29th days of June, at Yorkshire. The Council organised by appointing Br. S. Adams, Moderator, and B. Hunt, Clerk of the Council. United in prayer with Br. N. Stacy, when the Council was opened for business.

Credentials of Delegates were received, and the following lay delegates were found present, with the statistics of the prosperity of the cause in their several Societies. Independence: Augustus Beach, Reuben Kent—69 members in their Society—cause prosperous—preaching all the time by Br. George. Portage: Elisha D. Moses, Marvin Wood—Church and Society numbers not stated—cause prosperous—preaching all the time by Br. Kelsey. Hume: A. Adams, R. Istead—Society, 54 members—Church, 38—preaching all the time by Br. I. B. Sharp. Yorkshire: S. R. Crittenden, B. Wood. Heard the report of the Committee of Discipline, no cause of complaint. Reported that we have not heard from Br. Babcock, and consequently the charges against him have not been officially presented before him.—Committee discharged. When A. Kelsey, L. Graves and S. R. Crittenden were chosen as a Committee of Discipline for the year ensuing.

Br. Kelsey moved that Br. Babcock's case be examined into and investigated. Carried.

Resolved, That each Society in the bounds of this Association take up a collection on the first Sabbath in January next, and immediately thereafter forward the same to the Standing Clerk of this Association to be appropriated to the purpose of defraying the expenses of the delegates chosen to represent this body at the annual meeting of the New York State Convention.

Voted that Brs. D. Lee and I. B. Sharp, act as advocates for Br. Babcock, and that we enter into an investigation of this subject immediately after the preaching of the day.

Voted Brs. Kelsey and Sharp, ministerial, and L. Graves and — Cummings, as lay delegates to State Convention.

The Committee of Fellowship and Ordination reported—no business had come before them—report received, and they were discharged. When Brs. J. Todd, S. R. Crittenden and L. Graves, were appointed the Committee on Fellowship and Ordination.

The Society at Independence requested that Br. George receive ordination—referred to Committee.

Br. Babcock's case was now brought before the Council for investigation—the Committee of Discipline as prosecutors, and Br. Babcock's advocates on the defence. After the witnesses were examined, and the case submitted to the Council, the following preamble and resolution were presented and adopted:

Whereas, a complaint has been referred to this Council through the medium of their Committee of Discipline, against the Rev. Judah Babcock, containing four specifications of charges of immoral and unchristian conduct, either of which, if true, should disqualify him from holding our testimonials of fellowship as a preacher of the Gospel—and whereas, three of the specifications have been amply sustained by competent witnesses, therefore

Resolved, That the Rev. Judah Babcock be suspended from the fellowship of this Association until its next annual session, and that the Committee of Discipline be instructed to furnish Br. Babcock a statement of the proceeding of this Council in this case, if within the compass of their ability, and invite him and urge him by every consideration, then, and there, to appear, and vindicate his character, if he be innocent, and heal the wound under which the cause of divine truth is now suffering in this section of the Redeemer's vineyard, on his account.

Committee on Ordination reported in favor of conferring ordination on Br. George. Adopted.

Voted, that when this Association adjourn, it adjourn to meet at Cuba, Allegany county, the fourth Wednesday and following Thursday in June, 1844.

Voted, that the Standing Clerk shall have power to appoint such Conferences as he may deem proper during the coming year in this Association.

Voted, that the Clerk of the Council prepare the minutes of this Association, to be published in the "Luminary" and "Gospel Advocate," and that they be copied in all our Western periodicals.

Voted, that Br. Gowdy be appointed to preach the next occasional sermon before this body.—When the Council adjourned.

REMARKS.—There were ten preachers present, A. Kelsey, B. Hunt, I. B. Sharp, N. Brown, S. Adams, J. Todd, G. S. Gowdy, L. Paine, N. Stacy, I. George. Four sermons were preached—added to this, the usual addresses. Although we had frequent showers of rain, and held the meeting in a barn, yet the congregation was large, and the best attention was paid to the preached word. At 6 o'clock, on Wednesday, we had an excellent praise meeting, in which our lay brethren and sisters took part, and there the spirit and power of the gospel were felt. On Thursday in the afternoon, Br. George was ordained. Sermon by Br. N. Stacy. Ordination Prayer and laying on of hands by Br. S. Adams. Charge and delivery of the Scriptures by Br. Sharp. Right hand of fellowship by Br. Gowdy. We have reason to believe that many hearts were made to rejoice during this meeting, and we hope that all our friends, who were there, will carry to their homes the holy precepts which they there heard proclaimed from the desk, that it may influence and purify their lives, that they may walk in newness of life, conformed to the spirit of Christ.

B. HUNT, Clerk of the Council.

THE LORD'S PRAYER.

In the consideration of this prayer we may remark, that as to its character:

It is divine. How excellent must be the petition which the king himself has drawn up! It must certainly meet with acceptance from its author.

It is comprehensive. There cannot be mentioned a petition necessary for man, not included in these, Thy kingdom come,—Thy will be done,—Give us this day our daily bread,—Forgive us our trespasses,—Lead us not into temptation,—Deliver us from evil.

It is sublime. This character of grandeur appears

1. In its design. What is more ennobling than prayers? The loftiest place on earth is the footstool of Jehovah. The grandest posture is prostration before his throne.

2. In its language. The simple grandeur which struck Longinus in, "Let there be light, and there was light," breathes in every sentence of this prayer. Here are no swelling words of man's wisdom, here is nothing redundant; nothing deficient. It is the language of sublime devotion, chastened by filial awe.

3. In its conceptions. In vain look we for sublimity, where these are poor. But what vastness have we here! God,—the kingdom of God,—angelic obedience,—earth,—the will of God, the only law of its one thousand millions of living men; evil implying all that men can suffer, or dread; deliverance from evil; the power, the glory, the eternity of God! Was ever so much comprehended before, or since, in so few words?

Secondly, consider the spirit of the Lord's Prayer.

It breathes a filial spirit—"Father."

A catholic spirit—"Our Father."

A reverential spirit—"Hallowed be thy Name."

A missionary spirit—"Thy kingdom come."

An obedient spirit—"Thy will be done, on Earth."

A dependant spirit—"Give us this day our daily bread."

A forgiving spirit—"And forgive our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us."

A cautious spirit—"Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil."

A confidential and adoring spirit—"For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever and ever. Amen."

BUILDING ON THE SAND.

"And every one that heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man, which built his house upon the sand; and the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house, and it fell; and great was the fall of it."—Mat. vii: 26, 27.

The fishermen of Bengal build their huts in the dry season, on the beds of sand from which the river has retired. When the rains set in, which they often do very suddenly, accompanied with violent northwest winds, the water pours down in torrents from the mountains. In one night, multitudes of these huts are frequently swept away, and the place where they stood is the next morning undiscernable. A traveller states,

"It so happened that we were to witness one of the greatest calamities that have occurred in Egypt, in the recollection of any one living. The Nile rose this season three feet and a half above the highest mark left by the former inundation, with uncommon rapidity, and carried off several villages, and some hundred of their inhabitants. I never saw any picture that could give a more correct idea of the deluge, than the valley of the Nile in this season. The Arabs had expected an extraordinary inundation this year, in consequence of the scarcity of water the preceding year: but they did not apprehend it would rise to such a height. They generally erect fences of earth and reeds round their villages, to keep the water from their houses; but the force of this inundation baffled all their efforts. Their cottages being built of earth, could not stand one instant against the current; and no sooner did the waves reach them, then it levelled them with the ground. The rapid stream carried off all that was before it; men, women, children, cattle, corn; every thing was washed away in an instant, and left the place where the village stood without any thing to indicate that there had ever been a house on the spot."—Weekly Visitor.

THE UNITED STATES CONVENTION.

We take the following from the Star in the West

"Our friends here are looking forward to the annual session of the Convention in this place, with high expectations. We trust it will be one of the greatest and best meetings for religious purposes, ever held in the goodly State of Ohio—a joyous jubilee, where the captives will be set at liberty—a festival of Zion, where every wanting soul shall be refreshed by the dews and manna of heaven, acceptable as that which descended in the wilderness, and conformed itself to every palate. Such are the facilities of arriving here by land and water, from every point of the compass, that we anticipate a great gathering of the believers and friends of our cause. The society in Akron will be ready, with joyful hearts and liberal hands, to bid all a hearty welcome to their hospitable boards. Every arrangement will be made in their power, to render the stay of our friends from abroad, comfortable and pleasant. We hope to see a goodly number of our ministering brethren from the New England States and from the State of New York. The interesting tour by the Falls and up the Lake—a desire to witness the enterprise and improvements of the West—and a wish to learn the condition and prospects of our cause here, we trust will induce many to come on. A boat will be in the City of Cleveland from this place on Monday evening preceding the Convention for the purpose of conveying to Akron the preachers and friends who come up the lake. Arrangements will also be made on the part of the Universalist Society in Cleveland for the reception of our Eastern friends on their arrival there—which arrangements will be hereafter announced. Come on then brethren, one and all. May the North give up and the South keep not back—bring your sons from the West and your daughters from the East—and may we have an anniversary which shall long be cherished in grateful and pleasing remembrance by every lover of Zion.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JULY 21, 1843.

THE EARTHLY AND HEAVENLY FATHER.

The term "father" awakens in nearly every bosom the same feelings of filial affection, gratitude, and respect. It carries us to the home of our childhood, and brings vividly before the mind the venerable form, as it was last beheld—the head slightly sprinkled with the frosts of age, the wrinkled forehead, the beaming eye, the step that has lost its elasticity, if not its vigor, the frame slightly inclining to the stoop of age—all are again before the mental vision, so distinct and life-like that the heart leaps up yearning to embrace that loved form once more. We are carried back to the days of extreme youth, when almost constant indulgence rendered us impatient of occasional restraint, and led us to repine and murmur at parental prohibitions intended only for our good, as if they were selfish schemes devised for another's aggrandisement at the ruin of our dearest happiness. And, brightly relieving that dark picture is seen many a bright and sunny spot of unalloyed enjoyment, furnished to us most cheerfully by hours of toil and care by that lately exacting father. But, as we advanced in life, and learned truth and wisdom by experience, how changed became our views of the paternal government! We learned the love a father bore us, and saw that love alone dictated every law of his lips, whether it was a law imparting or withholding what we called enjoyment.

True, in the waywardness and self-sufficiency of our youthful hearts, we often thought our parents erred in the choice of means; and sometimes, perhaps, we even dared to distrust his choice of an end; but our confidence in his affection for us, overbalanced our distrust of his wisdom, and we were fain to submit. We advanced further in life, and entering on the busy stage as one of the actors thereon who had his own part to play, we learned to appreciate the labors, cares, anxieties and expenditures our guidance and control and support had cost—but still we did not know their number nor their greatness. We readily learned, also, on putting our own wisdom to the test, in plans for future life, that the wisdom of the aged is not easily excelled by the crude theories of youth.

And when we became a father in turn, and found developed within us the dormant affections and cares pertaining to that station, we were then, only—and even then, not yet in full—prepared to sit in judgment on a father's government. But even now, looking back on the past, amid all the dissatisfaction felt at times at a father's law when it crossed my path with a barrier I did not dare leap over—or when it administered to me the deserved rebuke, the stern warning, or the more kindly admonition, but all in opposition to my meditated pleasure—amid all these unwelcome checks, I still find confidence in a father's goodness causing me to bow in reverence even where his wisdom was not fully credited. I knew that that father's care was for his family—that neither toil, nor thought, nor heart-wearying care would be spared by him to provide food, and raiment, and shelter for the body—amusement and instruction for the mind, and to imbue the soul with pure principles of righteousness, and a manly resolve, a firm resolution to stem evil or stand by good in all their course through life. And oh, by what deeds was that confidence proved to be well-placed!

That father's rule of action, was the law of kindness, aided by all the powers of reason he possessed. We knew well, when temptation wooed to do things contrary to his will, that no corporeal suffering would follow the daring deed—but there was that in being obliged to hear the remonstrance of affection, to see the eye of compassion bent upon our guilty countenances, and to converse upon the now hated act, and to give its history, with all its details and the silly senseless reasons, as they were called, that led us to, and in, and through the course of evil-doing—there was that in all these, that would have rendered the blows of the rod unfelt—yea, even a pleasure in the comparison. We knew that whatever might be our conduct, we were sure of retaining his love—we might trample upon that heart, but its stores of affection would but gush out more warmly and abundantly to bless us—we might draw from it remonstrances and rebukes and solicitations, but could not tire it into feeling indifference and least of all hatred—and that knowledge—you may speak of its licentious tendency as you will, and tell of the necessity of torturing fear of losing a father's favor and love—that knowledge was most efficacious of all motives to restrain from sin, or to lead us to repentance when it was committed.

And when the chastisement we had merited, came upon us—however grievous it might be—however we might deem it severer than was necessary—it was submitted to, and the inflictor of it was revered for the motives which we knew actuated him in inflicting it.—And thus we were led to the fulfilment of the declaration—"We have had fathers of our flesh who chastened us after their own pleasure, and we gave them reverence"—reverence, if not for its wisdom, at least for the love which we knew led them to inflict it at an expense of pain to their own hearts far greater, many times, than it gave to us—reverence, if not from a consciousness of our deserving of it, at least for the oftentimes undeserved goodness that had so constantly preceded its infliction. And now, in looking back, and beholding all our fathers have toiled, and suffered, and cared for us—beholding the wisdom and anxious thoughts they exercised in planning for our welfare and advancement in life—in beholding the strong love that led them faithfully to chastise our perversity and frowardness and heedlessness; though in doing so they were more pained than we were—in beholding how unweariedly they forgave our thoughtlessness and folly—how unceasingly they loved us in despite of our frequent disobedience and ingratitude—is there a heart that does not swell with emotions unutterable, and that does not feel to its inmost depths a thrill of gratitude and reverence for their memories? Well—"We have had earthly fathers who corrected us, and we gave them reverence: shall we not, then, much rather be in subjection to the Father of spirits and live?"

I. O. OF O. F.

When we used these initials to announce the lecture of Br. E. H. Chapin, in this city, last month, we had no intention of tantalizing the curiosity of our readers.—We used a term well understood here, forgetting that hundreds of our readers would not think of its meaning; and now we are requested by several of our readers to answer the curiosity we have innocently awakened.—Our paper is not devoted to such subjects, but we suppose our friends have some claim upon us to answer their questions on this subject.

Be it known, then, that "I. O. of O. F." means the "Independent Order of Odd Fellows." This Independent Order of Odd Fellows had its origin as at present constituted, a number of years ago, in England, and was started in this country only about 25 years ago. It is a mutual aid, or beneficial, association on a large scale—divided into Lodges, subordinate to State Lodges, and these into a U. S. Lodge in this country—the members of which are to be chosen only for their good moral character, and social standing, and good health. These pay an initiation fee, say $5.00—a weekly due, say 6 cents—a quarterly contribution of 25 cents, to constitute the Widow and Orphan's Fund—and such other sums, from time to time, as may be agreed on, or necessary, to carry on the institution. The motto of the order, "Friendship, Love and Truth," discloses its principles. Its objects are, to secure aid and assistance for each other and their families—and hence each one is bound to seek out the stranger, to relieve the needy, to succor the distressed, to visit the widow, and to clothe and educate the orphan, as far as lies in his power to do, without injury to himself and family. If an Odd Fellow is travelling, he finds among his brethren aid and relief—if a stranger, they assist him to get into business—if sick, two are deputed each night to watch with him, and a stipulated sum (say four dollars, to make the proportion agree with the sums named above) is paid him each week as his rightful due—if he needs more, a donation is voted, or a collection is taken up, each week, to supply it—if he dies, $30 are appropriated to pay his funeral expenses, (and half that sum if his wife dies,) and his brethren attend his funeral—at his death, his widow is cared for and placed in a situation above want and temptation, so that she may provide honestly for her family; and his orphans, if necessary, are clothed and educated until old enough to be placed at a trade or profession, and watched over until that apprenticeship is ended.

The mode of initiation is secret—but the obligation is a simple pledge of honor, and is declared not to interfere with any duty man owes to God, to mankind, to his country, to his family or himself. A strict regard for morality, and general benevolence, and propriety of life, is inculcated; and no refreshment except cold water is allowed at any of their meetings. To prevent imposition, they have, besides sundry signs and tokens by which they may recognize each other, carefully framed certificates which show the standing of the members at home. And to prevent injury, their investigations of the characters of applicants, the condition and standing of their own members, and their general pecuniary transactions, are carefully preserved secret from the public, as well as their form of initiation, the meaning and use of their emblems, and their signs by which they recognize each other—for these could serve no public use beyond the mere gratification of an idle curiosity; and their revelation would at once frustrate the benevolent intentions of the order, and break up the universality of its mutual aid operations. Its principles and objects—its Constitutions and By-laws are published, and freely disclosed; but those private affairs which are connected with the money matters of the society, the condition of its members, the characters of applicants, and its mere forms and ceremonies, emblems, and passwords, and signs, belong only to its members.

Thus have I endeavored briefly, but plainly, to answer on the most important points the questions proposed to us. In regard to the extent of the order, there were in the United States, last August, about 270 subordinate Lodges, having about 24,000 members, of which number 7,755 had been admitted within the year; so that the present increase is rapid. These lodges had paid for the relief of brothers, $30,596; for the relief of widowed families of brothers, $3,876; for the education of orphans, $831; and for burying the dead, $4,463.

Religious disputes and political topics are strictly excluded from all their meetings; and the only religious test, is a belief in God. "In God we trust," is one of their principal mottoes—and reverence of him, one of their chief inculcations, while the Golden Rule of Jesus is strongly insisted upon in their charges and lectures.

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

REMOVALS.—Br. A. Wood has removed from Antwerp to Gouverneur—Br. J. Chase from Rochester to Middleport—and Br. C. Hammond from Royakton to Rochester, to take Br. Chase's place as pastor of the society in that city, and Agent for the proprietors of the Western Luminary. Br. R. Thornton from Carroll, in this State, to Ann Arbor, Mich.

NEW PREACHERS.—Br. F. M. Alvord, of Carroll, Chautauque county, in this state, is named in the Primitive Expounder, of Mich., as a new preacher of much promise. Br. J. J. Austin, of Oxford, has also commenced his labors as a preacher of the Gospel. He is a young man of fine talents and excellent moral character.

We have a lot of additions to make to these items as soon as we can find time to hunt them up in our exchange papers.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Br. P. H. S., of Oswego—Your letter of the 13th ult., was duly received. I do not deem it advisable to publish an article against an individual who can be better reached by regular complaint, if needed. The article complained of, named neither persons nor places, and was not understood to be any thing except general in its remarks.

The defence of the late Committee of discipline of the St. Lawrence Association, in correction of some alleged misstatements of the Black river Association will be published next week.

Br. Lee—our only safe conveyances are the Expresses. All others, except the Mail, are uncertain and irregular.

I have had no time to answer letters for some weeks past. The late and imperfect returns for the Register have delayed me much in preparing that work, that I must drive it through as fast as I can, leaving other matters to take care of themselves for a short time.

I shall send proof sheets of the Register for 1844, with a copy of the work for 1843, to a number of the brethren for their correction, within a few days.—I hope they will make the corrections and additions with great care, and return the proof sheets immediately. If they write any thing but mere corrections, etc., I will have to pay additional postage on each sheet, or subject them to a fine of five dollars for each offence. I have pretty full and accurate returns for most of the Western states, the proofs for which will be sent out late, perhaps too late to be returned in time. Those who receive them will therefore make haste.

"THE PRIMITIVE EXPOUNDER."—This new laborer has commenced its work in the West. The second number is now before us, containing much interesting matter. It is published every other Saturday, in Ann Arbor, Mich., at one dollar per annum, payable within three months. Brs. J. Billings and R. Thornton, (late of this State,) resident Editors; and A. H. Curtis and C. P. West, Corresponding Editors. It is published in 8vo form—16 pp. each number, and will be found well worth its cost to all who take and pay for it.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL CAUSE.

We gladly give place to the following Circular Letter from the Corresponding Secretary of the New York Sabbath School Association, and ask Br. Grosh and Br. Hammond to transfer it to the columns of the Magazine and Advocate, and the Western Luminary, which we have not the least doubt they will cheerfully do.

It would doubtless be best, as far as possible, to communicate the desired information directly to the respective paper offices—to Br. Hammond, of the Luminary, Rochester; Br. Grosh, of the Magazine and Advocate, Utica, and to this office—in the shape of concise communications, and we could then publish them, as the best method of placing them in the hand of the Secretary. We are sure there will be interest enough in the subject, with general readers, to tolerate this detached publication of them, as different sections are reported to the different offices, and then a General Abstract of the whole, from the Secretary's hand.

It is certain that there is a rapidly growing interest in the Sunday School cause, in our state, and we most devoutly hope that no one appreciating its importance in the least, will relax his exertions at this time, to make this interest as universal as possible.

The desired information can be given in most cases while persons are communicating with the respective offices, on other business. If postage must be incurred, let it be paid by the respective Schools, for it will be nothing to them separately, and in the aggregate would be too heavy a tax on the Secretary, from his individual pocket.

CIRCULAR LETTER

To the Superintendents of Universalist Sabbath Schools within the limits of the State of New York.

Brethren: On reference to the Minutes of the Annual Meeting of the Sabbath School Association recently held, I find no reports of the condition of your schools, as required by Article V, of the said Association. Those presented at the Convention in August of last year, were imperfect; and meagre as they were, purported to be the statistics of but nine schools. Now it is desirable to obtain, if possible, complete and uniform accounts of the condition of our Sunday Schools, that we may ascertain our strength, afford data to show in the future what progress we may make, and discover what exertions may be necessary to further the interests of the cause. And I have presumed to make this request: that you forward to me, as soon as your convenience will possibly allow, in the mode pointed out below, the statistics of your respective schools, embracing the following particulars:

1. The date of the formation of the school.
2. The number of scholars on the register on the 1st of June, after erasing the names of all such as had ceased to attend, and distinguishing between boys and girls.
3. The number of teachers, distinguishing between male and female, and including superintendents, librarians, and other officers.
4. The average attendance of scholars, distinguishing between boys and girls, for six months previous to the 1st of June.
5. The average attendance of teachers, distinguishing between male and female, for the same period.
6. The number of volumes in the Library.
7. The number of readers on the Librarian's books.
8. A list of the books used as text-books.
9. The times at which sessions held.
10. Any information in regard to discipline, modes of conducting schools, &c., &c., which it may be deemed advisable to present.

These reports may be forwarded, free of expense, (as can easily be accomplished), to either of the following persons, with whom I will advise as to the mode of transmission to me: Rev. S. R. Smith, Buffalo; Rev. C. Hammond, Rochester; Rev. G. W. Montgomery, Auburn; Rev. A. B. Grosh, Utica; Rev. S. B. Brittan, Albany; Rev. C. C. Burr, Troy; and P. Price, New York.

Brethren: I trust you will not overlook this matter. On the receipt of the reports I will arrange them into form, and have them published in our papers. I have no doubt that they will, if complete, form a very interesting document. Do not fail to attend to it.

Yours in the bonds of faith,

G. L. DEMAREST,
Corresponding Secretary. N. Y. U. S. S. Association.

Br. Tompkins—Send Repository, one copy each, to Mrs. A. Rappleye, and Mrs. M. G. Almy, Farmer, Seneca Co., N. Y., and one copy to Miss Seraph Oliver, South Dansville, Steuben Co., N. Y. Credit each $2.00 and charge us.

DEATHS.

In the town of New Hartford, on the 8th inst., of influenza, Mrs. ELIZABETH, wife of Jeremiah Powell, aged 84 years. Her funeral was attended on the 10th, and a discourse founded on 2 Cor. v: 1, was given by H. B. SOULE.

In Canton, June 27th, after a protracted and painful illness of from three to four weeks, Br. ALVIN C. LOW, the County Clerk of St. Lawrence Co., in the 43d year of his age; leaving a most worthy and amiable companion and five young children, to mourn their great and irreparable loss. Br. Low was one of our most respected citizens, and a most excellent and generous member of the Universalist society in Canton, and we deeply sorrow that we shall see his face no more.

The Hon. Silas Wright, who furnished his obituary notice for our county paper, says of Br. Low, "that he has been four times elected to the same office by the voluntary suffrages of the freemen of the county, that he has served three full official terms of three years each, and that his election for the fourth was by a stronger vote than he had ever before received."

"In constant devotion to the duties of his office, and a prompt and accurate discharge of them, no word of complaint has been heard against Mr. Low. All who have transacted business at the Clerk's office, every Judge who has held a seat upon the bench of our Common Pleas Court every Circuit Judge who has held our Circuit Court, and every member of the bar of our own county, and of the adjoining counties, whose practice has led them to attend our courts, will cheerfully give evidence as to the kind deportment, the untiring faithfulness of our Clerk, and the neat and orderly and accurate manner in which every official duty was discharged."

"The funeral of Mr. Low was unostentatious, but most gratifying to us, as it must have been to his numerous mourning relatives. The long line of worthy citizens of Canton, who so cheerfully presented themselves to bear in their arms and upon their shoulders, the remains of their cherished friend to the last resting place, and the almost equally long line of ladies of the village and surrounding country, who followed in the slow and solemn procession, presented the richest tribute to departed worth, and tried and approved virtue; and when enclosed within these extended lines of friends, we noticed several of the Judges and ex-Judges of our county courts, several of our ex-Sheriffs with their deputies, and those of the present Sheriff, quite a number of the members of the Bar of the county, many of whom, as well as several of the Judges had come from the remotest parts of the county to pay this last tribute of respect to our lamented Clerk, and this line closed by the present deputy Clerk and his assistants, the whole moving in silence, and solemnity, and order, under the direction of our present Sheriff—we confess that the impression was deeply made upon our mind and feelings, that no amount of parade and pomp could have offered so appropriate a funeral to so worthy a man, and so universally lamented a public officer."

The services of the funeral above alluded to, were held in the Universalist church in Canton, at 5 o'clock, P. M. on Thursday, June 29th, where the writer delivered a discourse to that very large and solemn audience, assisted in the services by Brs. Jones, Abbott and Potter.

W. H. WAGGONER.

May 10th, at the residence of Linus B. Steel, Putnam co., Ills., STEPHEN E. TUCKER, aged 32 years. He was a native of the State of N. Y., and a stranger in this country.—For a year or two past his health has been poor.

THE RESPONSE.

O Youth! if thou wilt consult Reason and Experience, and wilt lend the listening ear and the understanding heart, thou shalt hear and be profited by the following:

Bird in the water and fish in the air,
And earth-worm in either, will die
And Nature, if right our minds we prepare,
Analogous truth will supply.

Bird to the air, and fish to the sea,
And worm to the earth, shall ever be:—
Knowest thou what is appointed for thee?

Not in air foul and dank,
Where poison-plants grow rank,
And the hiss of the serpent is nigh,
Shall thy body be stout and strong,—
Nor can the breathing soul live long.
In what is prefigured thereby.

Understanding what thou redest,
See that thou the lesson heedest.

The atmosphere only of holiness can Give vigor and life to the soul of man;
And he who is sinful, inhaled the breath
Exhaled from the lungs of the Angel of Death.

THE HARD NAME.

"Well, it is certainly very mysterious!" said Mrs. Smith.

"Very mysterious, indeed!" said Mrs. Brown.

"Altogether beyond my comprehension!" said Miss Willowbough.

"Mysterious! do tell me all about it!" said Mrs. Jones, who had just entered the room, and heard enough of the conversation to convince her that scandal was its subject; as, indeed, she might have known had she not been deaf—for what other subject had been started at Mrs. Smith's for a twelve month?

"Have you heard nothing of the mysterious stranger?" asked Mrs. Brown.

"Nothing."

"Who has been here ever since the day before yesterday morning?" added Mrs. Smith.

"Not a word! how remarkable!"

"And whose name no one can discover!" continued Miss Willowbough.

"Wonderful! wonderful!" exclaimed Mrs. Jones. "But what is the peculiar mystery about him?"

"A great deal, I assure you," answered Mrs. Smith.

"In the first place, he—wears a black coat and drab pantaloons—and then, again, he—he—indeed his whole appearance has an air of very peculiar mystery."

"Bless me! what are we all coming to! But is there no way to find out who he is?"

"I expect Miss Vinegar here every moment," said Mrs. Smith, "and if any one knows any thing about him, she does."

"What, the old maid! Oh, I detest her!" said Mrs. Jones, "she is so terribly inquisitive. I never could bear any one who is eternally prying into the affairs of their neighbors. Then you can't find out even his name. I would give any thing to know. But here comes Miss Vinegar, perhaps she can tell us."

Miss Vinegar poked her sallow visage into the room. She looked the very incarnation of scandal, and well she might, for it had been her daily food for more than thirty years. Miss Vinegar was not of a certain, but of a very uncertain age, varying from twenty five to forty, according as you took her assurance, or the family Bible for your guide; and the whole of that time she had passed in the laudable occupation of investigating and regulating the affairs of her neighbors. She had a general oversight of the whole village. She knew every thing that ever happened, and was positive of a great many things which never did happen. Like the glorious sun, she shone on all alike. None so elevated as to be above the reach of her tongue; none so low as to escape the vigilance of her condescending scrutiny. But, alas! most distinguished powers are sometimes compelled to remain inactive from the want of proper objects for their exertion. Such seemed to be the inevitable fate of Miss Vinegar. Possessed of every facility and blessed with every inclination for the manufacture of scandal, she was alarmingly deficient in the raw material. She had worked up every character within her reach. With the intuition of genius, she had seized upon every incident susceptible of expansion, and had stretched it to its utmost extent. She had done every thing that could have been done; but, alas! who can make bricks without straw? Her best exertions met with no encouragement. Nothing would happen out of the regular course of events. Every body went to church on Sundays. Nobody was getting married, or liked to be, poor woman; she felt sure of that. In fact there was nothing worthy the attention of Miss Vinegar, and people began to fear that, for want of any other, she would attack her own character. Never did any thing occur in better time than the appearance of the mysterious stranger.

Miss Vinegar's researches had not been attended with that success which usually rewards persevering industry.

"The landlady knows nothing about him," she said, as she entered, "I have ascertained that he rises at eight—and drinks two cups of coffee without cream."

"Without cream!" echoed Mrs. Jones.

"Yes, without cream. I was very particular in my inquiries and the information may be relied upon."

"Very singular, indeed! Now I think cream is all the beauty of coffee."

"I should not at all be surprised," said Miss Vinegar, "if he should prove to be the bank robber, whom we saw advertised."

"But he is a dark man, with black hair," said Miss Willowbough, "and the stranger has a very light complexion."

"Nothing easier than to alter the complexion, as you must know, Miss Willowbough;" retorted Miss Vinegar. Miss Willowbough enjoyed the reputation of improving her complexion with pearl powder, but she blushed through it all, and continued, "but the robber is a large man, and the stranger is tall and slim."

"Nothing easier than reducing the size of the waist," answered Miss Vinegar, sharply, and glancing at Miss Willowbough's hour-glass form.

Really the conversation was becoming quite personal. So at least thought Miss Willowbough, as she answered.

"But there is one thing he could not alter. He is evidently not more than twenty-five years old, while the advertisement describes the robber as over forty; and, your own experience, Miss Vinegar, must have convinced you of the impossibility of any one's appearing twenty years younger than he really is."

Miss Vinegar began to mutter about "some people," and "some other people," but was interrupted by an exclamation from Mrs. Smith, which drew all eyes to the window.

"There he goes, as I live!"

"See," observed Mrs. Jones, as the mysterious stranger took a long step to avoid a muddy spot, "see how mysteriously he lifts his foot."

Poor man, he little knew the interest he was exciting in the kind souls who were watching him.

"I wonder if he is married!" said Miss Willowbough.

"If he is not," said Miss Vinegar, "he will not probably fancy a piece of paint and whalebone."

"Nor a woman old enough to be his grandmother," retorted Miss Willowbough.

"There, did you see Mr. White? He bowed to the stranger, so he must know him. I will knock on the window, and beckon for him to come in. I will inquire concerning his daughter—she is in delicate health, you know. Indeed, I have some preserves for her. A capital excuse, is it not?"

Mr. White was the only person in the village who had ever been known to keep a secret, consequently his popularity with the ladies was below zero. He was a complete anomaly. He could enjoy a cup of tea, although not sweetened with scandal; and, really, it never seemed to destroy his appetite for his own dinner, because he could not tell what constituted that of his next door neighbors.

"Oh, why did you beckon to that man? I never could bear him," said Miss Vinegar.

"We have no other means of ascertaining any thing about the stranger," answered Mrs. Smith. "But what objection have you to Mr. White?"

"Because he is so very impertinent. Would you believe it—no longer ago than last Monday, I saw him go home with a covered market basket—strange, that people will use such things—I sent Betty over to see what he was going to have for dinner—the most natural thing in the world, you know—and what do you think he said? He told her he should dine on scandal, and, were it not so very common a dish, he would invite her mistress to dinner. So impertinent! and to a lady, too! I can't bear him. Betty found out, though. He had a salmon. It could not have cost him less than three or four dollars—say three dollars and fifty cents."

The amiable Miss Vinegar was interrupted by the entrance of Mr. White, himself. Mrs. Smith was very kind in her inquiries about Miss White's health. Miss Vinegar apologized for the impertinence of her maid, who, she declared, went off without her knowledge, and had grown so very inquisitive, that she expected to be compelled to dismiss her.

"What gentleman were you speaking to, just now?" asked Mrs. Brown.

"O, he, he—was a stranger."

"Well, what is his name?" was the enger question, as they all pressed around him. But none of them observed the mischievous smile that played upon his lips, as he answered, with assumed hesitancy, "I really do not know—as I ought to—in fact, I do not exactly recollect his name."

"Oh! but you must tell us; it shall go no farther; I assure you."

"I should like to tell you; but, really, there are some peculiar circumstances; which—"

"But you certainly would not hesitate to inform us," said Mrs. Smith. "I have not the least curiosity in the world, but I merely—wish to know, that's all."

"He has a very hard name," said Mr. White.

"Hard name,—what is it—Stone?"

"Oh! no—Harder."

"Harder than stone? then it is Iron, I suppose."

"No,—harder yet."

"Harder than iron? impossible—Adamant?"

"Harder still."

"Harder than Adamant! I can not imagine what it is."

"I do not feel at liberty to tell you; but, if you can guess, I shall not be responsible. So good morning, ladies!" and in spite of all their entreaties, Mr. White fairly made his escape.

"What can it be," said Mrs. Smith; "harder than Adamant?"

"I have it," said Mrs. Brown—"Heart."

"You do not mean, pray, that the heart is harder than adamant?" said Miss Willowbough with a sigh.

"I speak in a spiritual sense," said Mrs. Brown; "the heart is by nature totally depraved, and until—"

"I wonder if it is not Pharaoh," interrupted Miss Vinegar. Many other names were proposed and rejected. At last they arrived at the conclusion, that his name must be Diamond; and with this opinion, the ladies separated.

Again the ladies were in conclave, at the house of Mr. Smith. Again Mr. Diamond—so they had named the stranger—passed the window; and again, all eyes were directed towards him.

"There! he has dropped a letter in the street," said Miss Vinegar. "Send some one for it, while I keep watch."

Mrs. Smith's maid was immediately despatched for the important document, while Miss Vinegar stood sentinel at the window, lest some more fortunate individual should secure the prize. But her caution was needless; the maid picked up the letter, Mrs. Smith received it at the door, and without looking at it, so great was her haste, bore it in triumph to her anxious guests.

"Now we shall know his name," said Miss Vinegar. Mrs. Smith held up the letter and read the superscription:—to submit to "WILLIAM HARDER, Esq."

DISCOURSES ON PRAYER....NO. I.

BY REV. DAY K. LEE.

"Continue in prayer." Col. iv. 2.

I propose to give you a series of some three or four discourses on the subject of prayer, calling your attention this morning to the first of that series. The consideration of several circumstances connected with us as a set of professed Christians, has prompted me to this labor; and I believe if I am listened to with that attention which you generally give, and which a subject of this nature demands, my effort, however feeble, will produce at least a serious reflection on a subject upon which Christians should frequently exercise their most solemn meditations.

It is known to us all, that our brethren of other churches have set us down as a people who are strangers to the spirit, and the service of prayer.—But when we are misrepresented in so many particulars; both of belief and practice, those brethren should not take it unkind in us to repel this charge also, and represent them as in the fault of judging their neighbors, without really knowing whereof they affirm. Prayer in its predominant import, signifies a communion with God—a referring of our cause—a directing of our supplications—an offering of our gratitude to him; and as this communion, this intercourse may go on in its holiest and most earnest, most blessed spirit, without making an outward exhibition, to be passed upon by the judgment of men; God only knows who is possessed of a praying disposition, what prayers are made, and who oftenest engages in acts of devotion. Man may be sometimes allowed to sit in judgment upon outward appearances, and say whether they savor of evil or good, prayerlessness or devotion; but God only can judge the heart, whose secret operations are open to him. As the Scripture beautifully expresses the thought, "The Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart."

This being the case, it would seem but an act of Christian modesty, to say no more, for every man to refrain from a hasty judgment in regard to his neighbor's devotions, and entertain a charitable reflection before he takes it upon himself to affirm, that any denomination of professed Christians are aliens from the spirit and habit of prayer. He who has ever enjoyed spiritual communion with his Creator—he who has ever felt a throb of genuine devotion in his soul, can testify, if he will, that it has not always been the long and audible prayer, which has seemed to bring him nearest God: and has been the most precious to his bosom. I believe that a fluency, and an audible expression in prayer, "is not always essential to praying. A man may pray most powerfully in the estimation of God, who is not able to utter even one word. The unutterable groan is big with meaning, and God understands it because it contains the language of his own spirit. Some desires are too mighty to be expressed, there is no language expressive enough to give them proper form, and distinct vocal sound; such desires show that they came from God, and as they came from him, so they express what God is disposed to do."

A prayer may be made in the hurry of business, and go up in silent eloquence from the struggling soul of the sweaty reaper, that will fall audibly, and sacred upon the listening ear of God. And the individual who may be judged of men as one who never uttered a breathing of prayer, may be the one whose lofty soul enjoys that privilege in its most blessed fruition, and who draws near to God by continual, and grateful, and generous spiritual devotions!

And since there are many choice hearts in the world who prefer, as a privilege, to make their prayers in silence, and in secret: it is not well for any man to say who are, and who are not accustomed to the spirit of prayer. But that our own people, as well perhaps as the very persons who reproach us—that a majority of professed Christians, need more of the ardent, pious feelings, and an increase of devotional affection, I can say doubtless with a becoming modesty that I am not disposed to deny. And as there is no positive perfection in this world, I may believe that all men need a continual increase, and unabating progress in that, as well as other Christian qualities, until they pass into the skies. It is a source of satisfaction, it is a blessedness of mind in which we may be changed into a loftier, heavenlier image from glory to glory! It is an exercise of heart which may carry it on toward perfection, and grow more pleasing, more generous and ennobling, while we discover our dependence for life, and for grace, and for blessing upon the beneficent Creator!

It is, however, a tender, a delicate spirit, and may be quenched by vain repetition, or by being professedly uttered in the corners of the street, where some man, righteous and saintly in self-estimation, would appear unto others as warning with devotion. It is a measure of enjoyment which may also cease to flow like a living, exhilarating fountain into the soul, when men become so very retiring, and so very secret in their communion with God, as neither to appear unto him, nor their own selves to pray!

And while on this subject I will remark, that if our people are not devotional, if they are not given to the genuine spirit of prayer, they not only neglect a sacred requirement, but they shut their bosoms against a state of enjoyment—nay, of beatitude as great and as precious as can be found below. They have the faith and the name to live, while they are morally dead. They profess to be happy, while the sweetest source of happiness they have never found. They profess to love God, and to recognize his blessings, while they are without genuine love, and without God in the world.—They stand by the tree of life, and declare to others that they feast upon its divine, its delicious fruitage, while the golden apples of fruition are all above their grovelling reach, and they fill themselves with the withered leaves that fall in the shaking. "They have committed two evils—they have forsaken God, the fountain of living waters, and hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns that can hold no water." They have seized upon the profession as something indeed excellent and desirable, while they have neglected the more important practice, which contains the duty and brings the reward.

It would grieve me to know that our people, especially the brethren worshipping here, did no praying that is audible in the ear of God, and acceptable in his sight. If they were obnoxious to this charge of our neighbors, and I knew it, I should believe that their enjoyment was indifferent, and their prosperity verging closely upon its termination.

"Can the rush grow up without mire? can the flag grow without water? Whilst it is yet in its greenness and not cut down, it withereth before any other herb: so are the paths of all that forget God"—saith the Scripture. And can we be Christians, following holy examples, and living in the joy of religion, unless we possess at least a semblance of the devoutness of soul which was evinced by our excellent Master?

The New Testament gives no formal delineation of the character of Jesus. Yet in what we gather from circumstances incidental to his history, we find traces of a deep, and ardent, a lofty devotion that his followers would do joyfully well to adopt as their daily example. How frequent was his retirement to prayer! How habitual, how often his thanksgiving! How significant, yet how unadorned; how simple, yet how sublime were his instructions on the subject of worship! His earnest addresses to his Father and the exalted piety of his behaviour, especially when the agonies of the garden, and the anguish—O what poignant, torturing anguish of the cross were pressing upon his spirit, exhibit a devoutness of mind that men may emulate, though they may never in this world approach its parallel!—And are not those examples beautiful for us to follow? Great as the Messiah was; high and sublime as were his origin and destiny; wide and glorious as was his inheritance; many as were the legions of strengthening angels that he could at any instant have called to his aid; yet he momentarily felt his dependence upon God—for his grace, for his sanctifying spirit, for his blessing; and most frequent were the instances of his prayer and thanksgiving!

After feasting the famishing multitudes in the wilderness of Bethsaida, and they had quietly withdrawn, "he went up into a mountain apart to pray, and when the evening was come he was there alone." Beautiful season, and appropriate place to pour out his lofty soul into his Father's ear, and ask for a fuller measure of grace, and love and tenderness! The character of his devotion found no parallel on earth. If he sat down to eat of the bounty of God, he would return thanks. If about to perform a marvellous cure, he would invoke the Father's aid and sanctifying influence. If he attended the wedding of an opulent Jew, he would add solemnity to the occasion, by invoking the smile and assistance of the Giver of gifts. When about to call forth the dead from the shroud of the tomb, he says—"Father! I thank thee that thou hast heard me, and I know that thou hearest me always." When the torments of the crucifixion were visioned to his mind in Gethsemane, we hear him ask in childlike love and confidence, "Father, if thou be willing, remove this cup from me," and immediately add with a most kingly resignation—"not my will, but thine be done."

Such were the examples of our good Messiah. Such his delicate, his lofty, his sublime spirit of devotion. And shall we not seek that spirit by emulation? If Jesus had need of the Father's aid, and the Father's strengthening grace, in how much greater need are we, his frail and tempted followers! And if he could express a thankfulness for mercies, in foresight of his coming agony, and cruel death; should not we also be thankful to God for the gift of Christ, and that victory which overcometh the sins, and sorrows, and separations of the world? Who have more reason to be thankful—who have more encouragement to commune with God, to wait upon him and unbosom the burden of their hearts before him, than those who profess to rejoice in an animating faith? If we are not given to ardent prayer, and spiritual meditation, who should be? If we do not recognize our entire dependence upon God for present benefits and future glory, who can be encouraged to make that recognition? If we discover no moral sublimity in the Saviour's example of devotion, and nothing in it worthy of emulation, and blessed to imitate, where are the believers that can make that discovery while beholding the character of their immaculate Redeemer?

It was the assertion of some truthful poet that

"The undevout astronomer is mad."

And what shall we say of the undevout Universalist, when he professes the most glorious—the most devotional faith that has been delivered to the churches? I am sincere when I say, I believe there is no system of religion that is so encouraging to devout aspirations, and so animate with a fire that can melt the affections, and kindle in our bosoms emotions of continual prayer and thanksgiving, as the one which has our favor. We believe that God is our Father, and the Father of all. We believe that he loves as no human parent can; that he blesses as no human parent will; that he has a father's concern for our welfare, a father's joy in our redemption; and that it was out of his great love that he sent his own Son and delivered him up for us all. We believe that he created us to bless us, that he wounds to heal, and though he caused grief, yet will he finally exalt us to the glory of his heavenly kingdom. We look up confidently to him for every benefit, for every excellent gift and desirable meditation, and love in our controversies, and in our declamations to represent him as good, and merciful, and abundant in loving kindness.

We love to repeat the Scriptures which say, "O give thanks unto the Lord; for he is good—for his mercy endureth forever;" and believe, or profess to believe that the obedient, devotional heart receives a recompense of high-wrought joy and happiness, on earth. And are we not forsaking the sweetest influences of our religion, leaving unpracticed our holiest sentiments and shutting up our souls against the most elevated and refined enjoyment, if we neglect the duty and the privilege—the blessed privilege of prayer?

Is any man so blinded to his own spiritual interest, so superficial in the faith of the Gospel, as to suppose he can meet the ills of life with a becoming resignation, and be prepared to triumph over the gloom, and fear, and agony of death, if he has never risen to an intimacy, and an affectionate communion with him who will swallow up death in victory; and anchored his heart, his all within the vail, by the habit of prayer, and an assiduous cultivation of all devotional feelings?

We feel that we could ill endure the evils, and ill appreciate the blessings of social life, if we should shun the presence and sympathy of our friends and neighbors, and undertake an entire dependence upon our own individual resources for a sufficiency of enjoyment and a support in afflictions. How a little pleasure may be increased, how some common joy may be heightened, if we know it is shared and relished by one whom our heart holds dear. When in the fruition of some rare occasion of happiness, how instinctively will our mind call up some absent object of its affections, and recognize the enhancement of happiness that we should receive, could that dear one share the sacrament of love, and enjoy with us the rich felicity!

So also in the bitterness of our sorrows, we may find alleviation—we may find relief, and comfort, and refuge in the assurance that there are those around us who sympathize with us, who are interested in our welfare, who are recipients and reciprocators of our love, and sharers of our griefs and burdens. What a blessing do we receive—what endearments do we find in the interchange, in the commerce of kindred sympathies, and attachments, and the division of mutual cares and sorrows!

Let us apply this thought to a communion with God. Let us conceive of him as a Father, the tenderest in compassion; a protector, the most unslumbering in his care; a benefactor, the most liberal in his bestowments, and a friend, the most constant, the most wakeful, the most infinite in love. Revelation encourages us in this noble conception. And now let the question be put to the struggling, soaring soul, how she can enjoy the good and endure the evil of this life, as they should be enjoyed and endured, without living, if I may so speak, in affectionate intimacy with that father, protector, benefactor, friend? How can we place a just valuation upon a single blessing, without living in the constant intercourse of his spirit, in the refined society and sunshine of his presence; and thus giving life and strength to the feeling that that blessing is the benefaction of a friend, the nearest, dearest, kindest, highest in the universe?

A ring, or a lock of hair, if found at the jeweller's or at the barber's may be contemplated with indifference, as of trifling consideration, and may call up no associations that we would desire to cherish for a moment. But let a ring of the same material and finish, or a lock of the same hue and texture, be the bestowment of some friend with whom we have found a paradise below, in whose affections we have lived, in whose smiles we have rejoiced, and over whose sorrows we have shed the sympathetic tear; and they re-animate associations of the most endearing remembrance, and beget a value in price above gold and a multitude of rubies!—How some trifling relic has been hoarded by the most sacred cravings of the soul, loved above our chief treasure, and made to supply the absence, and raise up the familiar image of a kinsman or friend, long after that friend has been gathered to his people; when the same thing separated from every association of friendship and affection, would be cast to the winds as of no imaginable worth!

You readily enter into my feelings, and can see the application of this idea, to things relating to God. By the individual who seldom has them in his thoughts; who holds with him no communion; who entertains of him but a cloudy and indifferent conception, and feels, if he can feel at all, that he is far away from his merciful, spiritual presence—by that individual the most stupendous, as well as the most trivial—the most endearing as well as the most common benefits of life are all received with an ignorance of their value, and an indifference to their origin, resulting in heartless ingratitude, and torturing ennui.

He lives without prayer—he lives without a kindling of devotion in his bosom. Like the unconscious brute, he never lifts his mind above the indulgence of his lust and appetite, and how can he feel that God is his friend? How can he conceive that he is not driven away from his smiles, from his presence, from his kingdom? And how can he enter into his seared and grovelling heart to suppose that every favor of existence, every faculty of mind, every particle of good, and every beautiful prospect that his eyes behold, is a gift from that dearest, and most constant, most tender of all friends, our heavenly Father! Live without prayer! O most lamentable thought! O most desolate condition! It is to live without life, and without any of the higher enjoyments of our lofty nature! It is to live in sorrowing indifference to the love, and care, and continued mercies of the Friend of friends. It is living a stranger to the Father, while he is surrounded by the glory of his works, while he might discover his spirit warming in the sun, glowing in the stars, refreshing in the breeze and blossoming in the woodlands—a stranger to the Father while he is preserved by his hand, and while he abides in the bosom of his family!—a stranger to the Father, whose bestowments, if he would only make his acquaintance in prayer, would call up before his mind, as with a resurrection trumpet, the tenderest recollections, the most sweet and sacred associations; and benefits, which, like the gifts of the dearest earthly friends, would be yet a value, and elicit an out-pouring of gratitude, that the consciousness that they came from a Father, only could produce!

If such is the abandonment—if such is the moral and spiritual bankruptcy of him who never prays, what shall we say of that man's enjoyments—of his untold affluence, who by prayers and thanksgivings continues day unto day to draw near to God? Who by his generous and grateful devotions, dwells with the Father, in a connection, not irreverently speaking, that may be termed friendship—intimate, familiar, blessed friendship—of which that of earthly associations is but a feeble anticipation! He comes before his Maker daily—not in tormenting fear, not with cloudy, and narrow conceptions—not in base and sycophantic adulation. O no! He comes before him with a supreme love, with a holy reverence, with a radiant and rapturous vision, and a spirit of devotion that would ennoble the burning bosoms of angels and cherubims! O favored man, who shall describe thy happiness? What words have power to name thy joys, and depict the blessedness that crowns thy daily portion? Who shall set prices upon the gifts thou receivest from the merciful object of thy worship?

What shall separate thee from the love—what banish thee from the spiritual presence of God? Shall tribulation, or anguish, or famine, or nakedness, or sword? Art thou shunned by thy neighbors? God thy Father visits thee and crowns thee with his favors! Art thou hated and cruelly wounded of men? God loves thee with an infinite kindness and showers upon thee compassion according to the multitude of his tender mercies. Art thou an alien from the churches, and doomed of men to future unimaginable sorrows? An angel comes down and sings to thee saying, "Fear not: for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people!" Do fools make a mock of thy religion, and wicked men attempt to drive thee from thy loyalty to the banner and standard of the cross? The oracle of thy holy Father declares—"They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles, they shall run and not be weary, and they shall walk and not faint!"

To conclude—I say, my brethren, if there were no other blessing attendant upon a habit and spirit of devotion, this endearing connexion—this sacrament of love with God to which it exalts the prayerful mind, is enjoyment and reward of sufficient bliss, and sufficient glory! It is an earnest of heaven. It is an enjoyed inheritance of the kingdom of God. It enhances the value of every blessing, it mitigates the bitterness of every sorrow, and gives to us a confidence, a boldness in the day of trial, and care, and suffering and bereavement! Do we part with friends? We feel that God, a greater friend, is very near, our refuge, our strength, our comfort in the sorest trouble! Are we bereft of a dear parent? We feel that God is a parent, the kindest and tenderest and best in all the world, who will turn our mourning into joy and will comfort us, and make us rejoice from our sorrows! Do we languish in sickness, or disappointment, or misfortune? Our acquaintance with God assures us that he will deliver us in his own good time, from all our distresses, and bring us home to the desired haven!

THE CONTRAST.

BY REV. H. BELDING.

Let any one turn his thoughts within himself, and see how the case stands there. Let him take into consideration the course he has pursued, and is now pursuing. Let him reflect, and see what have been his motives and intentions all the while. Have they been such, as his own individual judgment and conscience can approve, and sanction? Has he been honest and upright in all his dealings with his fellow men? And can he look every human being in the face, and say in sincerity and truth, never have I meaningly done you wrong?—In fine, has he performed his duty to himself, his fellow man, and his God? If he has, on a review of his conduct, he will be satisfied with himself.—No guilty fears will damp his joys: and, to a man of this cast, we may safely say, he feareth God and worketh righteousness; and therefore, is accepted of God.

So much for the rule, to determine when a man is righteous: and I may add, this rule will hold good in every case. And when we see a man of this description, we need not ask the common question, "does he belong to a church; and if so, what one?" No; these things have no place, in deciding by the rule I have named. Nor need we question him as to the changes he may have undergone: nor have we any occasion to learn his "experience," before we can decide in his case. His condition speaks for itself, unclouded by mystery; and it tells you, the man is a righteous man,

Let us now turn our attention to the opposite character. He has not followed the same upright course with the other. His intentions have partaken largely of fraud, deceit, and treachery. Ask such a man, if he is satisfied with the course he is pursuing; and his down cast eye will tell you, that he is not and can not be: and, should his lips declare the true state of his mind, they would tell you, that his soul was far from being the habitation of peace.

Ask that miserable deluded youth, who is already far gone in the ways of sin; who has been frequenting the haunts of vice, and dissipation; who has fondly imagined happiness to be found in the paths of iniquity! O! ask him, if he is satisfied with his present practices; and if his condition is just what he desires? Is there no lack of any thing, to render him contented, and happy? Has he no want? Yes, he wants the one thing needful; and that one thing is innocence. Without this, though the whole earth may lend its aid, all is vain. For him the songster may tune his sweetest notes—for him the flowers may bloom, and fruits ripen upon the bough—for him the fields may yield their hundred fold. Nay more, the nearest, and dearest kindred may linger around, to soothe his peace-forsaken soul; all, all is useless, all alike unavailing and unsatisfactory. Memory, which to the righteous is the harbinger of peace; which brings back by-gone days, and kindles anew the joys of other years, to him is but the messenger of woe.

Ah, how gladly would such an one make an utter oblivion of much of the past, and bury it in dark forgetfulness! But alas, the memory of deeds, past recalc, haunt his guilty soul. He looks back to the days of his childhood, ere yet he had forsaken the ways of virtue. Those were indeed blessed days—days long to be remembered, but never to be recalled—days that will live in the recollection, and be as the sunny spots of existence, upon which the mind will delight to dwell.

He thinks of the time when, with a merry heart, he innocently passed away the period of his youthful days. But in taking a view of his after life, he comes to the time when temptation assailed him. Memory, true to its office, brings up the time when the paths of vice and virtue stretched out before him—when was made that choice, upon which depended future peace. Then virtue raised her warning voice, and proclaimed audibly, "this is way, walk ye in it." But vice threw her enchantments around him, and ruin dire has followed.

To many—alas, to too many, this description will well apply, answering as face answers to face. Many who are now travelling "the broad road that leadeth to destruction," a shame and a disgrace to themselves, and a burden on society, are so merely in consequence of a wrong choice made in past time; when their destiny was hinged perhaps upon a single circumstance. In an evil hour, when some temptation to vice proved too strong for resistance, a course of iniquity was commenced, that has brought ruin and desolation in its train.

But should any one not feel satisfied with the bitter things he has found mingled in the cup of the transgressor, and should he wish to go still farther, and learn more of the ways of the wicked, let me tell him, he will if he make the attempt, find he is treasuring up repentance against the day of repentance—laying up in store, sorrow for future use, which will, most assuredly, come upon him. Nor can it be evaded—no; for so surely as consequence follows cause, so surely must misery follow in the train of vice. You know what your own experience has uniformly told you thus far; you know that through your whole life, where you have dared to transgress, a righteous retribution has followed. And can you, dare you hope that it shall not be so in future? Can you think the sentence pronounced by God against the sinner, will not be faithfully executed? He hath said, "there is no peace to the wicked;" and the wicked, if they are honest, will tell you the same.—Nay, more, experience teaches the same truth, speaking in accents too plain to be misunderstood.

And should there be any not yet satisfied with what he has seen and felt in his own individual case, who wishes information from him who is farther on; who has gone still onward, and downward in the path of iniquity; let the appeal be made, and of him learn, whether the road grows more smooth the farther it is advanced in.

Where is the old transgressor—he who is hardened in crime and villainy—whose soul is black with guilt! To him would I appeal! How is it with the murderer—who, forgetting all the ties of kindred and brotherhood, has been imbruing his hands in his brother's blood? Ask Cain, and he will tell you, in the agony of his soul, "my punishment is greater than I can bear." And so it will be in every case; the regulations made by God, for the guidance of the moral world, being impartial in their operation. They have their bearing upon each individual, and they are immutable. What was true of mankind, in olden time, is true now. "The way of the transgressor was hard," when the patriarch rested in the land of promise. It was so when the prophet raised his warning voice against Nineveh, Babylon, Tyre—when he told of the desolations hanging over Moab, and Edom! It was so when Sodom and Gomorrah met with their fate amid the fires from heaven! It was so when the proud Pharisee, and haughty Priest, met the Saviour's keen rebuke; and when Heaven frowned upon devoted Jerusalem, and sent the fell destroyer forth to the work of desolation!

Nor has an age or a generation passed since those ancient times, in the history of which, the same eternal truths may not be read; and the times are come down to us, stamped with the impress of the Deity, saying peace to the righteous; but woe to the wicked!

ANOTHER ACCESSION

To the Ministry of Reconciliation.

Br. Grosh—I have the satisfaction of announcing that another laborer has entered the vineyard of our Master. Br. J. J. Ausin, a young man of of irreproachable character, good attainments and excellent talents, about two months ago commenced and has since been proclaiming to good acceptance, in this place and the vicinity, the boundless love of Almighty God, and the final universal holiness and happiness of man. His discourses evince much deep thought and reflection, a logical and well disciplined mind, and a correct knowledge of the philosophy of man and of the works and word of God. His delivery is pleasing and agreeable, and rapidly improving; he is indefatigably industrious, and, if blessed with health, he can but succeed. At present he is residing with me, and will supply such societies and neighborhoods in this section as need and will procure his services. We cheerfully recommend him to our brethren in the faith of a world's salvation, as every way worthy of their confidence and liberality.

U. S. CONVENTION.

There was a request passed by the Ohio State Convention, if I mistake not, at the request of the friends in Akron, Ohio, that this Convention continue its session over the Sunday following the third Wednesday in September—that is to say, that the Convention hold a session of five days instead of two. The following proceedings of the Western Reserve Association of Ohio, have reference to the same subject. Of course, it comes too late for many of the State Conventions to act upon the subject, and must therefore be left wholly to the delegates themselves when they shall assemble. But the request may be spread before the public in our periodicals, and talked over among the delegates, so that those concerned may be prepared to act when the time arrives.

THE PITCHER IN THE WELL.

I shall venture again a few words to say,
Though censured so hard by my brother S. J.—
There is much ridicule stamped in his words,
Yet 'tis but the fruit which his doctrine affords.

It seems by his writing that he would have youth,
Take all that his ministers say, to be true;
Yes, they must throw logic entirely away,
And take all for granted that the preacher may say,
Though not from the Bible some subject he draws,
Yet 'tis not for youth to ask him the cause;
But they must keep silent, nor doubt in the least,
The high "Ipse dixit" of the Partialist priest.

Had reason to youth never been given,
They might by false teaching, have doubted in heaven;
Then, thanks to our Maker and Father above,
For this best of all blessings, this proof of His love.

I should not at present have taken the pen,
To be called e'er again a teacher of men;
Had my brother but answered the question proposed,
I willingly then would the subject have closed.

Undoubtedly he an answer designed,
To furnish from Scripture, but none could he find;
For not one of the passages which he has shown,*
Will reply to the question, as he must have known.

In the first part of Genesis we can there read
That heaven and earth, and all things were made;
Now if there's a hell of endless despair,
It would, without doubt, have been spoken of there.

A place of such vast importance to man,
Would not been forgot when creation began,
But would have been mentioned in accents more dire,
Than the ministers use, when preaching hell fire.

That there is a HELL, I have not denied,
And Jonah, too, knew it when from it he cried;
David's soul, while on earth, was delivered from hell,
Even from the LOWEST, as the Bible doth tell.

Where there is sin, there's a hell in the breast,
Like the sea that is troubled, it can not find rest;
But this too shall cease, for in Romans we read
That when we are dead, from sin we are freed.

The grave, in the Scriptures, sometimes is termed hell,
And we read that our Saviour not long there did dwell;
But triumphantly rose at the dawning of light,
Dispersing the clouds of error's dark night.

He died for the WORLD, and in time he will win
The last wayward child from his bondage of sin;
When this is accomplished, there'll be no more hell,
'Twill then be destroyed, for ALL WILL BE WELL.

THE IMAGE OF GOD, IN WHICH MAN WAS CREATED.

BY REV. D. PICKERING.

We read in Genesis i: 27, that "God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them."

Thus is man distinguished by the inspired penman from all rest of the creation of God. The image of God was impressed upon him. This is not said of any other creature in the universe, but of man alone.

We are all concerned to know what this image is, and to be able to understand whether we possess this distinguishing mark of the divine favor, as well as the primordial pair, and why it was ever bestowed by the Creator.

Numerous conjectures have been afloat in the religious world concerning this image, and yet they fail to satisfy my mind. The most popular and wide-spread of which is, that it was "righteousness and true holiness." But I object to this definition, and offer my reasons.

1. Righteousness with man, is doing right, not being created or placed in any particular situation by his Maker: but man was created in this image—therefore he had no action in the case. The same is true of holiness; it is thinking, meaning, or doing what is well pleasing in the sight of God.

2. With this error is connected another, viz:—That Adam by his fall, lost this image, so that all his posterity are ushered into being without it.—But what reasons have we to believe that Adam and his companion ever lost the image in which they were created? The Scriptures nowhere afford us any such instruction. Nay, the very reverse of this is contained in sacred writ. James tells us, "that the tongue is an unruly member, full of deadly poison. Therewith bless we God, even the Father; and therewith curse we men, who are made after the similitude (likeness or image) of God." Nor was he here speaking of Adam and Eve, but of their multiplied posterity. So that it is rendered perfectly plain by this testimony that the transgression of the primordial pair did not destroy, nor even affect this image in the least possible degree in their posterity: nor is there the least evidence that it impaired that image in themselves.—Thus far the subject appears perfectly plain.

It will now doubtless be demanded, what is that image? I answer, it must be moral intelligence. This, no creature on earth but man, possesses. It could not be his shape, for God is a pure, immortal and all pervading Spirit. Nor is there any other being on earth that possesses this moral intelligence; hence there is no other being here below who is capable of improvement in the science of moral virtue. If sin could destroy this divine image, man would cease to be a moral agent, and consequently cease to be accountable to his Maker, or any other being.

This is the plain line of distinction between the human and the brute creation. By this noble principle, man is rendered capable of improving in moral virtue, while the whole brute creation is utterly destitute of all such means of improvement.

Let us then, brethren, awake from our lethargy, and improve this noble, this distinguishing characteristic of our higher nature, that we may escape the condemnation of sin, and enjoy the constant approbation of our conscience and our God.

THE BLACK RIVER ASSOCIATION.

Br. A. B. Grosa—In the minutes of the Black River Association, which we see in the Magazine and Advocate this day, we find proceedings of a most peculiar and extraordinary character—unprecedented in the history of our denomination—and they not only reflect upon Br. W., but upon the Committee of Discipline of the St. Lawrence Association, and the Association itself, also. We respectfully ask of you the privilege of saying a few words by way of reply.

It is well known to many of the readers of this paper, that the undersigned, with Br. J. Wallace, were the Committee of Discipline for the St. Lawrence Association year before last, and that a complaint was made to them against the brother whose name is so often given in the proceedings referred to. Said complaint, furnished by Br. Morse, and presented by Br. Briggs, was by the Committee carefully investigated, and the evidence produced on the trial, fairly and fully considered—the result of which was a unanimous report of the Committee that the charge had not been sustained. The Committee made their report to the Association the next day, (for the investigation, by mutual agreement, was held the day before,) which the council accepted and approved.

About two weeks after the above complaint was lodged, and before the investigation thereof by the Committee, and after the day was appointed for that purpose, a second letter was received from Br. Briggs, sent him by Br. Morse. Why the matter embraced in this second letter was not furnished and presented at the time of the first, we were not advised. But Br. Briggs, after meeting the Committee personally, on the day first appointed for investigation, desired to withdraw it, to which the Committee assented, upon his repeated declaration or promise that it should never be presented again.

This statement of facts will show how "the Committee declined acting on all the charges," and in what manner "the Council refused to hear the evidence in the case," and whether the matter was "disposed of in any rational way," and whether, also, it "has remained for years without an investigation."

The reflection upon our Association we conceive to be as unchristian and uncalled for as all the rest—and we hereby beg leave to say to the world, in behalf of the Association, that it, in harmony with "Christianity and the principles upon which our social organization rest," requires "an unblemished moral character in a minister of the Gospel," and that it has no desire whatever "to put off or elude an investigation" of any case "which the rules of the Gospel and the interests of the denomination demand."

Regretting the necessity which calls upon us to say even thus much in relation to the matter referred to in this brief reply, we would only add, that whether Br. Morse solicited, or the Black River Association volunteered assistance, is not material; that in either case it appears that assistance was deemed necessary. Yours respectfully.

TRUE MAGNANIMITY.

We have the presumption to assert that no one who has seen and carefully observed the ways of the world, will deny that more of the animosities, bickerings and contentions of mankind, have their origin in trifles, than in any real injuries, however aggravating or enormous they can possibly be.—These trifles are magnified by the passions, and seriously impressed upon the feelings, until a mole hill becomes a mountain, and a flake of snow an avalanche, and good fortune to the foolish fellow who contends for them, if he does not get more dust in his eyes than did Don Quixote when he encountered a flock of sheep, wildly supposing them to be a body of armed warriors.

Not only are trifles the subjects of much jarring and discord, but they are often sufficient to determine the character, whether good or evil; to show if there be that within, which scorns to do a mean action; which is respectful, kind and affectionate to friends, generous and forbearing to foes: which acts from principle, from motives honorable and upright. And if there is a severe struggling with the feelings or passions for gratification, there certainly is a more than counterbalancing enjoyment and dignity of character in "yielding a little for peace." Of this we have a case in point. Two lads at school, L. and H., contended for a place of preferment. Each seemed unwilling to yield, and the countenance too, and agitation of each betrayed the contending emotions within. After some little time of obstinacy, L. with a brightened eye and yielding smile looked the other in the face and said, "If he was going to feel very bad about it, he might do as he liked." H. did so with apparent triumph, but it was of short continuance; a few remarks comforted the one but abashed the other. L. kindly offered his book, ink, &c., and the unwillingness with which H. accepted them, his faltering voice and downcast eye told plainer than words could express, that coals of fire had been heaped on his head. A very easy matter was it to see which was the magnanimous conqueror; a trifle to be sure, yet it might be enough to determine their characters for life—so true it is, that by once governing our passions we disarm an enemy, the second time paralyze his efforts; and a strong one must be if the third struggle does not altogether subdue him.

LETITIA.

June 13th, 1843.

REV. M. H. SMITH.

We have received several requests to furnish some information in regard to this great renouncer. We refer our readers to what we have already published on the subject, in 1841, and 1842—particularly "A Brother's Testimony" in our last volume. For those who can not refer to these articles, we furnish the following, which we select from reputable sources, as containing the most in the least compass. The first article is from Rev. A. A. Miner, of the Lowell Star, who quotes from the Olive Branch, a Protestant Methodist paper of large circulation and excellent literary and religious character. Rev. T. F. Norris, its Editor, and the author of the quoted remarks, is a gentleman of great candor, veracity and held in high estimation by all who know him.

M. HALE SMITH—JUSTICE.

It speaks volumes for the condemnation of the individual whose name stands at the head of this article, that those of other denominations who have unwittingly given a puff to his fame, or currency to his falsehoods, feel themselves compelled by the flagrant injustice he has done us as a denomination, to counteract such injustice by rendering unto the fellow his deserts. We surely have not the least objection to his Rev. brethren of this city availing themselves of the rare talents and questionable integrity of this rabid apostate, however and whenever they choose; but then we think they should be made aware of the view which candid and disinterested men take of him, and of the fact that the holiness of the motive which employs him is by no means apparent.

The foregoing suggestions have been called up by the following paragraph which we take from the "Olive Branch," a Protestant Methodist paper, published in Boston.

"MATTHEW H. SMITH, who has been all around the lot, a little while every thing, and not long any one thing seems to be hot in water, at Nashua, N. H., where now he is settled as an Orthodox clergyman. We should judge from the Christian Register that Matthew's character at Nashua was in keeping with the history of his former life. Smith has been received too readily by different societies, as he has been whiffling round from one sect to another. He is now professedly Orthodox. He was last a Universalist, to which denomination he has twice belonged.—When his influence was just about wholly used up with them, he went over to the Orthodox, and published a book of scandal against those with whom he had last associated as Christian brethren. In the next somersault he very likely will play the same trick with the respectable denomination with whom he now associates. We publicly refer to this man in this way, because we incautiously notified the public of Smith's libellous book being on sale, which we supposed was only a polemical attack on the theology of the Universalists. But on reading it we found it a gross tissue of personalities, and of low charges against respectable individuals and societies, having really nothing to do with the theological views of those whom he attacked. We wish to wipe our hands from any participation in such a course. We would be happy to see what we think erroneous in the creed of Universalists refuted and put down, but we never will be a party to an attack on the morals and characters of a class of men, who, as far as we know, stand as high on these points as any of their more Orthodox neighbors."

As a farther manifestation of the lack of public confidence in his integrity, we would mention that we are credibly informed that several dozens of Mr. Smith's book have been sold at auction recently in Boston, at from 3 to 5 cents per dozen. This seems to be at present, therefore, the market price of orthodox slander.—Star of Bethlehem.

In addition to these "signs," it may be added that at a late election in Nashua, N. H., Rev. M. H. Smith (now settled there as a Congregationalist) ran for a town office in opposition to Rev. L. C. Browne, Universalist. The Reverend Renouncer and slanderer obtained six votes, and Br. Browne some hundreds!

The next article is an extract from the Sun, of Baltimore, Md., where it appeared as a public defence against some gross attacks made on Universalists, based on Smith's book. It was probably written by Br. Shrigley; and is well known by all who know Smith's course, to be very mildly correct—the half of the fellow's baseness and falsehoods have not been told; as his present supporters are beginning to learn. No honest and well informed Partialist in Massachusetts will vouch for Matthew H. Smith's veracity. A. B. G.

We have been personally acquainted with Mr. Smith, more than eight years, and it may be presumed that we are as well acquainted with his history as Br. Heiner. It may be asked, if the statements in his book can not be relied on as correct. I answer, he has been guilty of writing that which was not true, as the following testimony will show.

The following letter was written by him with the intention of preventing the settlement of a brother minister:

Providence, Jan. 12, 1836.

"Rev. Sir:—I write because I am your friend; before you remove to this place, you should be acquainted with the fact, that the Society are not united in you. I hope you will come, but in justice to you, I have told you a plain truth, that you may come with your eyes open, etc.

"Your friend, A MEMBER OF THE SOCIETY.

"To Rev. W. S. Balch."

This letter was superscribed to "Rev. W. S. Balch, Claremont, N. H."

Rev. Mr. Balch became suspicious that the letter was a trick of Matthew H. Smith, and accordingly wrote him and charged him with the authorship of it. Mr. Smith denied it in the following letter:

Roxbury, March 24, 1836.

Rev. W. S. Balch—Dear Br.—I received at the Trumpet office this day, a letter from you, etc. * I can only say to you, as I have said before, that I AM NOT the author of the letters to which you refer, I HAVE NO KNOWLEDGE OF THE AUTHOR, and have never had any more connection with the writing of them than yourself, etc."

Signed M. H. SMITH.

And yet after all, M. H. Smith did write that letter, and he has acknowledged it. He was called to account for his repeated falsehood in regard to this transaction by the Committee of Discipline of the Massachusetts Convention, and finding that all his denials were of no avail, and that the committee fully believed he was the author of the letter, he at last confessed it, and with great professions of sorrow, asked forgiveness. This circumstance saved him from expulsion at that time. The following is an extract from Mr. Smith's letter to Rev. H. Ballou, in which he acknowledges himself to have written that which was not true.

Salem, Jan. 5, 1839.

Br. Ballou—I have no reluctance in penning the following statement:

I WROTE THE LETTER TO W. S. BALCH, which on Friday last, I saw in your hands.

Signed M. H. SMITH."

Superscribed, Rev. Hosea Ballou, Boston, Mass. "A true copy of the original on file. L. R. Paige, standing clerk of Massachusetts Convention of Universalists."

This is the man whose writings are considered by Br. Heiner good authority against his Christian brethren. This is the man who Br. Heiner says was too good to remain among the Universalists!

REV. PARSONS COOKE, AN ORTHODOX PREACHER IN LYNN, MASS., and editor of a Partialist paper, called the 'Puritan,' published his opinion of Mr. Smith in his paper, on this wise 'if he (Smith) is an impostor, he is a foolish one—if he is a maniac, he is a strange one. The phenomena of such a mind defy classification. They are subject to no laws, either of rationality or delirium.'

Rev. Charles W. Upham, pastor of a Unitarian Church in Salem, Mass., writes of Mr. Smith as follows:

"Salem, March 10, 1841.

"Mr. Smith's moral honesty can only be vindicated, if at all, by pleading disease and alienation of mind; and such being the case, his conversion can carry no weight, and be of no benefit to any party, and his denunciation can do no harm."

Yours, respectfully, CHAS. W. UPHAM."

Mr. Smith's own brother, Rev. D. D. Smith, writes the following, under date of May 20, 1842:

"The description he (Matthew H. Smith) gives of his early life and conversion, are so untrue to nature, that we recognize nothing of resemblance in his biography to the actual history. He has followed a wild imagination, and its fitful wanderings have caused him to do great injustice to those of whom he professes to write. He has prepared for himself the bread of sorrow, humiliation and shame. We know that the most prominent statements in his book are false.

D. D. SMITH."

Matthew H. Smith acknowledges that he is subject to delirium, in his book on pages 18 and 46. Mr. Heiner is desired to read to his congregation, the account Smith there gives of himself.

I conclude this publication with the following, written by the Rev. Thomas Whittemore, of Boston, and published in his paper, under date of April 10, 1841.

"Mr. Smith commenced preaching among the Christian Baptists. Rev. Mr. Himes, of Boston, says he preached his first sermon in his pulpit, in Plymouth; very early in life he was baptized by his own father, and joined a Christian or Christian church. His first change was from that sect to Universalism. His second was from a Universalist to a Presbyterian, while in Hartford, in 1835. His third change, was from Presbyterianism to Universalism, in four or five days from his 2d.—His fourth change was to Unitarianism, in Salem, in 1839. His fifth was from Unitarianism to "Orthodoxy," in May, 1840. His sixth was from "Orthodoxy" to Universalism, in a few weeks after. And his SEVENTH change, was from Universalism, to endless misery, in a few weeks after his sixth change!!" Other facts in regard to this Mr. Smith, will be published if circumstances call for them."

* The changes here should have been numbered from ONE TO EIGHT, for Mr. Smith's conversion to the Christian Baptists was his first denouement.

NOISY CHILDREN IN CHURCH.

Br. T. B. Thayer, of the Star of Bethlehem, has returned from a tour up country, and published a journal of travels and labors. In this journal he has the following chapter on noisy children in church. (It was at Springfield, Vt.)

"NOISY CHILDREN IN CHURCH.—Just after we opened our mouth in speech, a child on our right did the same, very much to our discomfort. In a few minutes another on our left commenced operations, and responded most heartily to the communications made. The utterance was not with any sort of diffidence, but with perfect fulness and freedom. Not being accustomed to such decided expressions of approbation, and being rather modest withal, we were somewhat disconcerted. Not knowing, however, what "Varmount" customs might be, we endured for a while as well as we could. But at last it came altogether too fast and loud. Exposed as we were to a heavy fire from both the right and the left, and finding that our thoughts were drifting rapidly into chaos and darkness, we were compelled to run up a signal of distress.

Accordingly I very respectfully notified the "pa" and "ma" that I could not talk when others were talking, and that as only one at a time could be heard to advantage, we had better come to some arrangement. It was suggested farther, that if I was allowed the floor, I should be glad to have the children kept quiet, and if this could not be, that there was a remedy they doubtless knew, without my naming it—whereupon they arose, stood upon their feet, took up their "babies" and walked—and lo, there was a great calm!"

We can very fully appreciate the embarrassment of Br. T. in the case above recounted. He was annoyed by the chattering of the little ones, but he knew not how it might be endured by the mammas, or even papas of the noisy dears, if he should ask for silence. We, a few years ago, lost a member of our society, and procured the settled enmity of a family, by kindly asking that a noisy child should be removed from the meeting. The little innocent set up a talking, which continued for some minutes. We tried to drive through, fearing to give offence, and expecting every moment that the mother or friend of the child would remove him. He was gaining the attention of one after another, until at length the most devout had to give up the preaching to hear the baby. We could not then proceed, and stopped for half a minute in silence. Yet the cause of the disturbance continued. The lady sat with her head down, and we knew not who it was; nor would it have made any difference if we had. We modestly requested that the person in charge of the child should remove him from the house. Our request was complied with; but the price of it was the enmity of that family.

The preacher who is imbued with good feeling has many things to try him. All attendants at the house of worship should love and promote the good order of the meeting, and when the preacher finds it necessary to suggest a wish in regard to any matter which has fallen out of place, all should understand that he has it not in his heart to illy treat his friends, and should be as one in bringing things to the right. All things should, and may, in the concerns of a religious society, be done decently and in order.—Christian Freeman.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

EDITED BY

Rens. A. B. Grosh, G. W. Montgomery and A. C. Barry.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JULY 28, 1843.

"IF UNIVERSALISM IS TRUE, WHERE IS THE USE OF PREACHING IT?"

We teach it, that men may know what God is—who he is—how worthy he is of universal and unlimited love and confidence; and how deserving therefore of our best service and constant obedience. And should the unobservant and unreflecting inquirer wonder at our answer, we can turn him over to his fellow believer in God's infinite wrath and vengeance, and man's endless sin and despair, who, in the moment of more than common distress and grief, is vainly seeking consolation in a creed of bitterness and death.

Go to the mother, or wife, or sister, bending over the corpse of a rash but noble minded and generous son, husband or brother, who has been called from earth suddenly, or when bereft of proper reason or reflection.—That fondly loved son or brother, died and made no sign.

He lived reckless of life, and uncaring even for what is called religion. Often, and often, had he been solicited to attend to the concerns of his soul—but he turned away lightly from the entreaty with a remark, that there would be time enough for that after a while. Many a time, when he was in the busy store, or at the gay ball, has the fervent prayer, and the earnest supplication gone up, accompanied with sighs, and tears, and groans, that God would have mercy upon him—that the Holy Spirit might powerfully strive with him, and bring him to repentance and to life. But his bright eye remained undimmed, and his light heart unoppressed by such conviction and conversion. At last, he was called to leave the earth. Up to his departure, he remained the same kind hearted and affectionate child and brother—fondly devoting his energies to render comfortable and happy those around him, and winning the esteem and warm love of all who knew him in return. Suddenly was he taken from the warm embrace. With slight warning was that kindling eye quenched, and that warm heart-pulse hushed in death. He died, and made no sign.

That mysterious and miraculous change of which so much is said and so little is known—deemed so absolutely necessary to salvation, and yet not experienced and continued in until death, by one out of a hundred in even our Orthodox Protestant Churches—to say nothing of Catholics, heretics, Mahomedans and Pagans—that mysterious change he never experienced in life! Where, then—oh where is now that almost idolized son, and brother and husband? In heaven?—in hell? Torturing—heart-wringing, brain-searing question! Go to that mourning mother and sister, and attempt to answer it with the promises of Jehovah—the assurances of God's universal goodness—and the bursting heart of the mourner will answer the question—"If Universalism is true, what is the use of preaching it?"

Oh, how often have we heard the Partialist mourner, whose son had been humbled, and purified, and rendered compassionately tender and affectionate by affliction—how often have we seen such clasp the hands, and raise the tearful eye as they uttered the fervent wish—"Oh, that I could believe as you do!—Oh, that I could see clearly that the Bible teaches, that ultimately all mankind will be made holy and happy—that my son whom I lost—my husband whom I have just buried—my brother who was even now stricken suddenly from my side—that these dear, dear ones will be made holy and happy in eternity—oh, if I could but believe this, I should be the happiest being in God's earth—I would be willing to die—to praise God and serve him forever!"

Yes, such is the language of the despairing Partialist mourner—and after hearing it as we have often heard it, who is there that will be unfeeling and unthinking enough ever again to ask, "If Universalism be true, where is the use of preaching it?" A. B. G.

REV. LEWIS C. TODD.

Many of our readers will probably remember this name, and the circumstances connected with it and our denomination. Br. Todd, a number of years ago, while publishing a Universalist periodical in Jamestown, Chautauque county, in this State, and preaching there and in the neighborhood, became gloomy minded, distrustful, and finally renounced Universalism, bringing some severe charges against the doctrine and denomination.—He joined the Methodists, and wrote a work against Universalism, but not in favor of endless misery, (as we stated at the time,) in which also he complained of the denomination, or, at least a number of our brethren.—Br. Todd seemed strangely bitter against me for some remarks of mine upon his course, which were certainly well meant by me, and which, to this day, I can not see how he could misunderstand as he did. My information was derived from a friendly source, and was correct, and was given without any design to censure Br. Todd, or to cast any imputation upon his motives.

But let that pass—a time may yet come (and most sincerely have I ever desired that it might) when face to face we may talk over the matter, and fairly understand each other. Br. Todd, after remaining a preacher among the Methodists for about a year, left them—renounced endless misery as an abominable and pernicious error—Methodism as a web of corruption, and Methodists as no better than they should be—and declared that his views against Universalism were the result of hypochondria, and that he was no more responsible for what he had published in his renunciation and in his book, than a man is for the ravings of delirium caused by a fever!

Since then, Br. Todd has been settled on a farm—his house, and hand, and heart open to our brethren as before. His health has become good—his heart is warm and his mind clear again, and he has returned to his first love again, we hope and trust forever. He is now once more a Universalist preacher, in full fellowship and good standing. We welcome him gladly to our ranks; and his old friends in all this region most cordially unite in the welcome.

The following letter from Br. Doolittle, of Akron, Ohio, will further explain our meaning. We copy from the Star in the West.

Will not Br. Todd visit this region soon? His old friends, and many others, would gladly see and hear him—and as our Editorial career (as resident Editor, at least,) ends with the present year, after which we shall probably leave Utica, perhaps even the State, we should be pleased to hear that he intended visiting this region this Fall, that we might see him also, and talk over old affairs with him. ### L. C. TODD.

Br. Gurley:—You will perceive by the Minutes of the W. R. Association, that Br. Todd has asked and received the fellowship of this Association as a minister of the Gospel of universal reconciliation. He is now desirous of devoting his time wholly to the work of the ministry. We welcome him into the moral vineyard, and from what we have seen and heard can cordially in friendship and confidence extend to him the hand of fellowship, believing that he will prove a faithful and effectual co-worker in advancing the cause of truth and righteousness among men, as in times past. You know he left us for a season. But like Noah's dove, a wanderer over the wide and watery waste, he found no rest for the sole of his foot, till he returned to the ark of infinite mercy and protection. You know also, that he wrote and published a book against us. But he says he can refute every argument against the doctrine of the final restitution, contained in that work. Thus you see that no weapon can prosper against the truth. He moreover says, he has never preached the doctrine of endless punishment. Br. Todd resides in Parkman, Portage Co. He will probably devote one-half of his time for the benefit of the Society there, and the remainder in the vicinity. May the Lord strengthen his hands, and encourage his heart. And may his labors be blessed abundantly to the upbuilding of the Redeemer's kingdom. N. DOOLITTLE.

ERRATA.

We regret the occurrence of some errors of late in our paper, in consequence of hasty proof reading and other causes.

In No. 28, page 217, in the text, "Jew" and "Gentile" should be in the plural number—the same in the second paragraph. The word "experienced," column 1, line 31 from the bottom, should be "exercised."

The following note from Br. Morse, will explain and rectify his grievances.

"Henderson, July 17, 1843.

Messrs. Grosh and Walker.—In the Magazine and Advocate, of July 14th, in the published Minutes of the proceedings of the Black River Association, and accompanying remarks, I find the following omissions and mistakes: will you have the goodness to correct them?

All but the last, occurred in consequence of mistakes in reading the copy, which was not as clearly written as usual. The last was purposely omitted; because, from information in my possession, I knew that the vote had not been unanimous, even though those opposed to it had not thought it necessary or useful to vote against it, and the statement of Br. Morse added to the original Minutes, (for the Clerk did not, probably, so record that vote,) was, in my opinion, likely to give an impression contrary to fact—an impression, even, that the Clerk was in favor of that vote, and had so recorded it in the original minutes. To avoid controversy, etc., I omitted the remark. Br. Morse, it seems, wishes it inserted.—As he was appointed to prepare the Minutes, I yield to his decision, with this explanation of motives and reasons for my part of the business. A. B. G.

The Western Luminary says—"Br. Price credits the proceedings of the Ontario Association to the Magazine and Advocate. This is wrong. It originally appeared in this paper. The Magazine did not give us any credit but we expected the Union to do better."

If Br. Hammond meant the last sentence for an insinuation that we are in the habit of neglecting to give due credit, or that we have manifested a disposition to wrong the Luminary in this matter—and it does look to us just like the insinuations of past times—then we would ask him for instances in which we have shown such a habit or disposition. We have copied the proceedings of several Associations from the Luminary, and have never, I believe, except in this single instance, failed to give due credit. Why, then, on this single omission, publish an insinuation that we are guilty of such meanness?

But the fact is, we copied those proceedings from a copy sent us by the Clerk himself; with his request (not published in the Luminary,) that Br. Price copy them. Br. P. therefore did not do wrong in crediting the version of the proceedings published by him to this paper. It originally appeared here, and never was published in the Luminary at all, as any one may see by comparing the two versions with each other—wording, italics, and all.

Will Br. Hammond please to correct the statement he made about this matter, and the charge he insinuated against the Magazine and Advocate? A. B. G.

MARRIAGES.

In Preston, May 11th, by Rev. J. T. Goodrich, Mr. STEPHEN E. BROWN to Miss LYDIA ROGERS, both of Preston.

DEATHS.

In Potsdam, May 27th, of consumption, Mrs. SYBIL BAILY, wife of Capt. Benjamin Baily, aged 58 years. This sister in the faith of a world's salvation, was long afflicted with the disease that caused her death; but having imbibed many years ago, correct views of the principles of the divine government, she never complained of her lot. She bore her protracted illness with an uncommon degree of resignation, and died in hope of a union with all the ransomed of the Lord. Long known and highly esteemed for her many excellencies of character, her departure is deeply lamented.

In Malone, May 6th, of disease of the heart, ESTHER ALZINA, only daughter of Lauriston and Nancy Amsden, aged 14 years, 6 months. This was a lovely girl—one of those fair flowers which our kind Father in Heaven has seen fit to scatter here and there, in this world of tears, and yet that never remain but a brief period, to adorn and make fragrant the path of human life. Cut down in the bloom of youth, she has gone to be encircled in the arms of the Saviour, and to behold the glories of heaven.

In Clarence, Erie county, July 8th, after a protracted illness, which she endured with Christian fortitude and patience, Mrs. NANCY WARREN, wife of Orsemus Warren, Esq. In the death of this most exemplary woman, society in Clarence has lost one of its oldest members, and brightest ornaments; a kind husband has been bereft of an affectionate and devoted wife, and eight children are deprived of a mother's tenderness and watchful care. Her funeral was humorously attended in the afternoon of the 9th inst., at the Methodist Episcopal church in this village, and a very excellent discourse for the occasion, delivered from Colossians iii: 2; "Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth," by the Rev. N. V. Hull, (Sabbatarian). Mrs. Warren was a firm believer in God's illimitable and impartial grace, and her unshaken faith in Jesus, as the true Messiah, the Saviour of whole world, sustained her to the last. May He who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb; bind up the lacerated hearts of the mourning family, and impart to them that heavenly consolation, which alone can afford them comfort in their bereavement. J. H.

In the town of Greene, on the 8th inst., Col. ALANSON D. CRANDALL, in the 33d year of his age.

A strong and well cultivated mind and an amiable and obliging disposition, combined with the strictest integrity and morality, secured for the deceased the sincere esteem of all his relatives and acquaintances. None knew him but to love him; and the loss suffered by his death will be long and deeply felt, and widely deplored.

He loved and practiced virtue for its excellency, and detested and shunned vice for its odiousness. As a Christian, he reposed strong confidence in God's unbending and unchanging goodness, and his unspotted life, godly conversation and triumphant death, powerfully exemplify the influence of the doctrine of universal benevolence and grace.—During a very protracted illness, he was cheerful and resigned, and enjoyed greater consolation than he believed any different views could possibly impart. But a day or two previous to his death, he assured those who surrounded him, that he had full confidence in a universal Saviour, and that he should meet them all in heaven. He requested that the Rev. Mr. Goodrich should preach a strong doctrinal sermon at his funeral, and inform the world that he died firm in the faith of universal salvation. And in the full possession of his reason, without a doubt or a fear, a struggle or a groan, he calmly and peacefully fell asleep in Jesus. So lived and died a Universalist.

He is gone! With him the dream of life is over, and the storms of adversity and the troubles that checker the path of humanity, are past forever! His body sweetly reposes beneath the clods of the valley; and his spirit has exchanged the vestments of earth for a better world, radiant with immortal beauty, and glowing with unfading splendor and loveliness. But his memory remains. The deep solemnity of the vast concourse of people, without distinction of sect, who followed his remains to the grave, proves it to be engraven upon the tablets of their hearts.

May his parents, brothers and sisters, and all his connections and friends, look forward to a happy period when they shall again be reunited with him—where friends no more shall part, farewells no more be spoken, and happiness no more be dimmed by the sorrows and separations of time.—Oxford Republican.

At the residence of her son, in Richford, Tioga Co., on the 8th inst., Mrs. REBECCA BROWN, wife of Mr. Thomas Brown of this town, aged 58 years.

For a long time the health of the deceased had been feeble. On the 3d inst., much more vigorous than usual, she left home with her husband, to visit a son residing about 40 miles distant. Unfortunately, a portion of the day was stormy, and in the afternoon and evening she suffered acutely from exposure—so much so, that she did not proceed to the place of her destination until the following day; in the latter part of which her symptoms assumed an alarming aspect. Her disease grew more and more violent until her death. Her remains were brought to this village and interred on the 9th, and her funeral discourse was delivered in the Universalist Meetinghouse on the succeeding Sabbath.

Not only her partner, children and other relatives, but her neighbors, especially the poor and unfortunate, have experienced a great loss—she, an unspeakable gain. Regardless of the sneers of popularity, and the frowns of ignorance, bigotry and prejudice, she was for many years an honest, frank and unwavering believer in the final "restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." During the lucid portions of her last illness, and after all hope of recovery had vanished, she declared that her faith was firm and unshaken; and in her life and death we have added another to the multitude of instances which prove that her sentiments were not only "good to live by," but "good to die by."

May the sorrowful and bereaved look beyond these scenes of darkness and shadows to the land of eternal sunshine and substantial felicity; where they shall meet their departed friends, and sit down with them and rejoice; where they shall drink "clear waters unmingled with bitterness," hear sweet music unmarred by discord, and gather flowers that ever bloom in immortal fragrance.—[Oxford Times.

THE TWO MAIDENS.

"Good morning, Mrs. Hinton," said Martha Green, lifting her head as a visitor entered the room in which she sat, busily engaged in sewing. "You see that I am full of work."

"So you seem to be," was the quiet reply. "But I suppose you can spare to-night for a work of mercy?"

"How a work of mercy, Mrs. Hinton?"

"Poor old Mrs. Bender is very ill—so ill that she can not be left alone any length of time. I have been up with her two nights in succession, and am now looking for one or two young ladies who will take charge of her to-night. Can I depend on you?"

"Not to-night, Mrs. Hinton. It would be impossible. It will take me till twelve to-night and most part of to-morrow, to finish this dress, which I must wear at Mrs. Corrie's party to-morrow evening. Any other time I would go with pleasure."

"I am really sorry for that; I have been to two or three this morning, and all have declined on account of this party."

"Hannah Bell can go as readily as not, Mrs. Hinton. She had her new dress made at the mantua-makers."

"I have seen Hannah."

"Does she decline?"

"Yes."

"That is very strange. What reason does she give?"

"She says that if she were to sit up to-night, it would ruin her appearance to-morrow evening. That it would make her look dreadful."

"There is something in that, you know yourself, Mrs. Hinton. Loss of rest has the same effect upon me. I don't look fit to be seen for two or three days after losing a night's sleep."

"Yes, I know that sitting up does not improve the looks much," Mrs. Hinton gravely remarked; and then, after pausing a few moments, got up, and said, as she moved towards the door,

"Well; I must bid you good morning, Martha, time is passing, and I must find some one who will relieve me, or I shall get sick myself."

"I do hope you will," Martha said in a tone of concern. "Were I not situated just as I am, I should go with pleasure."

And then the visitor went away. After her departure, Martha Green sat thoughtful for some minutes.—She did not feel altogether satisfied with herself, and yet, on reflection, she could not see any cause for self-condemnation. Sincerely did she pity the condition of poor old Mrs. Bender, who was nearly seventy years of age, sick, and without any one in the world to whom she could look, and claim from consanguinity, a single kind office. "But it was impossible for me to go," she reasoned, in the effort to quiet her uneasy feelings, "under the circumstances; utterly impossible."

Still she sat thoughtful, without resuming her needle. At length she aroused herself with the half audible remark:

"Somebody will go of course." And that settled the matter.

It was perhaps an hour after, that a young friend and confidant dropped in to sit an hour with Martha. The conversation run, of course, on the party to be held at Mrs. Corrie's on the next evening.

"You will look beautiful in this dress," the friend remarked, lifting a portion of the garment upon which Martha was at work in her hand. It suits your complexion admirably; besides being of a rich material, and attractive, yet appropriate, and not too gaudy in color."

"I am glad you think so," Martha replied, with a smile of satisfaction. "I don't believe there will be anything half so elegant at the party."

"There will at least be one dress there that will fully equal it," the visitor said.

"Are you sure?" in a tone of disappointment.

"Yes. As I came along this morning, on my way here, I dropped in a moment to see Ellen Willard, and found her at work, as you are, upon her own dress.—She has certainly selected it with exquisite taste. Much as I admire yours, I really think that I should prefer the one she has chosen. She will attract much attention, of course, for you know that she is a girl of a great deal of taste, and knows how to dress to the best advantage."

This intelligence had the effect to change naturally the tone of Martha's feelings. As far as was in her power, she concealed this change from her friend, but after she had left, her countenance expressed much concern. The reason was this. A young man named Alton, had paid her a good many attentions in the last few months, and of such a marked kind, that she had suffered her affections to become a good deal interested. The extent of this interest had not become apparent to herself until within a week or two, during which time she thought that she perceived a slight change in his manner towards her, united with, on two or three occasions, a perceptible preference for the company of Ellen Willard. One reason for her being unusually desirous of making, if possible, the very best appearance at the party of Mrs. Corrie, was to fix again the wavering regard of Mr. Alton. To learn then, that Ellen was likely to equal if not eclipse her, was no very pleasant information, and it troubled her, in spite of every effort to rally her feelings.

Time passed, and the evening came for the anticipated company. Martha was there early, dressed with the most scrupulous regard to effect, yet tastefully, in every respect. Alton came in perhaps half an hour after.—The maiden's heart bounded as she saw him enter, while the soft tint of her cheek, delicate as the rose blossom, deepened its hue. The eye of the young man glanced around the brilliantly lighted room, evidently in search of some one, and then he seated himself alone, as if disappointed, and again slowly surveyed the company. Of course he did not fail to notice Martha Green. In a little while others made their appearance, and soon he found himself by the side of one of his own intimate friends.

"Did you ever see Martha Green look so beautiful?" he said to this young man.

"Where is she?—O yes, I see! Really, she is a superb looking woman!"

"Is n't she? But there is one whom I expect here to-night, that, if I am not mistaken, will eclipse her."

"Who is she?"

"Ellen Willard."

"There she is now. Look at her, and then yield the palm at once to Miss Green. Really, I never saw Ellen look so indifferent in my life."

Alton turned his eye towards the door, and sure enough there was Ellen, plainly dressed, though neat, and her face wearing an expression of weariness. It was a moment or two before he spoke, and then he said in a tone of disappointment—

"As you say, I never saw her look so indifferent in all my life. Still, she is a sweet girl, even though eclipsed to-night, in every way, by Martha Green."

"They certainly will not bear a comparison," responded the friend.

Martha Green, who was sitting beside the friend and confidant mentioned as having called on her the day before, had been glancing uneasily towards the door every time it opened to admit some new comer, and was among the first to perceive Ellen.

"O dear! if that is all, no one here need fear being thrown into the shade to-night," was her exulting remark. "Why, I thought you told me that she was at work on a dress even more beautiful than mine."

"So she was," replied her friend. "And I can not for my life tell why she has not worn it."

"She could not get it done, I suppose."

"Perhaps not. There was a good deal to do on it when I saw her. Indeed, she had just commenced working on it."

"Do you know that I am right glad of it?" Martha said.

"No—why?"

"Because, if she had come out in her very best style this evening, I am very much afraid Mr. Alton would have been much pleased with her."

"Indeed! I thought he was paying almost exclusive attention to you."

"So I have flattered myself until within the last week or two, when he has seemed to grow a little more attentive to Ellen than is agreeable to me."

"You have nothing to fear to-night, Martha. Just see! She has on that old dress worn by her at the last half dozen parties. And instead of her usual brilliant complexion, her skin looks sallow, and her cheeks pale; and her whole face has a dull, lifeless expression. What on earth can be the matter? Something has happened, no doubt, to prevent her getting that dress done, which has worried her so much as to spoil her very pretty face.—And see, with what a look Mr. Alton is now regarding her."

"Yes, I see; and what is more I see that I am safe."

In a few minutes after, Alton took a seat beside Martha, cured, he thought, of the evident preference which had recently existed in his mind for Ellen Willard, over her anxious rival. This preference had not been so distinct as to have been founded upon any serious comparison made in his mind between the intrinsic claims to estimation which the two young ladies presented. It was rather a leaning towards Ellen, without reflection upon the reason why she seemed more interesting to him than Martha. Of course, it required but a trifle to change that state of mind. He now renewed his attentions to Martha Green, with even more than his former assiduity, to the entire neglect of Ellen Willard, who retired at a very early hour.

Towards the close of the evening, he sat near Mrs. Hinton, who was present, and two or three ladies who were conversing. The name of Ellen, mentioned by one of them, attracted his attention.

"Ellen did not look like herself to-night," was remarked by one.

"No," said another, "I never saw her make so indifferent an appearance. And she was, besides, very dull while she remained, and has left the room at an unusually early hour. What can be the matter with her?"

"She is not very well," Mrs. Hinton said.

"But even that does not account for the want of taste and effect in her dress, two things that are always regarded by her."

"I think that I can explain it all," replied Mrs. Hinton, smiling.

Alton listened attentively to what followed, although it was not intended for his ears. He sat near enough to hear all that was said, without making any effort so to do—and he was too much interested to get up and move to another part of the room.

"Well, what was the reason?" asked two or three of the ladies.

"It is a very plain case," resumed Mrs. Hinton.—

"Most of you know old Mrs. Bender. On calling in to see her a few days ago, I found her very ill, and in need of nourishment and attention. In the condition that I found her, it would have been cruel to have left her alone for any length of time. For two nights I remained with her myself, not wishing to trouble any one else, and being much in the hope every day that she would get much better. Yesterday, I found myself so much fatigued from loss of rest, that I was compelled to seek for some one who would relieve me. Accordingly, I called upon several young ladies and asked their assistance. But some, like Martha Green, had their hands so full in making up dresses for this evening that they could not possibly sit up—while others were afraid that the loss of a night's rest would entirely unfit them to enjoy this pleasant company. Any other time, one and all would have come forward cheerfully for the sake of old Mrs. Bender. With a feeling of discouragement, I called in to see Ellen, and found her busily engaged on one of the sweetest dresses I have ever seen. It was to be worn this evening.

"Busy too," I remarked, as I sat down by her side with a feeling that my search for a sitter up would prove fruitless.

"I am busy, Mrs. Hinton," was her reply, "but not so busy I hope, but that I can oblige you."

Instinctively it seems, had she perceived from my tone of voice, that I had a request to make, which her heart prompted her at once to grant, if in her power.

"I am rather afraid, Ellen, that you are too much engaged for what I wish you to do. This beautiful dress is for to-morrow evening, I suppose?"

"Yes."

"And is just commenced, I see."

"Yes."

"And of course will keep you busy to-night and to-morrow."

"I shall not certainly, have much time to spare," was her reply. "But what is it you wish me to do?"

"I did wish you to sit up with old Mrs. Bender, who is very ill."

"To-night?"

"Yes. I have been to six or seven young ladies, but not one can go. I have been up for two successive nights myself, and feel quite worn out."

"Is Mrs. Bender very ill?" she inquired in a voice of sympathy and concern.

"She is—so much so that she can not be left alone through the night."

For a few moments Ellen sat thoughtful, and then said, with a cheerful smile, "I will go over to-night, and sit up with her."

"But you can not finish this dress and do so," I said.

"I know that, Mrs. Hinton. But Mrs. Bender needs my kind attentions a great deal more than I need this dress, much as I have desired to appear in it to-morrow evening, and much as I need a genteel dress for such an occasion. But I had rather go with a calm consciousness of having done my duty, than, without it, to appear in the attire of a queen."

The dear girl spoke with an earnestness that made her cheek glow and her eye brighten. I thought that I had never seen her face wear so lovely an expression. True to her resolution, she went over to Mrs. Bender's and remained with her all night. Her dress could not, of course, be finished; and that was not all. An attack of sick headache was the consequence, the effects of which, upon her appearance, you all observed to-night."

"Admirable girl," murmured Alton to himself, as Mrs. Hinton ceased speaking. "How far more beautiful is a truly good, self-sacrificing action than all the exterior graces that art can put on."

As he said this, he looked up, and his eye fell upon the belle of the evening, Martha Green. But like magic, faded all her exterior loveliness, as he compared it with the moral beauty of the other. He sought not her side again, and left the company as soon as he could do so with propriety.

The next evening found him at the dwelling of Ellen, in whose every look and tone he now perceived a new attraction, and in every movement a new grace. He soon yielded his heart to the power of virtues unperceived and unfelt before—virtues whose bloom and fragrance time nor change can steal away.—[Olive Branch,

THE TEST OF DISCIPLESHIP.

BY REV. S. P. LANDERS, OF WORCESTER, MASS.

"By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another." John xiii: 35.

Baxter truly says, that "Two things have set the church on fire, and have been the plagues of it for more than one thousand years. First, enlarging the creed and making more fundamentals than God has made. Second, composing, and so imposing our creeds and confessions in our own words and phrases, instead of the language of the Bible. When men have learned more manners and humility," continues the writer, "than to accuse God's language as being too general and obscure, as if they could mend it—and have more dread of God and compassion on themselves, than to make those to be fundamentals or certainties which God never made so; and when they reduce their confessions, 1st to their due extent, and 2d to Scripture phrases that dissenters may not scruple to subscribe—then, and I believe never till then, shall the church have peace about doctrinals. It seems to me no heinous Socinianism for which Chillingworth is blamed, viz., Let all men believe the Scripture, and that only, and endeavor to believe it in the true sense, and promise this and require no more of others, and they shall find this not only a better, but the only means to suppress heresy and restore unity."—Preface to "Saint's Everlasting Rest."

In this short extract, by which I have opened my present discourse, there are named two of the principal causes which have tended to produce, not only a diversity of opinions, but dissensions among Christians. The test of discipleship does not now consist in exercising love one toward another, so much as it does in believing, or rather subscribing to, certain articles of faith, which are made the fundamentals of the Christian religion. These articles of faith are not framed in the language of the Bible, but in such words as best suited the minds of the creed makers. There is no Bible language that can be made to express the ideas which they contain. To prove this, I will introduce to your notice the doctrines of one creed, which happens to be first in my mind, which are regarded as the fundamental truths of the Gospel—which are deemed indispensable to our salvation, to our virtue and happiness, and to our being a disciple of the Lord Jesus. We hear of the "holy Trinity"—"three persons of one power, substance and eternity," "the Son eternally begotten of the Father," "the holy Ghost eternally proceeding from the Father and Son," "God's eternal decrees," "conditional and unconditional election and reprobation," "imputed righteousness," "the final perseverance of the saints," "total depravity," "original sin," "endless sin and misery," and thus we might enumerate many others from the same book. A belief in these several doctrines is regarded indispensable to discipleship, by those who hold them as the principles of the Gospel of Jesus. But I frankly confess that it would be a thing utterly impossible for me to become a disciple upon conditions like these. There is such a broad and glaring inconsistency in them, so utterly opposed to every dictate of reason, that the pains of the most severe punishment could not bring my mind to subscribe to them.

But however the world may regard the test of discipleship, we know that Jesus placed this test on the ground of love one toward another. "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one towards another." The apostle Paul says, that though he had all faith, so that he could remove mountains, though he bestowed all his goods to feed the poor, though he gave his body to be burned, and though he had all wisdom and knowledge, yet without love he was nothing—he was like sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal.—Love is the central sun of the universe—it is the essence and nature of God, and the glory of his son Jesus Christ. It is the principle which inclines us to worship our heavenly Father, and the test of our discipleship. We do not judge a true Christian disciple by the amount of his learning, by the abilities he may display, nor by the shape and fashion of his creed. We do not judge him by the professions he may make, by the experience he may tell, nor by the particular sect he may join, but we judge him by the spirit he is of, by the devotion and character of his life, by the interest he feels and manifests in the cause of virtue and religion, by his firm integrity and constant adherence to right, and by the liberal charity which burns in his bosom. It matters not whether such a man be a Trinitarian, Unitarian, Calvinist or Arminian, Methodist, Universalist, Friend, or Baptist; he is a Christian in the best and broadest acceptance of that word. A Christian is known more by his adherence to principle in all the walks of life, than by the name he bears. The name and creed of his sect have nothing more to do with making him a disciple, than the fashion of his garments, the quality of their cloth, or the country to which he may belong. The true disciple "is a slave to no sect, a partisan to no party, a bigot to no creed, a zealot to no dogma, and a servant to no man, save the man Christ Jesus." He believes in no test of Christian faith, Christian worship, and Christian morality, save the doctrines of the Gospel. The creeds of men, as tests of Christian character, of divine acceptance with God, and as bonds of union, he rejects, because of their exclusiveness.—Governed by this spirit, he extends the hand of Christian fellowship to all names, parties, and individuals, who manifest the spirit commended to us in the text. In the rugged paths of poverty, he may be destined to walk, but he clings to the principle of right, acknowledging no man master on earth, for one is his Master, even Christ. He is not ostentatious, does not seek the applause of the world, but his great concern is to find the right path, and to feel the approval of his own conscience. When these objects are gained, it is a matter of second importance to him, whether this one or that is willing or not to award to him the Christian name. It was once said, "see how these Christians love another," while they of whom this was spoken, felt the severe intolerance and persecution of the age in which they lived. I trust that the question is settled in your minds as to what constitutes a person a true disciple of Jesus. It is love to mankind. "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another."

When we look abroad upon the aspect of the Christian church, we find a great want of that sympathy and love among the believers in the same God, and the followers of the same Lord Jesus, which the text enjoins as being necessary to be his disciples; in other words, we find, not only a diversity of opinions, but divisions and strifes between different sects, and between differing parties in the same sect. In view of this fact, I wish to direct your attention to two subjects.

FIRST, what are the causes of these evils? and SECONDLY, what is our duty in view of them?—The causes which have operated to produce such a diversity of opinions, and such a spirit of disunion in the Christian ranks, are numerous and dissimilar. The question is often asked, why is there such a diversity of opinions among Christians, when they all go to one book, and that book containing a revelation from God, for the articles of their faith? This is a question so frequently put in the form of an objection to Christianity, that in attempting to enumerate the causes of the evils of which I have spoken, I will attempt an answer.

In the first place let it be understood, that there are certain fundamental doctrines of the Bible, upon which there is the most perfect agreement in sentiment. The being of a God, which lies at the foundation of all religion; the divine authenticity of the Scriptures, as containing a revelation of the will of God; the divinity of Jesus Christ, as the appointed agent to reveal and execute his will; and the resurrection of all mankind from the dead, clothed with a new and immortal nature, are doctrines upon which there is the greatest uniformity of sentiment.

The difference of faith, then, is not upon all the doctrines of Christianity, though there is a diversity of opinion respecting some very important points. The cause of this, lies not in the Scriptures themselves; for they are clear, so that "The wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err" in respect to all the important subjects of faith; but the principal cause is circumstantial and accidental.—When we take into consideration the different circumstances under which mankind are placed, the very different manner in which they are educated and taught from early life up to more mature years, we cease to wonder at the diversity of sentiment we behold around us. The old proverb is true, which says, "as the twig is bent the tree is inclined." Experience has verified this maxim in thousands of instances. With respect to a religious education, we see its truth every day around us.

In the first place, mankind are differently organized and capacitated. Some are fond of the marvellous and strange, and hence they are liable to put forced constructions on the Scriptures and believe in extravagant and silly doctrines. Some have feelings which lead them to be cruel, feelings of pride and self importance, and they are inclined to those systems of faith, which allow of the full gratification of such passions. They regard themselves as better than others; and hence those systems which make a distinction in the final condition of mankind, are the systems of their choice. Some have benevolent feelings which revolt at such representations of God and his dealings, and hence they are inclined to a more merciful faith.

Now if we add to these natural causes, the more important one of education, the mystery of there being so many systems of religion, all professedly found in the Bible, is at once solved. The different religious professors have perhaps been bred up under very different influences. One has had sentiments of a certain kind instilled into his mind from early childhood. His faith, therefore, has "grown with his growth and strengthened with his strength." Another has come up under different influences, and the third under still different, and so on to the end of sects. They have all been pointed to the Bible as the great repository of spiritual life and salvation. They have fixed certain significations to the words and phrases therein contained, all tending to establish the truth of the respective doctrines in which they believe. In view of all these circumstances, I ask is it at all strange that there should be a diversity of opinions, as to the meaning of the Bible? Not in the least; but the great wonder is, that there should be such a uniformity of opinion.

After all, men do not differ more widely in their religious opinions, than they do in other things, of common interest. Look at two farmers living side by side, who differ in opinion even as the best manner of raising a crop of corn. Look at two teachers of science, who have graduated perhaps at the same college, one preferring the Hamiltonian or Bolmanian system of teaching the Greek and Latin, the other the common method. Look at two politicians, both having the same means of information, and both equally sensible and candid, yet differing in all the essential doctrines of government. Look at two medical professors, who have gained their knowledge from the same sources. One plies mineral and the other vegetable remedies—one heals by steam, the other by calomel—one abstracts blood, the other pours in lobelia. The third differs from both of these, and cures his patients by the Homoeopathic system. Look at our statesmen as they assemble from various parts of the country in the capitol of this nation, gravely disputing with each other respecting the meaning of that venerable instrument, the Constitution of the United States. Why is it not, as mysterious that men should be divided in opinion upon all these subjects, as it is that they should differ in religious faith? They all have the same means of knowledge—all perhaps are equally sincere, and equally desirous that right views and practices should prevail. Yet each one believes that he is in the right, and his opponent in the wrong. It always has been that men have differed in opinion, and it always will be so, till we are created anew in the resurrection morn, when we shall see as we are seen, and know as we are known.

We have now spoken upon the natural, circumstantial, and accidental causes of such a diversity of religious opinions, as we find around us. There were two others named at the commencement of this discourse. These were First, making more fundamentals than the Bible makes. Second, composing creeds and confessions in other language than the Scripture. It is these two things, more than all others, that have caused so much hatred and animosity in Christendom, and disturbed the peace and happiness of believers. It is useless, and perhaps injurious, to dwell upon the evils which have been suffered in consequence of attempting to force mankind into a union of opinion. We all know that heresy has been pursued with fire and the sword, and we know that there is yet much of that spirit in existence by which the apostles lost their lives, and by which the church, since their time, has been clothed in mourning.

SECONDLY—What is our duty in view of these existing evils? This may be expressed in a single sentence—by all the means in our power we should strive to do it away. We find a spirit abroad, which, like Procrustes with his iron bedstead, cuts off or stretches out, all who do not suit the standard measure which it has set up.—We must believe so much and no more, so much and no less, or we are not the disciples of Christ. This is a spirit with which we should have no fellowship nor sympathy, let it come in whatever form it may. Christianity is as broad as the universe, and the spirit of charity which dwelt in the mind of Christ, is no more like this spirit of arrogance, than an ice house is like Nebuchadnezzar's furnace. Let those who feel this spirit and arrogate to themselves the Christian name, go learn of the Saviour, and see how broad was his mantle of charity, how deep and universal was his benevolence, and how strong and impartial was his love for the world. It is our duty to imitate the example of our divine Master, and cultivate the meek and lowly spirit which he always manifested, and in this way, check that spirit of intolerance which confines all its charity within the bounds of a single sect.

I want no selfish feelings of this kind, and I will have none. I want a religion that embraces the world in one vast brotherhood; a religion that reaches and satisfies the wants of every human being, that breathes the spirit of love, as pure and as holy as when it gushed from the high courts of heaven. The Christian name has been denied us, and were we to return evil for this act of a bigoted spirit, we might be guilty of as great a breach of duty as that of which we complain. But while we regard it as wrong in itself, for our sect to withhold that precious name from another, merely on account of a difference of faith; it is more divine and god-like to forgive the injury, than to gain redress by a similar course. Uncharitable feelings should not dwell in our hearts. An uncharitable sentence of condemnation should not pass from our lips. I know of no evil in the church which I more deeply deplore, than I do this spirit of contention between different sects. It breaks up the peace of families and neighborhoods. It divides community into parties, which like the Jews and Samaritans of old, have no dealings with each other. For my own part, I would suffer wrong patiently, rather than to add to this alienation. I would treat all mankind as the children of one common Father in heaven; as beings created by the same God, and of the same blood; as possessing the same desires and hopes, and as being subject to the same weaknesses and frailties, with myself and all others.—And could the Christian of every name and sect be brought to see and feel that God regarded all his children with equal compassion and tenderness—could they come into the belief of that great and glorious truth, which teaches that all are destined to share of his mercies at last, and to enjoy his salvation, I believe that their feelings towards each other would be better though they continued to differ in opinion on other points. It would bring down all feelings of pride and distinction, and lead them to love and cherish all whom they regarded as subjects of God's love and salvation. It is wrong views of the divine Being whom they worship, in addition to other reasons, that causes one class of men, or one sect, to arrogate to themselves all the piety and all the soundness of Christian faith, there is in the world.

And after all, the differences of opinion on the subject of religion, which agitate and distract the world, are generally speculative and unimportant. They can make no great difference with us under any of the circumstances of life. The leading principles of the Gospel with perhaps one exception, are recognized by all Christian sects. It is the fundamental truths of Christianity that are the most essential to our happiness, and to comfort and sustain us under the trials of life.

Upon what truths do we dwell with the most delight and satisfaction, when we are called in the providence of God to convey the last remains of a beloved friend, or a near relative, to the silent chamber of death? Is it the divine unity, or the trinity, that we think of then? Is it doctrines like these that occupy our thoughts in those solemn hours? No, no. These speculative systems are forgotten in times of grief and trouble, and the mind dwells with delight upon the great truths that God exists, that he is good, that all the events which he permits are ordained in love, and designed for our highest happiness, and that eventually we shall all awake from the sleep of death to the enjoyment of life immortal. May I not appeal to those who have been called to mourn, for the truth of what I say. To you, Christian mourner, may I not appeal, and ask, when you stood over the wasting body of your friend, or perhaps your companion and partner, and saw the last glimmer of life die away, and a cold and inanimate body come before you, when you wiped the sweat of death from the brow, and felt within your mind as though life itself could be no longer a blessing to you, did you not cling with a peculiar fondness to the truth of God's impartial and unchanging love for all, and to the hope of a resurrection, and a re-union with your friend in a land where parting and sorrow can never come? And mourning parent, when you have been called to yield up your tender babe into the arms of death, and when the little laughing cherub which had been as a star in the family circle, giving light, beauty, and happiness to all, came no more at your call, when the light of heaven and the beauty of earth seemed only designed to mock your ravished feelings, and add poignancy to your sorrow, have you not found a balm for your wounded spirit in the thought that it was safe in the hands of our Creator who gave it; and that Jesus took such in his arms and blessed them, and said "of such is the kingdom of heaven"?

It is important to believe "the whole truth and nothing but the truth," if we can: but then it must be admitted, that there is a great difference in the moral power of many truths, to comfort and sustain the human mind in times of sorrow and affliction. It is these more important ones that we ought to believe and understand.

I believe in God the Father, who hath created a world for his own pleasure and for the happiness of the beings to whom he has given life, and who will ultimately bring them all to the enjoyment of that heavenly inheritance which he has in store for a world; I believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, who is the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person, who was compassionate and forgiving when among men, and who spent his life in serving the human race. I believe in the resurrection of the dead, to a state of immortality, incorruptibility, glory, and honor, and that then, Christ will deliver up his kingdom, and God the Father will be all in all. These truths I regard as essential to our happiness, and to our reconciliation with God; but I can not call the man a heretic who does not believe with me in these particulars. We say with the poet,

"Let party names no more
The Christian world o'er spread;
Gentile and Jew, and bond and free,
Are one in Christ their head.

Among the saints on earth
Let mutual love be found;
Heirs of the same inheritance
With mutual blessings crowned."

Our duty is to "contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints," and while we maintain this faith openly before the world, not to confine our charities to those of our own sect. Let us strive with all the powers we possess, against all improper feeling that may arise in our minds towards others, on account of their difference of faith. Let us do all we can to make peace among ourselves, and to heal those wounds caused by a difference of opinions among Christians in general.

THE RIVULET—A FRAGMENT.

BY MISS MARIA L. STACY.

'Twas one evening just at twilight, that I wandered thoughtfully along upon the banks of a beautiful stream which flowed through my native valley. Oft had I strolled up and down by its side when I was a gay and happy child; but I had been a wanderer from my home—time had passed away since I had mingled with the companions of my childhood, and I was now permitted again, for a season, to enjoy the sweet and well remembered pleasures of my infantile years. I thought of the many happy hours I had spent on the banks of that murmuring rivulet ere my young heart had known the flight of time, or been scathed by the blighting influence of a cold and heartless world. The gay carols of my youthful associates struck my ear as in former days—a pensive undefinable sadness stole over my heart, and I sat down upon the skirts of the stream to muse upon the frailty of human hopes and pleasures. The water wended its way playfully at my feet—a kind of abstract reverie took possession of my mind, and I soon found myself watching the glittering bubbles as they floated along upon the surface of the sportive waters. Some would float joyfully along, far beyond the range of my eyes; and others were caught up in their glad career by some gambolling eddy, and mingled back again with their parent waters. How like unto this, thought I, is the stream of life! Mortal man is indeed but a bubble, floating onward, and liable every moment to be swept into oblivion by some whirlpool of time. 'Tis true that some are permitted to float long and brilliantly, but they too must at last yield to the mighty and overwhelming torrent of time. Be contented then, oh man, to glide tranquilly along upon the stream of life, till the destined time shall come, when you shall be wafted into your native and regained element, there to mingle with your kindred drops, and swell to fulness the broad ocean of happiness and repose.

CONFERENCE AND ORDINATION.

The first Conference of the St. Lawrence Association was held at Nicolville, July 26th and 27th, and we only say, what many have already said of this meeting, that truly it was a good one. It was one of those happy and profitable seasons which the Christian experiences when a whole congregation seems to realize that we are all one in Christ Jesus. There were six sermons preached on this occasion, by Brs. Day, Mott, Hayward and Waggoner. Brs. Mott and Hayward, each preaching twice. The singing was performed by three choirs. The Nicolville singers were joined by the choirs of Canton and Potsdam, and were all led by Br. Ellis of the Canton society—and such music as they made, oh, it raised the soul to heaven!

The services of Br. S. W. Squire's Ordination were performed on Thursday, P. M., and were as follows:

1. Singing, hymn 489, Streeter's Collection.—
2. Reading of the Scriptures by Br. A. Day.
3. Introductory prayer by Br. D. Mott.
4. Singing hymn 486.
5. Sermon by Br. W. H. Waggoner, text, "Goye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature; he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned."
6. Ordaining prayer by Br. J. Simonds.
7. Charge and delivery of the Scriptures by Br. W. H. Waggoner.
8. Right hand of fellowship by Br. H. L. Hayward.
9. Address to Society by Br. W. H. Waggoner.
10. Singing, hymn 243.
11. Benediction by the Candidate.

All the above services were solemn and impressive, and were listened to with deep and tearful attention. Br. Squire was also baptized by immersion on the occasion—administrator, Br. J. Simonds. And he is now fully clothed for the sacred office of an Evangelist; and we hope and believe that he will prove a workman who needeth not to be ashamed. He is located in a very interesting part of the moral vineyard of God, and has already done much for the cause of righteousness and truth. May his bow abide in strength; and may he be sustained by the Master of Christians in all his arduous labors.

ANOTHER REVEREND SCOUNDREL.—The Rev. Jeremiah Knowles, of Mina, Chautauque co., (Christ-ian,) has recently left his family in very destitute circumstances, and in company with a young woman has fled to parts unknown. Mr. Knowles has been very loud in his opposition to Universalism, and is a man of some revival notoriety. I think the public should be cautioned against this wolf in sheep's clothing.

THE LIBERAL DEVISETH LIBERAL THINGS.

It will be seen by the following paragraph which we cut from the Bunker Hill Aurora, that the infidel Unitarians and Universalists sometimes do more in the way of real charity, than their Evangelical neighbors.

"The amount collected in the Churches in this town, last Sunday, for the benefit of the sufferers at Fall River, was $635.23, which was forwarded to the committee next day, viz:

Rev. Mr. Ellis's Society, Unitarian,	$204 50
" Chapin's, Universalist,	151 00
" Humphrey's, Orthodox,	72 00
" Buddington's do	70 39
Baptist,	65 74
Episcopal,	48 00
Methodist,	18 60

Total $635.23

$355.50 of the above amount were collected in the Unitarian and Universalist churches—a sum which overruns the whole amount collected in the other five religious societies $81.37. Were a contribution to be raised for the purpose of sending the dogmas of Partialism to the Heathen, no doubt these five societies would contribute most generously. Well, Religion is one thing; and the cause of Humanity another. H.

EXPOSITION.

"All they that take the sword, shall perish by the sword." Matt. xxvii: 52.

These words of Jesus are supposed by a well known and distinguished critic to have been prophetic, and to have pointed out in the distance the overthrow of the Jews and Romans. His comment is after this sort: "This verse is probably a prophetic declaration of the Jewish and Roman states. The Jews put our Lord to death under the sanction of the Romans—both took the sword against Christ, and both perished by it. The Jews by that of the Romans, and the Romans by that of the Goths, Vandals, etc. The event has verified the prediction; the Jewish government has been destroyed upwards of 1700 years; and the Roman upwards of a 1000."

It is well that we should hear the opinions of all; but it is better that we should think for ourselves. It is well to know the views of others, though it is not safe always, or necessary to adopt them. The opinion just repeated may or may not be true, but it seems more easy and natural to suppose that the expression in question was an observation of the moment, called forth by the circumstances of the occasion; or perhaps a proverbial phrase, designed only to convey the general idea, that those who used the sword continually against others, must expect to have it used against them in return—that if they trusted entirely to this, it would perhaps be turned against them—and that the very instrument which they had used to the destruction of others would in the end prove their own destruction.

The object doubtless was to reprove Peter for his rashness, his readiness to take the matter in his own hands, when he should have looked to God, in such a cause, as the protector of his chosen Son and servant. The work in which they were engaged was God's work; he had sent them to perform it, and he would take care that there should be no failure. How absurd, therefore, for Peter to take the sword, and attempt, by the aid of this, to do what God had determined to accomplish by other means. And beside, if he intended to settle the question by an appeal to violence, to the sword, with the whole power of the government and the people against him, he would surely perish by the sword.

This seems to me the most probable construction, and to embrace what Christ would be most likely to say under the circumstances which gave birth to the text. It is certainly more natural and easy than to suppose they were designed to be prophetic of the fall of the Jewish and Roman governments.

TRIBUTE TO THE DEAD.

The following lines were written after returning home from the funeral of Mr. D. Coats. Thinking they might gratify the friends of the deceased, I have sent them for publication, should they be thought worthy.

Although you never can see here
That father kind and husband dear;
Yet still, my friends, you should not weep,
For him who now in death does sleep.

You would not ask for one to stay,
Whom God saw fit to call away;
He's called him to that heaven above,
Where all is joy, and peace, and love.

No more will your dear friend again
Be subject to disease and pain;
His spirit now has winged its way
To regions of unending day.

Then mourn not for his exit here,
Since he's transplanted to that sphere
Where joy, and peace, without control
Pervades and fills up every soul.

No more, my friends, may you complain,
Your loss is his eternal gain;
But raise your voices to heaven your home,
And calmly say, "Thy will be done."

SARAH.

THE PLEDGE.

A TEMPERANCE HYMN.

BY REV. L. C. BROWNE.

I'll set the glass aside,
And when companions call,
No more will I for friend provide
"The worm wood and the gall."

Our sires, a conscript band,
By power unawed, unbribed,
On freedom's pledge, with cheerful hand,
Their honored names inscribed.

And I will write my name,
And I will pledge my truth,
To quench that all-devouring flame
That withers health and youth.

I'll sign that blest reprieve,
That breaks the captive's chain,
That bids his wife no longer grieve
And gives him life again.

What though I'm not a slave
To goblet, glass, or cup,
Yet I will bend, the lost to save,
And raise the fallen up.

Then cast away the bowl,
And pass the pledge around;
The one can only wound the soul—
The other heals the wound.

SLANDER.

In contemplating the various circumstances that surround us, we are often pained to witness the unreasonableness and cruelty, the suffering and degradation of many on every side. But among all who excite our pity, no one is so much its real object as that one who asks it not—who, if he feels the poverty and emptiness of his soul, confesses it not—who spurns the words of kind remonstrance and tender admonition. It is he who depreciates worth; and not only rejects, but detracts from intrinsic excellence, and disrobes it of its beautiful habiliments of purity! It is the slanderer! The most fiendish imp that bears the semblance of humanity—the most dreaded foe that infests community, and whose weapons of vengeance are the venomous shafts of dire malignity! It is the slanderer who has withered the budding hopes of the promising, enthusiastic youth; and made the once fair world appear to him a cold, unfriendly theatre of accumulating discords; and sent him a lone Eremitic to his secluded cell! It is the slanderer who has made the misanthrope! 'Tis he who has taught him to feel that the whole intelligent family of man are misjudging, heartless, and speculating barbarians—caused him to recoil from the proffered hand of friendship, as from a fair blossom whose fragrant petals he knew enclosed some deadly sting! 'Tis he who has led him to look with suspicious eye on all who approach him, and on all whom he approaches; and to distrust all, as unworthy of even a madman's confidence!

Who has caused the first deep sigh to rise from the maiden's heart? the first bitter tears to course down her blanched cheek—the first desire for utter solitude; and the first misgivings of a friend's sincerity? We need not reiterate, the slanderer—all know 'tis he; he who would pilfer, not from the purse of poorly-estimated gold; but from the inestimable, the priceless store of dear reputation!—Yes, the "fires of hell" have burst from his doomed bosom; and "as a roaring lion" he has sought to devour the only treasure of weak, unoffending woman, whose generosity forbids retaliation—and who, unlike "boasted man," may not strive to retrieve a blasted name! Has not this been long enough the case? shall she yet longer suffer in silence, and not a word of just indignation escape her lips? May not woman's voice be heard in defence of her frail sex, and still her delicacy remain inviolate? At least, we may dip our pens, which should long since have been active, in vindication of the rights of a suffering sisterhood, without incurring the charge of indiscretion from our "lords and masters."

Very many have been the cases of severe protracted sorrow, which were the entire fruits of the base tongue of slander. Those who are the immediate sufferers from cruel and unjust obloquy, claim, and should receive, our aid and sincere sympathy. Most people have experienced injuries enough, directly, or indirectly, from groundless censure, to teach them well to sympathize with the wronged, and to aid in defending from defamation and falsehood. But the injured have sources of hope in the darkest hour of trial. Truth can not always slumber—its light is not extinguished, and though for a time it may be unperceived, its rays shall again brilliantly burst forth, and dispel the dark cloud of falsehood which obscured the vision. The Author of our being overrules in mercy, and dispenses favors according to our deserts; and we shall not fail to receive due reward for our innocence and virtue! And the poor slanderer shall not escape just retribution for the undeserved ignominy that he with excessive liberality has dealt out to his victim. His devastating curses shall return with awful power upon his own heart, which shall endure the writhings of deep remorse! Truly wretched must he be! Though he laugh at the ruin his vengeful tongue has effected; in that demon grin his soul must sicken—rankling envy has not quite consumed the vapor from the crucible of conscience, and we indeed pity much as we detest him! His innocent subject may enjoy the consolation which an amiable, forgiving nature, and consciousness of rectitude, afford; while his breast is agitated by the conflicting emotions to which vindictive malice subjects him. Oh, vile despoiler of happiness! can no power or appeal arrest thy progress? are not the fair hopes which thou hast desolated, adequate to thy avarice? Withhold, then, from the land, thy blasing breath, thy cup of death! Let virtue rear her lovely temple unmolested by thy career of madness! If thou art savable, let seraphs say amen to the fulfilment of mortals' prayers!

A SKETCH.

In my youth I became acquainted with a maiden, bright eyed, beautiful and lovely. Her voice broke forth in the sweetest melody: modesty veiled her cheerful countenance, and the exquisite grace with which she moved caused her every where to shine, fair as the noon-day sun. She was the associate, the confident, ay, the intimate friend of every class and of all ages. She mingled with unbounded freedom in the gay or rude feats of lovely, happy childhood, and the bright, airy step of youth betokened her presence. She joined with pleasure in their merry laugh, and heightened in a manifold degree the bliss of their day-dreams; dreams that when their "teens" were numbered, life would be an even, sunny path, strewn with flowers and pleasant fruit. O days of happy childhood, and pleasing dreams of youth! Why could ye not have stayed with us, and rendered our existence ever joyous and pleasant; or being gone, wilt thou never return to lighten the burden of care, or smooth the downhill of life?

Old age, too, sought her society; and when she was near, they clung to life with a firmer grasp, moved more elastic, and vainly thought they were not old. She entered the gloomy prison cell and whispered to its unhappy inmate that those iron walls would one day be opened for him to breathe again the pure air, and enjoy the undimmed light of nature. Report says that she sometimes told him that an opportunity would present itself for him to revenge an adversary, by committing some greater crime. But be this as it may, it was but one fault of hers, some vile slander, or a counterfeited visitor; for her mission was for good and not for evil.

She went with the mariner o'er the pathless ocean, and talked with him of his distant home, loved wife and children. She visited the bedside of the dying man, and pointed him to that better land where the weary rest;—told him that though the affectionate ties which bound him to earth must be severed, yet his Father in heaven would be the widow's Friend and orphan's Protector;—that though the way was dark, yet it would soon be lighted up with the smiles of undying love, and that the loved and lost of earth would meet in bliss to part no more. She often whispered to the toil-worn son of bondage, and talked of his degraded and oppressed condition till he sighed for the pure air of freedom, his father's land, or a skin unstained by Africa's blood. She told the red man that he might enjoy unmolested, his new hunting ground in the far west, or find another lake beautiful as "The smile of the Great Spirit,"* and wherever she appeared, every countenance was lit up with joy.

If there were any whom she favored less with her society, they were those who had been nourished in the lap of indulgence, and grown to manhood without realizing her worth, or encountering any of the difficulties which are so necessary to develop and strengthen the noble faculties of the soul, or to excite the feelings of charity for others' faults, and of sympathy for their distress. When such first entered the untried scenes of life, and found in their intercourse with the world that instead of its being like the world of their imagination, always bright and happy, clouds and tempests would often arise to dim their fairest prospects, and the vacant look, or lengthened sigh, would tell too plainly that something was wanting to assist them along the uneven path of life; and though our fair friend could render them the necessary assistance; yet she deferred it for a season, that their hearts might be softened and learn to trust to something better than their own frailties, for wisdom and guidance.

As much as this maiden was courted and beloved by all, yet by all she was acknowledged to be at times coquetish and deceitful. She would appear in her most flattering garb, hold out the most alluring enticements, and was always sure to win her cause. When led by her, we never stopped to retrospect, but "onward" was her course; and she would often point to flowery vales and shady groves, but leave us amid fens and briars ere the Elysian spot was reached. Then we would half resolve to abandon her friendship, to see her no more; yet would she no sooner "enchantly smile and wave her hand," then our arms were extended, and our lips opened to welcome her approach.

On one occasion I had so long sought and invoked her presence, but obtained it not, that when her white robe did at length appear in the far dis-

ance, I sat listless and repining till her near approach obliged me to give a feigned smile and cold reception. She tenderly inquired the cause of my sadness. I looked reproachfully at her, and said, "False maiden! have you not many a time deceived me? Have you not promised me joyous days and degrees of unhappiness untold?" "And have you not enjoyed them?" said she—"has not the morning sun often set and left you no cause for regret? and have not hours and hours of unalloyed bliss been yours?" "Yes; but then I have had some moments of anxiety; the future has been veiled in darkness, and I knew not whither to direct my steps." "Some moments," said she, reproachfully, "moments of darkness, but days and years of joy and happiness?" "But why could you not be always with me, that these moments might be unclouded?" Instinctively I shrunk abashed from her scrutinizing gaze as she said, "Inconsiderate mortal! why could not vegetation always flourish under the constant rays of the summer sun? Why are the fierce winds, the roaring thunder, terrific lightning and depressing rain necessary for the delicate flower to perfect its beauty, the tender vine to yield its fruit, or the forest oak to mature its giant strength?" "Why" said I, "I suppose these things are in the order of nature, necessary." "Equally necessary is it," she replied, "for clouds and storms, and even occasional tempests, to visit the children of men, that they may learn humility, meekness, love and childlike confidence; to learn to do to others as they would have others do to them, to endure with fortitude and resignation the ills and trials of life, to remove the various obstacles that beset their pathway, and to place their enduring affection on the Rock that will ever shield and shelter. And as for you," she said with reproving mildness, "did I not long since make you acquainted with my elder sister, Faith? Does she not point you to your Father in Heaven, and assure you that He is at the helm and will guide your bark safely o'er the sea of life; that He often guides thee into pleasant places by ways and means which thou knowest not? And has He not though severely as with a rod, often turned the course of thy wanderings when thine own inclination would have led thee into sin, and consequently sorrow's dark domain? Hast thou not seen this in times past, and does not Faith assure thee that He will do thus in time to come?"

My conscience could but give an affirmative answer to these interrogatories, and she proceeded; "Vain mortal; cease thy murmurings, and if my face is ever again veiled from thy sight, believe that it is alone for thy good: place unfeigned confidence in Him who knows even the number of the hairs of thy head, and suffers not one to fall without his notice. Be vigilant, active—watch and pray, for all will be well."

Saying this, HOPE spread her gay wings, once more "enchanted smiled," and was off on a mission of love, leaving me profited and thankful for her instructions.

Ministers present.—G. S. Gowdy, Yorkshire; S. Goff, Wm. Queal, Bristol; J. S. Brown, Pavilion; U. Clark, Canandaigua; O. Roberts, Lakeville; A. B. Copeland, Rochester; O. B. Clark, Conesus; Wm. Andrews, Wheeler.

Sermons were preached on the occasion by Brs. G. S. Gowdy; J. S. Brown, A. B. Copeland, Wm. Andrews, Wm. Queal and U. Clark, who also gave the usual addresses.

REMARKS.—This was truly a most delightful and refreshing season, the weather, with the exception of the morning of the first day, was very fine. Owing, doubtless, to the rain in the morning, the congregation, on the first day, was not large, though respectable; but on the second day, the house was filled, at an early hour, with devout and sincere worshippers of the Lord Jesus, who listened with profound attention to the truths of the everlasting Gospel, as it is revealed to us by divine testimony, and demonstrated by the resurrection from the dead, of the Saviour of the world. The sermons were generally of a highly interesting and instructive character, and we trust that the seed there sown did not fall upon a barren or unfruitful soil; but that it was received into good and honest hearts of such as will show by their fruits, that they "adorn the doctrine they profess, with a well ordered life and godly conversation." The singing was good, and well calculated to elevate the moral and devotional feelings of the Christian above the fleeting and transitory things of earth, to a contemplation of those heavenly scenes that shall be enjoyed when the Archangel shall sound the resurrection trump, and awaken all the sleeping millions, and they shall come forth clothed in the shining robes of God's eternal and boundless love, to chant the immortal songs of redeeming grace with angels around the throne of God.

Owing to the impossibility of procuring the services of a sufficient number of preachers, a large number of societies have for a long time been without preaching, and consequently there is not perhaps the same degree of devotedness and engagedness in the cause of truth, in that Association, that there is in some other places; yet there are a large number of determined and well-tried friends, who are making every effort in their power to advance the cause of truth among themselves, and to "build again the waste places of Zion," and we trust the day is not far distant when the gentle rivulets of God's eternal truth shall be seen issuing from all those sloping hill sides, and forming one mighty river of salvation, that shall flow through those beautiful valleys, and of whose waters many souls shall come and drink, and be made free from the bondage of sin and death.

In some of the Societies, where they have not preaching, the brethren meet and hold social meetings. Let all do so, and the Lord will surely prosper them in word and in deed.

EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS.....NO. I.

As there were Jews from Rome, in Jerusalem, on the day of pentecost, it is highly probable that they carried a knowledge of Christianity with them, on their return home, after their conversion. But as the written authority for Christianity was based in the Old Testament, possessed and believed only by the Jews; and as Christianity was at first regarded only as a reformed system of the Jewish faith, not intended for the embrace of the Gentiles, nor yet to supersede Judaism; the doctrine of Jesus spread at first only among the Jews. And when the Gentiles did begin to be recognized as proper subjects of the Gospel, and came into its belief, we find the Jews universally, and the Jewish Christians generally, insisting on their adoption of the Mosaic law and ceremonies as a part and parcel of the true religion. This led to numerous and violent disputes among the early churches out of Judea—even after the first council, held in Jerusalem, had decided that the Gentile converts were not to bear the burden and yoke of the law; but only to abstain from blood; from things strangled, from things offered to idols, and from violations of chastity—all of which were so connected with idolatry, as to render this injunction highly necessary. But the discussions still raged and continued—and especially in Rome did they so far increase, that the Emperor Claudius banished both Jews and Christians (all of whom were considered as Jews,) from Rome, in the 11th year of his reign, or in A. D. 51. This disturbance thus came to the ears of Paul, and led him finally to address those who afterwards returned to Rome again, in the Epistle, which is the subject of our remarks.

In order clearly to understand the full drift of the apostle's letter, it may be well to remember that there are four distinct parties, and sets of opinions, spoken of, against, and referred to, in its remarks.

1st, The unconverted Gentiles, who held to idolatry as the religion of the State, or Empire—who rejected both the Jewish and Christian revelation—who contended that philosophy, and the light of nature, were sufficient guides in religious faith and practice—and who regarded every departure from these, or every pretension to a purer revelation and religion, as superstition. 2d, The converted Gentiles, who early began to set aside the Mosaic law and ritual, and confine themselves to the prophets, and to the teachings of Christianity, verbal or written, as the only guide of faith and practice. 3d, The converted Jews, who in adopting the Christian profession, received Jesus as a mere reformer of their religion, and supposed he did not mean to abolish what Moses expressly taught in the Law—who argued that as both revelations came from God, he did not mean the latter to supersede the Mosaic institution, but only to explain them—and who, therefore, insisted that the Gentile converts must become Jews, as Jesus had been, before they could be true Christians. And 4th, The Jews, who considered Christianity a delusion, yet united with the Jewish Christians, in supporting the observance of the law, and denying the favor of God to any who would not be circumcised, and conform to its ceremonies.

Each of these parties receives a notice from the apostle—he corrects their errors, refutes their objections and strengthens their virtues and correct views, as they oc-our to his mind, or are connected with his subject—in some cases, stating their objections clearly; in others, only alluding to them—in some cases filling out his arguments and comparisons fully; in others, naming those parts only that were strange to them, or not recognized by them as correct and true. To the Jew, and to the converted Jew and Gentile, it is evident that he would use language in the religious sense—in the manner in which it is usually used in the Old Testament Scriptures. This he would do particularly with those who were, or had been Jews, and were therefore well acquainted with those writings. I wish this fact to be well remembered, for it is a very important one. Of itself, it is sufficient, in many cases, to settle the controversy on the words “predestinate,” “elect,” “reprobate,” “saved,” “salvation,” “damnation,” and the like. But in addressing the Gentile unbeliever, it is most probable that he used words, as far as he could, in the sense they generally attached to them in their systems of philosophy and polite learning.

As the church in Rome had been gathered and formed before it was visited by Paul—before this Epistle was written—he, as the apostle of the Gentiles, liberally diffuses through it, a general synopsis of the Gospel scheme or plan of salvation—disclosing God's final purpose in regard to man, as well as the means of its accomplishment, and the great prominent steps of its progress.—He does this, not directly, nor in the shape of a formal dissertation, but incidentally, as this purpose of God comes up before his mind, and connects itself with the subjects on which he is writing.

Now, it must be evident that in order to obtain a full, clear, and well connected idea of any subject as treated by this apostle, it will be necessary, not to read a few verses, or a few chapters only, but the entire Epistle—to read it often, and as continuously as possible—to bear in mind the four different classes of people to whose peculiar opinions it has reference. A. B. G.

CONFERENCE AND DEDICATION IN NILES, CAYUGA COUNTY.

A two-days Conference was held in Niles, on the 10th and 11th of July. On Wednesday morning, a large audience assembled; the house could not contain all who came. The Meetinghouse was then dedicated to the worship of God. Reading of Scripture by Br. T. J. Whitcomb. Dedication prayer by Br. A. Peck. Sermon by Br. G. W. Montgomery. In the afternoon, sermons were heard from Brs. Sawyer and Cheney.—In the evening we had a profitable and stirring conference meeting. On Thursday morning, Brs. Whitcomb and A. Clark, and in the afternoon, Br. Peck, preached. Addresses by G. W. M. Throughout the entire services, the congregations were large and attentive. We had a most delightful season of worship; and we hope that good seed were effectually sown in the souls of the hearers, to their growth in truth and righteousness.—Brs. Brown, Cheney, Whitcomb, Sawyer, Watson, Peck, Sias, Clark, Montgomery, were present, besides Br. Carpenter, a late convert from the Christians, whose remarks in the Conference gave great satisfaction, and Br. Peebles, a student with Br. Clarke. These latter Brothers are not yet in fellowship.

Our friends in Niles have done well—nobly. They have erected a beautiful house, containing 42 slips, and galleries on two sides and one end. It is surmounted by a handsome tower and dome. It is very pleasantly located. And it is much to their credit, to say, that they have prepared a way to have it entirely paid for by the coming winter. We pray that they may soon obtain a faithful pastor. As the best way to accomplish their object, I suggest the thought to them, to join with the society in Mottville, that, by united effort, they may settle a preacher over the two societies. May truth continue to flourish in the name of the Redeemer. G. W. M.

NEW PREACHERS.—We notice the name of Brs. O. B. Clark, of Conesus, and R. Wooden of Chili, in the Luminary—we suppose they are new preachers. The same paper also announces the name of Victor Mix, of Warsaw, as an acceptable new laborer in the Gospel field. The Laughery Association, Indiana, has granted letters of fellowship to Brs. Joshua Hicks, of Patriot, and Ezekiel M. Knapp, of Cambridge. There are lay preachers in that Association—Brs. Samuel Follis, of Indian Kentucky, and E. P. Hicks, of Vernon, are especially named. The Maine Convention has recognized as new preachers, E. F. Quinby, E. H. Emerson, and as ordained F. Foster and J. S. Tuttle.

Ohio has lately added a considerable number of new laborers to the force already in the field—Brs. N. M. Byington, Cincinnati; C. F. Wait, Woodstock; L. C. Todd, Parkman; Esau Preston, Alonzo Smead, and Aaron Rogers, of the Huron Association—all fellow-shipped;—and Brs. Mitchell, near Woodstock; and A. M. Chappell, of Cheshire, are among the number. That Buckeye state is “going it with a rush” lately!

CONVERSION.—The venerable Rev. Jacob Norton, an eminent Congregational clergyman, formerly of Weymouth, Mass., and father of Rev. Andrews Norton, of Cambridge University, has lately embraced Universalism as the staff of his old age.

NEW ASSOCIATION.—The Upper Wabash Association was organized in Dayton, Indiana, on May 17th and 18th. Six churches were represented, and three or four preachers were present. Br. E. Manford, Editor of the Christian Teacher, of Terre Haute, is the principal laborer who planted and watered this goodly vine, and God hath given the increase. Br. D. Vines is Standing Clerk. Annual meeting, the Friday before the last Sunday in May.

The West is going ahead wonderfully in forming societies and churches, and bringing forward new preachers.

NEW CHURCHES have lately been organized in Winchester, N. H.; Zanesville, Ohio; Perry, N. Y.; Ludlow, Vt.; and Portland Mills, Ind.

NEW MEETINGHOUSES have been lately erected and dedicated in Brooklyn, L. I.—cost $20,000, and all paid for; Saco, Me.; Dighton, and East Boston, Mass.; Hume, N. Y.; East Brattleborough, Vt.—this last is a Methodist house run down, bought and refinished by our friends;—and we notice that the new house in Cincinnati, Ohio, one of the largest and best in that city, is to be dedicated soon.

A State Sunday School Association was organized at the late session of the New Hampshire Convention of Universalists.

MY OWN MATTERS.

It would appear from several sources, that there are those disposed to censure me for—the Lord knows what; save that I was appointed to deliver the Occasional Sermon at the next session of the N. Y. State Convention. Was I to be blamed for that? It was none of my seeking—I cared nothing for the appointment—I would rather it had been conferred on some other individual. “But were you not one of the nominating committee?” I was. “You had a hand, then, in your own nomination.” Not at all. A friend of mine, Lewis Seymour, Esq., of New York, also one of the Committee, expressed a desire that I should receive the appointment alluded to, and so far insisted, that I finally consented to have my name appear, and withdrew from the Committee. Was there any thing very wrong in this? Many seem to think so. And a certain young man in a recent No. of the N. Y. Union, evidently makes a thrust at me, when he very modestly, proffers his very sage advice, to nominating committees. Your blade was too short, Sir—it did not reach me. But would not the same weapon applied to yourself wound an itching for notoriety.

To spare the feelings of a few dear friends, who seem deeply grieved, I hereby “throw up” my appointment, and name Rev. H. B. Soule my substitute. I hope he will not decline; and, unless he does I shall consider his consent given to my request. A. C. BARRY.

Fort Plain, July 29th, 1843.

P. S.—For the information of all concerned, I would state, that there was no contest between Br. Goodrich and myself by way of determining which of our names should be presented in nomination. A. C. B.

* * Will the Luminary, and Union and Messenger please copy?

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

BR. MANFORD—Probably the fault was mine, that you did not get the Magazine and Advocate in exchange for your Teacher; as I neglected handing your notice to the Proprietors, and they never saw it. Do you want any back numbers?

BR. MOTT—The correspondence would not be interesting to our readers generally, who know M. H. S. to be just what he is—and as to his friend, in your place, he probably is known also to all who care to know any thing about him. To pillory every case in which a Partialist clergyman who has shown himself regardless of honor, honesty, veracity, decency, and fair play would require a sheet much larger than ours, or that ours be published at least daily.

“That Report” can not be inserted,—to publish it, would do more hurt than good—the party, in my opinion, was not desirous of the office, and it is too severe a punishment for its simple acceptance, though even that was an error. I have communicated privately with the person concerned.

¶ N. B.—Is there no help for us? Are all our correspondents asleep, or dead, or offended at us? Our copy drawer is empty!!! Oh, dear me, what an aching void! A. B. G.

Christina Cochran, or Gilmour, the woman accused of the murder of her husband in Scotland, and whom it has been decided, after an impartial inquiry, to send back, was, on Wednesday last, brought before the Recorder of New York, on a writ of habeas corpus, to obtain a postponement for a few days, until the messenger sent to Washington on her behalf could see the President and return; but the Recorder decided that he had no jurisdiction in the matter, and therefore remanded the woman to await the order of the Executive.

Mr. Ellsworth and Mr. Fogg, rival pedestrians, commenced on Wednesday morning last, at Chelsea, Mass., the feat of walking one thousand miles in one thousand hours.

The important case of Amos Lawrence and others vs. the corporation of New York, for goods lost by the blowing up of buildings during the great fire of 1835, has been decided by the Supreme Court, during the late term at Utica, in favor of the city, confirming the decision of the Superior Court. If the Court of Errors, the highest tribunal in the State, do not reverse it, the city will be saved $1,000,000.

The water in the river Hudson, near Albany, was so low, that the steamboat Empire could not reach the city. She grounded at Drew's Point.

The Wyandots, the last tribe of Indians in the State of Ohio, have departed for their new home West of the Mississippi. A delegation from the tribe, consisting of three principal Chiefs, visited Columbus on Saturday week to bid farewell to the Governor, and, through him, to the people of Ohio. Jacquis, the head Chief, delivered a beautiful address on the occasion, to which the Governor replied, assuring them of the good feeling of the people of Ohio towards their brethren, and wishing them happiness and prosperity in their new home. The scene (says the Statesman) was very interesting, and the sentiments delivered by the venerable Chief were worthy the head and heart of a chief of this once noble race. May prosperity and happiness attend this remnant of red men, who have for so many years dwelt in peace and amity with our people.

All the canal lands in the State of Ohio, which remain unsold, are to be offered at public sale at Perrysburgh, O., on the 4th and 18th of September. These tracts are called canal lands, from the fact that they were ceded to Ohio by the State of Indiana, to aid in the construction of the Wabash and Erie Canal.

Mr. John Casay, a veteran of the Revolution, died at Rocky Hill, in Warren county, Ky., on the 16th instant, after having attained to the great age of one hundred and six years.

The barn and out houses of Mr. Morris, about four miles east of Greenbush, N. Y., were burned on Thursday night. A large quantity of hay and oats was consumed.

It is averred that the little town of Hull, Mass., has neither Minister, Doctor, Lawyer, Justice of the Peace, Coroner, Church, Poor House, or Pauper.

A horrible mode of death.—The Toronto Constitutionalist says that a young man named Bailey, a prisoner in the penitentiary, in consequence of insubordination, was placed for punishment in a cistern where it was necessary that he should work in order to prevent the water overcoming him, and that during the process he was overpowered by the water and drowned.

Two thousand houses have been built in Cincinnati within three years. There has been, in the three last years, an addition to the population of the city of thirteen thousand persons.

Beware.—The Narragansett [R. I.] Chief relates an instance of death caused by the use of kreosote in curing the tooth-ache. A particle got into the throat and caused an inflammation so as to close the wind pipe.

Another American Invention going to Russia.—Mr. Burden of the Troy Iron and Nail Works, yesterday made a contract with the agent of the Russian Government, to provide that Government with one of his patent spike machines. As the Russian Government will require a large amount of spikes for the Moscow and St. Petersburg railroad, perhaps it would be for its advantage to obtain a supply from the Troy works.—We believe they can be furnished here as cheaply as they can be made in Russia.—Troy Whig.

The Influenza.—A clergyman who has been settled two years in the vicinity of Boston, writing to his friends in this town, states that within a few weeks, he has attended more funerals from the effects of the Influenza, than of any other disease, during his residence in the place.—Northampton Courier.

We learn that the President has ordered the sloop of war, building at Norfolk, Va., to be called the "James-town"—that at Boston to be called the "Plymouth"—that at the Washington Navy Yard the "St. Mary's," in commemoration of the first place of permanent settlement in America.—Madisonian.

Gone Clean Over.—News has been received, as we are told, that the Rev. Roosevelt Bailey, late Episcopal Rector at Harlem, who lured towards Romanism and went to Rome for light on the subject, has become so much enlightened as to renounce Protestantism altogether, and will return a thorough adherent of the old mother.—Journal of Commerce.

DEATHS.

In this city, July 16th, by drowning, ALFRED MAPES, aged 7 years.

In Litchfield, July 24th, of consumption, Miss ELIZA M. RANDALL, aged 21 years. In the death of this young lady, Universalism has again shown how triumphantly it will do to die by as well as to live by. During the whole period of her illness, it taught her to be resigned to her condition; on her own account she felt no solicitude; she felt anxiety only on account of the pain which her death would cause her mother—all else was well. And when death approached her, her faith failed not, but proved all-sufficient in the trying hour of death. Seeing her friends weeping, she calmly said to them, "mourn not for the dead but for the living; weep not for me, but weep for yourselves"—"it is a glorious boon to die"—turning to her sister who asked her how she felt, she said "I feel perfectly well, I am happy—I feel bad only for my mother; but we shall all meet again in a few days." She asked her sister if she was dying, her sister told she was, and asked her if she was sorry—"sorry," said she, "O no, no; I am reconciled," and in a moment was no more.

Miss Randall leaves a large circle of relatives and friends to mourn their loss in her death. From a very early age she became devoted to Universalism; she lived the doctrine, and in doing it, she gained the esteem and good will of all who knew her. She possessed an amiable disposition and a good heart. She lived beloved, and died lamented by all—and so lived and so died a Universalist. May the blessing of God in the Gospel of his Son, be with all who by this afflictive providence have been called to mourn. Her funeral was attended at the Methodist meetinghouse, on the 26th, and a discourse given from the words, "weep not for me; but weep for yourselves," Luke xxiii: 28, by

H. B. SOULE.

In Stockholm, June 23d, Mrs. MIRANDA, wife of Jonah Griswold, aged 28 years. By this dispensation a husband and seven small children have been bereaved of a kind partner and tender mother. Her family were near and dear unto her, and even in death her affections clung to them. Yet did she express her confidence in God as the protector of her motherless babes, and the Saviour of the world. The night before she died, she told a sister that watched with her, that her hope was in God—gave directions concerning her affairs—named the preacher to officiate at her funeral.

The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourning friends and a large concourse of people, by

S. W. SQUIRES.

In Turin, Lewis county, July 22d, HAPPY LONIA, consort of Henry Ragan, Esq., aged 25 years, 4 months and 20 days. Her disease was the consumption. She was sick but a short time. In April she began to decline somewhat rapidly, but still her friends had hopes of her recovery, until about the middle of June, when all began to despair. She herself was fully aware of her situation, and became fully resigned to her fate. Thus in the short space of three months has passed from among us another of our number. She has left us in early life. But when we think of her happy exit, and remember how anxious she was to go, we feel that we can not mourn that she has left us even thus early.

It was during her sickness that she became established in the faith of a world's salvation. Like too many of us, she had never thought deeply and seriously of death, till she was reminded by the rapid work of disease that she was soon to try its realities. Hence she, as yet, viewed death as the king of terrors, and seemed unwilling to die. But about four weeks previous to her death she dismissed all her fears and was never afterwards heard to express any unwillingness to die, or to utter a complaining word. About eight days previous to her death, she supposed herself to be dying.—She called her two little children to her, and committed them to the care of Jesus. At this time she was so unspeakably happy that she shouted for joy. She said it seemed to her that she could see shining angels standing around her, bedside. She desired to have all her neighbors called in that they might see how happy she was. She longed to go; said she should meet her children and all her friends, together with a ransomed world, in the paradise of God. The last Sabbath of her life, while struggling for breath, she was asked by her husband which she chose, to be restored to health, that she might enjoy her family and friends again, or die.—She chose rather to depart than live. A short time before she departed she called her little children to her and bade them farewell. She then bid her husband, mother, and sister, and all her neighbors, adieu. She held up her hands and saw the blood settling under her nails; she adjusted the bedclothes; and on being asked how she felt, said she was perfectly easy; that there was not a cloud between her and the tomb; that it was the happiest day she had ever seen. All felt that God was there, and that it was beautiful to die, when to die was to go home. She died without a struggle—calmly, and serenely and sweetly, she fell asleep in Jesus. Her last address seemed to be:—

"Let thy mourning and weeping be o'er,
For death doth afflict me no more;
If the hand that I love lay me low,
There can not be pain in the blow!

"When the blood from its fountain hath gush'd,
And the voice that thou lovest is hush'd,
Let my memory still be thy pride,
And forget not I smiled as I died!"

Her funeral was attended on the 24th, in the Methodist church, at which time a discourse was delivered from the very appropriate words, "To die is gain"—Phil. i: 21—by the Rev. Martin Salmon, Baptist.

In Milan, Cayuga co., July 11th, Mrs. RUTH, wife of Hon. Isaac Sisson, in her 63d year. The deceased was a believer in the Restoration. It enabled her to die calmly in the Saviour. Her memory is cherished by all who knew her, as one whose Christian conduct was worthy of imitation. Consolation was administered to the mourners by Br. N. Sawyer of Wolcott.

In Westfield, Chautauque co., on the 4th ult., Mr. HERBERT SQUIER, aged 85 years and 7 months. Father Squier has been a Universalist for many, very many years, both in theory and practice. He died, as he had lived, reconciled to the will of God, and rejoicing in the hope of the Gospel. The Lord comfort the mourners with the like precious faith. Sermon by the writer.

L. PAINE.

In Rochester, July 1st, HARRIET M., wife of William H. Lawton, and daughter of Josiah Mack, in the 23d year of her age. An affectionate wife, a kind and exemplary mother, and a friend to all, her loss is felt, and mourned by all who knew her.

"Affliction's semblance bends not o'er her tomb, Affliction's self deplores her youthful doom." Com.

Drowned at Theresa Falls, on the 4th of May last, JOHN J. SPOFFORD, aged 24 years and 5 months. Severe indeed was the shock of feelings produced by the removal of this truly worthy young man thus suddenly. His parents, brothers and sisters, who reside at Depauville, (a distance of some sixteen miles from the fatal spot,) unlike those whose friends are removed by sickness under their own roofs, had no time in which to prepare their minds and fortify their feelings, until the appalling truth that their beloved John slumbered beneath the cold and merciless waves of the Indian River, broke like the unthought-of thunderbolt upon their senses. Few young men stand higher in the esteem of their friends and acquaintances than did the subject of this notice; not, it is true, for the dazzling splendor of his genius, but for what was of far greater value, his sound judgment, amiable disposition, unswerving integrity, industrious habits and Christian like examples. He was a Universalist in faith, and the above description goes to show that he was such also in practice. His funeral was attended at Depauville, by a thronged and sympathizing congregation, who listened with deep interest to an excellent sermon by Br. H. Boughton, of Watertown. The friends wish that Br. B. would send a copy of the sermon for publication in the Magazine and Advocate, what say you Br. Boughton? will you comply?

LINES

Written on the death of Mr. Stephen Clark, late of Buffalo, who died suddenly on board the canal boat, July 19th, 1839, twelve miles from Rochester, N. Y.

What shall we say of him that's gone
To that unknown and hidden sphere?
He was a truly valu'd one,
To all his friends and kindred here.

Dear husband, father, kindred, friend,
Thy name is dear to all our hearts;
Thy virtues pure, shone to the end
Of life's short pilgrimage on earth.

We've oft enjoy'd thy pleasant smile,
And in thy presence, felt the joy
Of conscious worth our hearts beguile,
In converse sweet, without alloy.

But now, alas! thy voice is hush'd,
And cold and moulder'd is thy form;
The grave receives thee to her trust,
'Till breaks the resurrection morn.

Thy precepts in our hearts still live,
And in thy faith we still rejoice;
Looking beyond death's gloomy vale,
To see thy form and hear thy voice.

Oh! blessed hope, that cheer'd thy heart,
In all thy changes here below;
That made thee willing to depart
From this vain world of sin and woe.

We drop the tear of mournful grief,
That we thy presence can't enjoy;
Nor in thy counsels find relief,
So full of comfort, peace and joy.

Then farewell father, husband, friend,
Rest in the bosom of thy God;
Where peace and joy thy soul attend,
'Till we shall visit thine abode.

THE SEWING SOCIETY.

"At whose house is the society to meet next time?" asked Mr. Barker.

"It has no invitation to meet with any one."

"Indeed! that is something new."

"Yes, Robert"—and instead of proceeding, as was evidently her design, Mrs. Barker became silent and abstracted.

"Lydia, what distresses you?"

"I have been sadly troubled. I wish you had not been called away to-day; we much needed your discreet counsel. A judicious reproof, administered by you, might have corrected the error—the folly—or, what shall I call it, Robert?"

"You speak dark things, Lydia—explain."

"I tried to exert a corrective influence; but they are not disposed to receive rebuke, though kindly given, from a lady younger than they are. Besides, they think it the interest of their minister's wife to enjoin virtues, which in private life she is not obliged to practice."

"Lydia"—said Mr. B. with astonishment—"pray tell me what has happened. Why this incomprehensible language? Sadly troubled, indeed, is your mind, if you can not speak so as to be understood."

"You must have observed, I think, that Mrs. Barbour bestows minute attention on external appearances, that she is not satisfied, unless she does much, and appears to do much for those she entertains; as you would express it, she is troubled about much serving."

"Pardon the uncharitable imputation,—but pondering, the bad effects of her example, I am forced to conclude, that she is of those who have a propensity to whitewash old sepulchres, lest any thing offensive to modern refine, ment appears to exist?"

"Well, Lydia, as this seems not to be a late discovery of yours, why does it suddenly affect you in this manner?"

"Yes, Robert—well—she gave us a very rich supper, —so great a variety and such kinds of food, too!—it was whispered as improper after the Society had passed a vote to have only a plain repast at its meetings."

"Has not every one that has entertained the Society, violated that law? and is not this violation unrebuked?"

"Yes; but no one has transgressed to so great extent as Mrs. Barbour has."

"Are all the others excusable for the infraction of that rule, while Mrs. Barbour is so highly culpable for going a degree beyond their example? Your mind seems not clear, to-night, love."

"I am told that three of the members were ready to invite the Society to meet with them; but, having partaken of Mrs. Barbour's sumptuous fare, they are ashamed to ask it to such an entertainment as they can give."

"Ashamed to abide by the sound sense of the Society, deliberately and plainly expressed, because other members dare to break its laws! Are any so weak, so vain?"

"You understand now, Robert; that is, what I would say. I would that you could remove this feeling."

"Is it not better that you do it, love? Invite the Society to meet with you next Wednesday, and when you think it due time, offer your friends wholesome refreshment, show them that they do not meet to please the palate. I merely suggest it; you will form your own plan."

"Thank you, Robert; with your co-operation, of which I am sure, I may yet arrest the progress of this evil."

"What can you be doing with all these things? Lydia," asked Mr. Barker in astonishment, as he went into the kitchen a few mornings after the talk about the Sewing Society.

"Have you forgotten that the Society is to meet here on Wednesday?"

"No; but I can not see the connection between that and these articles. You were to give your friends wholesome food."

"The society allow one kind of cake."

"Well, the Society, this time, will permit its minister to select the materials for the cake; and his wife will gladly make it according to his direction."

"Certainly—Betty, hand that bit of paper, now Robert, the prescription."

"Mrs. Barker wrote a few words of her husband's dictation, and after waiting a few moments, said—"That is written—what next?"

"Oh, let it be baked till thoroughly done."

"It, Robert—what? this would be only plain bread."

"Which is their minister's cake, the staff which supports his physical frame. Do you forget Mrs. Barbour's supper? and the ill consequences which you so deeply lamented?"

"I remember; but she had so many kinds—I was making only one kind."

"Would you eat it? would you give it to your children, or your husband? Is what you were about to make, wholesome?"

"No, Robert."

"For food, will you give your friends an unwholesome compound? and will you do this as the wife of their spiritual teacher?"

"They will think me stingy, or wanting respect for them."

"You are not accountable to man for motives. Could you not meet this reproach, unjust as it would be, to remove the evil which so grieves you?"

"Betty—take away this butter and these boxes; but I think, Robert, that I could not do it without your approbation."

"As blinded as society is"—resumed Mr. Barker—"it would not groan under so many curses, if each one would cheerfully and heartily do what he sees his plain imperative duty."

On the next Wednesday, the Sewing Society received from Mrs. Barker a cordial welcome. The good minister said he was happy to see so many of his friends at his house; and, while he staid with them, he was careful to render their conversation unembarrassed, innocent and instructive. At supper time, he was summoned to eat with them. Advancing to the table, he glanced at the nice bread and its accompaniments, which were spread before them, smiled, and looking around on the company, said—"My friends, we will give thanks for simple, nourishing food."

Earnest and heartfelt were the minister's brief thanks; and in a few words he implored a blessing from the Giver of all good. The party felt that they had met on an equality, and, that they were equally respected. They were pleased with themselves and one another, and parted well satisfied.

"I did not think our minister's wife so consistent; remarked Miss Hewitt to Miss Bean, the next day; she, really, has no wish for mere display. An afternoon was never before so happily passed by the society. Mrs. Benton, now, need not feel a reluctance to entertain us."

"I have not understood what her scruples are, Miss Hewitt. How was it?"

"Mrs. Benton told the President, that she should be happy for the society to meet at her house if she could give a proper reception; if she could afford a supper like Mrs. Barbour's. She says the society would be disgraced by meeting at her house."

"How?"

"It is so humble. Her reason is, she is so poor. She seems unwilling for the society to know her style of living. Mr. Barker did well, yesterday, in alluding to this feeling in his peculiar way. Each member took to herself a large share of the rebuke; and all knew he was sincere when he said he respected nothing more than honest poverty—when received cheerfully as the dispensation of unerring Providence, and borne patiently, not as a burden of shame, but as the part assigned in the gifts of life, to be faithfully studied and honorably acted."

"Yes, Miss Hewitt, and he felt all the grief he expressed at finding any members of our society, vieing in their style of living with their rich neighbors. Costly raiment, rich food, and elegant furniture do not, as he said, confer happiness or ensure real respect."

"I have Miss Bean thought much of the folly of imitating the luxurious habits of the rich. A well ordered house and simple attire are always pleasing, and none think them improper, or subject them to ill-natured remarks. But when persons in moderate circumstances, affect gentility and fall into expensive habits, exerting all their faculties, often depriving themselves of the conveniences of life, to make a fine appearance, they are only laughed at, or at best, pined. If they attract attention, it is the sneer given to excessive vanity, and the surprise that they are so weak minded as to deny themselves real enjoyment for mere glitter."

"How much pains many do take to make themselves ridiculous."

"Had I not, long ago, Miss Bean, risen above these foolish notions, I should think you alluded to me; but, now my cheap dress causes me no unpleasant feelings. I never think even, to contrast it with the beautiful and expensive garments worn by fashionable ladies. I can not understand how any can suffer their happiness to depend on the texture or the pattern of the cloth they wear, or on the style in which their clothes are made."

THE EARLY DEAD.

BY REV. W. H. GRISWOLD.

"If it be sad to mark the bow'd with age
Sink in the halls of the remorseless tomb,
Closing the changes of life's pilgrimage
In the still darkness of its mouldering gloom;
Oh! what a shadow o'er the heart is flung,
When peals the requiem of the lov'd and young!"

WILLIS GAYLORD CLARK.

I have seen the aged father die. I have stood by his bedside, and heard the death-rattle, and seen him in his last struggle for life. Around him were the weeping family. The mother wept; for it was the partner of her years. The children wept; for it was their father. Friends wept; for they sympathized with a family in tears. But still there was none there who refused to be comforted. It was the aged father in Israel that had died. This was not the death-bed of the young; it was him of three score years and ten who had died. We wept, yet not that he had left us so soon. We wept, yet we remembered that he had left us in a good old age and had gone down to the tomb ripe with years. We wept, but we wept not so bitterly, for it was the death of the aged that we mourned.

I have seen the mother laid in the tomb. Many were the mourning friends, but there was but one child to follow her to the tomb. He was calm and resigned. Hardly a tear moistened his eye. She too, had reached the age commonly allotted to our race. She had reared a large family. She had been spared to them long, but she could not be with them always. She had outlived some of them. Others were scattered over the world.—One only was left to follow her to the grave.—Could she wish to live longer? Could we mourn that a mother who had fulfilled her mission and was ripe with years, should die? We did indeed mourn, but still it was for the aged that we mourned. Shall not the harvest be gathered in, when the field is white and ready for it?

I have seen the brother die. In the bloom of youth; almost literally in a week, he was cut down. I did not think it possible that one so young could die. And when I was called to his bedside and laid my hand upon the cold clammy moisture of his forehead; when I found that the pulse was fast dying away; when I saw him gasp for breath and gazed upon him in his very death-struggle, I could not believe it a reality; I still felt that he could not die. He was too young to die; we could not spare him then; it was not possible that one so young should be torn from us thus early.—Thus I thought, and thus I felt. And yet he did die; he was dying even then; I saw him breathe his last breath, and then I gazed at his lifeless remains till I felt that my heart was breaking. I wept—I wept bitterly—I would not be comforted; I felt that I could not be. I had never seen the young die before, and I could not comprehend it; I could not understand how it could be. The death of the aged I could understand; I had learned that they must die! But why should the young die? Why should blooming youth be cut down? Why should health and vigor meet with the same fate of age and infirmity? I could not tell. I had not then learned that this world was not our home. I had never yet thought seriously of eternity. All my hopes were centered here. I was emphatically a creature of this world; I had never gone beyond this life as yet. I thought and felt, and made all my estimates with reference to this life, and this life alone. But here was something that I could not comprehend. It was something that reached beyond this life. It awakened an inquiry that this world could not answer. But the lesson did not end here. Sickness now laid its palsying hand upon me. Long months I lay upon the very verge of the grave. Deeply I pondered upon another life. I asked myself the question, what is this life of ours? The only answer that came was, brief at best. The longest life is but a span. I saw my error. I saw that seventy years would not satisfy me. I felt that I was born for eternity.—Every thing around me appeared to change. I saw things in a new light. I beheld God as a Father, Jesus as a Saviour, and heaven as my home. I lost sight of this world in my contemplations of another. I could have died then resignedly. But it pleased God to restore me. The early dead have been no mystery to me since. I have seen them die; I know they do die; alas! the companions of my youth, how many of them have been numbered with the early dead!

But there is a sadness that comes over the mind, fortified as it may be ever so strongly with Christian philosophy and truth, which we can not feel when the aged leave us. I have followed a mother to the grave with calm serenity; for she was an aged mother. But when I heard of the death of a young mother who had watched over me during long months of pain; when I heard that she and her first born were laid in one tomb, I gave myself up to grief once more, and wept bitterly; I could set no bounds to my grief; and yet I was weeping for a sister's child. But the arm of fate has again been shaken, and another young mother has just gone. She has left behind her two little ones who are too young to understand what they have lost. And although her exit from this world was beautiful, and happy, and all that her friends could wish it to be, still there is a sadness felt that can not be expressed in any language of grief. It is a sadness, too, that is not confined to the intimate friends alone; it pervades a whole community. And it is such a sadness as is not felt when the aged die, however esteemed they may have been.

Nor are we alone in this feeling. We have seen hundreds and hundreds stand beside the graves of the early dead with similar feelings. We visit the graves of the aged with a feeling of reverence and filial respect. But when we visit the graves of the early dead there is a melancholy comes over the mind which is irresistible, and which makes us feel the worthlessness of this world and the vanity of all earthly things.

SALVATION.

The subject of salvation in a future state, seems to be matter of doubt and darkness to many, because they can not see how the change from sinfulness and misery, to holiness and happiness can be brought about. They can not see how a man dying in sin and rebellion against God, can go to heaven.

Man is a three-fold being, composed of a natural body, animal life, (or as it is sometimes called in Scripture the soul,) and an immortal spirit. All the sin of this world may be traced to the wants, desires, or passions of the body; or as the Apostle has it, "the flesh." The immortal spirit is that innate principle in every human being which condemns him when he does wrong, and approves when he does right; it is the only part of man of which God can properly be said to be the Father. God is the creator of our natural bodies in the same sense that he is the creator of trees, plants, &c., and in no other, being like them, produced by his immutable laws; but the spirit came directly from God, and must return to him when it is separated from this tabernacle of flesh. "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it." We know what becomes of this body when bereft of the spirit; it moulders back to dust; then the only part of man that goes into eternity is the immortal spirit.

Now if man exist at all in a future state, he must exist a spiritual being, and consequently must be holy and happy. As man in a future state must be a spirit and nothing else, he must be spiritually minded, which the apostle Paul says, "is life and peace." I hold that as God is the father of the spirits of all flesh, there is no difference in them; the spirit of one man is just as good as the spirit of an other, and no better. And as the spirit never has done wrong while connected with this body, it would be unreasonable and unjust to punish it in eternity for what the body has done here. Now the spirit coming from God, must be holy, and when released from this clog of carnal flesh, it must be happy; and this is what I call salvation in a future state. I see no mystery about it, or any thing complicated or doubtful; it is plain common sense, and like the operation of all God's immutable and divine laws.

RIGHT OF OPINION.

"We hold that man is endowed by his Creator, with certain unalienable rights;" and that one of the most essential of these rights, is the right of opinion. It is a principle that is stamped in his very nature, and sanctioned by all free governments: it is that privilege which a person has of thinking on all subjects as he chooses, and also of expressing those thoughts; hence it may be styled a civil, political, or religious right. In exercising this right, however, he may not violate the rights of others, or disturb the good order of society. But what sufferings and privations have been endured in consequence of exercising this right!

It was for the purpose of exercising this right unmolested, that our Pilgrim Fathers fled from their parent country to seek an asylum in the wilderness wastes of a new and unknown continent. They chose to undergo the hardships of planting a colony on the rocky shores of New England, where they could exercise the right of conscience and the freedom of speech, unchained and unmolested;—rather than remain in the old world with all its luxury and grandeur, to be stamped by the iron hoof of tyranny, and be denied the privilege of worshipping God according to the dictates of their own consciences. Galileo, also, came near losing his life, for giving his opinion in regard to the doctrines of earth's motion and the sun's stability.—And it was only by publicly renouncing his vague notions, as they were called, that he was enabled to escape the doom that awaited him. Columbus was likewise treated as a visionary adventurer, for advancing the opinion, that if there is a continent on one side of the globe, there must also be one on the other to balance it; and gladly would many have taken his life, rather than listen to his schemes of future discovery. It was also for exercising his right of opinion, that the immortal Murray was stoned and persecuted by a class of denominated Christians, even in our own beloved country of freedom. And numerous other instances might be shown, in which men have been doomed to all the penalties and privations imaginable, and even to death itself, merely for asserting their opinions.

But in our free government, the law inflicts no such punishments, neither does it require them.—Yet are we left free to advocate our own peculiar notions without censure or opposition? Very far from it. Surely, we have not the law to contend with, but we have something to contend with, which, if possible, is more powerful; and that something is popular opinion. If a person advances ideas that are a little different from the received and popular ones of the day, he does it at his peril; he heaps coals of fire upon his own head. Why?—Because public opinion being against him, his name is immediately loaded with anathemas, denunciations, and curses, which it would require the resolution of a Bonaparte to withstand. For example; a person happens to drop a few ideas on the subject of religion, or on some biblical question, which perhaps in themselves considered, vary a little from the doctrines we hear promulgated from the majority of our pulpits; and the individual attempts to reason a little on the subject; what is the result? He is immediately branded with the epithet of unbeliever, infidel, atheist, and a score of others, which in the eyes of the majority of people, will make him appear one of the most abandoned of the human race. Now is all this right? Should a person be harassed and persecuted, and be made to appear in the most ridiculous light, simply on account of his private opinions? I presume all reasonable beings will answer in the negative.—Therefore, if we have come to the conclusion that it is not right; then let us battle the opinions and not the person advocating them. AMICUS.

"A REVEREND SCOUNDREL."—We intended to append to Br. Paine's article under the above heading, in our last, the following proceedings, but forgot it until too late. It is due to the Erie Christian Conference to publish their prompt and candid disfellowship of their revivalist preacher—and to the public, to copy the description they have given of this artful man. There are other revivalists abroad, however, as well as this one, whom the people will do well carefully to watch. Men generally do not make so much fuss in religion, unless they need the smoke and dust as a covert. A. B. G.

ERIE SPECIAL CONFERENCE.

At a special session of the Erie Ch. Conference, held at Arkwright, June 23, 1843, to take into consideration the standing of Elder Jeremiah Knowles, organized by appointing Elder G. C. Bailey to the chair.

Appointed a committee of five to investigate the standing of said Knowles.

Resolved, That Elders E. G. Holland, P. Lee, and Br'n. Harvey Totman, Jabez Burchard and Otis Golder, be said committee.

After due deliberation the committee returned with the following report.

"We your committee, after a faithful examination of the facts pertaining to the moral standing of Mr. Jeremiah Knowles, who to this time has been a minister and member of the Erie Ch. Conference of this state, do unanimously report, That he is proved by undeniable facts, to be unworthy of the confidence of the Christian connection—that he stands convicted of gross immorality, and that as he has absconded from this country, should be published to the world as one of the greatest impostors of the age."

Resolved, That the report of the committee be accepted.

Resolved, That the Secretary is authorized to publish a description of the person of Mr. Knowles, that he may be known through this report.

Resolved, That our proceedings be published in the Palladium and Herald, and that the editors of other religious papers, are requested to copy.

Resolved, That we adjourn sine die.

G. C. BAILEY, Ch'n.

ARMENUS ELY, Sec'y.

DESCRIPTION OF HIS PERSON.—He is in height about five feet and ten inches, weighing about two hundred. His eyes are of a grayish color, his hair is rather gray, and his whole appearance indicates a man of strong and hardy constitution. His age is from 45 to 48 years, and when he speaks in public, generally takes off his coat, and speaks with considerable ability, with strong appeals to the passions, often creating great religious excitements. He rides in company with a young lady not his wife,—having left his family and gone they know not where.

VALLEY OF JEHOSEPHAT.

We copy from the Baltimore Patriot the following letter from Professor Durbin, of Dickinson College, Pa., to the Rev. Henry Slicer, of Baltimore.

March 7, 1843.

My Dear Br. Slicer: Here I sit in the shade of the tomb of Zacharias, at the foot of Mount Olivet, where it ascends into the Valley of Jehosaphat, directly opposite to the eastern wall of the Temple, and towering high above the brow of Mount Moriah. Mount Moriah! What a world of heavenly and transporting energy does this word awaken in the bosom of the Jew, the Moslem, but particularly the Christian! The offering up of Isaac, the plague of David for numbering the people, when the angel of destruction stood here, with a drawn sword in the threshing floor of Onan, (1 Chron. xxi.) the travail and industry of the exiles returned by permission of Cyrus to rebuild their temple, the wonderful miracles of Christ and his apostles wrought on that Mount before me, the obstinate defence of the Jews, when Titus pressed them from the Temple to Mount Zion, the destruction of the sacred edifice, the appropriation of the holy mount to the service of Moslemism, its restitution to Christian worship by the Crusaders, and its return again to the Moslem service, in which it yet continues, crowned with the Mosques of Omar and El Aesa, whose beautiful domes sit above the sacred place with admirable lightness and grace. As I strolled by the open gateways, and looked in, how earnestly did I long to enter the sacred enclosure, linger in its walks, and amid its trees; enter even the mosques, particularly that of Omar, which covers, perhaps, the very spot where Isaac was offered, and where the magnificent Temple of Solomon was built, which he dedicated to God by the most eloquent and sensible of all prayers, except our Lord's; (1 Kings viii: 23, etc.) but the fanatical Moslem forbids the feet of the "Christian dog" to tread upon the sacred soil or cross the consecrated threshold.

But I must return to the Valley, from whence I promised you this letter before I left home, and which promise you received somewhat doubtfully. I have wandered up and down it, from the tombs of the Judges, just beyond its head, to the northwest of the city, about 1-2 miles, to the well of Job, perhaps the En Rogel of Scripture, a quarter of a mile below the southwest corner of the city. It is indeed a valley of the dead, or rather of tombs, for their contents are gone; and the sepulchral chambers, where they slept in peace many centuries ago, are now but gaping caverns in the rock, where reptiles nestle, if they be single, small sepulchres; or flocks lie down if they be as large as the tombs of the Judges, Kings and prophets, and some in the southern cliff of the Gibbon, both under and above the "Potter's Field." I have rambled through them all, and found not a fragment of their former contents. The limestone rock in which they are excavated is soft, and has yielded to the elements, and broken away in front of, and sometimes above the chambers. This is the case all over Palestine, (also at Petra, where the rock is as soft as sandstone,) and constantly reminds one of his mortality, and reduction to dust, and dispersion to the winds of heaven. What a glorious assurance, that the soul is not committed to the tomb, but returns to the God who gave it!

I have just come up from the pool of Siloam, which has a connexion with the pool of the Virgin, several hundred yards higher up. The first is in the mouth of the Tysopeon Valley, just where it enters that of Jehosaphat, and the other is on the west side of the latter, not many hundred yards from where I date this letter. The connexion is by a narrow passage cut through the point of the hill which slopes down from the fountains—now subject to occasional violent, irregular flows of the waters, which make one think of the Pool of Bethesda, mentioned in the 5th chapter of St. John, whose waters the angel troubled "at a certain season."—Our countrymen, Dr. Robinson and Mr. Smith witnessed one of these singular movements of the water. We were not so fortunate. No one knows whence the waters come to these cavernous pools, but there is a steady tradition, and general impression, that they have a connexion with the fountains under the temple's area, and perhaps Milton was apprized of this when he wrote,

"Siloa's brook that flowed Fast by the oracles of God."

I descended into the pool to wash, as all good pilgrims do, and found a coarse, ragged, strapping Arab woman, washing a dirty quilt, which lay floating upon the little volume of water. She shrunk away from me as from the approach of a leper, and stood huddled up in a little chasm in the rock, looking upon my pilgrim devotions. The water is sweet and good.

I shall not now undertake to describe the tombs to you, but perhaps I may allow you to peep into my omnium gatharum, where I have plans of them and notes also. But I feel oppressed with sadness, as I cast my eyes up the side of Mount Olivet behind me, and look upon the Jewish cemetery spreading over the sacred hill side, covering it with short, thick stones; each of which lies flat on the ground, and pressed into it a little, as if they had once stood erect, and had been prostrated and pressed by some terrible storm. They are a striking emblem of that most wonderful people, prostrated and trodden down every where but in America; and yet the heart of a Jew turns towards the side of Olivet, over against the sacred Mount, on which once stood the temple of his fathers, and there he desires, above all things, to rest him when his earthly pilgrimage is finished. They linger about the holy city, and steal through its streets to the place of wailing, or to the west side of the temple, as ghosts that have been frightened away, and returned again to the resting-place of their mortal remains.

The first Jews that I saw at Jerusalem, were three sitting apart in the rent trunk of an aged olive tree, in the deep retired valley of the Gibon. I pity them from my very heart.

Just above where I date from, is the golden gate from which our Saviour used to issue at evening, and retire to Mount Olivet. It is now walled up in the temple wall. Above me in the valley is the reputed tomb of the Virgin, in which I attended the devotions of the crowd of pilgrims, and followed them into the little chamber, where they pressed their lips long and ardently to the cold rock, as a young mother kisses for the last time her only child before it is laid to rest in the grave. What a mystery this world is! The glory and great works of man have perished, but the savour of the deeds of the Almighty, and the presence of his primitive children, still perfume the rocks and mountains, and all nations send their pilgrims to honor the consecrated places; and it is painful to the Protestant to know that this external worship is considered efficacious for saving the soul. I wish I could describe to you what I saw in and around the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. But my letter to you at your request belongs to the Valley of Jehosaphat.

From the Valley, I ascended of course the Mount of Olives, paused and—under the gnarled and rent olive trees of Gethsemane, which seem as if they might be the same that witnessed of our Saviour, rambled out to Bethany, stood on the ascension spot, returned to the city along the way of our Saviour's triumphant entry into Jerusalem; but I must pause. Bethel, Shioh, Sychem, Samaria, Nazareth, Tyre, Sidon, Damascus, Balbec, etc., are before me, but my sheet is full. I have a stick for you, cut from the most consecrated of spots.—

My kind regards to your family, especially to the best one. As ever yours. J. P. DURBIN.

P. S. I seal this letter in sight of Smyrna, having this morning at sunrise gazed upon the Island of Patmos, and read with unwonted zest the introduction of the Revelation of St. John. It is astonishing what light and power the Scriptures have when read on the spots, and amid the scenes described. It may be my faith is stronger under such circumstances.

INSANE PRAYING.

"I have heard a minister pray—'if it be for thy glory, sink the wicked still deeper in hell;' and he justified himself by saying that David offered a prayer somewhat similar; but forthwith there went abroad a suspicion that the minister was deranged, and he certainly was in this prayer."

So says Rev. Edward A. Park, Professor in the Andover Theological Seminary. What would he have said, if he had heard a man pray—"if thou hadst long since cut us down, and assigned our portion with the lost in perdition, thou wouldst have been only just." If he would not have said that this man was also insane in his prayer, methinks he would have said that he used a very polite way of accusing God with being wanting in justice!—And such language I heard in a prayer the other day at a funeral; as though justice had required God to send us to hell long ago, but he had neglected to do it! The ancient servants of God were more rational and consistent. While they prayed that God would reward the righteous in proportion to their merits, they prayed that he would punish the wicked according to their works. So prayed Solomon at the dedication of the royal temple.—"If a man sin against his neighbor, then hear thou from heaven, and do, and judge thy servants, by requiting the wicked, recompensing his way upon his own head, and by justifying the righteous by giving him according to his righteousness." He did not seem even to suspect that there was injustice in the administration of God's government, and he therefore prayed for the fulfilment of his will, as well in regard to the wicked as the righteous. Would that all modern teachers of religion had the wisdom of Solomon. A more amiable character would be ascribed to God. M. S.

RELIGIOUS NAMES.

Jews. This name is derived from Judah, and was applied to the descendants of Abraham by Isaac his son. This is rather a national name, perhaps, and yet it is seldom used without religious associations. Hence, when the word Jew is heard, the first thought is that of their peculiar religious opinions in reference to Christ and his doctrines. Their sacred books are those of the Old Testament. They have no home as a nation, but in fulfilment of the prophecies they are scattered abroad as outcasts and wanderers over the face of the earth. They are most numerous in Poland.

CHRISTIANS. The term Christian was first applied to the followers of Christ about nine years after his death, (A. D. 42,) at Antioch of Syria.—Before this they were generally called Nazarenes, being disciples of Jesus of Nazareth. Their sacred books are all those, both of the Old and New Testament, known as the Bible. They are found mostly in Europe and America.

MAHOMETANS. This is a name given to those who accept the person of Mahomet, or Mohammed, as a prophet of God, and receive the Koran as a revelation of divine truth through him. Their holy book is of course the Koran. The religion of Mohammed is embraced by the Turks, Persians, and several nations and tribes of Asia and Africa.

PAGAN. The origin of this name is little known, yet is somewhat curious. It is from the Latin pagus, a village, or rural district; and, because the pagani, the country people, villagers, or peasants, as was natural, adhered longest to idolatry, the term became a general appellation; and all idolaters and heathen are now called by Christians pagans.

pagans. They are found in Asia, America, and Africa, and embrace the larger portion of the human race.—Rev. T. B. Thayer.

UNITED STATES CONVENTION.

The following extracts from the records of the United States Convention of Universalists, are published for the purpose of reminding the brethren therein designated, of the duties enjoined upon them.

At the session held in New York in 1841, Brs. S. R. Smith and T. J. Sawyer, of New York, T. J. Greenwood, of Massachusetts, A. Moore, of Pennsylvania, and E. M. Pingree, of Ohio, were appointed a Committee "to draft a Constitution and Plan of Church compact and course of Discipline, for Societies, Associations and Conventions in the fellowship of this body, in conformity to the suggestions of the Miami Association of Universalists in Ohio, and to report at the next annual session of this body."

The Convention at its meeting in Providence in September last, passed a resolve, "That the report of members of the Committee appointed to draft a system of organization and discipline, presented at this session, be accepted and published; and that the Committee be continued for another year, with instructions to draw up a plan of organization and discipline, and publish the same as early as practicable, in our religious periodicals, and to make report of their doings at the next session of this body."

The Report above referred to, has not to my knowledge, been published, through some oversight, probably, of the Clerks of the session; but its purport was, in effect, if my recollection serves me, that the Committee had done but little, if any thing, toward perfecting the work entrusted to them.

Ers. R. O. Williams, of Connecticut, A. A. Folsom, of Massachusetts, and L. C. Browne, of N. Hampshire, were also appointed a Committee "to examine the code of rules which govern this body during its annual sessions, and, if they deem it necessary, to amend, revise, and enlarge the same, and make a report at the next regular session of this Convention. J. M. Austin, Standing Clerk.

A TRULY DISTRESSING CASE.—The brig Ohio sailed from Point Petre (Gaudaloupe) on the morning of the 2d of July, bound for St. Thomas. On the evening of that day, her second mate, Mr. Atwood, was taken ill, and died on the 8th; a few hours following the second mate's attack, her commander, Captain Berls, was taken; and on the 5th, the chief mate, (brother to the Capt.) was seized with the like symptoms, and died on the 8th. The captain lingered until the 11th, when he also died. In this situation, with but three souls on board, and one of them ill, the eldest seaman took charge of the vessel, with the hope of reaching some part of the United States. No one of the survivors had the least knowledge of navigation, and the vessel was but sparingly provided with water and provisions. Providentially they fell in with one of the Baltimore pilot boats, one hundred miles from land, on the morning of the 18th inst., in a state of hopelessness, bordering on despair, and in safety reached our port.—[Balt. Sun.

CRUEL FRAUD.—A scoundrel named Maltitz, who came over from Bremen in the ship Goethe, Capt. Hermann, which arrived at Baltimore on Tuesday, contrived on the way to ingratiate himself with many of the passengers, and obtain from them over $1,000 in all on the pretence of paying their passage to their several destinations. Immediately on landing he disappeared in a coach, and has not since been heard of.

Seventy-two of the crew of the U. S. steamer Missouri have signed the pledge of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors.

A beggar, 60 years old, was recently arrested in Paris, on whom 14,000 francs in gold were found, tied in a belt around his waist.

LANSINGUE is rapidly rising again from its ashes.—The Gazette says the loss by the late fire has generally fallen on men able to bear it, and they have taken hold manfully to rebuild the "burnt district."

Peaches.—Notwithstanding the great drought, and the consequent scarcity of this fine fruit in this vicinity we are glad to hear that there is likely to be no great deficiency in the supply for this market. The Messrs. Reybold, of the State of Delaware, who have devoted much time, labor and expense, to the cultivation of peaches, and by a variety of experiments brought the fruit to a state of great perfection, will supply the market during the season with about 30,000 to 40,000 baskets of the finest quality of fruit. A daily supply will arrive by the steamboats Independence and Swan, at Pier No. 2, North River, and the agent of the proprietors will be on the wharf when the boats arrive, prepared to dispose of the fruit in lots to suit purchasers. The first arrival is expected on Wednesday, the 2d of August.—Even. Post.

Navigation of the Mississippi.—Last year the navigation of the Mississippi included 450 steamers, averaging each 200 tons, and making an aggregate tonnage of 90,000. They cost above $7,000,000, and were navigated by nearly 16,000 persons—about 35 each. Besides these steamers there are about 4,000 flatboats, which cost each about $150, managed by five hands each, or 20,000 persons, and make an expense of $1,380,000. The estimated annual expense of the steam navigation, including 15 per cent. for insurance, and 27 per cent. for ware and tear is $13,618,000.

Mr. Alonzo L. Fish, of Herkimer, in this State, made last year from twenty cows, besides 301 pounds of butter, no less than 13,996 pounds of cheese, or 700 to each cow. He of course selects good cows of the best breed and keeps them well.—Tribune.

The farmers in Ohio are already selling their hogs, deliverable next winter. The asking price is $3.00, but sales have been made to some extent at 2.50 per cwt. The quantity of Pork will be about equal to that of last season.

The Oswego county jail was opened with false keys on Saturday night last, and six prisoners escaped. A reward of 130 is offered for them.

Two persons have been arrested in Schenectady for passing counterfeit $1 bills of the Bank of Rome.

The farmers of Washington county, Pa., have received $200,000 for Wool this season.

The Louisville Whig says that about 600 buildings will be put up in that city this season.

Dear sisters in our Zion—
Sweet friends of charity,
Accept my thanks sincerely,
For kindness shown to me.

Your sisterly attentions,
My gratitude excite;
Awakening in my bosom,
A thrill of pure delight.

My memory oft shall linger,
On halcyon moments flown;
When friendship's heavenly radiance,
On my lone pathway shone.

May Heaven forever bless you,
And on you ever smile;
And give you peace and gladness,
The world can never spoil.

May you repose when weary,
In friendship's holy arms;
And pure religion grace you,
In all its native charms.

When summer gilds with radiance,
The lofty mounts and vales;
And feathered songsters warble,
Sweet peans on the gales.

Remember me, then, sisters,
At twilight's holy hour;
When silvery moonlight sparkles,
And dew-drops bathe the flowers.

But never would I have you,
To think of me and sigh;
I ever shall be guarded
By God's omniscient eye.]

O, may we meet and mingle
Our voices here below;
If not, in that fair region,
Where fall no tears of woe.

Hail, happy, golden era!
When we shall meet above;
A ransomed world adorning,
The diadem of love.

ORIGIN, CHARACTER, AND PREVALENCE OF PUSEYISM.

The intense and universal interest now felt in the subject of Puseyism will ensure an eager perusal of a brief statement of the circumstances under which it originated, and the position it now occupies.

In the year 1833 the late Rev. Dr. Rose, of Kings College, the Rev. Mr. Percival, Dr. Pusey, and two or three other clergymen, met in the house of the first named Rev. gentleman, when talking over the progress of dissent and the unpopularity and even practical neglect into which high church principles had fallen of late years, they came to a resolution to form themselves into a society, though without any formal organization, to use their utmost efforts to revive and bring into practical recognition the class of principles to which we have referred.

The celebrated "Tracts for the Times," had their origin in the meeting in question. These tracts appeared at irregular intervals, and were published at prices varying according to the quantity of matter, from twopence to sixpence. The tracts soon attracted general attention, from the startling doctrines they advanced; and as the tendency of all of them was to exalt the authority of the church and increase the importance of the clergy, by investing them with a special sacredness of character, the new class of opinions made rapid progress among them. Every successive tract became bolder and bolder in its tone, and approached nearer and nearer the doctrines of the Church of Rome. The principal writers were Dr. Pusey, the Rev. Mr. Ward, the Rev. Mr. Williams, the Rev. Mr. Newman, and one or two others. The series proceeded until it reached No. 90, which so openly and strenuously advocated Popish principles that the Bishop of Oxford felt called upon to interpose his authority and put an end to the farther publication of the tracts. The last of the series, No. 90, created a deep sensation, especially as it was soon discovered that it had contributed to make several individuals go openly over to the Church of Rome.

The doctrines now held by the Puseyites, who are sometimes called Tractarians, so closely resemble those of the Roman Catholic Church, that there can hardly be said, on most points, to be any essential difference between them. Among the points to which the Puseyites attach a special importance, is the assumption that all the clergy of the Church of England, in common with those of the Church of Rome, have descended in a direct line from the apostles. This is what is called apostolical succession. They also maintain that all children, baptized by the established clergy, are regenerated when the water is sprinkled upon them; but they refuse to recognize the baptism of ministers of other denominations, as baptism at all. They hold that there is no hope of salvation for those who are without the pale of the Church. They denounce the Reformation, and look forward with eager desire to a union between the Church of England and the Church of Rome. They maintain that the church has an authority above that of the state; and that the sovereign and the senate are bound to submit to the dictum of the church. They lay but little stress on those doctrinal matters which the evangelical clergy in the establishment regard as necessary to salvation. They attach much greater importance to the writings of the fathers, than to the narratives of the inspired evangelists and the epistles of the apostles.

They hold, indeed, that the Scriptures ought not to be read at all by the laity, unless accompanied by the exposition of their meaning to be found in the book of Common Prayer. They virtually reject the atonement, and set aside as fanaticism what is regarded by other bodies the religion of the heart. They look upon religion as mainly consisting in the observance of forms and ceremonies. They maintain that the bread and wine in the sacrament are converted, when consecrated by the clergy, into the actual flesh and blood of Christ, and that the sacrament constitutes a kind of continuation of the atonement of Christ on the cross.

It is for maintaining these two latter points in a sermon preached in the Cathedral of Oxford, 3 weeks ago, that Dr. Pusey has been convicted of Popish heresy by a board of divines, and sentenced by the Vice Chancellor to two years prohibition from preaching within the precincts of the University. The board of divines, six in number, separated without coming to a formal decision—but they afterwards severally gave in their decision, and were unanimous in their condemnation of the sermon as advocating heresy.

Dr. Pusey has entered his protest against the decision of the board and the sentence of the Vice Chancellor, on the ground that he was not heard in his defence, and that the objectionable parts of his sermon were not specified. A requisition, signed by about sixty members of convention and bachelors of civil law, has been forwarded to the Vice Chancellor, requesting him to point out the objectionable parts in Dr. Pusey's sermon. The Vice Chancellor has refused to comply with their request, though, before passing sentence, he furnished Dr. Pusey privately with the grounds on which he condemned his sermon. The sermon, it is understood, will be published in a few days, and will, doubtless, excite intense interest. Puseyism has made extraordinary progress in the church within the last three years. It is calculated that out of 12,000 clergy in England and Wales, 9000, or three fourths of the whole, are deeply tainted with it. In Scotland again, the whole of the Episcopal clergy, with the exception of three or four, are decided Puseyites. In Ireland also, the heresy is making alarming progress. It is calculated that the majority of the Bench of Bishops are more or less tinged with it. Those of the prelates who most openly advocate Puseyite principles are the Bishop of Exeter, the Bishop of London, and the Bishop of Oxford. Among the churches and chapels of London in which Puseyite practice prevails to the greatest extent, will be found Shoreditch Church and Margaret st. Chapel, Oxford street.

In the latter place it would be difficult to perceive any difference between the form of worship and that observed in a Roman Catholic Church. In many of the Puseyite churches and chapels, daily worship has been established, and in all of them, we believe, the sacrament is administered weekly. We understand it is likely the subject will soon be brought before the Parliament, and the question to be determined will be, whether a Protestant country ought to be called on to pay from six to seven millions of pounds a year to the established clergy for inculcating Popish principles and observing Popish practices in their places of worship, in entire disregard of the solemn engagement they came under at their ordination to maintain the Protestant religion of the land.

DISRUPTION OF THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

We have delayed, for lack of room, much longer than we intended, such a statement, brief as it must necessarily be, of the prominent facts attending the recent disruption of the Church of Scotland as should enable our readers to form at least some general notion of the nature of this controversy and the importance of the movement. But as the question is one of permanent and not merely of temporary interest, we may render our readers a service by doing now what we should have done before.

It will not be easy to trace to its source the difficulty which has now reached its climax. Secessions from the Church Establishment in Scotland have been frequent during all the last century; but they have been small, and in comparison with this, quite unimportant. The questions which have been of the most influence in effecting this separation are two:

1. The first relates to the legality of what is called the Veto Act, passed in 1834—since which time the subject has continued to excite great attention, and the division between the two contending parties has become yearly more and more decided. Previous to that time, the presentations to a very large proportion of the Scottish Churches were wholly private property, in the hands, some of them of the crown, and others of individuals. The patronage thus possessed, as all patronage inevitably does, soon became more or less corrupt; and the presentations were made with very little reverence or regard to the wishes or welfare of the members of the Churches. Of course they became unpopular, and the opposition to them became so strong and unpopular that the General Assembly—the Convocation or Ecclesiastical Parliament of the Kirk—in 1834 passed an act giving authority to the male heads of families in communion with the church, to veto or reject any minister whom a patron might present to a vacant parish. This act, of course, was the occasion of no little excitement and discussion, and its legality was loudly denied. Cases soon arose in which it was tested. The first was that of the Presbytery of Auchtermader. The presentee was vetoed by the Congregation, to which he was presented, and in consequence rejected by the presbytery, which acted under the General Assembly. In conjunction with his patron he at once appealed to the Civil Courts bringing an action against the Presbytery, maintaining that they had no right to reject him on the mere ground of the veto of the parishioners. The decision was in favor of the patron and presentee. It was carried by the Presbytery to the House of Lords, and there confirmed. A similar question arose in the case of the ministers of Strathbogie, with a similar result.

2. The other principal question was of still more importance, as its decision, as given, would have a more extended retrospective action—excluding, in fact, from their seats in the Church Courts, 277 ministers and as many elders. It arose thus:—the General Assembly is composed of representatives from different Presbyteries, from Royal Boroughs and from the Universities; and as each parish minister is a member of his particular Presbytery he is eligible as a representative in the Assembly. During the several years last past there being great demand for Church extension, subsidiary places of worship, called chapels of ease, were erected: and there being great difficulties in the way of constructing new parishes, various localities in extensive districts were converted into parishes quo ad sacra, the ministers of which were provided for by a crown grant called the Royal Bounty. The ministers of such chapels and parishes have become very numerous and the General Assembly had conferred upon them the privilege of regular parochial ministers, thus constituting them members of their several presbyteries and so eligible to the Assembly itself. These acts have been called in question, and appeals have been taken to the Civil Courts by which the acts have been pronounced illegal. The effect would be as we have already said, to throw out 277 ministers and thus to change entirely the relative strength of parties in the Assembly.

These two parties had been organized with reference to the general question: the Nonintrusionists, or those opposed to this interference of the Civil Courts, with Dr. Chalmers at their head, having a very decided majority. They have, however, without objection, suffered the Lord High Commissioner, the Representative of the Sovereign in the General Assembly, to be present at its session; but he had no voice or vote in the proceedings, took no part in its business, and his presence was not even deemed necessary to the validity of the Assembly's transactions.

These were the principal questions which had caused the difficulty between the Church of Scotland and the civil powers. Minor points had increased it, and for a few days previous to the last meeting of the Assembly on the 18th of May, the excitement had been very great. That body met at St. Andrew's church in Edinburgh, with all its usual pomp and ceremony, the Marquis of Bute, Lord High Commissioner, being escorted by a splendid military array, and the nobility and gentry attending in great numbers, and amid a display of unusual brilliancy. The church was excessively crowded, and the number of members in attendance was much greater than usual. After the Marquis of Bute had taken his seat, the Moderator, Dr. Welsh, arose and said that the proper time according to usage, had arrived for making up the roll; but there had been so great an inroad, so decided an infringement, on the Constitution of the Church, that they could not proceed to organize the Assembly without a violation of the terms of the Union of the Church and State, as authoritatively defined. He then proceeded to read the "Protest of the Church," a brief, calm, decided statement of the wrongs the Scottish Church had suffered in the subjection of her Courts to the Civil Courts in the exercise of her spiritual functions, in the interference of the Civil Courts with the preaching of the Gospel and administration of the Church ordinances, and in general in the encroachments upon her authority, which were deemed inconsistent with Christian liberty and with the rights conferred by the Head of the Church upon the Church alone.

When he had finished reading this document, and amid the breathless attention and tears with which it was heard, he laid it on the table, rose up in his robe and cap of office and calmly walked out, followed by Dr. Chalmers, Gordon, Macfarlane, and others of the most powerful and influential members of the Scottish Church, including the whole body of adhering members and elders. For an instant a loud cheer burst from the galleries, but it was immediately hushed, and the assembled multitude looked on in solemn silence and admiration. They proceeded four abreast through the street, the windows and house-tops being filled with curious and interested spectators, and moved in a body to Tanfield, Canonmills. Thus with a heroism and self-denying nobleness of heart seldom equalled in the history of the world, they turned their backs upon Royalty, upon all that secured them worldly honor and distinction, upon their incomes, their very means of subsistence, and proceeded unattended by troops, marshalled only by consciences void of offence and hearts filled with the spirit of Him in whose name they had taken this great and momentous step, to the Hall where they were welcomed by tumultuous applause. They immediately organized by the applauded election of Dr. Chalmers, as Moderator, who then addressed the meeting, briefly vindicating the decision of the Assembly, and most earnestly protesting against being considered as Dissenters or Voluntaries. They still believed, he said, in the union of Church and State, and if they left the Establishment, they wished it understood that they went out on the Establishment principle. Committees were then appointed, and the business of the assembly was entered upon. The number of ministers who had joined the Free Assembly was 454, and the attendance upon its session was very numerous. It is to meet again at Glasgow in October. In all respects except with reference to the propriety of a Church Establishment, there is a free communion between Dissenters and members of the Free Churches, and the former, in several instances, have opened Chapels for the use of the latter, until their own can be completed. One has already been finished for Dr. Candish, who leaves the Church of St. George, the most magnificent in Edinburgh, for a small, plain edifice, erected within six weeks. The deputation from the Presbyterian Church of Ireland followed the Separatists, and acknowledged them as the Church. The Marquis of Breadalbane has subscribed £10,000, and his lady £1000 for the Seceders. The contributions, up to the latest dates, had reached about £250,000. The aggregate income and property which they relinquished exceeded half a million sterling.—N. Y. Trib.

It is refreshing to meet so much truth, mingled with so little error, in a Partialist journal as we find in the following article: which we copy from the Christian Palladium, published at Union Mills, in this State, by Elder S. Marvin, of the Christian sect. "It is certainly a clear and able epitome of the New Testament doctrine of the kingdom of God or heaven, or reign of God.—The only error is making the state itself, the condition of entrance into the state of immortal blessedness, viz., reconciliation, or subjection, or obedience to God. But this is done to convey the idea that some will not finally comply with the conditions, and that, consequently there will be a part of the universe, and some beings in the universe, over which this kingdom of God will not rule—or, in other words, that God's moral reign will be limited—that there will be an endless government opposed to him and Jesus, which they can not subdue to obedience!"

THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

The kingdom of God, and the kingdom of heaven, in the Scriptures, generally mean the same thing; and refer to his reign, and its effects, among men. The qualities of this kingdom are clearly defined, negatively, and affirmatively, by the Saviour and his apostles. "My kingdom is not of this world." That is, it is not earthly in its nature and attributes. "The kingdom of God is not meat and drink," "but it is righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." And "the kingdom of God is within you." And as here defined, the kingdom has already been set up.

1st. Because the parabolical illustrations of it are incompatible with the glorified state of the saints. The parables of the sower and of the net, represent two kinds of people in the kingdom, GROWING TOGETHER, "until the harvest." One kind, is, "the children of the wicked one." Is this consistent with the eternal state of glory of the saints? 1st. This kingdom exists before the end of the world. That kingdom of glory will not be introduced till after or in connection with the end of the world. 2d. In this kingdom are "the children of the wicked one," "the bad," "things that offend," and "that do iniquity." But into that kingdom of glory, "no unclean thing can enter;"

but those "who do his commandments," the "blessed of his Father." 3d. From this kingdom will be excluded "the bad," "children of the kingdom" (Jews) and those "that do iniquity."—But those who enter that kingdom of glory, "shall go no more out forever." For these and other reasons, I view the doctrine of these parables as incompatible with the kingdom of glory; hence conceive the kingdom to have been previously set up.

2d. "The children of the kingdom" (the Jews) "were cast out of the kingdom,"—"broken off because of unbelief," which could not have been, if the kingdom was not yet set up.

3d. Men were in the kingdom in the days of the apostles. Inferred from John iii: 5, "except a man be born of water and of the spirit, he can not enter into the kingdom of God." Certainly this implies, that if a man was born again he did enter into the kingdom then. Again from Luke xvi: 16, "The law and the prophets were until John, since that the kingdom of God is preached, and every man presseth into it." Could they have pressed into it if it had not existed? That primitive Christians were in the kingdom is positively affirmed, Col. i: 13. "Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son." If the Colossians were in the kingdom in the days of Paul, the kingdom must have been set up.

4th. This is a growing kingdom, as shown in the parable of the mustard seed and of the measures of meal; which, though small in the beginning, increases till the mustard is a great tree; and the three measures are all leavened. How irreconcilable is this view with that of the eternal state, where all is unchangeable! Dan. ii: 35, "And the stone that smote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth." This is another illustration of its growing nature. It is the stone that smites the image, and it is not till "the iron, the brass, &c., are carried away, and NO MORE PLACE FOUND FOR THEM," that the stone becomes a great mountain, and fills the whole earth. The kingdom can not be either universal or eternal when it smites the image; therefore it must be the kingdom in its present growing, progressive state.

5th. This kingdom exists in different states of perfection, as shown in the parable of the seed,—Mark iv: 26, 29. "First the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear." Whatever application may be made of these different stages, it is evident, 1st, That they do exist, 2d, That none but the last, the full, or perfect corn, can be applied to the kingdom of glory; when they shall be as the angels, "to die no more."

Finally, as there are three stages of the kingdom, so there are three different methods of introduction into it. 1. By a fleshy birth. 2. A spiritual birth. 3. By a resurrection, or birth from the grave. So also there are three different terms of admission. 1. A lineal descendant of Abraham. 2. Faith in the Lord Jesus Christ.—3. Obedience to the commands of God. The first stage is past; its "children cast out," "broken off." The second stage, that into which the Colossians were translated, is now progressing, and soon, as a stone, will smite the image and grind it to powder, when the third in all its fullness, and perfection of grace and glory shall succeed—death conquered—the grave vanquished—despisers punished—the everlasting gates lifted up, when to the numbered host out of every nation, kindred, tongue and people, with spotless robes, glittering crowns, and waving palms, midst sounding anthems, Christ shall say, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." And thus, amid the mingled shouts of triumphant saints, and rejoicing angels, an "entrance shall be ministered unto them abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

Reader, have you been born again? Are you obeying the commands of God? And are you prepared to enter that coming kingdom of indescribable and increasing glory? B.

EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS.....NO. II.

The apostle begins his letter by a brief statement of his apostolic commission and authority, as the apostle of the Gentiles; and the expression of his warm desire to visit them. At the 15th verse, he opens the subject of controversy, by declaring the Gospel to be the power of God unto salvation—a salvation and a life to be enjoyed only by faith in it. He then enters into the argument, by showing that the mere light of nature was not sufficient to guide man to holiness and peace; inasmuch, as their idolatrous and immoral practices had resulted from their having only the teachings of nature to direct them. In the second chapter he turns to the Jew, and shows that he is inexcusable in severely condemning the heathen, for that the law of Moses was unto condemnation, but not unto salvation—that the Jews had also sinned deeply against God, as well as the Gentiles, and that God would not spare either; but on the Jews first, as deepest in wrong, as well as on Gentiles, he would pour out his righteous rewards and punishments. To the Jews, he would deal out according to their law—to the Gentiles according to the law of nature—thus dealing fairly and truly, and without respect of persons.

In the third chapter he introduces the Jewish objection—first verse—and answers it in part; leaving a fuller answer to a subsequent period of his letter. This chapter is full of similar objections, and of replies to them. The argument appears to be, that though the Gentiles are to be admitted to be the true church, and the Jews to be cast out, yet, to the Jew the same door is open to enter by, as to the Gentile—even the Gospel. That their unbelief in Jesus, can not annul the promise God made to their father Abraham, which promise is the Gospel. That though this truth of God—this promise—is extended to the Gentiles, by Jewish unbelief; yet that will not excuse the unbelief of the Jews, no more than it would the Christians, if it were true of them, as had been slanderously reported, that they did evil that good might come. That having proved both Jews and Gentiles to be transgressors of their respective laws, both stand on equal grounds before the Gospel; and God is not unjust, therefore, in requiring both to enter into a knowledge of his favor by receiving that Gospel as their guide, instead of the laws of Moses and of nature. On this ground, all boasting of one over the other is excluded, and man becomes just, not by performing any outward deeds required by any law, but by embracing the spirit of the Gospel, by faith in its teachings.

The fourth chapter is devoted to showing that Abraham was justified—redeemed from idolatry and made just—by faith in the Gospel, and not by any outward works of idolatry, or ceremonies of the law of Moses—even before he received circumcision, which was the sign or seal of a past justification, rather than a promise or means of a future. If we, therefore, would be true children of Abraham, it must be not by any outward ceremony, but by also believing the Gospel—the promise God made to him.

The fifth chapter continues the subject of justification by faith—of becoming good men and women by believing the good news contained in God's promise of universal blessedness. He argues that the love of God, manifested specially in Christ's dying for us, will reconcile us to God. But if so, how much more shall we be led to peace and joy—to present salvation—by contemplating Christ's life? And this, too, even in the persecutions and afflictions heaped on the early Christians for professing their faith.

In the close of this chapter, Paul runs briefly over the causes that led to unreconciliation with God—and the means instituted to counteract those influences, and reconcile men again. He shows that moral death, or unreconciliation, began at Adam's transgression, and as all men sinned as Adam did, (not in Adam,) so that moral death passed upon all. But the example, and power and influence of Christ's obedience is destined to extend unto all these, and raise them from this moral death, unto everlasting life and joy. After this unreconciliation, or death, had reached from Adam to Moses, the law was given to render it more apparent—that the offence might abound—but now, where sin abounded, grace did much more abound, &c.

The apostle, in the sixth chapter, again introduces the favorite objection of the Jews, that if, their unbelief, or the sins of the world, were the reason why God extended the Gospel farther, or manifested his goodness more powerfully, then let us abound in sin and unbelief, that the Gospel and grace of God may abound still more.—This, you know, is a very popular objection to universal salvation—or that portion of our views, in which we declare that God's grace will extend beyond our sins, convert our evil into good, and cause all the punishment we receive, to operate as a curing medicine to our souls. The apostle answers it conclusively—that they who have died to any desire even to commit sin, by receiving the Gospel, can not live, or have any delight in sin. He pursues this subject through the chapter—presenting this death to sin in various lights—and concluding with the declaration, that the daily wages of sin is death; but, the gift of God, (which follows after this death,) is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

The seventh chapter seems to be directed especially to the Jewish converts, to show them that as the Mosaic law was dead—that dispensation closed, and extinct—no Jew could be any longer bound by it; any more than a man or woman can be bound to their partner after that partner's death. He argues, not that the law made men sin, for it forbade sin; but it was not sufficient to prevent sin—and the same could be said of the law of nature. But the law of love, in Christ, is more powerful, and delivers the mind from its subjection to fleshly appetites and passions, and thus releases us at once from the insufficient power of the laws of Moses and of nature; and from their condemnation, also. This subject is continued into the seventh chapter, and intimately connected with the text subject there introduced. But, I trust this brief summary of the chain of the argument of the letter, will enable us understandingly to go through the examination of the following chapters.

Remember—Paul was a Hebrew of Hebrews—brought up in all the Jewish manners, learning, and religion, strictly a Pharisee—that he was anxious, to a great degree, to convert his countrymen to Christianity, and at the same time, faithful in his office as the apostle of the Gentiles. Remember, also, that the Jews had always held the Gentiles in abhorrence, as the rejected and outcasts of God; and that the Gentiles held the Jews in contempt, as narrow souled bigots, and unlearned barbarians. Remember that the Jews prided themselves on being God's special people—favored with his revelations, and guided by his divine law;—while the Romans prided themselves on their established religion, its pomp and glory—and on being philosophers, lovers of wisdom, and followers of the light of nature alone. Remember, that each of these classes came into the Christian church with all these feelings, errors, prejudices and opinions of national and sectarian superiority; and that the apostle had to contend with both, to reason with both, and to endeavor to reconcile both to each other. These facts being remembered, and the general course of his reasoning having been pointed out in the portions already reviewed, it is presumed that there can be little difficulty in coming to a clear and full understanding of the remaining chapters of this interesting and valuable letter.

PUSEYISM.

This term will probably require a frequent mention, and occupy a considerable space in the public papers, from henceforth. We have therefore given a long article in to day's paper, giving, what we believe to be a candid explanation of its history and meaning. Probably it represents Puseyism as going a little farther toward the Church of Rome than it really does; but, from recent movements, it is evidently very nearly correct, if not wholly so.

It may not be uninteresting to give a brief statement of the events which have lately introduced Puseyism to public notice in this country, and especially in the city of New York. So far as I have been able to examine the hot and bitter controversy on the subject, the following appear to be the facts in this singular and important case, which threatens a division in the Episcopal Church in this country as well as in England.

Rev. Dr. Smith had a student, a Mr. Carey, whose high Church notions excited the Doctor's curiosity;—when, finding Mr. Carey to be almost, if not quite, a Roman Catholic in his views and feelings, he objected to Mr. C's ordination as a deacon of the Episcopal church. The Bishop called a council of eight clergymen including Drs. Smith and Anthon, for the examination of the candidate. Mr. Carey, being advised by his friends in this Council, answered very guardedly the questions put to him; but enough was elicited to show that he was not opposed to, even if he did not actually favor, the doctrines of transubstantiation, purgatory, prayer and masses for the dead, and invocation of the saints, besides some other doctrines and ceremonies of a similar character; and that he deemed the Reformation unjustifiable, and the Church of Rome a true church if not the true church, to which he might possibly go for license to preach, if refused by Episcopalians. Drs. Smith and Anthon opposed his ordination as a Protestant Episcopal clergyman; but Bishop Onderdonk and the other six clergymen were in favor of it. Accordingly arrangements were made for the ordination; but at the time and place, and during the preparatory services, Drs. Smith and Anthon rose and each read a protest. And when the ordination services proceeded, walked out of the house to the great scandal of the faithful. On being attacked for their want of decency and reverence, they came out with a history of the whole affair in pamphlet form. The "six" then came out with a card declining any reply, but pretty plainly insinuating falsehood and misrepresentation against the pamphlet. Subsequently one of the "six" has come out and cleared his faith from any participation with Mr. Carey in his Roman Catholic views and feelings. And so the war rages among these children of the Church of England.

In addition to those already named above as Puseyites in participation, if not in feeling and faith, Bishop G. W. Doane, of New Jersey, and Bishop Brownell, of Connecticut, have come out and declared that Dr. Pusey is orthodox according to the 39 Articles and Prayer Book of the Episcopal church in England and America. How many other Bishops, Editors, and clergymen of "the church" are tainted with this musty heresy, we have not yet learned. The papers opposed to it, represent the number as being small, and promise that Bishop Onderdonk & Co. shall be read out of "the Church," and "our Church," without any doubt or hesitancy. But it is presumed that this will be easier said than done. The high church party has many members and great influence, and holds the purse as well as the press under its control. Trinity Church, with its millions of dollars, will probably come out in aid of Bishops Onderdonk, Doane & Co. In this case, the contest between Roman Catholicism and English Catholicism in the Episcopal church, will be protracted, and the triumph doubtful. Probably the Puseyites will be beaten at last. But certain it is, that if the contest is openly waged for any time, the people will have such a very salutary exhibition of the tendencies and teachings and spirit of this legitimate daughter of the church of Rome, as to cure many of them of any love they now may have for Episcopal liberality, and ceremonies, and government. Those of our readers who read the Essays of Br. S. R. Smith on Episcopalianism, published in this paper a few years ago, can not fail to remember the graphic pictures he then drew of those tendencies, which history is now fulfilling rapidly.

Believing that this contest will result in advancing the spread of true liberality of Christian doctrine and feeling, in the end, we have deemed it our duty to enter on record this brief statement of affairs. We may find it necessary, or at least useful, in our opinion, again to notice this affair, or some of the events daily rising out of it.

SECESSION IN SCOTLAND.

We invite attention to the selected article in this paper on the great division in the Scottish Kirk. The tendency must be to give more power to the people, and take away power from the government. Like Puseyism in England, it must agitate to some good result, though the agitation itself may seem evil. Secession in Scotland, Puseyism in England, and Repeal in Ireland seem to be the three great means to work out a considerable reform in Great Britain and Ireland, the beneficial and liberalizing effects of which must ultimately extend across the ocean and be felt in our own land. God is at work in the earth.

FATHER STACY.

By our religious notices it will be seen that Br. N. Stacy is to preach in Marshall, in this vicinity, next Sunday. We would be glad to hear once more this venerable and active servant of the Lord Jesus. But we are consoled in our deprivation by the belief that many of our brethren and sisters will enjoy the privilege we are denied—some, perhaps, who heard him, a solitary and youthful messenger of “strange things” yet “glad tidings,” about 40 years ago.

His stay is but short in this section, and this probably will be the only opportunity afforded to his friends in this vicinity of now hearing him.

THE COMPANION AND REGISTER FOR 1844.

Attention the West!—It is our intention to have a small lot of the “Universalist Companion and Register, with an Almanac, for 1844” at Akron, Ohio, on the meeting of the U. S. Convention in that place. Br. J. A. Gurley, of Cincinnati, who will be present, will take charge and make sales of them. As, in order to do this, and thus accommodate our western brethren, we shall have to be at extra expense, we shall charge the ordinary cost of transportation per hundred more than we would on sales here. Without this small addition, our terms will be the same as last year—low prices and cash payments. Remember, brethren, without the cash we can not furnish the work to you—and therefore be prepared to pay for what you wish to get.

We give this notice thus early, that our friends may be prepared in time to avail themselves of this very favorable opportunity to procure the work; and save themselves the risk of transportation, and of remitting money by mail, as well as procure the work in time to make sales in every region, before winter. The work itself will be found cheap even to circulate as a tract, at the retail price. And purchased by the hundred or dozen, at the present low cash prices, it will yield a handsome profit to the retailer.

* * Genius of Truth, Star in the West, Christian Teacher, and Better Covenant, please copy, and I will send you my thanks in the bundle to Akron.

UNIVERSALIST REGISTER, FOR 1844.

Prices.—Single copy, 12 1-2 cents—12 for $1.00—25 for $2.00—40 for $3.00—70 for $5.00—100 for $6.50—500 for $30.00—1000 for $50.00—all, cash—discount and postage deducted from the amount sent—and all orders to be accompanied with the money.

Time.—It will be ready for sale in the various places to which it may be ordered during this month, probably as early as the middle of September. So send in your cash orders early, if you would have the work for sale as early as your neighbors. It will be seen that our prices are very low to those who purchase to sell again—it is because we ask cash—if they sell on credit, they should ask at least $7.00 per hundred—and unless they have good luck they may lose even at that!

To sundry persons.—Br. L. Chase, there is yet due you, (after deducting pay for 300, discount and postage,) about $5.50. Shall we put you down for 1000 copies, to be sent to Akron, and credit that balance on account?

Br. I. B. Sharp, how many shall we send you?

Br. Eli Ballou, how shall I direct yours—via what place, and whose care?

Br. Hammond, please take out that proof sheet, and charge to me—I will repay you. The postage is too high, but I want the corrections soon.

A. B. G.

Br. Tompkins—Credit Harriet E. Wells, Westfield, N. Y., $2.00 for Repository. Also Miss E. Cronise, Tiffin, Ohio, $2.00. Also Miss E. A. Mason, Penfield, N. Y., $2.00, and charge us $1.75 (25 cents postage on the last). Alter the direction of Miss Mason's Repository from Penfield, to Perrinton, Monroe county, N. Y. Also change direction of Mrs. D. E. Barry from Victor, N. Y., to Rochester, Racine county, Wisconsin. She has paid T. S. Bartholomew $4.00—the balance will be forwarded soon. Charge us the three first subscriptions above—$5.75.

Br. Witherell—When we ordered the Balm, for Wm. Robb, of Friendsville, Pa., in March last, we did not understand which form was wanted, but supposed it was the weekly, and directed you to send accordingly. He paid 50 cents at that time. He now informs us that he wanted the monthly. He has paid our agent 50 cents more and wishes the weekly instead of the monthly (as we directed you a few weeks since) continued, unless you can send him the monthly for 1843 & 1844, for the amount he has paid. He would prefer the two volumes of the monthly, if you can send them on the above condition, but if not, he thinks he ought to receive the whole of the 2d volume of the weekly, and be credited in full.

REMOVALS.—About the first of September next this section of our State will lose a valuable laborer in the ministry of reconciliation, by the removal of Br. G. W. Montgomery, of Auburn, to Portsmouth, N. H. We have known of this intended removal for some time, but deemed it unnecessary to notice it until near the time. In fact we hoped, almost against hope, that something might occur to render it unnecessary. We shall regret—and there are many others who, even more than we, will regret to part with Br. M. His labors have been greatly blessed in this section, both of the pen and the voice, but greatly more that of his example in public and private life. May God bless him and his, wherever he may go.

Br. H. L. Hayward, of Homer, Cortland county, now rusticating for his health in St. Lawrence county, is to succeed Br. M. at Auburn. He will begin his labors there on the first Sunday in September. May the new connexion be greatly blessed to both pastor and people—for both are worthy.

INDUCEMENTS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

All of our subscribers who have not paid for the present volume, by sending us two dollars, free of postage, shall be credited in full for this year and be entitled to the first and second numbers of the Theological Library. The first number contains Winchester's Dialogues complete, and is sold in book form at 62 1-2 cents. The second is Petitpierre on Divine Goodness. The first we have on hand, the second we expect to receive soon.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday by Br. N. Stacy in Marshall; and Br. N. Brown in Clinton—Br. Grosz in Little Falls.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday in August, by Br. Grosz in Syracuse—Br. N. Brown at Kelloggsville.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday in August, by Br. N. Brown at Howlett Hill.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in September by Br. Soule in Fort Plain, and Br. Barry in Utica.

The annual meeting of the Hudson River Association of Universalists for 1843, will be held in the city of Troy, the first Wednesday and following Thursday in September.—

The council will organize at 9 o'clock Wednesday morning, and public services commence at half past 10.

Will every society within the bounds of this Association be duly represented at this meeting? Each society is entitled to two delegates, who, it is earnestly desired, will come prepared, (according to a resolution of the last session of this body,) to give statistical accounts, and particular information of the state and condition of their respective societies.—Brethren, this is an important measure; for we can never know our true state and real strength, until each society realizes the necessity, and enters heartily into the work, of giving correct statements, from time to time, of their standing, condition, prospects, etc. “I speak as unto wise men.”

J. A. ASPINWALL, Standing Clerk.

* * Union and Messenger please copy.

The North Branch Association will hold its annual session at Sheshequin, Pa., on the last Wednesday and Thursday in August. The usual invitation is extended to the public to attend, and as it is expected that ordination will be conferred upon a ministering brother during the meeting, we hope that our ministering brethren, who can conveniently, will not fail to be present.

S. J. GIBSON, Standing Clerk.

* * Will Union and Nazarene please copy?

The second Conference of the Central Association will be held at Hamilton Center, on the last Wednesday and Thursday (the 30th and 31st) of August. The usual invitation to attend is cordially extended to all. By order of Committee on Conferences,

H. B. SOULE.

The Chautauque Association of Universalists will meet in Laona, Chautauque county, on Wednesday the 23d of August, and continue in session two days.

It is very desirable that all churches, and societies in its bounds should be represented.

DEATHS.

At Alder Creek, on the 30th ult., JAMES, only son of Col. Thomas Traffarn, aged 7 years and 1 month. Br. Traffarn's loss is irreparable in parting with this last lovely one of the wife of his youth who departed this life several years since, as also a daughter subsequent to the death of the mother.—James truly was a lovely child, and tenderly was he loved by a kind parent and friends; but he is cut down as a tender plant and gone to join his angel mother and sister, where trouble never comes, in that house not made with hands eternal in the heavens. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered by Rev. Mr. Hunter, D. D., on the 1st inst., in a truly affecting discourse from these words, “Be still, and know that I am God.” Long will that discourse be remembered by the hearers of it. And may it have its designed influence upon the afflicted friends of the deceased.

L. M.

In Canton, July 24th, of consumption, Mrs. CHARLOTTE, wife of Br. Joseph F. Blood, aged 37 years. In the death of this sister, our society mourns the loss of another of its most worthy members. Sister Blood was possessed of all those virtues of a social, moral and religious character, which gained for her the esteem and attachment of all who knew her. She was an undoubted believer of the doctrine of the final restitution, and her life and conduct was an exemplification of its fruits. And having performed her duty, it might have been expected, as it truly was, that she would thus be enabled to look upon death, with all its gloom and terror, with resignation and submission. She had desires to live. She had a beloved husband to whom she was bound by sweet and sacred ties. She had other relatives dear to her, and kind neighbors and friends whom she respected; but it was decreed that she must thus early die, and she bowed to the supreme will of God.

She hath now left us, and gone home to her Father. Yes, “She's gone to join the triumphs of the skies,

And range the azure fields of pleasure there,
With mingled feelings, lo! I see her rise;
With mournful joy her exit I declare.”

May her respected companion, whose affliction is deep and poignant, be sustained and comforted in this dark hour of his existence, by the faith and hope of God's word.

NIGHT SCENE IN A POOR MAN'S HOUSE.

It was in the middle of winter, on the night of the twenty-third of January, when the weather was miserably cold; it neither decidedly froze, nor did it thaw; but between the two it was cold and damp, and penetrated to the very bone, even of those who sat in carpeted rooms before large fires, and were warmly clad. It was on this evening that the seven little children of David Baird, the weaver, stood huddled together in their small room, beside a small fire which was burning comfortably. The baby lay in a wooden cradle on the corner of the hearth. The fire, to be sure, gave some warmth, because it had boiled an iron pot full of potatoes, but it gave very little cheeriness to the room. The mother had portioned out the evening meal—a few potatoes to each—and she now sat down by the round table, lighting the farthing candle, and was preparing to do some little pieces of housewifery.

"May I stir the fire?" asked David, the eldest boy.

"No, no," replied the mother, "it burns away too fast if it is stirred."

"I wish we had a good fire!" sighed Judith, the second girl.

"Bless me," said the mother, "it is a good fire! Why, there's Dame Grumby and her grandchild gone to bed because they have no fire at all!"

"I should like some more salt to my potatoes," said little Betsey; "may I have some more, mother?"

"There is none, child," she replied; "I put the last in the pot."

"O dear!" cried out little Joey, "my feet are so bad! they get no better, mother, though I did beat them with holly."

"Poor thing!" sighed the mother; "I wish you had better shoes."

"There's a pair," said Joey, briskly, "at Timmy Nix, on's for fourteen pence."

"Fourteen pence!" repeated the mother; "it would take a long time to get fourteen pence."

"Mat. Willis begged a pair of nice warm boots," replied Joey experimentally.

"We will not beg," said the mother, "if we can help it—let me see the shoes!" and Joey put one of his frost-bitten feet on his mother's knee.

"Bless thee! poor lad," said the mother, "thou shalt not go to work again till it is warmer."

"Mother," interrupted little Susan, "may I have some more?"

"There is no more," said she, "but I have a whole loaf yet."

"Oh dear, oh dear, how nice!" cried the children, clapping their hands; "and give Joey the bottom crust," said one, "because of his poor feet?"

"And give me a big bit," cried Susan, holding out a little fat hand.

The mother divided the loaf, setting aside a piece for her husband; and presently the husband came.

"It rains, and is very cold," said he shivering.

"Please God," rejoined the mother, "it will be warmer after the rain."

David Baird was a tall, thin man, with an uneasy look—not that he had any fresh cause of uneasiness—his wages had not been lowered; his hours of labor had not been increased; nor had he quarrelled with his master; but the life of a poor man is an uneasy life—a life of care, weariness and never ending anxieties. What wonder, then, if his face, have a joyless look?

The children made room for their father by the fire; Susan and Neddy placed themselves between his knees, and his wife handed him the portion of supper which had been set aside for him.

Mary, the eldest girl, was sitting on a box, feeding the squirrel with the bread which her mother had given her—she was very happy, and kissed the squirrel many times; Judith was sitting beside her, and David held the cup out of which the squirrel drank.

"Nobody has enquired after the squirrel," said the father, looking at them.

"No," replied Mary, "and I hope nobody will."

"They will not now," said the younger David, "for it is three months since we found it."

"We might sell it for half a crown," said the father; Mary looked frightened and held the squirrel to her bosom. "Josey's feet are very bad," remarked the mother.

"And that Doctor's bill has never been paid," said the father—"seventeen shillings and sixpence."

"'Tis more money than we can get in a week," sighed the mother.

"I go round by the back lane, to avoid passing the door," said the father, "and he asked me for it three times."

"We will get it paid in the summer," rejoined the mother, hopefully; "but coals are raised; and bread they say will rise before the week is out."

"Lord help us!" exclaimed the father internally.

Mary, fetch the other candle," cried the mother, as the farthing candle burnt low in the stick and went out.

"There is not one," replied Mary; "we burnt out the other last night."

"Have you a farthing, David?" asked the wife.

"Not one," replied he, rather hastily.

"Nor have we one in the house," said the wife; "I paid all we had for the bread."

"Stir up the fire, then," said David.

"Nay," rejoined the wife, "coals are raised."

"Lord help us!" again sighed David, and two of the children began coughing. "Those children's coughs are no better!" remarked the father rather impatiently. And the baby woke—so did Betsey, who had fallen asleep on the floor unobserved, crying, "I am so cold, father! I am so cold!"

"Go to bed with her Mary," said the mother, "for you were up betimes, this morning, washing—pull up the clothes on the bed, and keep her warm."

Mary went into the little dark chamber to bed with her sister, and her mother tried to hush the crying infant.

David was distracted. He was cold, hungry, weary, and in gloom. Eight children whom he loved were about him, and he thought of them only as born to poverty, and care, like himself—he felt unhappy, and grew almost angry as the baby continued to cry.

Cheer up, David, honest man! there is that coming even now—coming within three streets length of thee—which will raise thee above want forever! Cheer up! this is the last hour any of you shall want fire; the last hour you shall want for candle-light. Thou shalt keep thy squirrel, Mary! Betsey, thou shalt have blankets to warm thee! The doctor's bill shall be paid—nor Baird, shalt thou ever again skulk by backwards to work to avoid an importunate creditor. Joey, thou shalt turn the wheel no longer—thy feet shall get well in woolen stockings, and warm shoes at five shillings a pair! You shall no more want to sell potatoes, nor shall Susan go short again of her supper! But of this, all this, as yet, you know nothing about the relief—and such splendid relief, too, that is even now approaching your door!—Wail, little baby, and thou wilt—nurse thy poor tingling feet, Joey, by the fire! and muse in sadness on thy poverty, David Baird, yet for a few moments longer it can do no harm, for the good news is even now turning the corner of your street!

Knock, knock, knock! David starts from his reverie.

"Some one is at the door!" said the wife, and up jumped little David. "If it is neighbor Wood come to borrow some meal, you can get her a cup full," added the mother, as the knock was repeated more lustily.

Up rose David Baird, and thinking of the Doctor's bill, opened the door reluctantly.

"Are you David Baird?" asked the letter carrier who had knocked. "I am," said David.

"This, then, is for you; and there are twenty-two pence to pay on it," said the man holding forth a large letter.

"It is a summons!" cried the wife in dismay; "for what is David Baird summoned?" and she rushed to the door, with the baby in her arms.

"It is not for me," said David, half glad to escape his liability to pay the two-and-twenty pence.

"But are you not David Baird, the weaver?"

"I am," said David.

"Then," continued the letter carrier, "pay me the twenty-two pence, and if it is not right, they will return you the money at the post office."

"Twenty-two pence!" repeated David, ashamed to confess his poverty.

"One shilling ten pence!" said the wife; "we have not so much money by us, good man."

"Light a candle," said the letter carrier bursting into the house, "and hunt up what you have."

David was pushed to the extremity. "We have none," said he; "we have no money to buy a candle!"

"Lord bless me!" said the letter carrier, and gave David the younger four-pence to fetch half a pound of candles. David and his wife knew not what to think, and the letter man shook the wet from his hat. In a few moments the candles came, and the letter was put into David's hand.

"Open it, can't you?" said the letter man.

"Is it for me?" inquired David again.

"It is," replied the other, impatiently; "what a fuss is here about opening a letter!"

"What is this?" exclaimed David, taking out a bill for one hundred pounds.

"O!" sighed the wife, "if after all it should not be for us! But read the letter David;" and David read it.

"Sir, You, David Baird, the weaver of —, and son of the late David Baird of Marden-on-Wear, lineal descendant of Sir David Baird, Monkshaughton Castle, county of York, and sole heir to Sir Peter Baird, of Monkshaughton, aforesaid, lately deceased, are requested to meet Mr. Dennis, solicitor, at York, as soon after the receipt of this as possible. It will be necessary for you to bring your family with you; and to cover travelling expenses, you will receive enclosed a bill for one hundred pounds, payable at sight.

"I have the honor to be, sir, your humble servant, J. SMITH for Mr. DENNIS."

"Sure enough," said David, "David Baird of Marden-on-Wear was my father."

"O, O, O!" chuckled out little David, as he hopped about behind the group, "a hundred pounds and a castle!"

"Heaven be praised!" ejaculated the wife, while she hugged the baby in her arms.

"And," continued David, "the great Sir David Baird was our ancestor, but we never looked for any thing from that quarter."

"Then the letter is for you?" asked the man.

"It is. Please heaven to make us thankful for it," said David, seriously; "but," hesitated he, "you want that money."

"No," said the letter carrier, going out, "I'll call for that to-morrow."

"Bolt the door after the man; this money requires safe keeping."

"Mend the fire!" said the mother; and her son David put on the shovel full of coals, and stirred up the ashes.

"Kiss me, my children!" exclaimed the father with emotion; "kiss me, and bless God, for we shall never want bread again!"

"Is the house on fire?" screamed Mary, at the top of the stairs, "for there is such a blaze!"

"We are burning a mould candle!" said Judith, "and such a big fire!"

"Come here, Mary," said the father; and Mary slipped down stairs wrapped in an old cloak.

"Father's a rich man! we're all rich—and shall live in a grand castle!" laughed out young David.

"We shall have coats, and blankets, and stockings and shoes!" cried little Joey, all alert, yet still remembering his frost-bitten feet.

"We shall have beef, and plumb-pudding!" said Susan.

"We shall have rice-pudding every day!" cried Neddy.

David Baird was again distracted; but how different were his feelings; he could have done a thousand extravagant things—he could have laughed, cried, sung, leaped about, nay rolled on the floor for joy; but he did none of these—he sat calm and looked almost grave.—At length he said, "wife, send the children, to bed, and let us talk over this good fortune together."

"You shall have your Sunday clothes on to-morrow," said the happy mother, as she sent them up stairs. To bed they went, and after a while laughed themselves to sleep. The father and mother smiled and wept by turns, but did not sleep that night.

DISCOURSES ON PRAYER....NO. II.

BY REV. DAY K. LEE.

"Wherefore—seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race set before us."—Heb. xii: 1.

The Christian privilege, and the Christian encouragement and career, are beautifully set forth in the text. With a great and a glorious cloud of witnesses, and examples indeed, are we surrounded, and we should be encouraged, and induced by them to lay aside every weight—every burthen and hindrance—and run with patience—nay with joy and a heart overflowing with devout feelings and aspirations, the race—the happy and triumphant race set before us. And if an individual discovers a lack of this patience, and a want of this cheerful enthusiastic devotion in the way he pursues, we may feel quite well assured that he has not yet attained to that perfection and that enjoyment in the faith which he should possess, and which he will some time receive. The most cheering, the most exalting profession in the universe, is assumed by the Christian and especially the Universalist Christian, and if we neglect those duties, and forget to cultivate those ardent sympathies, and generous sentiments which alone, under the grace of God in this world, will bring us into the full and living enjoyment of our faith, we commit a fault which is all our own, and which renders the best of professions, and the most animating all doctrines, a dead and indifferent letter. We have the mere outward sign without the inward spirit and life and joy—we neglect the planting and watering of the precious seed, and God withholdeth the increase. If there are any of my brethren, who upon self-examination find themselves in this condition while they name the name of Christ, and claim the faith once delivered to the saints, I exhort them to wake out of their sleep and lay hold on the duties and the joys set before them. We are compassed about with a great cloud of convincing witnesses, and striking examples on the subject of PRAYER. The Scriptures of our faith, the oracles of our Father abound with instances the most interesting, and the most encouraging to lead us into a devotional state of mind, and a spirit of ardent prayer and thanksgiving.

There are the Psalms—where can you find a more sublime code of oracles, and expressions on this theme, than among them? It would seem to me that the occasional reading of them would force upon you a feeling of devotional fervor that it would be hard to shake off. How melting, how ennobling, how refining! "How many human hearts have they softened, purified, exalted!—of how many wretched beings have they been the secret consolation! On how many communities have they drawn down the blessings of divine Providence."

It was once the charge of a clergyman to his student in the ministry, that if he desired to be ardent and effective in prayer, to study the Psalms, and bring his affections into union with their devotional fervor. And that was an excellent charge, which I would repeat to my hearers. I have never risen from a perusal of those sacred writings without feeling in my heart an increased and blessed measure of devotional spirit.

They contain so many beautiful and moving prayers—they record so many instances of genuine thanksgiving—they breathe such liberal, animating sentiments—they tell us so much of God, of his eternity, of his omnipotence and omnipresence—of his wisdom, of his universal goodness, and the multitude, the impartiality and endlessness of his tender mercies—of his mindfulness of man—of his care over our destinies, his concern for our welfare, his joy over our prosperity and glory in our redemption—they possess such a resistless influence of seizing upon and calling out the most lofty, and refined emotions of the heart; that the man who studies the Psalms with a thirst after the spirit which they breathe, can hardly rise from his delightful duty without having a devotional aspiration, and a melody of praise in his soul!

They contain examples and exhortations not only for man to commune with his Maker, and implore his blessings, and his strengthening, preserving, protecting favor: and thank him for his goodness, and his abundant, tender, everlasting mercy; but the kingdom of nature, the birds, and trees, and fishes, and lands, and mountains are appealed to—as if to put a blush upon man for his ingratitude and indifference—to lift up their voices, and come before the Lord with prayer, thanksgiving and praise! "Let my supplications come before thee," said David—"deliver me according to thy word." My lips shall utter praise, when thou hast taught me thy statutes. My tongue shall speak of thy word, for all thy commandments are in righteousness. Let thy hand help me, for I have chosen thy precepts. I have longed for thy salvation, O Lord, and thy law is my delight. Let my soul live, and it shall praise thee, and let thy judgment help me." A beautiful and touching invocation that we can all adopt and breathe into the gracious ear of our Creator with the spirit and the understanding—with the struggling desire, the devout aspiration, and a sentiment of holy joy, and ardent gratitude.

Again he prays, and we can share his lofty devotions—"O satisfy us early with thy mercy, that we may rejoice and be glad all our days—and let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us, and establish thou the work of our hands upon us."—Again with a strain of eloquent entreaties to man and the outward world, he lifts up his voice and exclaims—"O worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness—fear before him all the earth....Let the heavens rejoice, and let the earth be glad.—Let the sea roar and the fulness thereof. Let the field be joyful and all that is therein; then shall all the trees of the wood rejoice."

I will cite no more evidence from the Psalms. If you know any thing of your Bible, you are familiar with this book of the spirit's utterances; and if there be a thrill of genuine feeling in your hearts, they will animate you to seek the communion of your pitying Father in prayer—"to serve the Lord with gladness, and come before his presence with singing;" with the happy truth impressed more and more upon your minds—that "it is he who hath made us and not we ourselves"—that "we are his people and the sheep of his pasture."

The writings of the prophets are convincing witnesses, surrounding this subject. They contain petitions, and supplications, and expressions of thanksgiving that men and angels may repeat in their sweetest desires and most rapturous hallelujahs! "With my soul," said Isaiah, "have I desired thee in the night—with my spirit within me will I seek thee early." A prayer that we may take up, and words that we may repeat before the Lord our Maker, morning and evening; and grow ardent and joyful thereby. Again he commands us—"Seek ye the Lord while he may be found—call ye upon him while he is near. Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return unto the Lord and he will have mercy upon him, and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon." A most encouraging entreaty and assurance for poor, tempted, erring humanity, to renew its resolutions, and repeat, and increase its devotions.

The prophecies abound with examples of the kind showing us that God's ancient servants were of a devoutness and piety of soul that we may be richly blessed to imitate. And, indeed, searching the whole Bible on this subject, we find that all the teachers in Israel, and that the common people among them, as well as the apostles and early disciples of Christianity, were glorious witnesses in our favor. The most signal privileges that were ever enjoyed—the most gracious blessings that were ever received—the most stupendous, and astonishing miracles that were ever performed, were at the instance of prayer—at the call of pious and faithful supplication. God has so purposed in his wonderful counsels—that without the necessity of any real change in him, or turning in his ways the prayer of the righteous, trusting, contrite soul may be answered in its reasonable desires in every blessing of real ultimate benefit. And the promises, the Scripture promises, that reasonable and righteous prayers shall be heard, and shall prevail, are neither few, nor as I sincerely believe, possible of failure.

The prophet Moses was an example of the devout man; and the general piety of his disposition, the prayers he offered, and the miraculous benefits that were showered down upon his people in answer to his supplications—furnish us the encouragement, to say no more, of believing that all the prayers we make in accordance with the will of a benevolent, and consistent God, will be answered. It was in answer to his prayer in the wilderness, when his people were loathing, and murmuring, and threatening their leader with rebellion, that the miraculous provision of quails was sent to relieve them; to keep them in delicious food until they came to the fields of plenty on their way to Canaan the blest. He lifted his beseeching spirit to God and said, "If I have found favor in thy sight, let me not see my wretchedness." The prayer was heard, and the promise was made that, since they had complained of the Lord and reproached him wickedly, the supply of provisions should be so ample, so lavish as to cause the complaining ones to loathe it. Moses had reposed great trust in God—but yet the promise of provisions was so great that it exceeded even his enlarged expectations—and he said, "The people among whom I am, are six hundred thousand footmen, and thou hast said, I will give them flesh that they may eat a whole month; shall the flocks and the herds be slain for them, to suffice them? or shall all the fish of the sea be gathered together to suffice them? And the Lord said unto Moses, Is the Lord's hand waxed short—thou shalt see now whether my word shall come to pass unto thee or not." This promise was abundantly fulfilled to the whole camp, in the miraculous clouds of quails that were sent them. Again—when the people in consequence of their sins, were tormented on their journey by the fiery serpents, and their cries for deliverance ascended—Moses prayed for them, and the Lord directed him to lift up a brazen serpent, and promised that all who should look upon that should live: And this promise was fulfilled to them as he had spoken.

The victories of Joshua, and other leaders of the armies of Israel in the conquest of Canaan, were bestowed in answer to the earnest and pious supplications that were lifted to the God of battles. And they were given continually to remember, that they could do nothing without his aid, and would be swept as the chaff before the whirlwind, unless, their operations were sanctioned, and blessed by him. And when he put forth an arm to fight their battles, and to crown them with his smiles, and favors—they had all needful blessings; the rains descended and the harvests flourished—five of them were enabled to chase a hundred, and a hundred were promised to put ten thousand to flight.

Some of the instances of prayer and blessing, as recorded on the sacred pages, are impressively beautiful, and to my mind powerfully convincing in the truth that God heareth our correct desires and crowneth them in due season. In that sublime prayer which Solomon lifted on the dedication of the temple, he said, "If thy people Israel be put to the worse before the enemy, because they have sinned against thee—and shall return and confess thy name, and pray and make supplication before thee in this house—then hear thou from the heavens, and forgive the sin of thy people Israel; and bring them again unto the land which thou gavest to them, and to their fathers.... If there be dearth in the land—if there be pestilence—if there be blasting or mildew, locusts or caterpillars—if their enemies besiege them in the cities of their land: whatsoever sore, or whatsoever sickness there be—then what prayer or what supplication soever shall be made of any man or of all thy people Israel, when every one shall know his own sore and his own grief, and shall spread forth his hands in this house; then hear thou from heaven thy dwelling place; and forgive, and render unto every man according to all his ways, whose heart thou knowest, for thou only knowest the hearts of the children of men."

The examples of Elijah and Elisha, are beautiful and encouraging ones for those to contemplate who have faith to believe that acceptable prayers will be answered. It was in answer to the prayer of Elijah that the widow's son at Tarephath was restored to life from the dead; that the fire of the Lord came down and consumed the sacrifice, prepared to confound the prophets of Baal; and that other miracles were wrought. It was in answer to the prayer of Elisha that the eyes of the blind were made to see. By prayer, the pious king Hezekiah, when sick unto death, and warned to set his house in order, received fifteen years in addition to those he had spent on earth in usefulness, and good. In answer to his weeping supplications, "the word of the Lord came to Isaiah, saying, Go, and say to Hezekiah, thus saith the Lord God, the God of David thy father—I have heard thy prayer—I have seen thy tears, behold I will add unto thy day fifteen years."

Some of the most stupendous miracles of Christ were permitted to be wrought at the request of the prayers that he lifted. And setting aside miracles which we believe ceased to be performed in the age appointed for them, and we have in the Scriptures a cloud of witnesses, and a multitude of examples that we of this day can imitate. We can study the devotional character and habits of the pious men of the old dispensation, and be better for the study—we can drink in the spirit of our adorable Redeemer—consider his continuance in prayer and thanksgiving—we can read the history of the early disciples and apostles—read of their strict attention to devotional habits; their prayers, their thanksgivings, their daily worship—we can search the numerous commandments in the Scriptures to continue in prayer—to pray without ceasing from the inclination; to pray for blessings, and give thanks for past favors; and have the encouragement to believe that it is our duty and our privilege to be regular in our devotions, feeling assured that an acceptable prayer, uttered in the right spirit—in accordance with the will of God, for a reasonable favor, will in due time be answered, and that without failure on the part of Him whose counsels never waver, or come short of the designed fulfilment.

The account of the primitive Christians assembled at Jerusalem after the day of pentecost—are strengthening to our convictions on this point. They remembered the solemn injunctions of their risen Master, they felt athankfulness to God for the wonderful displays of grace, and their spirits gave utterance to unceasing devotions. "They continued daily," says the divine historian, "with one accord in the temple, and breaking bread from house to house—did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart—praising God and having favour with the people."

We have the example of Cornelius, the pious Gentile to whom the kingdom of heaven was first open among his people, and to the Gentile world. "He was a devout man—and one that feared God, with all his house—who gave much alms to the people and prayed to God always. The word of the Lord said to him, thy prayers and thine alms are come up for a memorial before God."

We read in the epistles frequent exhortations of the apostle Paul for his brethren to pray for him, and commandments for them to continue in prayer for other needed blessings, and in thanks for the mercies showered down upon them. They are commanded to "pray in faith," to "be instant in prayer"—to "lift up holy hands without wrath and doubting." He says "let the peace of God rule in your hearts—and be ye thankful. Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom, teaching and admonishing one another in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs—singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord." "Continue in prayer—and watch in the same with thanksgiving—withal praying for us also, that God would open to us a door of utterance to speak the mystery of Christ."

In foresight of the tribulations that were to come at the destruction of Jerusalem and the dispersion of the holy people, St. Peter said—"be ye therefore sober and watch unto prayer." "Humble yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt you in due time, casting all your care upon him, for he careth for you."

And we have the commandment from the apostle Paul to pray as no others but individuals of Universalist hopes and desires can—the commandment that we love to adduce in our controversies, and that we should obey in our practices, making us doers of the word, and not hearers only. He lays down this requirement as a very prominent duty, saying, "I would, therefore, that first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks be made for all men." And after naming some special petitions, he says, "That we may lead a quiet and peaceable life, in all godliness and honesty. For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God, our Saviour, who will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth." And who can find a more encouraging thought, a more sublime instruction? Supplications, prayers and thanksgivings for all men, lead us to a peaceable state of mind, and an honesty of disposition, by bringing us nearer to God, and to a more perfect knowledge of his counsels, a more joyful faith in his promises, in his mercies, in his love, and a more solemn realization of the fact that he sees our hearts—knows every secret thought, and will bring every meditation into judgment.—Making these supplications for all men, also, we know that they will be fulfilled, being good and acceptable in his sight, and accordant with his will and determination to bring about the greatest ultimate good of all his creatures.

Seeing, then, that we are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses and examples—seeing that there are so many, and so animating commandments in the Scriptures for us to be devotional, to be prayerful, and thankful, why should we not perform the duties, run the race, and receive the exalted joys that are set before us? Who, having named the name of Christ, who having received the blessed Gospel, and gloried in the faith of a world's redemption should be so backward in his own enjoyment, and so stinted in common gratitude to his Father, as to leave undone this acceptable—this inestimable service?

We cannot expect—and we should not desire in this age of marvellous grace, and multitudinous benefit, to see miracles follow in answer to our prayers, as they came before the sight and to the aid of holy men of old—but a most prevalent indifference which runs to the other extreme should be remedied, and all Christians—especially those professing so much faith, and so much confidence in God as ourselves, should come up to their duty and privilege, believing with all their hearts that every reasonable prayer which is consistent with the divine will, and for the ultimate benefit of mankind, will be heard, and answered in good time and in the needed blessing. Let us not faint, or weary, or doubt, when our belief stands upon such a sure foundation! Let us seek assiduously for an increase of faith, for an enlargement of confidence, and for an affectionate nearness to God as our unsleeping guardian. Let us study the witness and examples, exhortations and precious promises given us in the Scriptures on the subject of devotion. Let us cultivate those noble sentiments, sympathies, desires, emotions that are requisite in joy-inspiring prayer, and resolve this day that we will henceforth establish our hearts, our habits, our thoughts, our lives, in vital, rational, exalted piety. Why should we live without God in the world, when he surrounds us with more blessings than for which we can express our gratitude, and while he is a Friend, a Father who will be felt to be very near, and even hold us in his blessed presence when other friends and other fathers are afar off, and the world goes troublously without and within our tabernacle? Why should we live aliens, and strangers from home, when by an exercise of the devotional feelings, we can bring ourselves to a home here on earth—a home beautifully and joyfully typical of our inheritance on high? O come, let us rid ourselves of this cumbersome torpor, and come forth to a resurrection of life, and prayer, and peace.

SUNDAY SCHOOL EXCURSION.

By the Buffalo Daily Gazette of the 3d inst., we learn that the Universalist Sunday School in that city, took a pleasure excursion, by steam boats, and rail road, to Niagara Falls, accompanied by parents and a number of friends, among whom we notice the Unitarian clergyman of Buffalo, Rev. G. W. Hosmer. An address was delivered at the Falls by Br. S. R. Smith, pastor of the society, and the prayer preceding it was offered up by Mr. Hosmer. The recreations of the whole excursion were varied and pleasing in the highest degree, and the party returned delighted with the jaunt, and pleased with themselves and each other, at 10 o'clock in the evening, having been gone about 12 hours.

It will be seen by the following extract, with which the account is closed, that the party and the school was not a small one—loading down, as in fact it did, two steam boats. "Nothing can be hazarded in saying, that we were upon the finest excursion of the season, leaving and returning with from twelve to fifteen hundred individuals for the most noble and beneficent purposes." And certainly no more enchanting spot in this bright and beautiful world, could be chosen for such a party, than Iris Island.

We hope other Sunday schools throughout our Zion will enjoy such excursions, this season. They are productive of much happiness to the scholars and their friends; and endear the young and old more to each other, and the pupils to their schools and schoolmates; besides exerting an influence of a higher character on the minds that can read God in his works, and behold his goodness in the bounties of the season. A. B. G.

P. S.—Since writing the above we have received another account of the excursion, from which, on account of its interest and style, we make an extract for our columns. A. B. G.

Arrived at the Falls, a short time was devoted to an examination of the wonders and glories of that stupendous phenomenon, after which the company partook of a pic-nic dinner in the grove, preparations for which had been kindly made by General WHITNEY, and of course in excellent style. The board was spread with a rich and various abundance, and by the voluntary and kind attendance of many members of the society, and particularly the ladies, the least and humblest of the throng found his wants anticipated and gratified. It need not be said that water was the only beverage.

Dinner over, the company arranged themselves on seats, prepared by the kindness of Gen. Whitney, in front of a raised platform, below which the children were placed in order. Five clergymen, viz: Rev. Messrs. Smith, Hosmer, Holland, Bunker, and Goss—three Universalists, one Christian, and one Unitarian—then took their places at the temporary altar, and by that great eternal altar, "not made with hands," when the exercises commenced with a feeling and appropriate prayer from Rev. Mr. Hosmer, after which Rev. S. R. Smith, pastor of the Universalist society, addressed the school and assembly substantially as follows:

The speaker remarked, that, impressive as were the circumstances of time, and place, and occasion—yet these circumstances had so combined, as to render it both desirable and necessary, that the present exercises should be as brief as possible. The fatigue of the auditory, the exhaustion of the speaker, and the irrepressible desire to see the wonders before us—to say nothing of the lateness of the hour, were abundant reasons for dispensing with much that the feelings might prompt, and the occasion otherwise demand.

Children, do you understand what is meant by cause and effect? The sun is the immediate cause of light—light is therefore an effect. So if you put your finger in the flame, you will suffer pain—pain is the effect of being burned. The privilege which you now enjoy of visiting this scene of wonders is the effect, in other words, the reward of your good conduct and attention to your lessons, as the pupils of a Sunday School. Let it teach you—that for every duty and every good act of your lives, that great and holy God, who is the Father of us all, will render an appropriate reward in your own peace of mind and continued happiness.

Fathers, and Mothers, and Friends, can you doubt the utility—the intellectual and moral influence of the Sunday School? Look at those young and happy faces—how does their enjoyment reflect back upon your own hearts, and expand them with new emotions, with higher and fuller pleasure.—This is your own, your appropriate work, and it yields an ample and enduring reward. In the name of humanity, we thank you for thus aiding the progress of human happiness. We thank these teachers and superintendents for the affectionate labors and cares which they have devoted to the objects of their charge. We thank the members of the U. S. Band, who have cheered us with spirit-stirring music. We thank all, who by their presence or liberality, have ministered to the rational festivities, and comforts, and objects of this excursion.

From this spot where meet and mingle so many, so great, so grand exemplifications of Omnipotence and benignity—look up from the cloud of the Cataract, from the rush of its everlasting waters, from Nature's most sublime displays, "to Nature's God." To you and all the great family of our race; to all of the past, the present, and the future generations of men—he is to you and to all of them, what you are to these little ones—a parent. He spreads the glories of earth around you, and he has sent down truth, pure, simple and sufficient from heaven for your redemption. So live every day, so believe and hope in Christ—that when age whitens your locks for the chambers of death, you may look back on all the past and be at peace; and forward, and upward to a glorious and coming life, to a common and blessed immortality.

There in that grove where once the Indian worshipped, and by that awful emblem of God's majesty, and power, and glory, where the red man's Deity had once, to his untutored belief, his everlasting home, thus rose to heaven the pure and pious strain of a truly catholic feeling, and each appeared to feel, while he listened to the beautiful words of the Spiritual Instructor—seeming himself almost exhaled to heaven—that it was good to be there, and that the Almighty would look upon and bless the occasion and its objects, and bless too the dear ones for whose benefit the festival was held.

At the conclusion of Mr. Smith's remarks—the unstudied but native eloquence of which seemed to touch the strings of every heart, and find there responsive and according strains of spirit-harmony—the little ones, to close the ceremonial, united in a song of thanksgiving, and the sweet voices of two hundred and fifty children, mingling with the deep diapason of the Cataract's everlasting hymn, rolled up in holy tones of praise to heaven. It was a beautiful finale to the simple but sublime ceremonial, and there was a deep and teachful pathos in the sweet strain of children voices rising thus with the eternal roar of the cloud-compelling cataract, that went at once to the heart, and made it humbly acknowledge the wisdom and power and goodness of Him whose terrible majesty is scarcely shadowed by the stupendous scene which here compels the homage of all hearts; and whose love for man is but faintly emblemized by the beautiful bow which couches ever on the cataract's verge. Beauty on the brow of terror—God's smile of peace on the face of his terrible power.

After the exercises were over, the party enjoyed a pleasant ramble about that most beautiful, most favored, and most delightful spot of earth, Iris Island—a spot where the Muses might make their home—and seemed, from their reluctance to leave it, to think the whole day too short to linger about its sounding shores, and gaze upon the sublime displays of Omnipotent power and beneficence in the midst of which it lies so sweetly and so magnificently cradled.

At last tearing themselves away, the party was conveyed back, by different trips of the cars, to Schlosser, and the Kent proceeded on her return, followed half an hour later by the Columbus passing up on the American side of Grand Island, and thus enabling those who were strangers to enjoy the opportunity of seeing every part of the scenery of that majestic stream, which broad and deep and grand at its source, as where its course is run, seems to spring from Lake Erie as Minerva is fabled to have done from the head of Jove, in the fullness of its maturity and strength and majesty.

Every care that could be observed was taken to secure the enjoyment and comfort of the party, and though the passage down and back might possibly have been more pleasant had the number on board been less, no sound of complaint was heard; but, on the contrary, all seemed cheerful, hilarious, and highly pleased with the proceedings. Refreshment tables were arranged in the cabins, where the ladies dispensed tea, coffee, ices, and other refreshments and delicacies. In short, nothing was omitted that could contribute to make the excursion a pleasant one, and to the ladies, who in every good work are foremost, our thanks are especially due for their attention and kindness to the wants of the company, and particularly of the children, who, without their care, might not have found the jaunt in every respect so delightful.

The United States Brass Band, both on the down and return passage, contributed much to the general enjoyment, and are entitled to the warm thanks of the numerous company who listened with delight to the noble harmonies they gave with so much truth and spirit. As the Columbus entered the harbor they struck up the Star Spangled Banner, and the effect was almost electric. It is—no, it is not strange how readily our national melodies find their way to the heart, for there never was a people in whose bosoms burned so deep and pure a love of country, as the American; and whatever touches this chord of feeling is sure to awaken a quick and corresponding emotion—deep as the feeling it arouses, and quick as the instinct of our national temperament.

At a quarter before ten the Columbus touched the wharf, and in a few minutes the very numerous company were on their way to their several homes, and, as we trust, to the enjoyment of sweet sleep and pleasant dreams, after a day of delightful relaxation, the festivities of which were marred by no accident or disturbance of any kind.

Thus ended the excursion, which, from first to last, disappointed the croakers—if any such there were; and which was altogether the most successful and gratifying that has ever taken place from our city, whether we consider the number and respectability of the persons who attended, the completeness and harmony of all the arrangements, the general gratification of the party, or the ample realization of the more peculiar objects of the enterprise.—Buffalo Com. Adv.

TERRIBLE STORM IN PHILADELPHIA.—On Saturday the 5th inst., this city was visited with the the severest storm that has been known there in many years, accompanied with great destruction of property, and the loss of several lives. It commenced raining on Saturday morning, and continued through the day with occasional intermissions. In the afternoon a dense mass of clouds collected, which, at six o'clock, poured forth an immense torrent of water, continuing incessantly for two hours, during which there was a high wind and terrific thunder and lightning. A deluge was the almost immediate consequence. Streets, cellars, and lower stories were inundated, and greater damage done than was ever before known in that city. During the progress of the storm, a tornado swept up the Schuylkill, passing over the northwestern part of the city, unroofing and blowing down houses, wrecking and sinking vessels. Of 44 schooners lying at the wharves only six escaped uninjured, twenty coal boats fully laden were sunk.—From 12 to 20 buildings were blown down, and nearly 20 unroofed. Accounts of the loss of 10 lives have already been received.

The Steamboat Sun, coming up the Delaware encountered the storm and broke shaft, reducing her machinery to ruin.

CAUTION.—A young child, thirteen months of age, came very near losing his life through carelessness, in this place during the past week. It appears that it got possession of a small box in which was tartar of antimony, a very poisonous medicinal preparation, and before discovered had eaten twenty grains of its contents. Dr. Gay was immediately called, and through his treatment the little sufferer is in a fair way of recovery.

From the numerous warnings almost daily published, it might be supposed that parents would be more careful of medicine, but the opposite appears to be the case.—[Quincy Patriot.]

Fanaticism.—The last Belfast Maine Signal, gives a new feature to the Fanaticism of the Millerites. It says that on Saturday last, their attention was arrested by a flag suspended upon a liberty pole in front of Mr. Jonas S. Barrett's house, and on visiting that place, we learned Mr. Barrett was celebrating the coming of the first year of the second advent of Christ. The flag bore the inscription of the "Opening of the Seven Seals," and a picture representing the Bible in seven clasps, three of which were broken. At nine o'clock seven cannon were fired, representing the seven Thunders that uttered their voices upon the opening of the Seals. The bugle, fife and drum, were introduced, with other ceremonies, and the military rattle was kept up in the grove of pine trees set out for the occasion in front of the house. Mr. Barrett is an honest and hard laboring man, and seems to be insane on no other subject but religion.—We regret that so industrious a citizen should waste his scanty funds in giving free dinners, and propagating such enthusiasm.—Argus.

Thomas Moore, who, in early life, published some poetry under a feigned name, whose distinguished characteristic was sensuality, is said, in his more mature years, to have frequently expressed his sorrow at having written them. A friend once asked, "When did you first regret having written these poems, Mr. Moore?" "When I had a daughter old enough to read them," was the emphatic reply.

Death in the Cars.—An elderly woman died of consumption in the railroad cars near Batavia, on Sunday week. She was on the way to the home of some children.

Death on the Railroad.—We understand that a hand employed at the depot at the head of the inclined plane, on the Mohawk railroad in attempting a few days since to unhitch the drag rope from an ascending train of cars, fell across the track, and the whole train passed over him, killing him instantly.

IDLE WORDS.

BY MAJOR C. CAMPBELL.

The strongest love hath yet, at times,
A weakness in its power;
And latent sickness often sends
The madness of an hour!
To her I loved, in bitterness,
I said a cruel thing;—
Ah, me! how much of misery
From idle words may spring!

I loved her then—I love her still,
But there was in my blood
A growing fever, that did give
Its frenzy to my mood;
I sneer'd because another's sneers
Had power my heart to wring;—
Ah, me! how much of misery
From idle words may spring!

'Twas over soon, the cause—not soon
The sad effects pass'd by;
They rule beneath the summer's sun,
And 'neath the winter's sky!
I sought forgiveness—she forgave,
But kept the lurking sting!
Alas! how much of misery
From idle words may spring!

Month after month—year after year,
I strove to win again
The heart an idle word had lost;
But strove, alas! in vain.
Oh, ye who love, beware lest thorns
Across LOVE'S path ye fling;
Ye little know what misery
From IDLE words may spring!

THE WORLD AS IT IS.

This world is not so bad a world
As some would like to make it;
Though whether good, or whether bad,
Depends on how we take it.
For if we scold and fret all day,
From dewy morn till even,
This world will ne'er afford to man
A foretaste here of heaven.

This world in truth 's as good a world
As e'er was known to any
Who have not seen another yet;
(And these are very many);
And if the men and women too
Have plenty of employment,
Those surely must be hard to please,
Who can not find enjoyment.

This world is quite a clever world,
In rain or pleasant weather,
If people would but learn to live
In harmony together;
Nor seek to burst the kindly bond
By love and peace cemented,
And learn that best of lessons yet,
To always be contented.

Then were the world a pleasant world,
And pleasant folks were in it;
The day would pass most pleasantly
To those who thus begin it;
And all the nameless grievances
Brought on by borrowed troubles,
Would prove, as certainly they are,
A mass of empty bubbles!

SIN AND THE SINNER.

In the Scriptures we are clearly instructed and warmly exhorted, to look upon sin with the utmost aversion; we are to hate it; not to look upon it with the least degree of allowance. But while we are called upon thus to regard sin—thus to feel towards it, we are at the same time as clearly instructed to distinguish between sin and the sinner, the man and his practice. For while we are called upon by the plainest injunctions of Holy Writ, to hate sin, we are commanded to love the sinner—to love the man, not as a sinner or because he is a sinner; but because he is a man, the child of God, our brother.

I do not remember an instance in which man is required to hate his fellow man, whatever be his character. His actions, if they be wrong and sinful, we are to regard with indignation: but towards himself we are to exercise the spirit of kindness; we are to detest the crime, but to pity and sympathize with the criminal. The spirit of the Gospel makes it our duty, not to abuse but to reform; not to condemn but to save; and all this we are to effect, not by denunciation and hatred, but by "speaking the truth in love," "overcoming their evil with good," by drawing them "with love's resistless might" from the ways of sin and misery into the regions of light, and life, and peace.

So God, the infinite Good, regards and treats the sinner. He hates sin, and can not look upon it with the least degree of allowance; but not so does he look upon the sinner. He hated sin, but so loved those who had fallen into it—the world, every one of whom had sinned and come short of the glory of God—that he sent his only begotten Son into the world, to manifest the Father's love to the world by dying for them, while they were yet in sin.

God hates sin because it is opposed to man's happiness; he loves the sinner and wills that he be happy; he therefore employs means to lead him to repent of his evil way and live. It is not his hatred to the sinner that causes him to manifest his love to the world; neither does his hatred to sin arise from his enmity to the sinner; but he hates sin because he loves the sinner. It is this when clearly perceived by the sinner, that moves him to take upon himself the resolution of the Prodigal. "It is the goodness of God that leadeth to repentance."

O when will men see the character of God in its beauty and glory, and "be perfect as he is perfect"! Not till then will the world be saved from sin, and men be exalted to the dignity of obedient and happy children of their Father who is in heaven.

FEAR.

"FEAR, like the other passions, exhibits numerous shades or degrees. It may be slight and transient, or so aggravated as completely to dethrone the judgment, and jeopard, not only the health, but even the existence of its subject."

After this, the writer goes on to show the effects of fear. It affects the respiration—creates spasms—irregular and convulsive breathing—painful sense of suffocation in the chest—temporary speechlessness—oppression, contraction, fluttering and palpitation of the heart—unnatural or spasmodic contractions of the viscera of the abdomen—pallidness of the face—coldness of the skin—chills—cold sweats—partial tremors—wild glare of the eyes—painful expressions of the countenance—severe paroxysms of hysterics—convulsions of the muscular system—syncope—fainting—suppression of the action of the heart—hemorrhages—convulsions—epilepsy—and death. In his third chapter on fear, he reaches that subject of such eminent importance to all friends of humanity. He describes, clearly, the horrible effects of fear in religious matters—the desolating influence of those unreal, but maddening descriptions of a God of wrath, and endless burnings. Hear him:

"Religion, when perverted from its true purpose of hope and consolation, and employed as an instrument of terror, becomes a frequent source of most melancholly nervous complaints. Religion, in its widest signification, has been defined, 'An impressive sense of the irresistible influence of one or more superior Beings over the concerns of mortals, which may become beneficial or inimical to our welfare.'"

"Now according to the fancied character and requisitions of the Power or Powers it worships, it may be the parent of fear, cruelty, and intolerance, or of trust, charity, benevolence, and all the loftiest feelings that adorn our nature. The austere bigot who owns a God of terror and vengeance, becomes the slave of the direst passions. All who differ from his creed, are to be hated as the enemies of Heaven, and the outcasts of its mercy, and he may even persuade himself that to inflict upon their bodily tortures, is an acceptable religious duty.—This spirit of gloomy fanaticism has been one of the severest scourges of our species. No human sympathy has been able to withstand its merciless power. It has set the parent against the child, and the child against the parent, and has blasted every tie of domestic affection. Even those naturally possessed of the most tender dispositions, have become so hardened under the customs of religious bigotry, as to look without the least feeling of compassion on the pangs of the heretic amid the flames, and who, in their faith, was to pass immediately from his temporal, into the indescribable agonies of eternal fires. "I was once," says Dr. Cogan "passing through Moorfields with a young lady, aged about nine or ten years; born and educated in Portugal, but in the Protestant faith, and observing a large concourse of people assembled round a pile of faggots on fire, I expressed a curiosity to know the cause. She very composedly answered, 'I suppose that it is nothing more than that they are going to burn a Jew!' Fortunately it was no other than roasting an ox upon some joyful occasion. What rendered this singularity the more striking, was the natural mildness and compassion of the young person's disposition."

"Need we feel astonished that such relentless and terrible passions, awakened by the gloomy and fearful apprehensions of the future, should oftentimes, especially in weak and timid natures, become the occasion both of bodily and mental disease?"

"The influence of the terrors of religion, in exciting convulsions and epilepsy, will be rendered obvious enough to any one who will visit the religious field-meetings that are annually held among us. On such occasions, I have witnessed the most distressing spasms, and contortions of the body, not only in females, but even in the more hardy and robust of our own sex. And the same morbid effects may occasionally be observed among all sects of religionists who seek to make proselytes by appealing to the fears rather than convincing the judgment; affrighting the imagination with

"—damned ghosts, that do in torments wail,
And thousand fiends that do them endless pain
With fire and brimstone, which forever shall remaine."

"Females, and indeed all persons of sensitive feeling and nervous habits, may suffer material injury from being subjected to such superstitious terrors. Not only epilepsy and hysteria, but even settled insanity, as is admitted by all writers on this disease, is liable to be thus induced. Dr. Prichard tells us that several instances of mental alienation from this cause have fallen within his own sphere of observation. "Some of these," says he, "have occurred among persons who had frequented churches or chapels where the ministers were remarkable for a severe, impassioned, and almost imprecatory style of preaching, and for enforcing the terrors rather than setting forth the hopes and consolations which belong to the Christian religion."

"The Society of Friends, or at least such is true of them in England, are in a great measure exempt from what is termed religious insanity. Now this immunity is only to be explained by the fact that their religion being one of peace and charity, they are but little exposed to those fanatical excitements and superstitious apprehensions which work so powerfully on the imaginations of many other Christian sects," Mental Hygiene, by Dr. Wm. Sweetzer.

SHORT DIALOGUE.

Between a Universalist and Partialist, on the safe side.

Partialist. There are two classes of mankind, I discover; and it would afford me great joy to see you on the safe side.

Universalist. Indeed! I thought all mankind were the kindred of the earth; and God the Father of the spirits of all flesh, therefore all of one blood.

P. No, no, you mistake my meaning; there are two sorts; one composed of those who have been changed from nature to grace. The others are the world.

U. Well to which class do you think I belong.

P. I think you are still in a state of nature, and are one of the "world." Pardon me, sir, I wish to give no offence.

U. No offence at all, sir, on the contrary what you tell me is really good news.

P. Good news—to hear that you are in a state of nature, and one of the world!

U. Certainly, for, if I am in a state of nature, I am not one of the characters Paul describes as being "without natural affection," and, if I am one of the world, I am on the "safe side," for "the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world." (1 John iv: 14.)

P. But I mean that the world will be lost, what then will be their fate?

U. God means the world shall be saved; for he sent his Son, in whom all fulness dwells, to save them.

P. But the lost, sir, what will become of the lost?

U. There must be an owner for every thing that is lost; and "the Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." Again I am in the ark of safety.

P. How can you believe that sinners will be saved?

U. "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." See 1 Tim. i: 15—Matt. i: 21.

P. There is no use in talking with a man who will not see.

U. So I often think. When will men be freed from the pharisaical scales of self-righteousness?—Uni. Watchman.

SABBATH SCHOOL EXCURSIONS.

We understand that in a late Evangelical discussion on the propriety of Sabbath School Excursions, one person gave as a reason against them that he never knew of a conversion being brought about by them. To our mind nothing can clearer show the ultraism of the spirit of proselyting than this; to some, every thing is to be judged of according to the promise it gives of directly promoting conversions. The cultivation of social feeling and generous sympathies, is nothing in their sight, for the favorite name of the religionist to them is—He is serious!

Sabbath School excursions promote a kind of conversion that is very desirable—a conversion whereby warmth and activity are given to kindness, mutual interest and true sympathy. They cultivate acquaintance between the members of a school; for a few happy play hours do more towards this than years of attendance at school, and thus indirectly, but essentially, the interests of the School are promoted. It is with children as with adults; persons will go year after year to meeting and not know the occupants of the next pew, but an Excursion brings all together and a new interest is added to the church—an interest which is inseparable from mutual acquaintance with those with whom we weekly congregate.

A severe religion must be opposed to whatever tends to promote cheerfulness, but a liberal religion unites therewith. We rejoice that we have a liberal religion, teaching us while we mourn over the ease with which the young are led to sinful pleasures, never to throw obstacles in the way of their enjoying a healthy festival, where the moral restraint will be of the best character. Sorrows come soon enough, and let us be cautious not to darken the golden beauty of childhood, nor cheat children out of the enjoyment of the very poetry of existence.—Gospel Messenger.

BEAUTIFUL WHEN FINISHED.—A poor Irish woman, with the simplicity and intelligence that characterizes her country, upon witnessing some of the many wonderful improvements of the present age, exclaimed, "Ah, then, what a beautiful world it will be when it is finished!" The idea led to a train of thought not altogether uninteresting, the result of which was, to represent every thing that hitherto seemed to be perfect in a most imperfect state! from the contemplation of man, down to inferior objects! Will he be finished in this state of existence? No! the resurrection day must dawn ere his perfection will be accomplished! and, surely, when we turn to the page of history, and trace the movements that have taken place only a few centuries back, down to our time, may we not re-echo the poor Irish woman's exclamation of "Ah, then, what a beautiful world it will be when it is finished!"

FORGIVENESS.—How readily should we forgive those that offend us, if we considered how much there is in us that requires to be forgiven.

UTICA, FRIDAY, AUGUST 18, 1843.

OUR PERIODICALS.

A pressure of other matters has caused me to delay much longer than I at first intended an act of just courtesy to several of our publishers and editorial brethren, whose papers have lately entered on new volumes.

THE LADIES' REPOSITORY having dropped a title which it divided with another paper of our order, and which therefore caused some confusion in the way of credits, &c., entered on a new volume in June last.—We are greatly astonished to learn the fact, that the subscription list of this very neat, cheap and excellent periodical does not reach 2000 names! We are more than astonished—we are ashamed, mortified at the fact—our pride in our denomination is cast down. And what may astonish our readers still more, is the fact, that the greatest deficiency in this respect exists in some of the principal places where Universalism flourishes, in the New England States—in and around the boasted Head Quarters of Universalism! But we hope the announcement of this humbling fact, and the labors of new traveling agents, will remove this reproach in a short time. In the meanwhile, let every Universalist family that is supplied with the required number of our weeklies, and can afford to add a monthly to their family fare, send on for the Ladies' Repository. It is published on the first of each month, each number contains 40 large octavo pages of double columns, neatly covered and stitched, all for only $2.00 per annum in advance. Br. Abel Tompkins, 38 Cornhill, Boston, Publisher—Editor, Br. Henry Bacon, of Providence, R. I.

"THE GOSPEL TEACHER, and Sunday School Contributor," is the new title in part of the old "Light of Zion," an excellent quarto that is published every two weeks at 38 Cornhill, Boston. Br. J. G. Adams, of Malden, Mass., is its Editor. It is mainly devoted to the interests of Sunday Schools, and addresses itself to parents and teachers, as well as pupils. Br. Adams is very anxious to have a hearing in our Empire State on the subject of Sunday Schools—and we need all he can teach us—for this branch of our Zion—this tender shoot from which so much fruit may be confidently expected if it is but rightly attended to—needs much more care and culture than it has yet received. Will not our parents and preachers, and Sunday School teachers take an interest in this periodical, and procure it a few subscribers?—Let a few copies, also, be introduced into each Sunday School for the use of the scholars; and as a source to which they may apply for pieces to speak at their Exhibitions. Published as above, at only $1.00 per annum in advance.

"THE BALM OF GILEAD" began its second and improved volume on July 22d, with a beautiful engraved title or head. Its publisher and principal Editor, Rev. J. F. Witherell, is an industrious man, and possesses a good taste in getting out a neat paper—in filling it, he works more than readers are aware, for he condenses much, and arranges his matter carefully. It is a quarto, about the size of our own, one page filled with advertisements, and is published every Saturday, in Concord, Manchester and Nashua, N. H., at one dollar if paid on subscription—$1.50 if paid in three months—$2.00 if paid with in the year. The only Editor proper, is Br. Witherell, who, only, resides in Concord where the paper is printed—all the rest are merely Corresponding Editors.—But Br. W. fairly divides his honors thus:—Editors, J. F. Witherell, L. C. Browne, G. W. Gage, C. Woodhouse—Corresponding Editors, Samuel Jenkins, E. Francis, H. W. Morse—a team large enough to fill a carpet sheet with a forty-editor power if all did their share of the work equal in quantity to the first named.

"THE TRUMPET, and Universalist Magazine," glided so quietly from its 25th into its 26th year that we never noticed its birth day. Is the old veteran afraid that people will begin to notice how old he is growing? Well, then, we will take the new series, and say he is but in his 16th year. Will that do? This paper continues its well known course—lustily buffeting the waves of opposition, sounding an alarm whenever it discovers a secret or hostile movement among the enemy, and carefully filling its capacious pages with useful and interesting matter. It is one of the largest and best papers in the order—is published in folio form, in Boston, Mass., every Saturday, by Br. T. Whittemore, its well known Editor and Proprietor, at two dollars per annum in advance, $2.50 if not paid in 6 months.

"THE CHRISTIAN FREEMAN and Family Visitor," the neighbor of the Trumpet, and edited and published by our abolitionist brother, S. Cobb, entered on its 5th volume, in May last. I believe we noticed it at the time. Terms the same as the Trumpet. It is a good Universalist paper, and says a good deal on Temperance, Anti-slavery, &c., &c., with an occasional article on animal magnetism, in which Br. Cobb is not only a believer, but of which he is also a professor.

"THE UNIVERSALIST CABINET" is a small paper about one fourth the size of the Magazine and Advocate, lately started in Essex, Mass., by Br. John Prince, its printer, publisher, editor and proprietor, at 50 cents per annum. It is about the size to which nearly all our papers must ultimately come, if many more new ones are started and continued—for we now have only about 22 to 24 periodicals for our denomination to bear up, besides two annuals. On this plan, each preacher can print, publish and edit his own paper, and each society read in print its own doings, besides saving postage!

"THE UNIVERSALIST MISCELLANY," edited by Brs. O. A. Skinner and E. H. Chapin, has commenced its course by the issue of the first number. Generally it has been hailed as a good work, and one that may succeed—but unless the work is different from the promise of its prospectus, I must still adhere to my former opinion, that its character is not so different from our other papers, its contributors generally not of such eminent reputation or ability, and the paper not so cheap, as to secure for it 5000 subscribers—which its publisher, Br. A. Mudge, says it should have to warrant its publication! I notice that a few of our papers have given the same opinion—the Union and Messenger, and the Gospel Banner. Time will show whether 5000 of the denomination disagree with us practically.

N. B.—Not having received the first number, we can not speak of its contents. They are said to be good.—Br. Chapin's explanation of the character of the Miscellany and his relation to it, was mislaid, and the Trumpet containing it not found until too late, or we should have published it. What we said of the Miscellany, and its published list of contributors, we said in good faith to the denomination and the press generally; and we meant no contempt for, and to heap no disgrace on those whom we designated as fifth-rate writers—there are few in any denomination that are more, and it is their misfortune, not their fault, that neither nature or education has made more of them. Those who deem it a fault not to be a first-rate writer, may misunderstand my meaning. And I wrote as I did, because nearly all the few first and second rate writers we do possess were not named at all as contributors to this 5000-subscriber and peculiarly superior-to-all-the-rest periodical, while these acknowledged inferior writers just around Boston, were paraded as the contributors to this great work! If I noticed the work at all, I must notice it as I had heard others around me notice it, and as I thought its claimed superiority should be noticed; that, not only the public, but the proprietor also, (for the Editors are not to blame,) might know what, in our opinion, they had a right to expect. Time will soon show whether those whose opinions I frankly expressed, were greatly in an error or not.

"THE UNIVERSALIST EXPOSITOR," we learn, is to follow closely on the heels of the Miscellany. We regret this—for the two can hardly live in these hard and newspaper-publishing times; and the publication of both must effectually prevent the success of either, besides affecting more or less the prosperity of others of our older periodicals. If the plans of both, and both periodicals, could be united, under charge of one enterprising Publisher, who would employ one or two good Editors, and all the best writers of our denomination as Contributors, we would then have such a periodical as our denomination does need—such a monthly as would do us credit—and such a one too, as I verily believe would be well supported. But as it is, we must, I fear, continue to pay six pence for a four penny loaf, of inferior materials, poorly baked, and have more of them than we can either buy or eat! Well—I can stand it as long as the rest can. A. B. G.

LETTER FROM BR. E. W. LOCKE.

Some of our readers may remember a notice from our pen, in the last volume, of the withdrawal of this brother from the ministry, on account of some painful doubts in relation to the inspiration of the Scriptures. Our Eastern periodicals generally bore testimony to the piety, uprightness, correct manners and habits and useful labors of Br. Locke, and expressed regret at the necessity for his withdrawal. At least so did the Gospel Banner. This Spring Br. Locke called on us, and after exhibiting numerous testimonials of character, and holding much converse, declared his mind satisfied of the truth and divinity of Christianity, and expressed his desire to preach again. We did not hesitate to believe his statements, and to encourage him in his resolution. He went to the Western part of our State, and while there, the Genesee Association noticed with approbation his intention to resume ministerial labor. A society of the order (in Alexander) employed him, and he is now laboring there all the time.

But now the tone of some of our Eastern papers seems changed. Since that announcement, the Banner and Trumpet have both noticed him as if he was endeavoring to impose on the New Yorkers, by concealing his former doubts. Such is not the fact. He was unreserved in stating what his thoughts and feelings had been, and now were. So far, at least, he has done all I could ask as an individual. And if the man can be believed, (and if he can not, then the Banner greatly deceived us last year, and numerous individuals of great respectability now certify falsely,) he has now done all that can be required to show to the world that he is a believer in Christianity. We hope, therefore, to read no more insinuations against him. If he is an honest man—of which I have no doubt—his word should be taken that he believes, as readily as it was taken that he doubted. If he is not an honest man, since when has that fact been discovered—and what are the proofs? It is due to Br. Locke, and to the friends in this region, and to the cause in general, to make known to the proper authorities the proofs of his wrong doing; or to stop the publication of articles that are calculated to awaken suspicions against him, without a why or a wherefore. Whoso readeth, let him do to others as he would be done by. Here is the letter of Br. Locke. Let it be received as true until the man is proved unworthy of credit and confidence. A. B. G.

Alexander, August 13, 1843.

"Br. Grosh—It is known to many Universalists in this State, and New England, that I once suspended my ministerial labors on account of views which I was forced to embrace, and which rendered it improper for me to preach any longer as a Universalist—though I never disbelieved the final holiness and happiness of all created intelligences. It is unnecessary to recapitulate what has been said publicly. This much I say—I never advocated the doctrines which I held, in public, till after I left the ministry. But let us draw the pall over the past. I am now a full-believer in the Christian religion. Were it necessary, I could tell the cause of my rejecting some notions I entertained. But this is enough. I will not trespass on your time any longer.

Yours in the Gospel, E. W. LOCKE."

N. B.—Br. J. H. Sanford, after leaving for the same cause, returned and was received with open arms—and we have just joyously welcomed Br. L. C. Todd back again—what heart so little—what soul so narrow, that another returning wanderer can not also be welcomed back to Christ and the ministry? A. B. G.

NEW WORK.

"A discussion of the conjoint question, 'Is the doctrine of endless punishment for any part or portion of the human family taught in the Scriptures; or, is the doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all mankind?' between Freeman Yates, Pastor of the Methodist church, South Berwick, Me., and Eben Francis, Pastor of the Universalist church, Dover, N. H., consisting of eight discourses, delivered in Dover, N. H., in the months of March and April, 1843. Exeter: Printed by Francis Grant, 1843."—pp. 157, 8vo.

We owe an apology for neglecting to notice this neatly printed work in pamphlet form, at the time of its reception. But really we have had no time to peruse it entirely through, and were waiting to do so. It is handsomely got up—the sermons (for the discussion was carried on by sermons preached by the disputants, at different times,) appear to be in good spirit—Mr. Yates was not very deeply acquainted with Universalism, and hence his objections are rather old, commonplace, and unfounded—and Br. Francis has ably answered, and in some cases ingeniously as well as ably refuted them.—We thank the individual who sent us the copy, for his kindness. A. B. G.

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

REMOVALS.—Br. J. Averill has removed from Ellensburg, to Dexter, Jefferson county, and wishes all letters and papers directed to him at that place. Br. W. H. Ryder of this city, purposes returning to Provincetown, Mass., next week, where he will probably reside for a season. All his letters and papers should be addressed to that place until further notice.

NEW PREACHERS.—"Br. Jacob Sax, a young man of moral worth and talent, has commenced preaching the doctrine of the restitution in this vicinity, to good acceptance"—so says a respected correspondent in Ellis village in this State.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We are very grateful and highly pleased to hear again from Br. Ashley Clark, of Elbridge. He has sent us a very spirited and interesting correspondence of his with a respectable Presbyterian clergyman, which we have read with pleasure. Our readers will have it—at least a part of it—next week.

Br. Bullard's favor is also received, and will appear next week. It exhibits a dignified "backing out" of a blustering bragging Methodist clergyman.

The favors of I. I. F., of Scriba, Oswego county, are also received, and shall have place soon.

We have been very scarce of communications for a few weeks past, for the first time in some years, we believe. We hope the above favors are only an earnest of more good things speedily to follow.

Br. H. Lyon asks why Br. Woolley's occasional sermon before the State Convention has not been published. Possibly the delay may have been caused by a sad accident which happened the week after, by which Sister Woolley's ankle was badly sprained, and (I believe) the bone broken, in her attempt to escape from a buggy, the horse of which ran away. She has been confined ever since, away from home, and besides this, some others of our brother's family have been sick. So that between attending to his sick at home and abroad, Br. Woolley has been probably too busy to prepare the sermon for publication.

THOSE SERMONS, Br. Locke, will be acceptable whenever your Secretary has leisure and inclination to copy them for us. Thank you for the offer of them, and the other favors. The Magazine and Advocate will be sent you—the former order was overlooked by Br. Walker. If you want any back numbers, you can have them.

CONFERENCE AT HAMILTON CENTRE.—The friends in the Central Association will remember the Conference at Hamilton Centre, on the last Wednesday and Thursday of the present month. Let there be a general attendance both of preachers and laymen. Would it not be a good thing at this meeting to hold social conferences in the evenings instead of having, as usual, a single sermon? We believe that this course would be productive of very signal good. It would put into operation a new power to further the interests of our cause—a power which has not been in this section, as yet, much employed; but if it is calculated, as we verily believe it is, to do good, to advance the vital and healthful influence of Universalism in the community, is it not high time that it was tried? What say you, brethren, shall it be done? H. B. S.

It is a maxim of Cato's, that a man ought to respect himself; that is, respect his reason; that recommends an honest boldness, and forbids a servile fear, which is a kind of license and permission for others to have no regard nor consideration for us.

Henderson, August 14, 1843.

The annual meeting of the Hudson River Association of Universalists for 1843, will be held in the city of Troy, the first Wednesday and following Thursday in September.—The council will organize at 9 o'clock Wednesday morning and public services commence at half past 10.

Will every society within the bounds of this Association be duly represented at this meeting? Each society is entitled to two delegates, who, it is earnestly desired, will come prepared, (according to a resolution of the last session of this body,) to give statistical accounts, and particular information of the state and condition of their respective societies.—Brethren, this is an important measure; for we can never know our true state and real strength, until each society realizes the necessity, and enters heartily into the work, of giving correct statements, from time to time, of their standing, condition, prospects, etc. "I speak as unto wise men."

J. A. ASPINWALL, Standing Clerk.

The North Branch Association will hold its annual session at Sheshequin, Pa., on the last Wednesday and Thursday in August. ## DEATHS.

In Lansing, Tompkins co., May 20th, of consumption, LEVI WYCUFF, son of Jesse Wycuff, in the 26th year of his age. It was his happiness to believe in the final restitution of all things; and that faith which was his companion of health was his solace in death, after cheering him through a protracted illness of one year, during which every effort was made by those of an opposite faith, to shake his hope in God as the Father and Saviour of all.

The consolations of the Gospel were presented by Br. Cheney to a large assembly, embracing the mourning family and friends. And yet, some of the Partialists in that assembly, not content with having assailed the deceased while life remained, chose the time of the funeral for their scoffs and sneers—some of which were not a little insulting. It was remarked that our Methodist brethren, in particular, could be distinguished from the rest of the congregation, by their want of decorum; and yet there were some honorable exceptions. Some of our opposers expressed themselves well satisfied with the discourse, as were probably a majority of the hearers. When will bigotry cease to follow with malignity even the corse to the grave, and professed Christians learn to mingle with common decency in the rites of public worship, and bear with calmness, and judge without passion, the doctrine presented to them in sincerity and affection?

A. OZMUN, Jr.

Drowned, in Ellisburg, on the morning of July 29th, PULASKI CLARK, aged about 22 years. The circumstances, as near as can be learned, were these:—He went to the creek, with his younger brother and another young man, for the purpose of bathing. The younger brother fell in and strangled—the other young man went to his assistance and was pulled in himself, and strangled—the deceased then either jumped in, or fell in, and was drowned before the others had recovered to render any assistance.

By this dispensation a father and mother are deprived of an affectionate son, on whom they hoped to lean much in their declining years—so fleeting are our hopes in mortal aid, and all that pertains to mortality! But still, they, as well as the brothers and sisters of the deceased, have a hope in God, which enables them to say, "God's will be done"—believing that their loss is the gain of the departed—that the rod of affliction is wielded by the hand of infinite love, and will result in producing the best good of all concerned.

The deceased was retiring in his disposition, and I am informed spent his leisure moments in the study of the word of life. As far as is known, he was a believer in the salvation of all mankind from sin and death through the Redeemer. The funeral was attended in the meetinghouse at Ellis village the next day (Sunday) when an immense concourse of people assembled to take their last look at one taken from among them in the early prime of life. Funeral services by Br. Persons, assisted by Br. Jones. O. WILCOX.

Drowned in Camillus, Onondaga co., May 25th, DANIEL T. OAKLEY, aged 20 years. He was an amiable young man, and beloved by all who knew him. His loss is deeply felt by all his friends. His funeral was attended by the writer on the 27th, and a discourse was preached to a large congregation of mourning friends.

N. BROWN.

In Clinax, (Prairie,) Michigan, February 12th, Mr. JOB HARRINGTON, formerly of Laurens, Otsego county, N. Y., aged 79 years. Funeral services by Rev. Henry Worthington.

In Greenfield, Wisconsin, February 22d, Mrs. THERESA HARRINGTON, wife of Mr. Riley Harrington, formerly of New Lisbon, Otsego county, N. Y. She died as she had lived, a Universalist.

In Locke, Cayuga county, on June 14th, after an illness of 5 days, ELEAZAR WOODWARD, Esq., aged 53 years.

Mr. Woodward was formerly from the town of Brooklyn, Windham co., Connecticut; but removed into these parts about 26 years ago. He was a kind husband and father, an obliging neighbor, one whose counsel was sought even by his political and religious opposers, and an upright and honest man. He was a Universalist in his views of the extension of divine grace; and when taken sick with the recent epidemic, he seemed to have a presentiment that it would be his last sickness; and rejoiced that he had never taught his family those doctrines and views of the divine government which in his apprehension were at once a dishonor to God, and destructive of the soul's dearest joys. A. P.

* * Universalist, please copy, and request papers in the vicinity of Brooklyn to do the same. A. P.

In Eagle, Allegany co., July 13th, of influenza, Mr. JESSE DUTTON, aged 71 years, 2 months, and 16 days, and weighing, a little previous to his death, 430 pounds.

He was sick but a few days, and was able to stand upon his feet about one hour before his departure. About three years ago he moved into the place where he died, from Oneida county, in this State. But his new home was not an abiding one; and he has left it to return no more. I was informed, at his funeral, that he was conscious that the time of his departure was at hand, and died without a fear, in the faith of universal salvation. That he was a worthy man, and respected by those who knew him, was evinced by the attentions which were paid to his burial. That he was a kind father, the attachment which his children exhibited was sufficient and convincing proof. The funeral was attended the following day by a very large assembly of friends and neighbors, when a discourse was given by the writer, after joining in prayer with the Rev. Mr. Ward. May the consolations of the Gospel abide with the mourners, and prepare them to rest in hope, "until the redemption of the purchased possession." A. KELSEY.

In Nunda, July 14th, Mrs. MERITABLE HORTON, mother of Judge Elijah Horton, in the 80th year of her age.

The deceased had been growing feeble for some years, and her continuance in this earthly house, was not expected for any length of time. The spirit's tabernacle on earth, had nearly worn itself out, and must have ceased its action in a short time, if the influenza had not hastened her departure. But she had filled up a good old age—seen and felt the joys and sorrows of life, and had no more anticipations of earthly good to bind her to life, and has gone to the Father of all. May the same grace which has hitherto supported this mourning circle, minister unto them individually, the light of life. The funeral was attended Sunday morning, July 16th, and a discourse was presented by the writer to a respectable number of friends and neighbors.

THE GOLDEN MAXIM.

Mr. John Richardson was one of the most respected of London's citizens. He had arrived young in the metropolis, very foot-sore, and with five and nine pence in his pocket. In the course of thirty years he had increased the five and nine-pence to fifty thousand pounds. This was generally considered clever; but, in truth, the man had no genius in his composition. The lack was more than compensated for by the possession of that valuable quality called prudence. He was slow but sure; dull, but industrious; short-seeing, but sharp-sighted within his ken. He passed through life acquiring few ideas, but many guineas. He began ignorant and ended ignorant; he began poor, and he ended rich. Mr. John Richardson, at the age of sixty, found himself retired from business, a widower, with one son. Alfred, the son, was a spirited young man. He despised trade and tradesmen, particularly despised the tradesman, his father. He owned to a very dim notion of the east end of London, but paraded his intimate knowledge of the West. His associates were entirely aristocratic. Lord Cheroot, Sir Edward Allnight, and the Hon. Tom Daredevil (as he was always called) were his sworn friends. It was rather an expensive friendship, certainly, for amongst them they borrowed of him something like a hundred pounds a month, not one farthing of which they made even a show of returning. But he had his money's worth in praise. They assured him that his spirit, his wit, his good sense were something extraordinary, and for a citizen almost miraculous. To be sure there was a manner, an air, a something only to be acquired by companionship with persons of birth; but he had improved greatly, in this respect, they said, and would in time be perfect. All this was averred to his face, and behind his back their remarks were, I doubt not the same—that is, unless Lord Cheroot, Sir Edward Allnight, and the Honorable Tom Daredevil were swindling scoundrels, which, as they belonged to the aristocracy, was not likely.

One evening, Mr. John Richardson, that respectable, elderly, well-to-do individual was taken suddenly ill. He went to bed—and never rose again. Just before his death he called for his son Alfred, and taking his hand, affectionately uttered these words, in a broken voice:

"Son Alfred, I am about to die, and before I do so I want to say a few words, as I have always made it a rule to do every thing in a business like manner. I shall leave you more than fifty thousand pounds, all got honestly. There is something else I shall leave you almost as valuable. Attached by a green silk ribbon to the parchment on which is written my will, you will find a sealed paper, containing the wisest sentence ever put together. By acting in the spirit of that maxim, I made all my money, and by acting in it, you may use well the money I made. I'm not much of a philosopher, son Alfred, but I say that all a man need know is contained in that maxim. Do not take it in its vulgar interpretation; it applies to every situation in life, and if people understood it better they wouldn't be such fools. As you despise or venerate my maxim, so will you fail or prosper."

Soon after pronouncing these words the old gentleman expired. At the proper time the will was produced and read. Attached to it, sure enough, by a green silk ribbon, was a small sealed paper, on the back of which was written, in round text, "The Golden Maxim." The anxiety was intense as the man in authority broke the seal and opened the mysterious paper. With a loud clear voice he gave forth the contents, which were as follows.

You must pay the best price if you want the best article.

At this strange end of their expectations, the auditors were variously affected. Some laughed, some whistled, some were angry, but not one certainly felt the least respect either for the maxim or the eccentric maxim giver. Alfred, for whose especial benefit the seal had been broken, did not affect to conceal his contempt. As soon as the company had departed, and he was alone, he soliloquised thus.

"Well, this is pleasant; the old man must not only bore me with his musty maxim, but render me ridiculous before my friends! As for the fifty thousand pounds, I'm obliged to him there; but I don't want his narrow minded posthumous advice how to use it and conduct myself in the world. These slow goers are always so ready with their council—and a confounded deal more ready than welcome! I can take care of myself, or I'm mistaken."

The first thing he did to show that he could take care of himself, was to sell the old house and the old furniture, and take a residence in a more fashionable situation, which he immediately set about furnishing. But here one of his peculiarities came into operation. In spite of being foolishly extravagant, he had a great notion of bargaining, so he went to a cheap establishment and purchased his furniture; and proudly did he chuckle when he saw the shining mahogany; the brilliant carpets, the resplendent gilding, and thought how little money he had given in return for these comforts and luxuries. It was not long, however, before the shining mahogany went to pieces, the splendid carpets faded and wore out, and the resplendent gilding peeled off—"Humph!" exclaimed Alfred, musing, "dad was certainly right here. As far as mere buying and selling, he knew something, though he was an ignoramus on other points. Yes, I suppose in trade the cheapest things are the dearest. You must pay the best price if you want the best article."

He now gave himself up entirely to the society of his somewhat loose but well-born associates. Notoriety was the object of his existence. He wished to rank amongst the first rakes of the day, and become celebrated for breaking lamps, beating policemen, driving over old women, and so on; but either he had less spirit or more sense than the rest, for in drunkenness, brutality and vice, they went generally beyond him. Whilst their names were known far and wide, and their deeds were fondly imitated, he was known only as a third-rate genius, and more an imitator himself, than an original worthy of imitation. He retired from the field considerably worse in pocket and constitution.

"Alas," said he, "there was more in that fantastic maxim than I suspected. It does not apply to trade only; I was willing to purchase notoriety, and find, unhappily, that the first quality of that commodity costs me more than I can afford. It was foolish to wish to obtain it; but more foolish to expect to obtain it cheaply. Yes—you must pay the best price if you want the best article."

He had now bidden farewell to his unworthy companions, and resolved to pursue a better path. Love entirely occupied his thoughts. He selected a beautiful, accomplished, and amiable girl, and thought that if he could induce her to become his wife, happiness would be his portion for ever.

But she was not easily won. There were points in his conduct which she wished to see altered, before she could choose him before all others. These concessions he was not exactly inclined to make; and there was Mary Tomlins, a very nice girl, who was quite ready to have him just as he was. He married Mary Tomlins. Six months after marriage she ran off with Ensign Jenkins.

"Ah!" sighed Alfred, "what an error did I commit. I lost a charming creature from idleness and pride. In proportion to the pain of acquisition, so would have been the pleasure of possession. You must pay best price if you want the best article."

He had arrived at a time of life when love generally yields to ambition. Alfred determined to become great, and great as a philosopher. He would examine into the nature of man and the constitution of society, and endeavor to leave the world wiser and better than he found it. He studied—he meditated—he wrote—he published; but the course of his studies and meditations were very prudently and daintily in accordance with popular notions, whence it happened that the books he wrote and published were somewhat trite and common-place. He gained no reputation as a philosopher, but he lost none as a man. Truth was not in his compositions, and consequently, defamation and abuse were not in the criticisms on them.

"I see clearly," said he, "that philosophical fame and the world's love are incompatible with each other. Every man who greatly benefits his fellow creatures, is hated and despised whilst living, by the majority of those he benefits. The immortality of every great benefactor has been purchased dearly indeed. You must pay the best price if you want the best article."

His hair was by this time beginning to grow gray, and the old gentlemanly advice stirred him exceedingly.

"I will make money," exclaimed he; "true, I have already some thousands, but a wise man should consider these merely as seed, to produce a plentiful crop. I am not young enough to enter trade regularly, but I will speculate. This is the way to make fortunes in a few years."

Accordingly he bought shares in Joint Stock Companies. He became a director of the "Dover and Calais Tunnel Company;" he held largely in the "Steam Balloon Company;" he was greatly concerned in the "Oxy-hydrogen Gas Street Lighting Company." Bull, bear, scrip, premium, were familiar words. He thought, he dreamed, of nought but speculation—of shares going down and getting up in the market—of paid up and unpaid up capital.

But commercial matters, even the most promising, are uncertain. "The Dover and Calais Tunnel Company," "The Steam Balloon Company," "The Oxy-hydrogen Gas Street Lighting Company," and all the other companies went successively to the dogs. A few knowing ones became astonishingly rich; but Mr. Alfred Richardson was not a knowing one, and lost all he had in the world. Some must suffer, that others may enjoy; such is the tendency of civilization.

Mr. Richardson retired to a garret in the neighborhood of Clerkenwell to meditate on his fortune-seeking. He came to the conclusion that wealth is most certainly procured by industry and self-denial, and that here, as elsewhere, you must pay the best price if you want the best article.

He had managed to preserve from the wreck of his property just enough to exist upon, and he employed his time chiefly in walking about, and viewing with unavailing regret those places where he had formerly exercised influence. But whether this had a bad effect on his spirit, or from whatever cause it might proceed, his health gradually became worse, until at last he was unable to stir from his room. His old and severely-punished sin however, once more tempted him. He could not prevail on himself to call in a proper medical adviser, which any man but a fool will always do, even if he pawn his only coat for the purpose. Mr. Richardson availed himself of the services of Mr. Abraham Solomons, who assured him, by advertisement in the news papers, that he was not only the cheapest, but the clearest surgeon in London. Mr. Abraham Solomons gave him some hope of recovery; but, finding that he got no better, he changed his mind, and declared the case hopeless.

"Mrs. Dickenson," said our unfortunate hero, "I am dying. You have been a kind landlady, and shall have all I possess. I am, and have been, a victim to my contempt for a noble maxim. Oh! Mrs. Dickenson, take warning by my sad example, and ever believe that you must pay the best price if—"

His voice failed—he fell back on the pillow a corpse. Through life he understood not the GOLDEN MAXIM, so in death was unable to pronounce it.

MORAL.—The earth yields nothing to one who refuses to labor. Whatever the object of your pursuit, you must give an equivalent; and, if that object be valuable, your offering must be in proportion. You must pay the best price if you want the best article.—Saturday Courier.

CORRESPONDENCE—

BR. A. CLARK AND REV. S. MILLS.

MESSRS. EDITORS—The following correspondence was elicited by a discourse delivered some time in September, 1841, by the Rev. Sidney Mills, then Pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Elbridge. The text selected was from 1 Samuel ii: 13, which treats of the case of Eli and his wicked sons. Eli was, in the estimation of our preacher, altogether blame-worthy, inasmuch as he did not restrain his sons; and, as a consequence, they had gone to hell, and were now suffering its dreadful torments.—Taking these things for granted as facts, he had been led at times to query whether Eli could be happy even in heaven; knowing as he must, that his two sons were suffering the torments of the damned in hell—and all this in consequence of their father Eli's neglect to restrain them. This he illustrated by reference to the neglect of individuals to save life when they could, but suffered them to perish. It was inferred that those who neglected to save life when they could, but suffered them to perish, were themselves the murderers, as in the case of Eli, who did not restrain his sons, but suffered them to perish.

The object of this discourse probably was to wake up Christians to duty, and shew them their great criminality in neglecting to restrain sinners, and thereby suffer them to perish everlastingly. The correspondence is somewhat tardy, and fails on the part of our Rev. friend to give the desired information. He objects to Universal salvation because it would work greater ruin to other parts of his (God's) creation." What or whothose "other parts," or what their "ruin" will consist of, he does not inform us, though frequently requested to do so. But here follow the letters as a specimen of modern Orthodoxy.

A. C.

Elbridge, Sept. 29, 1841.

DEAR SIR—I noticed in your discourse of last Sabbath, on the life and character of Eli and his government over his sons, your remarks were interspersed with several affecting illustrations, from which you draw very correct and very just inferences. The destruction of life by fire, water, etc.—the cause of that destruction, as set forth in your illustrations, was traced to the right source—that is, the person having the power and means of saving from that destruction, but did not do it—that individual, you say, was the murderer. This you infer with confidence, and appeal to the congregation for the justness of the inference. I have no doubt that the congregation all concurred with you, and drew the same inference I did myself. But why, I ask, does it not occur to you that the character of these murderers is the character of your God!! Perhaps such a wicked thought as that never, for once, entered your mind. Well, now, I am very apt to harbor just such wicked thoughts; and when you drew the inference that the person who suffered that destruction of life when he might have prevented it, but did not, was the murderer; I also drew the same inference, and this inference was at the same time accompanied with another inference—viz., that that was just the character of your God!!

Understand me. I have not said this was the character of the true God, but the character of your God according to your views of his government, with this difference, viz., the murder committed by your God is as much greater, and more awful, as he is greater than man; but as much worse as an endless murder is worse than murder for a moment. But such things, or inferences, it seems, do not enter your mind. I wonder they do not. According to your creed, God is the only being in the universe that can save man from endless misery, and still he does not do it!! "A word to the wise is sufficient."

You will pardon this liberty, when you are informed that it is from one of the sons of Eli.

Yours respectfully, ASHLEY CLARK.

REPLY.

Elbridge, Nov. 26, 1841.

DEAR SIR—I feel ashamed that I have so long neglected to answer your line of Sept. 29th. Without, however, stopping to apologize, I would say in answer—

That if I have been understood as attributing such a character to God as that he might have saved all human kind had he been so disposed, but does not, from indisposition—or that he might save all without working greater ruin to other parts of his creation—or that God neglects from indisposition to secure good to his creatures which he might do without, at the same time, causing the loss of greater good to themselves or others—I think I hold no such sentiment in regard to the character of God. It seems to me such a character attributed to God destroys his holiness, and makes him infinitely wicked. When I see in the world around me, suffering—great suffering, I do not adopt the conclusion that God is indifferent to it, as the reason that he does not prevent it; and when I understand the Bible as asserting that there will be some incorrigibly wicked, who will suffer eternally as they will be eternally wicked, I do not adopt the conclusion that they will continue thus wicked and suffering eternally because God is indifferent to their welfare, and does not do all he can consistently do for them, i. e., all he can without working greater evil elsewhere to others of his creatures.

I might say more, but it is perhaps needless.—I am with much respect, Yours, etc.

SIDNEY MILLS.

2d Letter to Rev. Sidney Mills.

Elbridge, Dec. 11, 1841.

DEAR SIR—Yours of Nov. 26, is received, and is now before me. I have perused it for the purpose of understanding. In it you say, "That if I have been understood as attributing such a character to God as that he might have saved all human kind had he been so disposed, but does not, from indisposition," etc.—that you "hold to no such sentiment," and that it seems to you that "such a character attributed to God destroys his holiness, and makes him infinitely wicked." It seems to you, then, that to leave mankind unreconciled and render them endlessly miserable from causes other than his own disposition, would make a material difference with regard to the holiness of God.

If I understand you, you attribute to God a character that he will render a portion of his offspring endlessly miserable. This you believe, and do not deny; but to attribute such a character to him as the result of his own disposition, this you deny; and it would seem to you to "make him infinitely wicked."

Let us see how the matter stands with regard to the dealings of God toward the children of men after their transgression, to say nothing of the design of God in the first creation of man. Mankind are in a lost and unreconciled state. God reconciles and saves some "without working ruin to others; or without, at the same time, causing the loss of greater good to themselves or others." How happens it that "reconciling the world unto himself" would cause ruin to others? Would it cause ruin to those whom God reconciles and saves? So it would seem, if I rightly understand you. But again—why does God reconcile any "unto himself," but because he is so disposed? Does he reconcile and save them, because they have done something good on their part to dispose God to reconcile them? If so, it appears to me you have departed widely from the Presbyterian creed, as also from the Scripture representation, "not by works of righteousness which we have done," "not that we loved God, but that he loved us." "We love him because he first loved us." But I need not multiply passages, for to this import they are numerous. If God reconciles and saves some, because he is so disposed; notwithstanding they were "enemies in their minds by wicked works," does he not leave others unreconciled and unsaved because he is so disposed? I do not know how you can alter it by saying, God will render them endlessly miserable because they have been wicked, when he saves others notwithstanding their wickedness, and all this because he is so disposed to do. If you will look at this matter candidly and dispassionately, I think you will see that the present and future destiny of man depends altogether on the disposition and character of God. Or will you say, that God was disposed to save all, but had not the means of accomplishing it? What! infinite wisdom can not "do all his pleasure" "without working greater evil elsewhere to others of his creatures?" Is it indeed so? If God can not reconcile "the world unto himself" without working greater evil elsewhere to others of his creatures, how happens it, I ask, that he (knowing this to be the case previously) ever commenced the work? Why did he "make peace through the blood of his cross, to reconcile all things unto himself," when at the same time he perfectly well knew it could not be done without working greater evil elsewhere to others of his creatures? Does not the Almighty know, or as the Scripture records it, "declare the end from the beginning?"

But, I ask, who are those "others of his creatures" to whom universal reconciliation will "work greater evil elsewhere?" Are they the inhabitants of other systems who will look on this delightful spectacle with feelings of envy? Or are they devils for whose rights you are jealous? Are you fearful that they will be cheated out of their just dues, and be robbed of their lawful prey? and thereby work greater evil elsewhere to others of his creatures, i. e., to devils? If it is the work of reconciliation to triumph over death, hell and the grave—to "destroy the works of the devil"—yea, "him that hath the power of death, that is the devil," according to the Scriptures—why then be concerned about his rights? But that universal reconciliation will work greater evil elsewhere to others of God's creatures!—is not this position rather assumed than otherwise? Let us see how the apostle's words would read, attaching to them this position. "For it pleased the Father that in him should all fullness dwell; and having made peace through the blood of his cross, to reconcile all things unto himself; to him, I say, whether they be things in earth or things in heaven" that he might thereby "work greater evil elsewhere to others of his creatures." How does that sound, neighbor Mills? Does not the phrase, "all things whether they be things in earth or things in heaven," include all? This is the opinion of some of the learned doctors—Professor Stuart for one. We have other phrases that include all intelligent creatures.—The "creation itself shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God," Rom. viii: 21. When this is done, will it "work greater evil elsewhere to others of his creatures?" No, sir—you have "got the cart before the horse." If you had said, God can not reconcile and save some and leave others unreconciled and unsaved, without "working greater ruin elsewhere to others of his creatures," you would have hit nearer the truth; but as it is, you are wide of the mark. If you know, or can imagine, any "greater evil elsewhere to others of his creatures" than their endless unholiness and misery, you have perceptions which I do not possess.

Having said thus much, we will conclude with a few inferences—not my inferences particularly; but I would ask you whether they do not legitimately follow from the position you have assumed?

1. If God feels disposed to save all men, (or, as you have it, "all human kind,") but can not without working greater evil elsewhere to others of his creatures, has he not instituted such a system as will issue, in that which is at variance with his disposition and pleasure?

2. If he instituted such a system without knowing or designing the result, is he infinitely wise and omniscient?

3. All those passages of Scripture which speak of his doing "all his pleasure"—of his working "all things after the counsel of his own will"—"For thy pleasure they are and were created," etc., are null and void.

4. And this is partially included in the 2d—If God could not institute a system that would result or issue in his pleasure; is he a God of infinite wisdom as revealed in the Scriptures?

5. God has instituted such a system as has resulted in an infinite evil. In your letter you say you "understand the Bible as asserting that there will be some incorrigibly wicked; who will suffer eternally as they will be eternally wicked." Does not the inference legitimately follow, that God has instituted a system that issues in an infinite evil, not only to himself, (as he was otherwise disposed, desiring universal salvation,) but also to millions of his own offspring whom he created in his own image!! Sin, according to your creed, is an infinite evil; and here it is allowed to exist, not as an incidental evil terminating in the good of its subjects, but as an end or ultimatum, terminating to them in no good whatever, but evil, and only evil endlessly!

But you say, "I do not adopt the conclusion that they will continue thus wicked and suffering eternally, because God is indifferent to their welfare, and does not do all he can consistently do for them, i. e., all he can, without working greater evil elsewhere to others of his creatures. The conclusion, then, that you do adopt follows legitimately, that God looked upon the welfare of the world "lying in wickedness" with deep concern and solicitude, and therefore undertook their complete reconciliation and deliverance; but to his own mortification and "incorrigible wickedness and suffering eternally" of his subjects, it resulted in a complete failure! If I have not reasoned correctly, I should like to be informed wherein.

Yours, etc. ASHLEY CLARK.

TO THE CHURCH OF CHRIST.

Friends—Ye are not yet able to endure strong meat, therefore allow me humbly to feed you, as an instrument in God's hands, with a little new milk. For one I must say, I have viewed many meetings of God's children, and their results, and this is my experience. I give it not as a true experience of every one, but as an isolated and individual case.

At those meetings where loud praise and painted views are given of heaven—its pearly streets, its joyful anthems, the splendid crowns given to its inhabitants—and God's love is depicted as surprising in preparing such an abode for the faithful; and also hell is represented as a place burning with fire and brimstone, whose liquid lava continually ascends and torments its inhabitants—as a place continually stretched, as it were, with an open mouth to receive the wicked of earth—a place whose torments never cease; revivals, (as excitement which must be the result of such sounds continually vibrating on the ear,) oft are found to spring up.—But look at the result. Ere a few months, out of each ten only one is found, to return and praise God; and that too, so feebly, that Christ instead of noticing the praise and giving the plaudit expected, makes the inquiry, were there not ten healed? but where are the nine? Reader, stop, reflect, and answer—are these things so?

But let us cast a glimpse at another class of meetings. That class where the pastor deals plentifully in the milk of the word; where child-like simplicity is used—at that meeting where children are brought up as a fair example of Christianity—their love to their parents—their love to each other—with what attention and feeling they watch their parents—how they notice their smile or frown—how they love every object and thing that bears any resemblance to their parents, or is loved by their parents—with what complacency a child can retire to rest with its parents' smile—how sweetly it can sleep in its parents' arms—with what eagerness the first glance of its eye, upon waking, is turned towards its parents—how it can smile if but its parents smile—how happy is the life of the dutiful child; how miserable that of the unruly one; how the child enters as it were, into the joys and sorrows of its parents—how it mourns with the parents if duty compels them to correct an unruly member of the family; and oft the tear is seen to flow more freely from the uncorrected child than from the one punished from the pure motive of love; how the child, if in need of food, drink, or any other thing, asks, (or prays) to its parents for the thing desired; and if not noticed, continues to importune—with what implicit confidence it listens to its parent's instruction; how eagerly it obeys its commands; how sorrowful it feels after having offended its parents, and what joy it feels when having done a deed, it receives its parents' approbation! Again—look at a child's love to its brethren and sisters—it is equal to that of self in every particular; and if parent or brother or sister absent themselves for a time, how tedious the hours of separation, and how joyful the meeting! I say, the pastor that tries to square the walk and conversation of his flock by such a line as this, and the Christian who is willing to learn holiness from children, and the result of sinning from the same source, can enjoy heaven below—God will dwell with them, God will bless them; because he has said, "Except ye become as little children, ye can not enter the kingdom of heaven." Why? "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." Now let converts be born under such preaching, and then the pastor can adopt the language of Christ when he comes to render up his account, "Here I am, Father, and all thou hast given me, except Judas the son of perdition." And like a child who rejoices having done a good deed, not on account of the merit of the deed, but because it causes pleasure in the breast of its parent, he can ascribe all the glory to God.

Please view this matter carefully and prayerfully, and decide this day whom ye will serve—God and his parental embrace, or Baal and his excitement.

A REVEREND SCRIBBLER.

Scowling bigotry and alarmed falsehood wears a species of impudence, or daredevilness, at times, which can not fail to arouse the tamest spirit of charity. Such is often the case with Partialism in its treatment of Universalists. I like to judge no man, nor his motives; but to pretend that there is no cause for complaining against the recklessness of some, yea, of many of our opposers, is sheer self-deception, and open delusion. Look at a portion of the popular clergy. We are sorry that liberal Christians are unable to place but very little confidence in that portion of community, especially with regard to their honesty towards those sentiments and people which exceed Partialism in liberality and enlightenment. The following circumstance reveals a pretty specimen of a Protestant clergyman to talk about the destructive intolerance of Romanism in burning Bibles, defacing books, etc.

Not many weeks since, I chanced to stop, for a few moments, in a neighboring little village, where there was only one believer in Universalism, and that a married lady, at whose house I stopped. After conversing for a while, she left the room, and my eyes accidentally fell on a book which was lying upon the table. I took it up, and found it to be "Skinner's Letters to Aikin and Lansing," which had been circulating very freely in that little village. On turning over the leaves, I found many of the margins filled with the most outrageous abuses and accusations against Mr. Skinner and his sentiments; expressions like, "A lie!" "a wilful and gross perversion!" &c. Choice, delicate and charitable phrases and remarks like these, were scattered along throughout the book, rendering it sadly disfigured and mutilated.

On inquiring of the lady, I ascertained that the author of these friendly tokens and notes of caution, was the Rev. J. B. Wilson, the Presbyterian pastor of the place, who had taken such a kind interest in the welfare of the lady who had lent him the book, as to pass his opinions upon the sentiments of the same, by rendering it unfit for farther use: besides the evidences of his kindness which had been frequently manifested in the pulpit, in sundry suggestions indited for her particular benefit.

N. B.—Universalist authors, travelling West, and desirous of having pencilled notes and criticisms taken upon their works, will please call upon this Rev. Annotator, residing at Chapinville, on the Rail Road, three miles east of Canandaigua. The editors of this paper will please send this gentleman a copy of this, that he may be prepared, without surprise, to receive calls for the exercise of his critical acumen, and gentlemanly remarks.

Canandaigua, August, 1843.

IMPORTANT DISCOVERY.—On the farm of Gen. Thomas C. Miller, in Dickinson township, Cumberland co., Pennsylvania, there has recently been discovered an immense vein of pure red Ochre, of the finest quality, second only to the finest Venetian red. Gen. Miller is now preparing it in large quantities for the market. Its purity is such, that it requires but to be dried in the sun and ground, to be used for the finest painting. From the appearance of the mine, it is supposed there is an amount sufficient to supply the whole United States.

BLOWING UP A SHIP.—A vast number of persons, male and female, visited Castle Garden and the vicinity on Tuesday, lured by the announcement that a vessel of 80 tons was to be blown up by Capt. Taylor's "sub-marine battery." An old vessel, with one mast, was anchored off Castle Garden, but just as Capt. T. was preparing to descend, the mast fell over the side, the swell from a passing steamboat having unshipped it, striking and breaking in two two small boats, the occupants however escaping without injury, and crushing the rocket intended for the explosion, which was on the deck at the time. This caused a delay of nearly an hour in order to make a new rocket, but finally the explosion did come off in splendid style, more effectual, if possible, than the same operation by Mr. Colt some time since.—[Sun.]

The Cheraw Gazette states that, in addition to the advantages of the Tomato for table use, the vine is of great value as food for cattle, especially cows. It is stated that a cow fed on Tomato vines will give more milk, and yield butter of finer flavor, and in greater abundance, than on any other long feed ever tried. It is thought, too, that more good food for cattle, and at less expense, can be raised from a given quantity of ground planted with tomatoes than from any other vegetable known in the southern country.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE ERIE RAILROAD.—The

freight train of cars, which started from Middletown on Tuesday afternoon at 2 o'clock, after proceeding about 3 miles, to the Hampton bridge, the last car of the train ran off the track, and was precipitated some fifty feet, where it was dashed to atoms on the rocks. The bridge had no planks upon it. There was one passenger in the car, a Mr. Fitzsimmons, a very respectable man with a family residing at Goshen. He survived the accident in great agony, for three hours. A gentleman who was present, describes the scene which took place in the rude Irish cabin, whither Fitzsimmons was carried, as deeply affecting. His daughter, quite a young girl, was present, and after her father had ceased to breathe, she attempted, in the absence of a priest, to read the service from the Catholic Prayer-book, (none of the inmates of the family knowing how to read,) but her feelings so overcame her, that she was unable to proceed, and requested the gentleman, our informant, to conclude the reading, which he likewise found himself unable to accomplish. The daughter, however, would not consent that the body be touched by any one present until after she had given utterance to the prayer for the spirit of her departed parent to be conveyed to the land of the just.—Tribune.

MARRIAGES.

On the 17th inst., by Rev. D. Skinner, at his residence in Deerfield, Mr. ERASTUS D. PALMER, to Miss MARY JANE SEAMAN, both of this city.

DEATHS.

In Danube, Herkimer county, on the 8th inst., Mrs. CATHERINE DILLENBACH, consort of Mr. John Dillenschach, Jr., aged 45 years, 2 months and 21 days—leaving behind her seven children, with a loving husband to lament their loss. Mrs. Dillenschach had been unwell for upwards of two years, during which period, as well as in her last sickness, she was sustained by that "faith which overcometh the world." She was a Universalist both in theory and practice. She was an obedient wife and an excellent mother. Her children loved her almost beyond measure. She cultivated those virtues, that create esteem, inspire love and command respect. In her heart there existed a flame of heavenly love, which was continually kept burning with a full supply of the oil of charity, benevolence, and forgiveness. On the Sunday before her death, she sent for the writer to administer to her weary soul, the rich promises of the Gospel of Christ; and expressed her happiness at hearing on her bed of sorrow, those truths which had been her solace in health, and which she relied on in death. With repeated assurances of her own salvation and that of all the human race, she waited with patience until her change came. On the day of her death, about five minutes ere her spirit fled from its frail and attenuated abode, did she take the narrator by the hand, and desired him to commend her soul "unto God who gave it," at which she seemed satisfied. Then with a smile of inexpressible satisfaction, with the cold dews of death sitting on her brow, she gave up the ghost.

Her funeral was attended by a vast concourse of people, to whom and to the mourning friends, by particular request of the deceased, a discourse was delivered by Br. J. D. Hicks—Text, Luke iv: 3d clause of 18th verse, "He hath sent me to heal the broken hearted"—assisted in the services by Elder Russel of the Baptist persuasion, (who behaved not as Partisanist clergy generally do on such occasions,) and by Br. Barry and the writer.

In Westmoreland, N. H., July 17th, Mr. Timothy Skinner, a Revolutionary pensioner, aged 82 years.

The subject of this notice had the singular fortune, to rear to manhood nine children, all of whom are now living, with families around them. Of his own family, he himself was the first to obey that summons which bids the living join the congregation of the dead. After having raised up and educated according to the extent of his means his children, it has been with him and his worthy consort, a source of great happiness to see them all—a somewhat unusual circumstance in so large a number—comfortably and even prosperously settled in life, and not a few of them enjoying positions of eminence and distinction, among their fellow men. They have frequently been honored with the confidence and respect of their countrymen, and the aged patriarch who is the subject of this obituary, has lived to see his children in the Senate chamber, in the Halls of legislation, on the Judicial Bench, and, also in the Sacred Desk. Brs. Warren and Dolphus Skinner, eminent preachers of the Gospel, are his children, and well have they honored their family connections and their sacred calling.

Father Skinner was not only a patriot in the Revolution, but he opposed tyranny wherever he found it, and particularly did he oppose all kinds of religious despotism. He was the first in the place of his residence to oppose compulsory taxation for the support of the clergy, and rather than submit to this system of oppression, he suffered his property to be driven off and sold under the officer's hammer. The next year after this occurrence, the "Toleration Act" was passed, and every man was permitted to act as to him seemed right, with none to molest or make afraid.

It is hardly necessary to remark, that as Universalism appeared to Mr. Skinner the only consistent system of religious faith, it for many years received his constant and open support. He who opposes religious oppression will seldom, under favorable circumstances, embrace a narrow creed, and hence it is that multitudes of those who in the State of New Hampshire, plead and contended for free toleration in religion, are, as was Father S., believers in a common salvation. Honor to those men, who thus severed the chains of priestly bondage! Let posterity hold them in grateful remembrance.—Balm of Gilead, C. W.

In Elba, July 17th, of a lingering consumption, Miss MARTHA CUDWORTH, daughter of Barnard and Polly Cudworth, aged 22 years. Her funeral was attended on the 19th inst., in the Free Will Baptist meeting-house, Byron, and a discourse delivered on the occasion by the writer.—W. Lumsdary, J. M. DAY

PAST YEARS.

BY MISS M. E. TILLOTSON.

Past years, ye're gone—your fruits of sour and sweet,
Gone with you—but their flavor lingers yet—
Your seasons all with harvests richly laden,
And changes that alternately grieve and gladden.
Oblivion's veil is fallen o'er you now—

Mem'ry alone to your dark tomb may go;
And if perchance she brings from it away
A single trophy gilded with a ray
Of righteous light, to show some good had blest,
In former time, a soul with sin oppress'd;
Then, was our being given not all in vain;
Then, mem'ry wand'ring o'er the waste again,
Tho' scenes she view that make our pleasures less,
That trophy bright shall also moments bless!

'Tis bliss to scan the joys our childhood knew;
The kind caress our little frolics drew;
The merry task, the praise that raised our glee;
These joys again are shared in memory!
She brings again the haunts in youth we trod,
The verdant hill side and the sloping wood;
The boughs we gathered, and the blossoms fair—
Yes, and the tender hands that led us there!
The river, too, whose banks we loved to roam,
The rippling current, and the eddy calm;
The boat that bore us gently from the strand,
And vine-wreathed willows that did o'er us bend—
These spots of green enchain the thought that's cast
Through the strange vista of the buried past!

Past years, ye're gone—and gone the early dream,
That to expectant heart did lovely seem:—
Anticipation in your life was bright—
That, too, has with you passed to shades of night
It raised the child awhile on pinion strong,
But even youth in it perceived a wrong,
Manhood sometime was lured by hope of bliss,
But he full soon was taught he'd built amiss!
Age may instruct, and we should heed it's lore,
And deem our due, what others shared before.

Yes, ye are gone—and now are numbered all,
With friends ye bore beyond reach of recall:
And had we power, nor you, nor them we'd bring Back to a clime, whence joys from sorrows spring!
Ye took our pleasures when ye bade adieu—
'Tis well, since with them went some troubles too:
I wren your scales do equipond'rate well.
For 'gainst the wo, you drop the weight of weal.

Sealed is the past, the future still is spread,
To four-fold pay the hand of gen'rous deed;
If ill the act, the law all comprehend—
The fruits we reap upon the seed depend.
Pleasure is sometimes ours, contentment ne'er;
Mortal still must we be, in time be e'er
Children of circumstance, formed to endure;—
And yet, 'tis said, that erst the world was pure.
But these are time's concerns—the poor are they,
Who faithless find the road a thorny way—
The rich are they who read God's endless love
In nature's book revealed—and heaven above!

MOHAWK RIVER AND OTSEGO ASSOCIATIONS.

At the last session of the Mohawk River Association of Universalists, the Universalist society of Frankfort and German Flats applied for and received its fellowship. Two weeks after this the Otsego Association met in annual session and appointed a committee of two clergymen and one layman to confer with the clerk of said society as to their reasons for this measure, &c.

Now, to me, the appointment of such a committee for such a purpose by the Otsego Association, though perfectly harmless, looks like a very singular and unheard-of measure. For that Association can have no possible jurisdiction over a society that has never asked its fellowship nor placed itself under its government. No religious Association or society (especially in this free country) has the authority or power to compel any society or individual to come into its fellowship or under its jurisdiction. I have a perfect legal, moral and religious right, as an individual, to connect myself, (if I see fit and such church or society will receive me,) with a church or society in Boston, Philadelphia, or even London; and no other church or society, either from local or other considerations, has a right to interfere with said connection.

Now, as I was present at the organization of said society, and also conversant with their feelings and views when they appointed their delegates and instructed them to ask the fellowship of the Mohawk River Association, I presume I can give the reasons of the measure adopted, and satisfy both the committee appointed and the Universalist public, of its propriety, and that no improper feelings or motives existed in said society, inducing them to said measure, without a long and formal correspondence between the parties.

The reasons were briefly these: 1. The members of the society reside on both sides of the Mohawk river, (which is the line dividing the two Associations,) though it is true most of them reside on the south side of the river. 2. The present pastor or preacher of said society resides within the bounds of the M. R. Association; though I am not positive that this had much, if any influence in the matter. But 3, and principally, (for this was the only weighty reason,) local considerations determined the society in favor of the Mohawk River Association. It felt no disfellowship, no unkind or unfriendly feelings towards the Otsego Association or any of its members, but the best and kindest affections. But the M. R. A. generally holds its sessions much nearer to Frankfort and German Flats than those of the Otsego are held, and therefore more convenient for their delegates to attend. While the former generally holds its sessions within ten or fifteen miles of these towns, the latter not unfrequently holds its sessions forty or fifty miles distant. And this was an important, altogether the most important, consideration, both with the society and its delegates. Had it joined the Otsego Association it would have been annually a serious tax on its delegates to attend its sessions, and it would have been far less likely to be represented than it will now in the M. R. A. Perhaps I might add one reason more, viz., the M. R. A. has a smaller number of societies within its boundaries, and therefore stands more in need of this society, than the O. A.

In conclusion I will say, it was almost entirely local affinity that determined its choice, and not the "elective affinity" of the old and new school Presbyterians, which a few years since determined the choice of that denomination, as to the Presbytery or Synod with which they would unite. We have no such distinctions as old and new school Universalists. We are happily one, and profess to belong to the school of Christ. D. S.

LETTER TO MR. LAWTON.

Wellsboro, July 4th, 1843.

Mr. Lawton—I make no apology for thus addressing you—the circumstances speak for themselves.

I understand that, subsequently to my visit to this place last winter, you came out with a notice to the public, that you would preach at a certain time on or against Universalism—that having done so, or rather attempted it, (which, by the way however, I am told was an entire failure,) you then stated to your congregation that you had challenged several Universalist clergymen to a public discussion with you, that they (the Universalists) would generally accept your challenge, but that they would invariably back out. And, moreover, I am informed that you represented that such was the course which the Universalists generally pursued with other Methodist clergymen who had also frequently challenged them to a public discussion, but that they could never be drawn into one, &c., &c.

Now, my dear Sir, so far from acknowledging your assertion to be true in general, the facts already before the public, show it to be false—and that you knew it to be false when you made it—and now, Sir, we call upon you to produce one instance of the kind you mention—nay, we defy you to do it.

But, again, I am also informed that you said you would like the opportunity of meeting Mr. Bullard in a public discussion—that nothing would suit you better, &c. Well, then, why do you not challenge me and done with it, as you say you have others, and thus vindicate your courage and veracity at once? But no, I see no prospect of this. I have heard much from you—of your threats, etc., since last winter, and have been waiting all this time very impatiently for you to come out and take your stand like a valiant soldier—but I have waited in vain. And now, rather than to wait any longer, I have concluded to challenge you—and do hereby challenge you to meet me in a public discussion of the joint question of universal salvation on my part, and of a general judgment after death and endless misery on your part, which I will reduce to form as follows:—

The question to be discussed between Mr. Lawton and Mr. Bullard.

Is the doctrine of a future general judgment after death subject to the endless misery of the wicked—or the doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all men, taught in the Bible?

My friends will wait upon you with this letter; and receive your answer. I would also say, that on account of the distance of my residence from this place, they are authorized to settle the preliminaries with you, report to me the result of the matter—leaving me the power of appointing the time for the commencement of the discussion should it take place. Yours with due respect,

W. BULLARD.

Clear the track.—Here comes the answer.—Reason for refusing a challenge!!!

"A Skunk challenged a Lion for a personal combat, but the Lion refused saying if I consent you will make your boast about town that you have had the honor of contending with a Lion!!! while at the same time I shall publish by my scent that I have associated with a Skunk." "18th July."

There, reader—them's the animals what we have to deal with in this region. Lions!!! Roaring ones, too, I can tell you—especially when they think the enemy is out of hearing distance!

It appears this roaring Lion has been trying for years to associate himself with skunks by his endeavors to draw them into a personal combat, but has hitherto failed in accomplishing his object, and now at last, after much boasting, suffers himself to be branded coward fairly. W. B.

UNIVERSALISM NOT SECTARIAN.

That Universalists sustain in public estimation a denominational character, and hold a place, so far at least as the adoption of a name is concerned, among the Christian sects, is undeniable. The early Christians were also known as a religious sect, from the fact that they cherished opinions and practices peculiar to themselves, and by no means in harmony with the popular, and (in the world's estimation) orthodox doctrines of that age.

It is nevertheless true, that Christianity was perfectly unsectarian in its character, and that its founder never manifested any thing that looked like a sectarian spirit. 'Tis true that he and his followers had to do battle with their opposers, and it may perhaps be claimed that they zealously engaged in defending their sectarian views. But this is entirely a mistake; for their views were entirely unsectarian, and he must have been a superficial reader of the New Testament who does not know that the Saviour's most pointed rebukes were constantly aimed at what was then, and what still is, a party or sectarian spirit. What else are we to understand by his opposition to castes, classes and clans in the community; manifested in his caution not to invite friends and rich neighbors to a feast, but the poor, and the suffering, no matter of what party? He was anti-sectarian in his caution, also, that his disciples should not confine their salutations to their friends, but extend them as the honest testimonials of that love which he taught them to cherish for their enemies. But especially did the merciful Saviour manifest his utter contempt for an opposition to all narrow party and sectarian feelings, by mingling, himself, with all classes, from the proud and self-righteous Pharisee to the despised publican, the outcast Samaritan, and downtrodden sinner (so called by the spirit of self-righteousness).

But I wish still further to illustrate this point by stating, what I suppose none will dispute, that a sectarian is the devotee of a party. But such was not the blessed Jesus; for he lived the devoted servant of Him who is the equal God of all. He lived and died the friend of universal humanity. Surely no one would think of charging Howard with a sectarian spirit, when he travelled Europe over and over, to mitigate the woes of the most miserable of the human race, no matter to what nation or what sect they belonged.

Now no careful and unbiased observer can fail to see the perfect coincidence between Universalism and primitive Christianity, so far as the copiousness and unsectarian character of its doctrines are concerned. The one regarded God as the Father of the human race, and Christ as the Saviour of all men; the other does the same. The one regarded every man a neighbor, however distant his location, or however bitter his enmity to us might be, and so does the other. Hence it is plain that Universalism, as such, has not and can not have any party purposes to accomplish. It is true that we, like the primitive Christians, must defend our cause against the attacks of our opposers. But what is the cause of this opposition? What is there in our creed which is so offensive to a portion of our fellow men? It is its universality—its opposition to sect and party. This is the point of contention between us and our opposers. While we spread the broad mantle of God's unchanging love over all; they contend strenuously that only a party, party, or sect (whichever the reader may please to call it) will be the final sharers of that love.

From the foregoing remarks I think it is plain, not only that Universalism is unsectarian and anti-sectarian in its character, but that this claim, noble and God like as it is, is peculiar to the cause we advocate. None else can make any reasonable pretensions to it. No man, while he contends for the salvation of a part, only, of mankind, can claim on that point any higher title than that of a party man or a sectarian. But it will be said that there are Partialists who appear to be guided but very little, if any, by party feelings. I acknowledge that such is the fact; and I rejoice at it. But it should also be remembered that such men have feelings but very little, if any, in harmony with their creeds. There is another fact, which, though painful to acknowledge, must not be denied, and that is, that there are men professing Universalism who have a large share of bitter party feeling. But it is equally true that the feelings of such men were never derived from their creeds. J. FRENCH.

THE NEW BIRTH.

BY REV. S. C. LOVELAND.

Except a man be born again, he can not see the kingdom of God.—JOHN iii: 3.

The expression, "to be born again," is undoubtedly a figure of speech, drawn from the circumstances of a natural birth, to which it seems to have an evident allusion. Figures of speech were very frequent with our Lord. In our text he speaks of the kingdom of God," used synonymously with the phrase, "the kingdom of heaven," which in other places he compares, at different times, to a variety of things.

The kingdom of heaven is spoken of in the New Testament as Christ's kingdom. In appearing in our world, as a king, though he assumed no outward throne, he brought his kingdom with him.—Hence it was said, The kingdom of heaven is at hand. It was brought by the coming of Christ, very near; brought to our world, that man might share something of its benefits and its glories in this life.

The qualities of this kingdom are righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. These qualities the members of this kingdom must possess; indeed, it is the province of the kingdom to impart them. The school of Jesus Christ is the school of moral perfection, where we may be ever learning, and yet find that there is still an ample field before us, to excite us to diligence and to persevering industry.

On the subject of the new birth, it is often thought, not a small acquisition to understand what it is.—Figurative language makes ideas obscure, when the attending circumstances that go to elucidate a subject are not understood. And a multitude of conflicting interpretations seldom pave the way to the path of truth.

In natural things to be born is to be a child. This remark is equally true, when applied to the things of the kingdom of Christ. The Scriptures often speak of the sons of God, the children of God, the children of the kingdom, and few people think of attaching obscurity to phrases like those. But when we speak of a new birth, they are puzzled to attach any definite or satisfactory idea to the expression. To be a son always implies that a person has been born in the same sense in which he is called a son. So it is equally plain that to be born again is to be a child again, in the same sense in which the birth should be understood. But the Greek word which is translated again in our text signifies more literally, from above. This last sense describes the nature of the birth, while the common translation makes it only second in order, with an evident allusion to the first. But either translation will not vary the nature of our subject. If we adopt the common rendering of our text, we find the nature of our subject described from the principles of Christ's kingdom. If we adopt the words, from above, in room of the word again, we find an additional explanation of our subject. We find the source is the same as James' description of heavenly wisdom. And my hearers are informed that the same original Greek word describes both.—"The wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy." Thus the wisdom that is from above, describes the principles of the birth that is from above.

In the sacred pages the words son and child are used in a great variety of applications. We read of the sons of thunder, by which we easily understand men of heavy voices; of the son of perdition, by which Judas, the betrayer of our Lord was meant, who went to destruction. A son of consolation was one who possessed a peculiar power of sympathy in participating of the sorrows of the afflicted. In the Old Testament, we read in a few instances, of the sons of Belial, who were men peculiar for their stubborn and morose dispositions. Christ says to his disciples "into whatsoever house ye enter, first say, Peace be this house. And if the son of peace be there, your peace shall rest upon it." Here the son of peace must mean peace or a peaceful household. In view of the uses of the term son, we may the more easily comprehend the expressions, a child of the devil, children of disobedience, children of wrath, a child of hell or Gehenna, if we substitute the original for the common translation. The idea of literal offspring in these cases, is entirely out of the question. These are said to be children, merely on account of certain properties described by wrath, devil and Gehenna, of which they are said to partake or suffer.

As the terms for cities in the original languages of the Bible are used in the feminine gender, daughters are used for smaller dependent cities, as Jerusalem and her daughters, Samaria and her daughters. Sodom and her daughters. There can be no question, that daughters here mean cities. So the sons of the prophets were not their literal children, but their disciples or scholars.

This peculiar mode of phraseology is carried much further in the Hebrew Scriptures of the Old Testament than we find preserved in the common translation. I shall not multiply examples of this kind. Two instances to this effect may suffice. When David took the spear and cruise of water from Saul's bolster, while he and his servants slept, at a time when Saul was pursuing David to take him prisoner, if not to take his life, David, standing at a distance, cried to the servants of Saul, "As the Lord liveth, ye are worthy to die, because ye have not kept your master the Lord's anointed." The expression, ye are worthy to die is in the Hebrew, ye are the sons of death. This is usually found in the margin of those Bibles, which have marginal readings. See 1 Sam. xxvi: 16. My second instance of this kind is found, Gen. xxi: 3, where it is said Abraham was an hundred years old. The original makes him, the son of a hundred years.—Now the language might seem somewhat uncouth to us to say, that a man was born of years, as Abraham was, or that death was a father, as David applied it to the servants of Saul. But all this is analogous to the language of Scripture, and very much resembles the words of our Saviour, when he says in our context, "Except a man be born of water and of the spirit, he can not enter into the kingdom of God." So again in 1 Pet. i: 23, "Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God which liveth and abideth forever."

It does not appear from any thing which the Scriptures present on this subject, that we should attach a mysterious sense to the language of our Saviour. A reasonable interpretation in the light of the experience of mankind, and of the common usages of the sacred pages, should be adopted in this as in the usual topics of divine revelation.—St. John tells us expressly that "Whosoever believes that Jesus is the Christ, is born of God."—In another place he tells us, "Every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God. He that loveth not knoweth not God; for God is love."—Here are two instances in which the apostle in different terms describes the condition of the new birth. They are worthy of our particular attention in this place.

Of the first named instance, "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ, is born of God."—A child of faith in Christ, becomes a child of God. Here it is plain to be seen that this faith in Christ must be something more than the mere speculative kind. It must embrace for its object, the true riches of the grace of God, as matters of personal interest. "For where a man's treasure is," as our Lord has said, "there will his heart be also."

Of the second passage which we quote from the apostle John, "Whosoever loveth is born of God," we have only to remember that this love is a divine principle; because it enables us to know God, whom he emphatically pronounces us to be love. We perceive then that this passage is in unison with the other. The language is somewhat different; but the sentiment is one.

We are further assisted in our subject by understanding that the new birth is an introduction to the kingdom of God. As we are taught the spirit and nature of this kingdom, so we come to an understanding of the qualifications, needful to prepare us for a suitable reception in the kingdom. Although this kingdom is not of this world, yet we may be confident we are not called to wait for its light and its glory, till after we pass the bounds of time. It has a light that shines into this dark world of ours. The children of men may see it and experience its effects through faith in our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, in this their pilgrimage journey of human life. The qualifications of the children of the kingdom, must be like the nature of the kingdom itself. A child of the kingdom then is no other than one who is found with the principles of the kingdom of the Redeemer, one who possessed those spiritual refinements from moral pollutions, which the love and mercy of God are calculated to inspire.—Balm of Gilead.

Physic is of little use to a temperate person, for a man's own observation on what he finds does him good, and what hurts him, is the best physic to preserve health.

He is happy whose circumstances suit his temper; but he is more excellent, who can suit his temper to any circumstances.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

EDITED BY

Reus. A. B. Grosh, G. W. Montgomery and A. C. Barry.

UTICA, FRIDAY, AUGUST 25. 1843.

REV. LEVI CHASE.

This gentleman is a convert from the Methodist ministry, and formerly resided at Fall River, Mass. His present residence is in Illinois, at Mt. Hawley, I believe. He is not in formal fellowship with the Universalist denomination, nor amenable to our discipline, unless, by his actions at the West, in accepting office at the hands of our Associations, he may have rendered himself so in part. Some years ago the New York Universalist Union noticed a handbill published by Mr. Chase, purporting to be questions by him; but which were by Br. A. C. Thomas. Br. Price severely censured the plagiarism. Since then we have been told by one or two individuals that we ought not to publish his name in the Register—but they gave us no reasons for our guidance; while others living nearer to the man handed in (or suffered to stand) his name as a preacher of Universalism, but not in fellowship. We therefore continued to publish his name. For our rule (adopted after long deliberation, and frequently reconsidered under trying circumstances) is to publish the name of every person who is acknowledged as a preacher of Universalism by the friends or societies in the section where he lives, only marking whether he is in fellowship or not; and to continue doing so while he preaches, until the proper authority, or persons, by public action, show that they do not any longer so regard him. If any one does aught unbecoming the profession, let it be duly certified to the proper quarter, and let the persons most concerned, or having authority, do their duty.

Such being the facts of the case, we give the following caution a place in our columns with great reluctance—1st. Because the writer specifies no act of which Mr. Chase has been guilty. He warned us privately in the same vague manner, and promised particulars, but we have not yet received them. He is equally vague here. Now we do not doubt Br. Lumsden's veracity; by no means!—but may not his judgment be at fault? He is not infallible. Besides, he may only have heard the things that induce him to give the caution; and "hear say" is no testimony.

2d. Even if he knows whereof he insinuates (for he affirms nothing), and even if his judgment in regard to those things is not erroneous, still this is not the proper way to settle the matter. It is not right to drag every case of discipline into our newspapers, and convert all our readers into one vast Committee of Discipline, before the accused party has been examined, heard, and justly and legally tried by our regularly constituted tribunals. This is my opinion—others may differ from me, and perhaps with more reason than I allow them. But in this case, Br. L. could have forwarded his charges and proofs to Mrs. Gurley or Manford, and directed them to lay them before the Association in whose bounds Br. Chase now resides and labors; and left them do the publishing, if deemed necessary.

As to the plagiarism, that was undoubtedly wrong; and yet it might have been committed ignorantly. In calling them questions "by Rev. Levi Chase," he may not have intended to claim authorship. I find a case in the last Primitive Expounder, where some very ancient verses on the miseries of rum are published as the original production of a venerable old minister. Another case is in the "Banner of Love and Washingtonian Repository," where the lines of Leggett beginning "If yon bright stars which gem the night," are published as original, and signed "Harrietta A. Smith;" when, possibly, Miss or Mrs. Smith only meant that she copied them for publication. True—such ignorance in preachers and ladies, at this day, is not very probable, but still it is possible. But enough—here is the caution—let it pass for what it is worth,—not of sufficient value to condemn a man before he is proved guilty of something worth condemnation; yet sufficient to keep us in mind that he is not yet in formal fellowship. Br. Chase, if he values his reputation will now demand charges and specifications, and have the whole affair thoroughly investigated by proper persons. A. B. G.

CAUTION!

I will avail myself of this method, for the purpose of warning our brethren in the West, especially, against receiving REV. LEVI CHASE, as a minister in good standing in the Universalist denomination; for this good and sufficient reason, that said Chase is not connected with the denomination in any way whatever. He belongs to no Church, Association, or Convention of the denomination. His certificates of having been in good standing in the M. E. C., are not sufficient evidence that he is worthy of our confidence. We require better proof than Partialist certificates, to show that a man is in good standing in the Christian church. Such things amount to but very little, in our estimation. Let us be cautious how we receive them. Will papers friendly to a pure Ministry copy the above? G. L. L.

A VALUABLE WORK—CHEAP.

The third (or July) number of the "Select Theological Library" published by Brs. Gihon, Fairchild and Co., of Philadelphia, contains an exposition of the 24th and 25th chapters of Matthew's Gospel, illustrated with note and quotations of the parallel passages in Mark and Luke's Gospels, by Rev. Hosea Ballou, 2d—and all this, a large pamphlet beautifully printed, stitched, and covered, containing 20 large octavo double column pages, is afforded at the low price of 6 1-4 cents per copy! It being a periodical, can be sent by mail at a moderate postage.

Br. Ballou's style is one of the most simple, clear, and easy, we have ever read. His careful and very extensive researches, enable him to give with precision the most valuable authorities on the subjects and phrases involved in the subject. And his perfect candor and honesty render him a safe guide to those who, by their limited knowledge are compelled to rely on the information of others. We know not a writer of any denomination in whose theological ability, and candor, and judgment combined, we could recommend greater confidence. And in saying so, we are but uttering the opinions of all we have ever heard speak of the man. It is therefore only necessary, in order fully to recommend this work, to say that the publishers have also done their duty. It would be a capital work to purchase by the quantity for gratuitous distribution—especially in Mil-larised communities. It can be had at this office—of Grosh & Walker, General Agents—at the Publishers' prices. Send in your cash—one, two, five, or ten dollars—and the amounts proper of pamphlets will be sent you in return, by mail or otherwise, as you may direct. A. B. G.

BR. C. E. BROWN.

Many of our readers will remember the name, and peculiarly afflicting circumstances, and unwavering fidelity, of this ministering brother, and probably will wonder whether, after the immense sufferings he has endured, he can yet be in the land of living. To all such—yea, to all Universalists in this State—we answer—Br. C. B. Brown yet lives in that highest life pertaining to the man proper; and he yet lives in the body; but that body is half dead, and the remainder is painfully and slowly dying, day by day—and is in want of aid in the shape of medicine, food, and clothing. And the family of this dear, patient, suffering brother—especially his wife—also need aid in the shape of sustenance and clothing. They are nearly worn out, and are sinking under their long endured watchings, and toils, and cares, endured in his behalf. Can we say more to ensure their relief? Gladly would we fill column after column to do it. But need we say more? Is it not enough for Universalists to know the facts, to secure their aid?—not alone in the shape of commiserating sighs, sympathising tears, and wordy prayers; but in those substantial tokens, money, medicine, food and clothing, which show stronger than any other signs, that the head is clear and the heart is right before God and man. To state the facts, then, we give the following letter from Br. A. B. Simons, of Fulton, Oswego county, a faithful and active friend of our afflicted Brother, and a well known Universalist. Its statements in regard to Br. Brown's condition are confirmed to us by a trusty friend of ours who has just returned from personally visiting brother Brown, and who can not sufficiently express his wonder at Br. Brown's sufferings and patience, and at the devotion of his wife to her husband's service. Our friends may rely upon it, that this letter contains only the truth, as far as it goes; but that no description with pen or even tongue, can tell the whole truth—can fully and accurately describe the pain endured by, and the resignation and piety of the sufferer, and the unwearied attention which is wearing the wife to the grave with her husband. Let then, something be done immediately, to procure them proper aid—means, if possible, to hire such help as may, for a time, give rest to the family, should also be provided. Here is the letter. Read it, and then act.

N. B.—Any donations may be sent directed to "A. B. Simons, Fulton, Oswego county, N. Y." He will see them faithfully delivered and properly applied.

A. B. G.

Fulton, August 14, 1843.

DEAR BR. GROSH—I address you in behalf of our much afflicted Br. C. B. Brown—wishing you to lay his case before the Universalist denomination generally, in such form as you think best, from the information I here give you. I have visited him four or five times in the space of two months, and have found him in need each time. Yesterday I proposed to him to have some one draw up a statement of his case, and have it published in the Magazine and Advocate. He consented, and wished me to do it.

For the information of friends at a distance, I would say that Br. Brown's first consort lay some years confined to her bed, which kept him poor. I think in December, 1839, he was attacked, with the inflammatory rheumatism, in February or March, 1840, he got able to attend a Conference eight miles from home; and on his return, he had a more severe attack, which has confined him to his room to the present time, and for the last two years to his bed, with the exception of about twenty days the latter part of the past winter, when he was able to sit in a chair, from 5 to 45 minutes once a day. The posture in which he rests is lying; nearly flat on his shoulders, reclining on his right hip, with his knees braced apart, and bent, so that the sole of the left foot rests square on the bed. From the hips downwards he has no use of his limbs—not to move even a toe. When turned on his left side he endures the most excruciating pain, and is not able to lie in that position but a few moments at a time. He has a sore located on the lower part of his back, nearly between the hips, which is from two to three inches in diameter, and which discharges at times large quantities of fresh blood.—There is no time that he is free from pain; and sometimes it is so severe that his groans have been heard forty rods, and the paroxysm continues from one to three hours! These severe turns or spasms, for the last two months have not been so frequent, nor held so long, as before, for a common thing.

Sister B. is in a decline of health, and has needed assistance to take care of her. The family consists of Br. and sister B., a daughter, and his son, (a lad of 16 years of age,) who is employed in attending to the family concerns and waiting upon his father.—Br. Brown has received the most of his support from the friends of humanity since his last attack, and a large proportion of that within the circle where he labored while able to preach. He has had no expense spared to get relief; but as yet in a measure failed in all attempts. He is now trying Bristol's syrup of Sarsaparilla, which his physician recommends. He has to take from 8 to 12 pills of opium as large as a pea, per day, to quiet his nerves and allay his pains.

I have been thus particular in describing his situation, to give the friends of humanity some faint idea of what a fellow mortal can undergo; but no tongue can express, nor mind conceive it fully; for it is past description how much he has endured. The object of this is, that wherever there is a friend to the suffering needy, they may have an opportunity to contribute to his necessities. The burthen has been on a small share, in comparison to what it would have been had others had the same chance to bestow their charities; and the aspect of things now require them, for Br. Brown is as likely to need them for three years to come, as for the past; and will need all the necessities of life that a family of four persons would want. If there could be some more systematic course pursued among the friends that have heretofore contributed to his relief, he would be more regularly supplied. Nothing is asked by him unless necessity compels, and then it is with reluctance. But let persons visit him, and they will not wait to be solicited to lend aid, but their sympathies will be excited and drawn out by affection and admiration of the sufferer, and they reap their reward in doing their duty. If it is asked what is needed, I answer nothing would come amiss that can be used in a family. His medicine that he now takes costs money, (that is, Sarsaparilla and opium,) of which he is now in great need. Friends who can forward either money, cotton cloth, clothing, etc., will confer a favor indeed. If our assembled bodies, such as associations, conferences, etc., would remind our friends of his wants, I think we should not have to appeal to them again, only that he still lives, and that on charity.

I must close, for I do not know where to stop. I leave it with you to put the above in such form as you think best. I regret that some one more able had not undertaken the task, and saved you the trouble. Yours in the bonds of peace,
A. B. SIMMONS.

ATTENTION!

By the following it will appear that the annual meeting of the Chenango Association is postponed one day. We have made a corresponding alteration in the notice, which with this will, we suppose be sufficient, if the following is copied by Br. Price. A. B. G.

P. S.—Neither self nor Br. Soule can be present—other business and engagements preventing.

BR. GROSH—In consequence of having yesterday ascertained that there is to be regimental training in this village, on the first day to which our Association stands adjourned to meet, "by and with the advice and consent" of all the friends I have been able to consult, I have assumed the responsibility of deferring the meeting a day. Hence it will be held on the first THURSDAY and following FRIDAY (7th and 8th) of September. Of course, the Council will convene Thursday instead of Wednesday morning. It is expected that a UNIVERSALIST CHURCH will be formed and recognized during the session. Please give all necessary notice of this fact, and of the above alteration, in the next two numbers of your paper, and much oblige me and all who are interested.

Yours with much respect, J. T. GOODRICH.
P. S. Request the Union and Messenger to insert whatever you publish pertaining to the alteration, etc. J. T. G.

BLACK RIVER ASSOCIATION.

Having given the desired corrections of Br. Morse, in full, of the Minutes of this Association, and of his remarks on them—and having stated the reasons and causes of the omissions and errors thus corrected—it might be supposed enough had been said. But Br. Morse wishes to express his dissatisfaction of the reasons given, and we have no objection to his doing so, in the following note, which we have received from him. We will only add, to his note, that all Editors are not, perhaps, as accomplished and successful in their efforts to do exactly right and to avoid all difficulties, as Br. Morse was. We did as we would be done by. But hereafter we will deal with Br. Morse's articles as he requests us to do in the following—though we really doubt whether we shall, in so doing, please him as well as he always pleased his correspondents while he was an Editor.—Thank God, we shall soon cease to fill the station—and the worst wish we could have (we have it not) for Br. M., would be, that he might again try his skill at the business! A. B. G.

Br. Grosh.—The reason you assign in the Magazine and Advocate of July 28th, for omitting an expression I prepared for publication is not satisfactory. 1. I prefer to have an Editor reject my articles, rather than alter them. 2. When I was an Editor, I thought the rule of "doing as I would be done by," required me to publish what came from a responsible source, with the writers name,* as he prepared it, if I published it at all, instead of altering it to suit my notions. 3. I did not write that the vote was unanimous, but that it was without a dissenting voice; and if any readers misconstrue the sense, the fault is not mine. 4. When I wish editorial aid "to avoid controversy" or conduct it, I will ask it. 5. "Give an impression contrary to fact!" and yet it was undeniably true. [Literally true—not true according to impression. A. B. G.] 6. Immediately after the vote, it was said in council, that it was remarkable the vote should be unanimous (as it was supposed to be, though it was not,) and then no voice was lifted against it. 7. Seldom if ever was there more unanimity on a question of that nature in any council.

Respectfully yours, P. MORSE.
Henderson, August 16, 1843.

* The omission was in an article bearing, not Br. Morse's name, but the name of another, which other would have been held responsible by many for Br. Morse's addition to the minutes—hence my omission of that addition. A. B. G.

ANOTHER NEW PAPER.

We have now 25 Universalist periodicals—27 if we include the two annuals; and 30 if we include the Expositor which is always about to be published, the Philomath Encyclopedia and Alihn Bordman's paper which may yet be in existence for aught I know. Of these but one is a source of any considerable profit to its proprietor—the rest, if their Editors, and correspondents and printers, were paid a fair compensation for their labors, would not leave a surplus, and the great majority would leave (as many now do leave) their proprietors in debt every year! Four-fifths of these papers call weekly, monthly, quarterly, and some of them constantly, for more aid, and piteously relate their sufferings for the want of more support. Once in a while one gives up the ghost, and proprietor, editor, printers, paper and ink manufacturers, and good natured friends, mourn the loss of their dollars gone with it. But still, rapidly as one sinks, another starts into being, flushed with hopes of success that are destined, in nine cases out of ten, to perish. And yet, indignation is scowled on any person who shall breathe a word of caution, or utter a deprecating sentiment on the subject of starting new papers. We talk of the folly and madness of speculations in water and corner lots in 1836, yet have no eyes to behold the equally groundless speculation in publishing Universalist newspapers, though bubble after bubble is bursting around us.

"The Evangelist," a demy folio, published weekly, at one dollar per annum in advance, has been commenced in Salem, Mass. Brs. L. S. Everett, J. M. Austin, and S. C. Bulkeley, Editors. It is started because as Br. E. says, they want an organ through which to communicate with the public. There are now 13 papers published in the New England States, and 8 in Massachusetts alone, very few of which are crowded with communications—but probably Brs. Everett, Austin and Bulkeley's ideas are so large as to require one paper for their sole use, in addition to the room furnished them in the other papers!

PER CONTRA.—The Genius of Truth, published in Zanesville, Ohio, by Br. G. T. Flanders, after a trial of eight months, has died for want of support. It has not paid the cost of publishing, leaving the Editor minus his care, labor and time, and what it will yet cost him to furnish his subscribers with the Star in the West for the remainder of the year. Br. Flanders is able to "foot this bill," and so no one will feel the loss but himself. But if he had not been able, there would have been no little injury to others, and to the cause in that section, in consequence. Yet it is no one's business what new papers may be started! A. B. G.

JUST RECEIVED.—The third number of the Select Theological Library, entitled "Twenty fourth and twenty fifth chapters of St. Matthew's Gospel, illustrated with notes, etc., by Hosea Ballou, 2d. Price 6 1-4 cents.

ANOTHER CHANCE.

We have come to the conclusion (for which we shall give some good and sufficient reasons some of these days) to place the Magazine and Advocate, on the advance pay system, at the commencement of next volume. Now then, will be a good opportunity for those who have not paid for the current volume and who feel disposed to assist in sustaining our paper, to save the fifty cents due us after the first of May, last, by sending three dollars free of postage, and be credited in full for this year (1843) and next, (1844).

☞ We have just received a lot of new and handsome JOB TYPE, and should be happy to receive calls from our friends and others, who may want printing done either in the way of Books, Pamphlets, Hand Bills, or Cards, and we will endeavor to do it for them in as neat, cheap and expeditious a manner as possible.

Br. Hammond—I thank you for your trouble in regard to that proof sheet.—It is late to send another.

THE MISSIONARY AT HOME.

BY MISS C. W. BARBER.

"Domestic love! to thy white hand is giv'n
Of happiness, the golden key."

Kind reader, will you go with me for a little while into the snug parlor of Aunt Eunice Fletcher? Do not expect to find sofas and side-boards—ottomans and secretaries, for I can tell you before hand there are none there, but the cheerful aspect of every thing around, and above all, the sweet, good natured face of Aunt Eunice, (as she is every where called) while rocking to and fro in her high backed old fashioned chair, seems to say that Happiness sometimes deigns to dwell, where Fashion does not.

See! never was nice home-made carpet swept cleaner—never did an old fashioned clock tick in a more highly varnished case, and never did a greater profusion of sun-dial and Bachelor-buttons flourish beneath anybody's windows. While gazing at these outward signs of comfort, are you not almost tempted to exclaim with the poet quoted above,—

"Domestic love! to thy white hand is given
Of happiness, the golden key!"

It does foreshadow look like a little Eden, shut out from the commotions of a wicked world, and was Aunt Eunice sole proprietor of the establishment, perhaps it would in some degree merit the name, but there is another genius connected with the household—one of those restless, active, thinking and petulant spirits, who, if they do not render the path of life thorny, make it often times rough and uneven. This was none other than Uncle Ichabod master of the domicile and consort of Aunt Eunice.

Picture to yourself a short thick man, with a cluster of light hair lying off from his high prominent forehead, with every motion betokening him to be of the nervous and sanguine temperament, one of those who can not bear contradiction, and will not brook insult, one who is easily irritated at trifles, and yet carries in his bosom as warm a heart as ever throbbed and you will have a correct idea of Uncle Ichabod.

To have seen him and listened to him while in a pet, one would have thought him destitute of every kind feeling, but let the voice of distress be heard in his own family, or that of his neighbor and there was none more ready to turn out, wait, watch and minister unto. He was moreover a thorough going business man. There was not a farm for miles around which could bear a comparison with his. In short he was forever planning, fretting, working, and calculating, and the result of all this was that the Fletcher farm as it was every where called, always produced the best of every thing, and every thing was always in the best repair. His fences stood erect while those of his neighbors were blowing down, and where could such heavy hogs—such high-spirited horses, and even such nice hens and chickens be found.

Aunt Eunice was in most things her husband's opposite—and it was always a great mystery among the neighbors how such antipodes in character ever came bound together in the holy bonds of matrimony. It was happy for the family that aunt Eunice was possessed of a happy heart—one which always made the best of every thing, for had it been otherwise, things must often have gone on badly at the Fletcher farm. She married her husband in early youth, knowing his peculiarities of temper, and she journeyed on from day to day, mindful of his comforts and heedless of his faults. She seemed to be determined in her own mind to be deaf and blind to his imperfections.

Three lovely children had risen like beautiful flowers in their path and the clear silvery laugh of little Edwin, their youngest, was always so full of glee and happiness that it had sometimes been known to soothe, even the moody spirit of his father. His curly hair was ever on the toss, and his clear blue eye was always liquid with delight, and there was not a knoll or stream—a bird's nest or a tree, but was as familiar to him as his mother's face. He knew where the "checkerberries" grew the thickest, where the strawberries ripened first, and he could hop the farthest—stand the longest on one foot, and say, "Peter Piper picked a peck of pickled peppers" faster than any boy in the neighborhood.

Felicia, their only daughter, was a tall romantic girl—fond of books, and there was not a day in which aunt Eunice was not told that she had "entirely spoiled Leccia."—"she never was good for any thing and never would be—just like her mother—not one bit of snap about her—always pouring over some old paper—for his part he wished her plaguy old books were at the bottom of Connecticut river." But when the Tuesday mail came in with the newspapers, Felicia was always called upon to read its contents to the family in the evening, and uncle Ichabod was always sure to find some piece, which he thought Farmer White, or Deacon Cobb, or Esquire

Hutchin ought to hear, and said neighbor was accordingly called in. On these evenings uncle Ichabod always occupied the high backed rocking chair, and any one could see while he was listening to the clear voice of his daughter, as she went through with page after page, and item after item, of newspaper matter, that he was as proud of her as father could be notwithstanding her "book learning." But at the end of every piece, she was sure to be told that "that piece warn't any great affair after all, and she needn't spend her breath reading any more such."

Harvey Fletcher was their eldest child, and uncle Ichabod's idol. But he never showed his idolatry by caresses of any kind. He seldom spoke to his son, save with harsh words. He however said that Harvey should have a good "education," and many a dollar did he expend for him at the high school. At the end of every term he questioned him very particularly about his "ciphering," for in uncle Ichabod's mind, ciphering was the soul and body of an education. He had no objection to the master's "learning Harvey other fol de rols if he thought best," he said, "but he must be a cipherer and that's all about it."

Now it happened, that Harvey, unlike his father, had a mind so constituted that it learned numbers slowly, and he abhorred mathematics "above ground," to use his own phrase. Place a Geography before him, let him read of the wonderful luxuriance of the torrid zone, how the fire-flies sparkled among the dark green vines, and the wild wonders of creative power roamed untamed about, or carry him away with the Greenlander while he trimmed his lamp with oil, and watched for the sun through the long, long night, and his eye would brighten, and his cheek glow with enthusiasm. But tell him of quotients and angles and he was dull and uninterested—he saw no beauty in the science. In vain Mr. Strickland reasoned with him, and told him of the necessity of mathematical knowledge to a business man—in vain he repeated to him the injunction of his father; even that had no effect upon him. He would sit for hours, dreaming over the pages of his Astronomy, picturing to himself bright worlds, and peopleing them with the fairy being of his fancy, until the remembrance of the black-board recitation would flit, like a dark shadow over his mind and rouse him up, to unwilling exertion. But his lesson in Arithmetic was always imperfect, and Mr. Strickland, knowing the fiery temper of uncle Ichabod, and fearing that his ire might be aroused in case Harvey remained longer with him without greater proficiency, resolved on sending him a note declaring the whole state of the affair. Accordingly when the four o'clock bell rung for dismissal one afternoon, Mr. Strickland called Harvey, and delivered to him a note to be given to his father. Harvey was ignorant of its contents, but he instantly surmised it must be about himself, but he was a straight-forward, truly-loving boy; so he folded it in a smaller compass, and safely deposited it in his vest pocket. He resolved upon giving it to his mother, for she usually did all the talking with uncle Ichabod—the children shrunk from the eye which always rebuked.

When Harvey arrived at home, aunt Eunice was just finishing her week's ironing. He marched up to the table and delivered the note into her hands.

"Why, who is this from, child?" said she. "From the master," said Harvey. "What is it about?" "I don't know; he gave it to me to give to father."

"I hope you have not been guilty of any 'saucy' tricks at school," said she, eyeing him sharply with her dark grey eye.

"None that I am conscious of," said Harvey with an air of perfect unconcern.

"I wonder what it can be about!" continued aunt Eunice, holding it up, so that the light from the window gleamed through it. "I will see."

She broke the seal and read the contents. A shade passed over her usually calm features, and sitting down in a chair which stood close by, she mused over it in silence. Felicia left her sewing by the window, and leaned over her mother's arm, to see, but aunt Eunice folded it very quietly, and put it into her pocket. Preparations for supper were made in the usually quiet manner.

When uncle Ichabod came in to the supper table that night he was in a high passion. Esq. Hutchin's sheep had trespassed upon his land, and he declared in no very gentle terms, that he would kill every neighbor's geese, hens, sheep, or turkeys, which should henceforth shew their heads any where on his premises. Aunt Eunice did not venture to remark on the subject, but turned the conversation as soon as possible.

That night, uncle Ichabod listened to Felicia's reading with more interest than usual, and after she had read the paper through twice to the advertisements, and the marriages and deaths twice over, he went to bed and covering his head with the quilt was soon snoring audibly.

"Mother, you haven't told father about that note, have you," said Felicia, as she took the candle to retire.

"No; nor shall I to-night, child,—good night."

After every sound was hushed, aunt Eunice took the light and went towards Harvey's bed-room. She opened the door and entered.

"I am not asleep, mother," said Harvey. "I can not sleep. What time is it?" "It is late," said his mother, "but I have come to have a short talk with you, and am glad to find you awake. Harvey, do you wish to see that note?"

"Oh! yes, mother," said he, as he reached forth his hand eagerly for it. "It is a sad report, and would exasperate your father, how much you know as well as I."

"Mother, I can not study Arithmetic! I do not like it," and the poor boy covered his face with his hands.

"So I am to infer from that, am I, that you never intend to do any thing which you do not like to? That is a bad rule my son, one which never will win you one warm friend, and one which you will find it impossible always to follow. This is a world of sorrow and perplexity, and I know of but one way of being happy in it, and that is always to do what is exactly right, and to consult your own pleasure less than that of those around you. I presume you will find many obstacles in your way, but which will most betoken a brave spirit, to overcome them manfully, or to yield tamely without trying to conquer? I shall say nothing about the note. You will go to school to-morrow as usual, and I trust we shall hear nothing more of your nonproficiency." So saying she wished him "good night."

That was a long and weary night to the young spirit of Harvey Fletcher. He tossed and turned to the evident discomfort of little Edwin, who lay beside him, and at last, finding it impossible to sleep, he arose, and lighting a candle, reached up and drew down his slate and Arithmetic from his satchel. He sat down by the head of his bed and leaning his head upon his arm, reviewed page after page in his preceding lessons. The grey light of the morning found him thus engaged. A strong spirit was roused within him. The calm, sweet voice of his mother had acted like magic, and he determined to overcome every difficulty if by so doing he could contribute to her happiness.

The next day his recitation in Arithmetic was for the first time in his life pronounced good,—and uncle Ichabod's eyes sparkled brighter than they were wont, not long after, when he heard his son spoken of as one of "the best cipherers in school."

I have related the above incident, only to show in what a manner the quiet spirit of aunt Eunice always operates in stilling family disturbances, and making her home what it seems to the passer-by, a quiet and happy spot. Is she not a Missionary,—yes! a self-denying and devoted Missionary, on the very ground God has given woman to cheer and bless—the field of Home? Would there were more such!

Kind reader, have you a Missionary spirit? Do you long to see this wicked world going back to Eden innocence? If so, begin at home. Root out every weed of discord and selfishness—adorn, deck and beautify it. Humble and lonely though it may be, until,

"From its white walls, the very tendrils wreathing, Seem with soft links to draw the wanderer back;
and I say unto you "verily you shall have your reward."

ORIGINAL SERMON

Preached to the society at Collinsville, and repeated to the society at Leyden, on accepting their invitation to settle with them.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

"And let us consider one another, to provoke unto love and to good works." Heb. x: 24.

The great object of the institution of the Christian ministry, was for the instruction, reformation and comfort of the children of men. Or, to say the least, this was one great object of this institution. It is needless, and it is not my intention, to dwell upon the importance and necessity of the introduction of the Christian ministry. Neither is it needful that I dwell upon the importance of the perpetuation of that ministry. As it ever has been, since it was instituted, it will ever be, so long as mankind are subject to mortality and liable to err, a needful institution to instruct and encourage the weak, to unclinch the shackles of error and to console the afflicted. No labored argument is necessary to convince the Christian believer of these facts.—Were arguments necessary, they might be multiplied almost without number. You might be pointed to the hallowed influence of the ministrations of pure and undefiled religion upon the face of society—its deep workings when it enters the domestic circle, where the strength of the social compact, the mildness and serenity it gives to every inmate, attest its benignity. You might be pointed to its hallowed influence exerted in preparing the Christian to live well and die well, giving him to "know that if this house of our tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

Look at the calm, quiet and resigned Christian, whose soul is filled with this assurance. He has made the fast approaching dissolution of his frail tenement the subject of quiet and thoughtful contemplation. He has learned to realize that this is not "man's abiding place." But with this fact, he has also learned to realize that he is seeking "a city which is to come, whose maker and builder is God." Here is to be his eternal home. He associates therewith, the presence of God, with all its fulness of joy, and the pleasures that flow from his right hand forever more. He associates heaven with it, with all the purified sons and daughters of Adam—immortality with its endless continuance, and all its beauty, vigor and strength eternalized, and put on them as a garment—endless life with all its bliss and ceaseless round of pleasures, as their rich inheritance.

But I almost forget that I am adding arguments upon a point which I said needed no labored argument. For every Christian is ready to admit the importance, and the necessity of the perpetuation of the Christian ministry; and is ready to admit the great work it has executed and is still executing. These things, I say, are admitted by every Christian, though, by some, they are held in theory rather than reduced to practice. It is more particularly to the negligent, indifferent and theoretical Christian, that the following remarks are intended. And perhaps I might add with safety, that it is little to be feared that any of us are now, or will be too much engaged in the cause which we have espoused. Let us, one and all carefully look to this thing, and act with a full purpose of heart.

Brethren, as I have accepted your invitation to settle with you and dispense to you the "word of life," a fit opportunity offers itself for appealing to your hearts for energetic action in the cause of our divine Redeemer—for a deeper engagedness in the great truth of a world's salvation. We are all aware that we have abundant reason to thank God for the civil and religious privileges we enjoy—for the blessed hope we have, through the death and resurrection of the Saviour to immortality. We can not but be aware, that no small share of our earthly enjoyment depends upon our building ourselves up in our joy-inspiring faith, upon our keeping our hearts warmed with the genial rays of Christian truth, and upon having our souls filled with the pure waters of life.

With the view of guiding us into some profitable reflections at this time, I have selected this text—"Let us consider one another, to provoke unto love and to good works." The text suggests what I wish to enforce. Let us clothe our hearts with our most holy faith, which works by love and purifies the inner man. Let a deep and all-absorbing energy possess our minds. Let us walk in confidence, trusting in that God whose arm is mighty, and outstretched to save. There is nothing like an earnestness and deep-rooted confidence in the faith we profess, to build us up together, to warm our hearts and make us glad in our earthly pilgrimage. Do we realize this? Do we bestow upon this fact a serious thought? Do our acts testify that reference is had to it? What is our faith and its teachings, for which this earnest appeal for their cultivation in our hearts, is made? It can be briefly summed up. They require no long, fine-spun articles of some creed-making man.—They are clearly enough developed in the Bible without any foreign aid. Our faith teaches that there is "one God and Father of all," who is above all, and through all and in you all." Eph. iv: 6. It teaches that the Saviour was "sent into the world, not to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved," he, having given "himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time." John iii: 17; 1 Tim. ii: 6. In reference to the future condition of the human family, it teaches that when raised from the dead, "they can die no more; for they are equal unto the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." "And when all things shall be subdued unto him (Christ) then shall the Son be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all." Luke xx: 36; 1 Cor. xv: 28. More in confirmation of the above need not be added.

How fitted this faith to make the feeling heart rejoice! How fitted to prepare us for the great change that awaits us! How admirably adapted to calm our fears, to soothe us amidst the great One Sorrow of our existence, and to make us wait patiently till our change come? There is nothing in it to affright the child or terrify the adult. All are bright associations that cluster around it. All is beauty and grandeur in that upper and better world to which we are all tending. No sin, or sorrow, or death shall be there. No pains, or groans, or sighs shall be there. No mourning child shall sit down in grief that a father or mother has been separated from him or her, never to meet again. No wandering prodigal shall return to the "celestial city of the living God" and stand before its pearly gates, lifting up a ceaseless wail at the thought, or rather the painful reality that God, the Father of all mercies, has no mercy for him. But all is joy and gladness in that abode. All is harmony. For it is written in burning capitals upon every gate, to be read by every joyous and white-robed spirit of that celestial throng—THE LOST IS FOUND. Oh how this truth will send a thrill of gladness through the hearts of the heavenly host, which shall vibrate eternally from the centre to the circumference. Realize it for a moment. The lost found! Fit theme to awake rejoicing. The father greets the smile that will never grow dim in sadness. The mother takes the hand that will never become cold in death. The child meets the long separated parents, and they embrace each other with a warmth that shall never cool. The happy spirit shall exclaim, "I am here with my God, my Saviour; yes we are all here, our kindred, our friends, our neighbors and our enemies converted into friends; all here, 'a happy family in heaven!'" Is this all fancy? Is there nothing of reality in it? Has this faith no power to "allure to brighter worlds and lead the way?" Does it fail to touch the heart—to soften our feelings—to fill us with resignation to the will of Heaven—and to console us amidst afflictions, by applying the prophetic declaration, "The days of thy mourning shall be ended?" I know your answer if you felt its influence. You can testify as an apostle of old, that "it is the power of God unto salvation." Rom. i: 16. You can look back and see its constant operations in making mankind better and happier—in spreading a holy charm over the prospect of futurity—foreshadowing the period when the purposes of God shall be accomplished, transgression ended, everlasting righteousness brought in, tears cease to flow, man be reconciled to God, and the Father glorified, praised, adored, by a universe of intelligent creatures, all participating in the joys of immortal fruition, and basking in the sunshine of an endless and unclouded felicity. This is no fiction. This is no powerless faith. It is filled with the outpouring of God's holy spirit. It is mighty to support all that will lean upon it.—And its power shall never fail. When the less attracting schemes of the religious world shall have been subjected to the reason of humanity and revelation, and their influence forever departed—when the sound of all partial systems shall have died away upon the lips of the future, and their very names left to slumber in forgetfulness—when the voices of false religion shall have ceased to echo around the graves of the old and the cradles of the rising generations, then will the sublime faith of a world's salvation through a crucified and risen Saviour, rise to cheer and gladden the heart with its peaceful sway—then will the local be lost in the general, the partial in the universal, and truth spread her wings to the encircling of all in peace, and happiness, and joy.

Brethren, allow me, as I wish now to come a step nearer to "your business and your bosoms," while I open the inquiry, What is our duty?—What is demanded of us? The answer is plain and obvious. If we would benefit ourselves and those around us, we must be awake, be up and doing; for it is not the forgetful hearer, but the doer of the word whose works are accepted and blessed of God. In short, individual activity, is demanded of us. Though every thing around us seems converging and tending towards the establishment of those principles for which we contend—though a spirit of inquiry is abroad, and old opinions laid deep in the reverential love of the people, cemented together with the blood of martyrs, are being examined and thrown away—yet, this is no time to be idle, no time to slumber. We should be among the first to catch the spirit of the awakening influence, and go forth in renewed strength to the work in the vineyard of our Master. If others are verging towards us, dropping one error after another—and if others are joining us in those truths we have embraced, and helping to spread them abroad, it can not effect us very materially. What I mean is this, if others are warming their hearts in the genial beams of Christianity, it will not warm ours. We must submit ourselves to the same task—we must sit where they have been, and receive all from the same great fountain. The heart, like yonder moon in the sky, is an opake body, and may reflect some of the rays of Christian truth, and like that moon with respect to the sunshine, absorbs itself the heat, and reflects none. And if we have no more of Christianity than is reflected from the hearts of others, we may have a feeble light, but it will be destitute of warmth.—There may be some, even, among us, (for we claim little superiority over other sects in this respect,) whose chief enjoyment in the truth embraced, consists in the fact that many are embracing it. So certain it is, that their chief rejoicing consists in this fact, that they are quite indifferent about the truth, unless the multitude go there. If so, they have some little earnestness about them. But all the religion they have, is a little light, perhaps, without any heat. But this is not all that we would have. This is not the kind of piety we would desire, neither is it a kind that would prove very beneficial. We would have a religion that would make us individually religious, though the multitude should be profane. We would have a piety that would burn in our hearts, and warm our feelings, though it should burn solitary and alone. Then it will be fruitful, and repay us with a golden harvest.

Let me insist, then, that you be vigilant, lest the mists and shadows of indifference and moral apathy fall upon you. Let me caution you lest your harps be found hanging upon the willows, and all your spiritual energies congealed, as if they had been exposed to the chilling blasts of a December night. Let me insist upon individual action in this matter. For even in religious, as in political affairs, it is the individual that moves the mass. Now that you have a stated ministry, on each returning Sabbath let every one of you resolve to be at the house of public worship. No trifling circumstance, no affair of a moment, that would not, in the least, derange the ordinary business of life, should deter you from being there.—The watch-word of each should be, whatever others may think, or say, or do, I am resolved to be there. I will contribute the unit of my individual mind, the springs of my individual influence to further the cause I have embraced, to diffuse life and animation all around, lest we be found as a valley of dry bones, from which lifeless state, no breath of animation can awaken us. I will not be inactive while every thing around me is teeming with life and energy. While the planets as they roll, and nature through all her walks, are praising God, my tongue shall not be mute, my heart shall not be tuneless. Let this be your purpose, and what earnestness will be given to your devotion, what testimony will be given to the world that you are full of confidence in your faith, what newly awakened feelings will go out from our hearts, and create us anew in the likeness of the Redeemer. This is what we wish to see—this is what we wish to feel. For this let us strive—and we know,

"All hands engaged, the royal work grows warm!"

This call for individual action is not made for a benevolent purpose alone. It is not to benefit those around you altogether. It is not self-sacrificing in its nature. When a world-wide philanthropy goes out of our bosoms—our faith becomes a living thing—our piety becomes active, then it shall be ours to look abroad, and all around, and down deep into our hearts, and "see, like the husbandman, who sees his garden and fields covered with the beautiful creations of his own industry, and sees, like God, that all his works are 'good.'" You will feel that your alliance to the teachings of your faith is an honor to you—that your constant reliance on it, is your first and sweetest happiness—and that your friendship for it, is a source of never failing comfort to you.

If this be the case, your faith with a plastic hand will fashion the very body of your character, and "breathe into it by divine inspiration, whatever of life, beauty and loveliness it may present to the eye of the world." And a just conception of your duty to yourself and your Maker—a firm resolve to be faithful to the truth committed to your care—and a continual pressing forward in the path of well-doing, will build us up in our most holy faith. We shall behold the people coming from the North and the South—the East and the West, and sitting down with us to the inviting feast of the Gospel.—There we can mutually drink at the same great fountain without fear of its exhaustion. There we can feast upon the same great bounty of our heavenly Father. There is enough and to spare in that great storehouse, as in the mansion of the prodigal's father. We shall be quickened to a lively hope, have our hearts set on divine things, and our minds filled with the fulness of the Gospel of peace.

But without this conception of our duty, and a firm resolve to discharge it—without a deep seated piety in our bosoms, which will be active, our professions will be vain and hypocritical—our places of public worship and our altars will be nothing but enduring monuments, bearing in living characters, the common but significant inscription, "Your faith, like your works, is dead." This would not tell very well for our zeal. It would seem little like holding fast the profession of our faith. We could none of us desire such a state of things. We should deeply lament it, were it to fall upon us. And I trust you will consider these things, and act in reference to these great truths whereof we have been made glad. We have experienced how great the tide of opposition is, which, in many places, is set in against us. We have seen the measures that have been, and are still taken to prejudice the public mind against those truths which to us are unspeakably precious. We are aware of the opinions entertained of us, by those who claim the honor of orthodoxy. And let us see that "our good"—our faith, by our loose and improper conduct, is not "evil spoken of."

Hitherto, brethren, you will perceive that my remarks have been general rather than particular. I have spoken of our duty in somewhat of a summary manner. Though I deem it non-essential to particularize to any great extent, yet it may not be out of place to mention a few individual particulars in our duty. It is but reasonable to suppose, in justice to your good sense, your moral integrity, and your soul-enshrined religion, that, while we remain in our present relation, you would not have me disseminate and encourage immoral principles, you would not have me sow the seeds of vice, and foster the sprouting germ—you would not have me inculcate a reckless daring in the path of degradation—neither would you have me declare myself in favor of looseness in your conduct, laxity in your morals, or lassitude in your social and religious principles. As you would not have me do the whole, or any one of these things, so you will expect that I will use my power and influence to discourage them. You will expect me to speak plainly and decidedly should occasion call for it. It is but justice to you as a Christian community, enjoying Christian privileges, and believing the Christian principles, to suppose that you would not expect me to disseminate erroneous ideas, to sow the seeds of discord, to foster vulgar and vicious habits, and to encourage a spirit of criminal indulgence. Otherwise, all your professions would be falsified—all your partiality for your faith would be hypocrisy—and all your religion mere mockery. And not only this, but such a state of things would be attended with loss of character, loss of reputation, and an accumulating weight of misery. And after all, you would present to the eye of the world the mournful spectacle, that the Christian religion had failed to touch your hearts, warm your feelings, animate your souls, verifying the poet's sentiment,

"It fell a sunbeam on a blasted blossom."

I have before spoken more plainly upon the duty incumbent upon you, to be regularly at the house of public worship, and to let no trifling consideration prevent it—a consideration which would not disturb the ordinary affairs of the week. I need but barely mention it again. Indeed, I should not be justified in reverting to it now, were it not the fact that more remissness is betrayed upon this point, perhaps, than upon any other. Not to say that I speak of you now, from any personal knowledge. I do not know but with you it is, as I could wish it to be, and hope it will be while you live, namely, that you can not recognize the sin of remissness in review of your lives. Neither would I say that Universalists are much more remiss upon this point than other denominations. I believe, as a whole, they are not. Perhaps it would not be saying too much, were I to say, that there is undoubtedly a little too much remissness among all sects. On this point it is not saying much for us, even, if we do as well as our self-called orthodox neighbors. If they are in the fault here, we should profit by their error, and not feel contented in doing as they do, even, though it be conceded that they do well. The creed "do well" will answer in some instances, as that mentioned by St. Paul in reference to matrimony; but matrimony, and the duty of attending public worship—of cultivating religious principles in our hearts—are two things, and very different in their character. Then the creed "do better" is the one to which we should subscribe—this should be our motto, and we should look to it, and carry it out. I need not point out the many ways in which people strive to find an excuse for neglecting the sanctuary of the most High. For there, you may review your own lives, and if you fail to find them there, then ask your Christian brother the next time his seat is vacant in the house of worship, what excuse he has to offer, and he will tax his ingenuity for one. And in all probability, should you follow up this course with every member of the society, or every acknowledged believer in Universalism in the vicinity, before one year rolled away, you would be furnished with a catalogue of excuses which would amuse a fireside circle; and should it be read to the congregation, the blush of shame, perhaps, would be visible on the cheeks of more than one. Brethren, these things ought not to be!

Next to this, I would name the duty of integrity to your faith. I would see among you, a consciousness that you are walking in the light of truth. I would see among you an open manifestation that you esteem yourselves in the right. I would see you walking erect, manly, firmly, as if you felt that your course was approved by your conscience and your God. It may be that I should explain what is here meant, and how the application should be made. It is sometimes the case that we meet with a very timid Universalist. He may be strong in the faith. He may have a great partiality for it. It may give him an inward sense of joy when he contemplates its results. But he may be alarmed lest his self-styled orthodox neighbor should not approve his course, should he be more open. Something, he fears, may be said or done by a certain class who are nominal Christians, but practical Pharisees, that will injure his reputation—his good name, interest or trade. In short, he is very timid; even so much so, that should any one call him a Universalist he would be half inclined, like Peter, to deny his Master. If he chances to attend church, he is fearful while going—appears more like a galley-slave while there than a devout worshipper, and leaves, as if in a fright, when the benediction is pronounced. There is another class of timid Universalists who betray little integrity for the truth, in high political stations, or are angling for some great office. Were it not for politics, they would be found in their places with a right ready good will. But as it is, they endeavor to walk between Orthodoxy and Universalism, and shake hands with the adherents of both. This is betraying a timidity but little less than the other class, and no more justifiable. Now, I would see none of this cowardly spirit among Universalists—no compromise with truth and error. To all such, I feel inclined to say, as said Alexander the Great to one of his soldiers, on hearing that he bore his name and was a coward. After asking him if such was the case, and receiving an answer in the affirmative, he replied "Change your name, or your actions." Brethren, this cowardly spirit ought not to be among us. Let us put it away, if we have it, one and all.

The last particular I would specify, is, that you cultivate the social principles. I fear that with many of us, this duty is too much neglected. As far as my observation extends, this is too true both of the city and country. I think that truth would not suffer were it said of either place, that often strangers come to our places of worship week after week, and very few know ought of them—whence they are. Few have exchanged the friendly salutation—have welcomed them among us with a warm greeting—have accosted them with a smile. Oh, there is nothing that will make a stranger rejoice more than to show him that he is welcome—that he is not altogether among strangers. How his heart will leap with joy when he learns that you have an interest in his welfare—that your sympathies are enlisted in his favor, and that he can rely on your friendship. Though he came a stranger, he has gone away rejoicing that he has found a welcome among friends. This is my duty, and it is yours, too, my brethren. And if we set ourselves individually to discharge it, we shall build ourselves up—we shall be growing in grace and in the knowledge of God. We shall be blessed in our deeds. We shall see others made happy around us and feel happy ourselves. We shall be growing to “the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.” Our hearts will be made better, our feelings will become softened. Around our pathway will beam the sunshine of truth—upon our heads will fall the showers of divine grace, and around our shoulders will hang the garments of righteousness, testifying to ourselves and to all around, that our labor has not been in vain. Amen.

From the Star of Bethlehem.

THE OBJECTION ANSWERED BY THE OBJECTOR.

“I could be a Universalist very well, were it not for one thing,” said an intelligent physician to me a short time since, whose mind, though clear on many subjects was greatly in the dark with respect to religious truth.

“And pray, sir,” said I, in reply, “what can that ‘one thing’ be, which seems so great an objection to the sublime doctrine of a world’s salvation?”

“Why,” said he, “I can see no difficulty in the way of the salvation of the common class of sinners; but then, just think of pirates, robbers, and other classes of sinners equally awful. Now, really, I do not see how these people can go to heaven.”

“I fear you do not view the subject in its true light. I hope you do not imagine that Universalists believe that pirates and robbers are going to heaven as such,” was my reply.

“Oh, no,” said the doctor. “I know that they believe that they must be made holy first. And although this seems somewhat reasonable, still it does seem to me that such awful creatures can never reach heaven.”

“Well,” I remarked, “let us reason on this subject a little. You have no trouble in believing that the common class of sinners will be saved; but it is the pirate and the robber that interferes with your believing in Universalism. Now, sir, will you have the goodness to inform me how wicked one may be, and still be saved, and also how good one may be, and still be damned?”

“Oh, I don’t know any thing about that,” said he, “but, really, I can’t think that these awful creatures can be saved.”

“I presumed that you would answer me in this way. But my question is not to be disposed of so easily. The fact is, you can not draw the dividing line, and I never yet have seen the individual that could. The moment you attempt it, you virtually declare that an individual may be so wicked, and still be saved, while another, hardly a shade worse—not enough worse to be perceptible—will certainly be eternally damned. And what sentiment can charge the Deity with more cruel injustice than this?”

“Well, there does seem to be some difficulty there, but still I can’t think that such awful creatures can be saved,” replied the doctor.

“Well, then, let us view the subject in a different light. You admit that the more sinful and wretched one is, the more he needs salvation, do you not?”

“Oh, certainly,” was the ready reply.

“Well, then, these awful creatures, being so much more wicked than common sinners, certainly stand more in need of salvation. This you admit?”

“Well—yes,” said the doctor, hesitatingly.

“Well then,” said I, “you could be a Universalist were it not for one thing. You have found a class of sinners who stand so greatly in need of salvation, that you do not see how in the world they can be saved! Rather singular logic, this!”

I here found it impossible to clear the doctor’s mind on this subject, so long had it been, in darkness, and the victim of early education. The next day I met him returning from a distant visit to one of his patients. He seemed to be fatigued, having been called away from the quiet repose of sleep. I accosted him thus,

“Well doctor, you seem to be rather tired.—You have had rather a fatiguing visit, I presume.”

“Yes,” said he, “and I would not have gone at all, had not the man been very sick, and therefore in great need of my services.”

“Have you any patients nearer home, who need your aid?”

“Oh, yes, I have a great many, but then they are nothing near so sick as the one I last left.”

“Well,” said I, “why don’t you take care of them, instead of going so far out of your way to aid one so very sick?”

“Why, for this reason,” said the doctor. “Those patients near my door are not so wretched as the one I last left; and does not the fact that this man stands in so much need of my aid, give me more reason to aid him first?”

“Well, it may be so,” said I, “but I can not see it. I have no difficulty in seeing why you should aid the common class of sick persons, but why in the world you should go out of your way to help one who is so very sick, appears to be a mystery.”

“Well,” said the doctor, “I am astonished at your blindness on this point. You of course admit that the more wretched a man is, the more he needs aid?”

“Certainly,” said I.

“Well, then,” said he, “this sick man stands in so great need of my aid, that it is a mystery to you why I should aid him at all! My dear sir, this simple fact of itself is sufficient reason why I should aid him before any others.”

“Oh, I see the force of your argument now, and really it is reasonable. By the way, your mind seems to be a little clearer than it was yesterday. Then you could not be a Universalist, because of a certain class of individuals who stood in so great need of salvation that you could not see how in the world they could be saved! To tell you plainly, I saw the force of your reasoning from beginning to end. But recollecting our conversation yesterday, I thought I would let you go on, as you was in a fair way for it, and remove your own objection to the doctrine of Universalism. And you have done it most admirably. You are aware of it, I presume.”

“Well, really,” said the doctor, “I never thought of that before. I will, however, think of it more in future.”

“That is right,” said I; “adopt no conclusion hastily, but give it serious thought, and I doubt not your mind will soon rest in the truth.”

And now I have a word to say to the candid reader. Have you ever looked upon these wretched mortals as being too wicked to be saved? If so, remember that of all classes of mortals, they are the most unfortunate, and have the greatest need of salvation. View them not with a feeling of revenge, but with the eye of pity, ever remembering that God, who is rich in mercy and love, is yet able to wash away their sins, and render them fit companions for angels, to sing His praises forever. Amen.

Swine’s wool.—In announcing a lot of soap the other day from Indiana, we expressed a hope that the western folks would not get to manufacturing newspapers out of their hogs—but ‘pon our honor, we might begin to is the material out of which paper is made. The fol-think they will. Already they are making cloth out of “swine’s wool,” and cloth or rags, every one knows, lowing is from the Northampton (Mass.) Democrat:—“They have commenced, at Cincinnati, the manufacture of a very neat and useful article of floor and hearth cloth, from hog’s hair. The hair is softened by immersion in lard oil, and afterwards spun and woven into cloth, and colored as fancy dictates.

MARRIAGES.

In Albany, August 28th, by Rev. S. B. Britain, Rev. H. B. SOULE, Pastor of the Universalist society in this city, to Miss CAROLINE A. WHITE, of the former place.

In Sheshequin, August 16th, by Rev. S. J. Gibson, Mr. FRANCIS VAN ALSTINE, of Owego, N. Y., to Miss ELIZA SNYDER, of the former place.

In this city, (at “Griffins Hotel,”) August 15th, by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. SETH BIRGE, Jr., to Miss FREELOVE HENDERSON, both of New Hartford.

DEATHS.

In Buffalo, on the 23d August, Mrs. ELIZA HOYT, wife of Mr. Medad Hoyt, aged 36 years. She met her great change with the strong faith and chastened submission of a Christian—resigned her loved children to the care and protection of her and their Father in heaven, and fell asleep in the hope of a glorious immortality. S. R. S.

In Dexter, Jefferson county, July 28th, of consumption, Mrs. ELECTA, consort of Alexander Darrow, and sister of Rev. O. Wilcox; in the 36th year of her age.

In the earlier part of her life she was a member of the Methodist church, and her husband a preacher of that doctrine. Some years ago, she began to examine more closely the doctrines of that church, and found they had no foundation in truth. She finally embraced the Gospel of universal grace, and found “great joy and peace in believing.”—She possessed a strong and vigorous mind; and notwithstanding the strenuous efforts that were made by her husband and some of his Partialist comrades, to destroy her confidence in God, by proclaiming to her the doctrines of endless sin, and suffering, and fiends—she remained firm and unshaken until the last. Report was very busy in telling of her doubts, and darkness, and unbelief; and a “thousand and one” other stories about Universalists and Universalism, &c. But it so happened that the writer was with her during her last moments, and she frequently told me she had no doubts—that she had made up her mind when well, and that she found it to be the only consolation—that she would not part with it for the world. A short time before her death, she exclaimed with transport, “glory! glory!”—said she, “I am happy! O, you can’t tell how happy I am! how pleasant every thing looks!” Said I, “Mrs. Darrow, what makes you so happy?” She said she was soon going to dwell with her Saviour—“I am going to see my Father in heaven.”

She requested to have the writer preach her funeral sermon, which he did, to a respectable congregation, from Ps. xlv. 6. She has left a husband and five small children to lament their loss. God grant to enlighten the mind of the husband, that he may not mourn without hope. G. S. A.

In South Bainbridge, on Friday morning, June 30th, STEPHEN PRESSON, aged 68 years. Br. Presson was born in Vermont. He was twice elected a representative of the people in the Legislature of his native State, and discharged the duties of his responsible station with fidelity, and to the satisfaction of his constituents. He emigrated to this State some years ago, and settled in South Bainbridge, Chenango county, where he lived until the time of his death. During his residence in this place, he has been distinguished for his uprightness, integrity, and moral worth. Both his precepts and example exerted an influence which told powerfully on the side of virtue. For a number of years he has been a consistent believer in Universalism, and an excellent and worthy member of the society and church in this place. He loved the truths of the Gospel, and was always punctual and regular in his attendance upon religious worship. It may truly be said of him, that he was an ornament to the doctrine which he professed. He enjoyed the respect and esteem of all who knew him. His faith sustained him through his protracted illness, and his death was calm, peaceful and happy. His funeral was attended on Sunday, July 2d, by a large concourse of friends and acquaintances, when a discourse was preached by the writer, from Acts viii: 2, “And devout men carried Stephen to his burial, and made great lamentation over him.”

THE STREAMLET.

Glide on bright stream! in joyous mood,
Through shady groves and lonely wood,
Where blooms the rose in wildest form,
Nursed by the dews, and sunbeams warm,
That softly gleam where branches bend,
And in thy glassy waters blend
Each leaf, and stalk, and blossom sound,
That deck the long untrodden ground.

The birds come here to bathe their wing,
Or wet their throats and gaily sing
Their anthems sweet to stream and grove,
Or warble forth their lays of love.
And wild bees, too, with droning hum,
From some old tree afar have come,
To steal the flowery sweets away,
And bear them home at close of day.
But still, a fragrance fills the breeze
That murmurs through the forest trees,
And bows the fox-glove's modest head
Down o'er the streamlet's pebbly bed.

Glide on, bright streamlet! for thou art free
To wander 'neath each green clad tree,
Or wind away through grassy dell
And laughing, play with moss and bell,
Which grow in beauty on the brink,
Where many a fawn has stooped to drink,
And turned away with startled bound
As though it heard some baying hound.

But few have trod with careless feet
Amid this quiet, calm retreat,
Save when, perchance, some one like me
Comes here, fair stream, to gaze on thee,
And learn how life may sweetly glide
Afar from all the haunts of pride,
By some glad stream, in cottage white,
That gleams beneath the summer light,
And bears the weight of many a vine,
Which o'er the roof and portals twine;
The shrubs, and groves with foliage green,
And flowery walks fill up the scene.
While on the air the voice of song
In gentle cadence floats along,
And softer notes, of breeze and rill
Steal o'er the place so fair and still.
There all the joys of life are blent
With love, and peace, and sweet content,
And flows on like thee, bright stream!
Yet seems one long unbroken dream.

Reply to 2d Letter.

Elbridge, March 17, 1842.

Dear Sir—As my former letter was rather a disclaimer of certain sentiments supposed to be held by me; perhaps instead of again disclaiming other sentiments, I should rather try to make manifest what I do profess to hold—therefore—

I account for the existence of sin and its consequent suffering here and hereafter, even eternally, on the same supposition—viz., not that God chooses it—not that there is anything good or lovely or desirable in it—it is displeasing to God, and a drawback upon that moral system to which men and angels belong. This moral system was chosen, notwithstanding it was foreseen that sin and suffering would be, to a certain extent, eternally an undesired incident—the good attendant upon the system overbalancing the evil so far as to render the system desirable as a whole, notwithstanding the incidental sin and suffering. There is no necessity laid upon the moral agency of men or angels, in any one case, to sin—they are fully adequate and competent in every case to abstain from the sin which they commit, and for the commission of which alone they are punishable.

Moral agency is controlled alone by moral influence—moral influence consists alone of arguments of reason—of the motives of right and wrong—of good and evil influences which we are conscious are every day exerted over our minds, and which we to some extent exert over each other's minds. That God governs by this influence is asserted in the Bible, when it is every where said he does it by the truth. "Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth"—"Sanctify them through thy truth," etc. That God controls moral agency in any other way than this, is nowhere asserted in the Bible—of such control we are conscious, and we are conscious of no other. It is therefore unphilosophical and unreasonable to suppose any other control.—This control is brought to bear upon the mind by means of experience, observation and inference or reason. The proof is our consciousness. There is no proof that it is ever brought to bear upon the mind in any other way, or that, in the nature of the case, it can be. Even the influence of the Holy Spirit is exerted in this way, and this only. This influence—moral influence, is in its nature limited and resistible. That which is unlimited, is of course infinite and incapable of increase or diminution. But moral influence if not entirely created is greatly increased and rendered potent by the exhibitions which God makes of himself in conjunction with, and acting upon, and influencing the experience, observation and reason of his creatures. Our own experience, so far as remembered—the experience of all past ages, so far as history has brought it down to us—our observation of the principles by which God works in his work of creation and providence—all go to increase that moral influence by which God governs moral agency. Every suffering consequent upon sin—every penal infliction for sin, increases that influence by which future sin is restrained and prevented. That the time will ever come when all sin can by moral influence—the only influence that controls moral agency—be prevented throughout the vast universe of God—when there will be no need of the present actual exhibition of sin—its true deformity and merited punishment—to sustain the restraining, preventing power of moral influence; we have no proof. On the other hand, I understand the Bible, as asserting that sin and its merited punishment will eternally continue, and as the only justifiable object of punishment is the prevention of crime—the only object for which we ever justifiably punish our fellow men—I infer that the eternally existing sin will be eternally punished for this end—viz., its moral influence in preventing sin, and promoting holiness. That this influence, moral influence, is in its nature resistible, is proved from the fact we do resist, often, all the influences urging us to pursue the right, and in despite of them pursue the wrong. The Bible says—"Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost: as your fathers did, so do ye"—"grieve not the Holy Spirit"—the Holy Spirit "strives" with man, etc. I think we are bound to believe, in order to sustain the moral character of God, that he so inflicts righteous penalty and grants pardon—so metes out to, and withholds from, moral influence as well as natural good, that he may on the whole secure the highest possible amount of holiness and happiness. I suppose God could have done more, both morally and physically, for Elbridge, were not such doing more inconsistent with the highest good of the whole of his creatures. God might spare us the infliction of suffering from the loss of friends and temporal evil, would it not be the loss to us of greater moral good, or the loss of greater good some where else. God might spare the punishment of the vilest, did not the good of others—the public good, require it.—God might doubtless do more than he does for the prevention of any particular sin, yet not more for the prevention of sin on the whole. I suppose God neither withholds nor inflicts anything, but in such act more good is secured than could have been by any variation of his withholding or inflicting act—and for this reason, whatever he does is right—his doing it should be matter of joy.

Your first inference from my former statements—that God has instituted "such a system as will issue in that which is at variance with his disposition and pleasure," is thus a true inference. It issues in sin, which is at variance, etc. See the first part of this letter.

Your second inference—that to "institute such a system without knowing or assigning the result," militates against omniscient wisdom—is true—the entire plan of the system is of God.

Your third inference is not held to—viz., that the Bible assertions of "God's doing all his pleasure," etc., according to my view is null and void. God does do all his pleasure—he does no sin—wicked men and devils do not do all God's pleasure—they do sin.

Your fourth inference is, you say, partly included in the second.

You infer, fifthly, from my understanding the "Bible to assert that there will be some incorrigibly wicked who will suffer eternally as they will be eternally wicked"—that God has instituted a system which results in infinite evil even to God and to millions of God's creatures. Since I also hold that God does not desire their sin and ruin, but the reverse; and does all he can consistently to secure the reverse of their sin and ruin—I do not call sin an infinite evil, though I believe it to be an unspeakably greater evil than we can conceive—so great as to be atoned for, only by the blood of Jesus Christ. I do not call sin an end—an ultimate end with God, by which he was moved to create—but an evil incident to this moral system, of which holiness and happiness is the ultimate end—i. e., God was not moved to create by a view of the sin that would exist in his creation, but by a foresight of the holiness and happiness. You infer from my declaration that God is not indifferent to the conduct and doom of his creatures, but desires and does all he can consistently do to promote their holiness and happiness—from this you infer that God must have undertaken the complete reconciliation and deliverance of a world lying in wickedness; but that this undertaking of God has, "to his own mortification, through their incorrigible wickedness and eternal suffering, resulted in a complete failure." I think this inference does not follow from the sentiment, in the sense in which I hold it. I think God's knowledge and wisdom so infinite that he undertakes no impossibilities, and so meets with no disappointments or failures; and I also think that since God is holy, he would—had it been possible—secure all the holiness and happiness which will now exist in his universe, without any of the attendant sin and suffering—but this not being possible, God did not undertake it—but in full foresight of all the results he did undertake to secure the highest amount of holiness and happiness possible, with the least possible attendant sin—least possible, so far as governmental prevention is concerned—this God does secure, and in this the heart of infinite benevolence rests and rejoices. Any variation of the existing arrangement of God would lessen the amount of good and increase the amount of evil. Wickedness and misery exist now, not because God has pleasure in them—they will exist eternally, not because he will then have any pleasure in them, but because these are and will be the only lessons of wisdom which, exhibited in some, will effectually teach others not to sin—like as in earthly governments, the punishment of one criminal is made a terror to restrain crimes in others—the exhibition of punished crime being made a means of deterring other crime.

My object has not been argument, but to make myself understood, and to answer inquiries. I hope I may not have failed. I am very sincerely yours, etc. SIDNEY MILLS.

MR. A. CLARK.

Third letter to Rev. S. Mills.

Elbridge, April 17th, 1842.

DEAR SIR—I have delayed a reply to yours of March 17th, until the present; perhaps on account of its great length; and this must also be my apology if I should not reply to every part. I will however endeavor to get the substance of the whole.

You say, "I account for the existence of sin and its consequent suffering here and hereafter, even eternally, on the same supposition, viz., not that God chooses it: not that there is anything good, or lovely, or desirable in it—it is displeasing to God and a drawback upon that moral system to which men and angels belong."

I agree with you that it is a drawback, indeed. If in consequence of the existence of sin, it is to terminate in the endless sin and suffering of millions of the vast family of man whom God made in his own image, it may well be called a drawback—and a drawback altogether inconsistent, I should suppose, with the plan and perfections of a being infinite in wisdom, power and goodness.

But you say "This moral system was chosen notwithstanding it was foreseen that sin and suffering would be, to a certain extent, eternally an undesired incident"!! "To a certain extent." So, then, there will be to eternal suffering, some alleviations—some hope and comfort. Sufferings to a certain extent—that is, extending throughout eternity!! But perhaps you mean extent in degree, though not in duration. If this is your meaning, then those sufferings, perhaps, might be quite comfortable after all—for you say:—"The good attendant upon the system overbalancing the evil so far as to render the system desirable as a whole, notwithstanding the incidental sin and suffering."—Perhaps "the good attendant upon the system" may finally terminate in universal holiness and happiness: and if so, you and I will agree and rejoice together in such a system. But your letter as a whole, gives us quite a counterpart to a system so glorious and happy in its results.

I have no particular inclination to object to what you say on "moral agency"—"moral influence"—"control of moral agency," &c., as these contingencies or "influences," if you please to call them, are wholly under the "control of the Divine Being." Even the passages you quote prove this—"Of his own will begat he us." Whose own will? The creature's? No. God's own will. The whole is of God, and this, too, without a violation of man's "moral agency." And as you say, "the entire plan of the system is of God," so I conclude He will "control" all "agencies," and all other "controlling agencies," in such a manner as not to involve those "agents" in endless sin and suffering—a result so contrary to His declared will and purpose. You say in opposition to this sentiment, "That the time will ever come when all sin can be moral influence—the only influence that controls moral agency—be prevented throughout the vast universe of God, when there will be no need of the present actual exhibition of sin, its true deformity and merited punishment, to sustain the restraining, preventing power of moral influence—we have no proof." Quite a long sentence—we will try to sum it up in fewer words. The amount of it is this:—Man's "moral influence" can not prevent or "finish sin"—hence we have no proof that God's "moral influence," or power, will ever do this. But I think differently. Proof—1 Cor. xv. 28: Rom. viii. 21; Col. i. 20; Phil. ii. 10, 11; Eph. i. 10.

I will now pay some attention to the object of endless punishment, as understood by you. You say, "I understand the Bible as asserting that sin and its merited punishment will eternally continue, and as the only justifiable object of punishment is the prevention of crime, the only object for which we ever justifiably punish our fellow men, I infer that the eternally existing sin will be eternally punished for this end—viz., its moral influence in preventing sin and promoting holiness." Here, then, we are informed of the necessity of endless sin and suffering. The object of it is to prevent crime and promote holiness. And this holiness is promoted not by "finishing sin," and by making an "end of transgression," but by "the eternally existing sin." The Divine Being, then, in order to promote the holiness of a part of his offspring, is under the necessity of endlessly punishing the other part!! Is this your belief, Mr. Mills? Have you come to this conclusion from a solemn, sober conviction of its truth? Or do you adopt this plea as the best excuse for your doctrine of endless sin and suffering? Is it your settled conviction that this is the plan adopted by "the Father of spirits" in the government of his family? Is this the plan you have adopted in the government of your family? Do you punish one of your children for "the only object" of preventing crime in another? And if so, does it have the desired effect? Do you prevent all transgression in one child by punishing the other? And how has it been with human punishments for 6000 years? Have they always prevented crime and promoted holiness in others? Does the hanging of one man prevent all others from murdering? Facts show that if this is the only justifiable object of punishment, it proves a failure of the "object" intended. Crimes have been perpetrated in all ages and countries in spite of punishment in others. I think you could not adopt this sentiment from the study of the Scriptures, or from the study of Dick's Philosophy. He says—"the great object of all civil punishments ought to be, not only the prevention of crime, but also the reformation of the criminal, in order that a conviction of the evil of his conduct may be impressed upon his mind and that he may be restored to society as a renovated character. When punishments are inflicted with a degree of severity beyond what is necessary to accomplish these ends, the code which sanctions them becomes an engine of cruelty and injustice. This was strikingly exemplified in the reign of Henry VIII, remarkable for the abundance of its crimes which certainly did not arise from the mildness of punishment. In that reign alone, says his historian, seventy two thousand executions took place for robberies alone, exclusive of the religious murders which are known to have been numerous—amounting, on an average, to six executions a day, Sundays included, during the whole reign of that monarch." Dick's Philosophy of Religion, pp. 157, 158. If your plan and object of punishment be correct, why did not these executions prevent robbery? We see that this plan fails in its object. Does the Divine Being adopt the same plan? Has he no way of preventing crime and promoting holiness, but through the fear of punishment? Is this the acceptable service which God requires—that which is produced by the slavish fear of punishment?—How degrading to attribute such a character to that being who says, "Son, give me thine heart"—who also says, "There is no fear in love; perfect love casteth out fear, because fear hath torment"—and also, "the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance."

Now it appears to me, that punishment to be justifiable, should be administered principally as a medicine, or chastisement to cure, to heal and reform those to whom it is administered. This appears to be the view of the apostle, Heb. xii. Punishments administered in this manner, and for this object, in your language, "May on the whole secure the highest possible amount of holiness and happiness." Which plan, think you, will secure the highest possible amount of holiness and happiness, to govern in such a manner as to secure holiness and happiness to all, or to only a part of God's offspring? But you say, "secure the highest possible amount of holiness and happiness;" implying thereby, as you hold to the doctrine that God will inflict endless suffering on a part of his offspring for sin, that it was impossible for God to secure the holiness and happiness of them all. This sentiment you have expressed in another place, thus:—"I think God's knowledge and wisdom so infinite that he undertakes no impossibilities, and so meets with no disappointments or failures." Now for the inferences:—and first, The final holiness and happiness of all God's offspring is an impossibility. 2d. He never undertook to effect it; 3d, consequently "meets with no disappointments or failures." I think you are now clearly understood. The sum of it is this, notwithstanding all you say about "free salvation, provision for all, all may be saved if they will"—still the salvation of all is an impossibility, which even the Divine Being himself can not effect!! Recollect, Mr. Mills, that in all your preaching and that of your brethren, you are bold to speak of an atonement for all—provision for all—but when asked why an atonement was made for all, and why was provision made for all, and why all are invited and commanded to look to God and be saved, you reply that "all may be saved if they will." That is, if they will effect an impossibility which the Almighty can not effect, why, then they may be saved!!! I would inquire of you, how much sincerity you attribute to the Divine Being when you say he invites all to look to him and be saved, when he knows at the same time, that the salvation of all is an impossibility!!

The objection in your first letter to the salvation of all "human kind" was, that it would "work greater ruin to other parts of his (God's) creatures." But, by the bye, you have not yet informed me who those other creatures were, as requested in my last. I shall therefore be under the necessity of guessing, or drawing my inferences from both letters. The reason assigned in your last why "wickedness and misery will exist eternally, is, not because God will have any pleasure in them, but because these are and will be the only lessons of wisdom which, exhibited in some, will effectually teach others not to sin, like as in earthly government (say, for instance, the government of Henry VIII) the punishment of one criminal is made a terror to restrain crime in others—the exhibition of punished crime being made a means of deterring other crime."

Now, for my inferences and application. All can not be saved, "delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God," because it would work ruin to other creatures. What other creatures? Why the children of God; or the inhabitants of heaven. But why would it work ruin to the inhabitants of heaven? Because there would be no "punished crime" in hell to keep them straight, or as a means of deterring other crime, that is, crime in heaven, "as in earthly government." Henry the VIII punished crime by executing on an average six persons a day; and if he did this for the purpose of preventing crime in others, "the only justifiable object of punishment," he did not effect his purpose during his whole reign, though his executions had increased to SEVENTY TWO THOUSAND!!

What a comment is this on your "only lessons of wisdom to restrain crime"!!

But suppose we grant your position, that crime is prevented by the fear of punishment. What kind of holiness does it promote? Does it promote true love to God? The apostle John says, "There is no fear in love; but perfect love casteth out fear; because fear hath torment: he that feareth is not made perfect in love." 1 John iv. 18. The inhabitants of heaven, according to your theory will never be made perfect in love; not only so, but they will forever "have torment"!! "Thou believest (says James), there is one God: thou dost well: the devils also believe and tremble." Just so it would be with the inhabitants of heaven who are prevented from committing crime through the fear of punishment, or through the "exhibition of punished crime." What, then, is the great difference between those devils spoken of by James, and the inhabitants of heaven, according to your theology? I think when you have duly considered your position concerning God's "lessons of wisdom to prevent crime," you will abandon it, and seek for something more congenial with the nature of the Divine Being. "God is love; he that dwelleth in love (not fear) dwelleth in God, and God in him." And the apostle Paul speaks of a time when all things shall be subdued unto God, and "God be all in all." 1 Cor. xv. 28. When God dwells in all, and all dwell in him in a sense different from what they now do, I think it will be in love: yea, true love that will not be contaminated with fear which hath torment.

What would you think of your servant who could render to you no obedience but through the fear of the rod? I think if the rod, or the fear of the rod, were the "only lessons" to induce him to obedience or dissuade him from "crime," you would soon feel disposed to dismiss him as unworthy of your employment.

My object in this letter has been principally to show you the fallacy of your position concerning the object of punishment—an error which I deem fundamental. This I have endeavored to do in the spirit of kindness. Perhaps I have failed. If so it was not intended. I should be pleased to hear from you again on this subject. The spirit in which your two letters have been written has disappointed me. I admire it. If our correspondence can be continued with as kind feelings as you have manifested, the result can not be otherwise than beneficial. I would not, however, forget to "contend earnestly for the faith which was once delivered to the saints." "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." These are admonitions of high authority. Very respectfully yours, &c.,

ASHLEY CLARK.

EDITED BY

Rev. A. B. Grosh, G. W. Montgomery and A. C. Barry.

UTICA, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 1, 1843.

"I HAVE NO INFLUENCE."

There is now in the Perkins Institute for the Blind, in South Boston, Mass., a young girl, a mere child, delicate and slender of form, who has probably done more to call into active exercise the resources and ingenuity of teachers, to awaken the benevolence and sympathy of the philanthropic and humane, and to furnish the mental and moral philosopher with materials with which to build up that noble and useful science, than any person now living. And yet Laura Bridgman—for it is of that unfortunate child I am writing—is deaf, and dumb, and blind; is also destitute of the sense of smelling, and almost destitute of that of taste—she has but one full sense, that of touch; and by and through this very destitution and helplessness, she has taught us the almost entire independence of mind over the senses, and has drawn forth the ingenuity of teachers, until she has been taught to read, to write, to cypher, to converse with those around her with her fingers, and to study various branches of education and perform various kinds of work suitable for girls of her age. And when so much has been accomplished by and for this tender and destitute child, let no one having the full use of all their senses, say they possess no influence—or that they can do nothing to benefit their race, and to advance the world of mankind toward its high and holy destination!

And most especially is this shrinking back from duty, wrong and misplaced, in view of the fact, that the most important duties of life are those most common and constantly recurring ones, that lie in our daily walks of life—that call for our exertions of body and of mind from day to day, from hour to hour, and from moment to moment. If you doubt this, turn to the Gospel of Jesus, and mark what its precepts call for—love is the great duty and fountain of all duties—love to God and to all mankind is the fulfilment of all required in the law and the prophets—love to enemies is the perfection of human virtue—love to God and the brethren is the new birth or regeneration of the soul—love universal makes us partakers of the divine nature and purifies us from sin.

But, to be more specific—speaking the truth to each other in love—bringing up our children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord—providing for our own household, all things, honest in the sight of men—shunning the appearance of evil, that our good may not be evil spoken of—cherishing faith in the Gospel, and cultivating its spirit in our life and conversation—being pitiful, compassionate and forgiving, courteous to all, putting down malice from our hearts, evil speaking from our tongues, and guile from our lips—being liberal to the poor, needy, outcast and downtrodden—cherish reverence for God and zeal for his truth and precept—dealing justly, loving mercy and walking humbly before our Maker—visiting the fatherless and the widow in their afflictions, and keeping ourselves unspotted from the world—being constant in breathing the prayer of holy desire to God, and giving him thanks in all things, by the cultivation of cheerful and grateful feelings in our hearts—wives, husbands, parents, children, friends, neighbors, church members and citizens, surely here are every day duties enough, easy of performance, full of happiness in their performance and in their results, and constantly recurring—enough to keep us all busy, to make us all better, and to render us all happy.

THE ABRAHAMIC FAITH.

"And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed" Genesis xxii: 18.

Universalism, or the faith of Universalists in the Gospel of Jesus Christ, is frequently called "the Abrahamic faith;" because, as we believe, our faith is the same that was held by Abraham, and which made him just. This article is devoted to proving that point.

This promise of God is called the Gospel which God, before due time, preached to Abraham—and the "seed" spoken of is Christ. Galatians iii: 16. The blessing, then, must be a spiritual, and not a merely temporal blessing; for it is to be in Christ, and all nations, in a temporal point of view, can not be blessed even by Christ, for many ceased to exist as nations before Jesus was born. Again—it can not be a temporal blessing, for Jesus is not a temporal prince and saviour, but a spiritual—his kingdom is not of this world, and his blessings are not the blessings of earthly potentates. Again—as they are to be blessed, not only by Christ, but in him, the blessing must be at least regeneration itself; for "if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature;" (2 Cor v: 17;) or, the greater regeneration of the resurrection to immortality, by which man becomes as the angels of God in heaven; for, "as in Adam all die, even so, in Christ shall all be made alive"—and "as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." Besides, we have the express testimony of the Apostle Peter that the blessing consists "in turning away every one from his iniquity" (or salvation from sin)—and of Paul, that it consists in justification by faith. See Acts iii: 25, 26; and Galatians iii: 8. These two definitions united, embrace both Jews and Gentiles; which terms, in the New Testament, include the whole world of mankind.

This Gospel, then, is the Gospel of Christ—its blessing is spiritual, and not temporal—it consists in making the subjects just by faith in it, and thus saving them from sin—and it includes both Jews and Gentiles in its blessing of regeneration.

We have, then, only to find the extent of this salvation to determine the question which is the subject of this discourse. This can readily be determined by Holy Writ.

The term "all nations" is not confined to the political sense only; for as the Saviour and the salvation are spiritual, and not temporal, "nations" means the spiritual beings composing them. It is used as a convertible term with "all the families of the earth." Genesis xxii: 3. And, as if to prevent all limitation, the apostle Peter declares that it includes "all the kindreds of the earth." And when we take the spiritual nature of the blessing into consideration, and consider the individuals composing these nations, families and kindreds, as spiritual beings, and remember that God is the Father of spirits, even of the spirits of all flesh, we learn that a spiritual family and kindred are meant, and are compelled to consider the promise as absolutely universal in extent—embracing every spiritual being "in heaven, on earth, and under the earth," and "such as are in the sea, and all that are in them"—and to believe that ultimately all these will be reconciled to God, subdued to his Son, made holy and happy and immortal, and will "confess Jesus Christ to be Lord, to the glory of God the Father."

Such is the Abrahamic Gospel, as Scripture explained by Scripture unfolds it—such the Abrahamic faith as we hold it, and rejoice in it. Reader, is it not honorable to God, rejoicing to angels, gratifying to the holy desires and prayers of saints, and salutary to man? If you believed it, would not Jesus seem more lovely to you—would not God appear more glorious, and man more dear to your soul—would you not hate sin more, and feel deeper gratitude to God, and more expansive love to mankind? You would—I know you would; for thus "to know God and Christ, is life eternal," indeed. All the moral universe of God made holy and happy—sin and misery utterly annihilated—death and the devil destroyed; and God all that is in all! Oh, glory be to God for such a hope and such a faith!

OUR PERIODICALS.

Another birth and death.—A new paper, devoted to the discussion of Universalism and Partialism, has been started in Pottsville, Pa. We have not seen it, but it is stated to be about the size of the Universalist Cabinet noticed a short time since.

The Gospel Messenger, published in Providence, R. I., by Br. A. A. Davis, has been discontinued, and its subscription list transferred to the Christian Freeman in Boston. There are some painful circumstances connected with this event, which we desire to notice, hoping that the mention of them may tend to the benefit of our unfortunate brother. Br. A. A. Davis, after several years very arduous service in the ministry, was obliged by ill health (induced by his hardships and exposures) to suspend his ministerial labors. He went to the West Indies in hopes that a change of climate might benefit him. But after his return it was found that he must cease to preach altogether. His heart was bound up in the work of the Gospel. His habits and his health pointed out some work like publishing a paper as the best for him. Persuaded by the encouragement of friends, and the flattering prospects publishing always presents to those unacquainted with the business, he purchased the Messenger, and the Book establishment connected with it, from Br. Z. Baker, and commenced making his living in that way. Br. H. Bacon and others lent the aid of their pens gratuitously, and others favorably noticed, and earnestly commended to patronage our worthy brother. But, alas, Br. Davis has found prospects deceiving, and promises vain—and is obliged, after a heavy expenditure of time, labor, and money, to leave the business poorer than when he commenced it! Had it not been for the generosity of Br. Z. Baker, from whom he purchased the establishment, he must have been still worse off—for Br. Baker has most kindly taken back the books at cost, and assumed beside the payment of a considerable debt that was incurred by Br. Davis in carrying on the paper. But still, even at the best, it was an unfortunate business for Br. Davis. And unless prompt payments of nearly all the subscriptions are made, and generous additions are furnished to the list of the Freeman on his account, he must sink money by his past efforts.

N. B.—All persons who are able, and feel disposed to aid Br. Davis, and yet receive the worth of all they give, can assist him by subscribing for the Christian Freeman, a large folio weekly, published by Br. S. Cobb, at two dollars per annum in advance. All such subscriptions, however, must be sent to Boston, with a statement annexed, that they are "sent for Rev. A. A. Davis." Let this be remembered, or he loses their benefit. The Freeman is a good paper—he has a good list of contributors to its columns—is well printed—is anti-slavery (as was the Messenger) in its general tone, but breathes a right good spirit to all.

NEW PREACHERS.—It gives us much pleasure to learn that Br. Davis Bacon, of Prospect, in this county, has commenced proclaiming publicly the great salvation.—He has been a preacher of it in the social circle, for several years, and with good success—especially while, with his brother, engaged in school teaching at Cynthia, Ky., when nearly all around were opposers of our faith. His moral character is excellent—his mind clear and active, and his address pleasant. We are much mistaken if he does not succeed well as a minister of the restitution. The Luminary also announces as a new preacher, Br. R. C. Kent, of the western part of this State.—There are some others whom we have noticed in the Register, and probably forgotten to notice in our columns. The increase in new preachers during the past year will be found considerable. Our cause is still "onward."

THE COMPANION AND REGISTER FOR 1844 is now in the hands of the binder, and will be ready to forward to those who have ordered it in about a week. Very few as yet, have sent in orders, probably because our terms are cash, (real Universalist terms—"pay, as you go along,") and none like to run any risk. Let those, however, who want the work, remember that we have printed but a limited edition also, for we wish not to run any risk either. Look around you in your respective neighborhoods—see how many copies you can certainly sell for cash—then send in your orders, and you will be safe, and sure of a pretty little profit for your trouble. The work will be for sale by Brs. A. Tompkins & T. Whittemore, Boston; Eli Ballou, Montpelier, and J. E. Palmer, Barre, Vt.; J. A. Gurley, Cincinnati, Ohio, who will also have a lot for sale at the General Convention at Akron, Ohio; and by Universalist preachers generally. A. B. G.

NOTICE.—Br. G. W. Montgomery having removed to Portsmouth, N. H., requests all letters and papers intended for him, addressed accordingly.

Will the Editors of our papers, please copy?

Fire in Cabotville, (in Springfield,) Mass.—Last Sunday morning, a fire was discovered in the interior of the Unitarian church at Cabotville. The choir had been in the gallery the evening previous, and it is supposed that fire was unknowingly communicated to something by a lamp. The fire had made such progress before it could be extinguished, as to damage the gallery and church to the amount of about $300.

A Strange and Solemn companion.—The New Orleans Republican says: "A gentleman whose name we do not feel ourselves at liberty to make public, for many years a resident of this city, and whose health for the past six months has been, and now is, in a very precarious and critical condition, took passage in a ship for the North on Saturday, with the endeavor to see his friends before he died. There was put on board for him a coffin, lined with tin, at his own desire; so that in case he 'shuffled off this mortal coil,' he might be preserved to be laid under the sod. His wife accompanied him.

Cause of the death of Mr. Legare.—Dr. Jacob Bigelow has furnished for the Boston Medical Journal the details of Mr. Legare's disease, and the condition of the patient during his last illness. Strangulated intestines, produced by sedentary habits, were the immediate causes of his death, as every effort to relieve the patient proved unavailing. Dr. Bigelow remarks that about half an hour before his death he got up from his bed without assistance, and upon lying down again, earnestly asked for water. On receiving it, he pushed it away, saying it was filled with ants. A white paper was shewn him, and he made the same remark. On being told it was an illusion of the sight, he put forth his hand for the glass, but missed it, said a few words incoherently, leaned back and expired without a struggle. Upon a post mortem examination, it was found that the intestines were twisted four times, and that one of them was distended to the circumference of fifteen inches! The disease or obstruction was entirely beyond medical aid.

Wool.—The Albany Daily Advertiser says: Upwards of sixty tons of wool, consigned to houses in this city, from the West, were landed at the freight depot of the Albany and Boston Railway, on Tuesday, for manufacturing establishments between Boston and this city, on line of the railway.

Lightning.—When any one is struck with lightning, shower him immediately with cold water, which is one of the most facile conductors of electricity yet discovered.

It is believed that, in this way, nine out of ten persons, apparently struck dead, might be restored.

"All Baggage at the risk of the Owners."—Catharine Wilkins brought a suit in Baltimore, a day or two since against the President and Directors of the Citizens' Union Line, to recover damages for the loss of baggage, in the sum of $25. The baggage was shipped in Philadelphia for Baltimore. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for $25 damages and cost.

The toll paid at Rochester on the cargo of the canal boat Zassul, from Albany, was $338.82.

It is stated in the Fall River Monitor, that already there are about one hundred buildings of different sizes in progress in that town, on the burnt district—some nearly finished.

Great Oats.—A friend in Onondaga county has sent us a single stock of oats, bearing 150 plump grains, and inquires whether any of the farmers of Old Herkimer can beat it? If they can, we will aid them in putting down the Onondaga man. The stalk sent us is of the kind known as Black Oats.—[Herk. Jour.]

Awful Accident.—We learn that a laborer on the Somerville Railroad, named Stetts, riding in one of the rear cars, was instantly killed this morning, by what is known as a 'snake-head,' or a flat iron bar turned up. The locomotive and three cars had passed over the spot, when the loosened rail sprung up, pierced the bottom of the car, and entering the neck of the unfortunate man below the chin, transfixed him entirely, and caused instant death.—[N. Y. American.]

Yellow Fever.—A vessel, the schooner Vanda, came to New York last week, from some West India port, having the yellow fever on board. She was allowed by the Quarantine officer to go up the North River some ways, for the purpose of discharging her cargo, and was then to return to quarantine, which she did. Two or three persons have died upon her, either upon her passage up the river or at the quarantine ground, among others Mr. Bailly, the man who piloted her up the river. The True Sun says, "we understand several persons from this city went on board of her as she passed up."—[Oneida Whig.]

MARY MAGDALENE;

A TRADITION OF NAIN.

Mary arose from the crimson pillow on which she had been reposing, and approaching the window, drew back, with a silken robe, the heavy draperies of purple inwrought with gold, which shaded the apartment from the direct rays of the sun, and gazed, with a thoughtful brow, out on the quiet streets of the city of Nain. Beyond its walls lay the sea, whose waters reflected back to heaven the thousand resplendent lights and shadows scattered along the western horizon by the flashing rays of the setting sun, and in the far distance, like a streak of gray clouds, lay the mountains of Judea.—Many a shallop, richly laden, was gliding over the still waters; some bound outward, freighted with rich dyes and stuffs of Nazareth; some coming into port, bearing treasures and jewels from distant lands; others with costly silks and fine paintings—polished mirrors of steel and silver, and pearls and wrought ivory from the Ionian Isles. The chaunt of the oarsmen, as their oars plashed lazily in the glowing water, came faintly and sweetly on the ear, and the white sails scarcely swelling in the breeze, looked like suffron tinted clouds. Then came stealing and chirping on the stillness, the vesper hymns of the birds, and blending as they did with the gradually decreasing hum of the city, as the evening mist brooded over it, they were sounds which shed over the spirit of Mary Magdalene, something like peace.—A band of young and beauteous maidens now tripped along, with jars filled from the purest well in the city; then came a crowd of children, dancing to the sound of cymbals and lutes, and trailing after them, long vines of flowers and interwoven wreaths, and sending out their joyous laughter and sounds of mirth, which well accorded with the sweet harmony of music.

Mary Magdalene turned her eyes wearily away from these tokens of peace and joy, and leaning her head against a marble pillar, wept. A low, sweet voice aroused her, singing an old Jewish song which told in sad poetry, the tale of a broken heart. The singer was a young and lovely girl, just blushing into the morning of life; her skin was like polished ivory, save where a rose tint flushed her cheek, and dyed the tips of her hair.

per fingers. Her large blue eyes were cast downwards, and the full red lip, just parted enough to reveal two rows of pearl-like teeth—her exquisitely formed arms and bust, combined with a slight and graceful figure, now half hidden by a profusion of sunny hair, that fell back from her childish forehead, and swept the Mosaic pavement, completed the beautiful picture. Mary started as the voice told her her slave had been a witness to her emotion, and raising her magnificent form to its utmost height, while her commanding black eye flashed with anger, she exclaimed, "Thou here! away slave!—how dost thou dare see me weep?"

The voice was stilled, and the fair young head bowed in silence and tears. After gazing on the young maiden for a few moments, during which short space, anger, contempt, and an expression of mysterious bitterness alternately changed her countenance, the touching and beautiful grief of Addi moved her better spirit, and chased away every feeling except pity. "Come hither, Addi—come hither, poor bird. Forgive thy mistress' wayward mood, and sing again—but sing something to lighten my heart, for it is heavy and sad, child—sing something to stir the still fountain of its gladness—sing—sing Addi—is not thy cage a gilded one—then wherefore sad and silent?"

"The star that lighted my path, lady, is gone out—Zimri, the widow's son, is dead!"

"Ha! poor child! I pity thee! Yet, Addi, come hither; I would tell thee, maiden, to cherish a love for the departed; let it not go out, and leave thy heart, like the waters of the sea whose sullen waves cover those olden cities which were destroyed in their might and glory by Jehovah—Thou has heard of the fruits which grew on its banks!"

"Yes, lady."

"Let love for the dead go out, and thou wilt become like—like—me—yes, Addi, me—beautiful and bright to the eye, but within, bitterness and ashes!—but hark!"

"Oh, lady," sobbed the young slave—"that sound of grief, is the wail of Zimri's mother and kinsmen—they are bearing him past to the grave"—and Addi rushed to the window, and straining her eyes through the misty twilight, saw the bier on which was laid the dead body of Zimri, and over it the bended form of his widowed mother, weeping, and, by the torch light which they carried, the sorrowful faces of his kinsmen.

"They are coming, lady," she cried to Mary, who had thrown herself again upon the crimson pillow of her couch. "Oh Zimri, is that still form never more to move? Methinks I see now, the smile on his white lips, and the waves of shining hair on his gentle brow. See, lady! they are beneath the window, and the pall has fallen so close around him that you can see the beauty of his form, even in death—ha! why do they stop?—a crowd approaches—who—what—ha! it is the prophet Jesus and his followers!"

Mary started from her recumbent posture, and throwing back the tresses of long black hair which had fallen like a veil around her, with a look of intense anxiety gazed on the face of Addi, who still, unheeding her mistress' emotion, continued—"He is like one of our mountain palms in his majesty—his brow is like the evening star, and his serene lips drop honey. He approaches the window—he looks on her tears with eyes of tender pity—he speaks—he raises his face towards heaven, and reaches forth his hand, and lays it on the dead. God of my father! the dead?"—and with a loud and piercing shriek, she rushed forth into the street.

Mary started up with an expression of dread and wonder, and looking on the crowd below, saw the young man arising from his bier, at the command of Jesus.—She saw him with the warm breath of life in his nostrils, who a few moment past, was dead and cold. And as the shouts of the assembled people rent the air, many of whom were now willing to believe in and worship Him who had wrought the miracle, he bowed his head meekly on his bosom, and gathering the folds of his garment around him, he glided noiselessly away from the multitude.

After long hours of abstraction, Mary lifted her head from her bosom, and approaching a mirror, folded her arms and gazed on her image with an expression of scorn and bitterness; anon tears coursed over her flushed cheek, and her bosom heaved as if some pent-up agony wrung her heart.

"Why art thou weeping?" said a voice near her; "why art thou weeping, Mary?"

"Ha! Phelon?"

"Ay, Phelon," he answered—"Phelon, the king's son, who abides here in the common garb of a publican to be near thee."

"Go to thy father's palace again, Phelon," answered Mary, sadly, without turning to look on the beautiful youth, with his brown curling hair and dark blue eyes which gazed with incredulous wonder up on her.

"Mary," said he, "thou art angered with me—I come but to bring a parting gift, Mary. My father is wroth against me, because I am not at the head of the soldiery, and hath sent his chief officer to bring me to his presence, but I will go out of the city to-night, while he sleepeth, and ere the first watches of the morning, Phelon will be on his war-horse, with helm, and battle spear, and plume, ready for the fight."

Her lip quivered and paled as she turned and looked on him, and her voice was plaintive as she replied—"Go Phelon! thou art bright and beautiful in mine eyes, and verily have I loved thee; but go, I pray never more to see that face again—I pray never more to hear the words of thy silvery and honeyed tongue again—I have sinned—go from me!"

He looked steadfastly and sternly on her while she spoke, and with a searching glance, said—hast thou seen the Nazarene, who calleth himself Jesus?"

"I have," she replied, "and to-morrow, while thou art going to battle, I shall be kneeling in the dust at his feet."

Phelon laughed tauntingly, and turning on his iron heel, replied:

"Look on my gift, Mary"—and he laid an exquisitely wrought casket at her feet. The light from the scented lamp, which threw upward delicious odors from its silver pedestal, shown down on the interior of the casket, and glittered on the gold and precious stones that were therein, in the many-hued sparkles of brilliance. There was also an alabaster box, set round with jewels, which contained spikenard and ointment, such as queens use.

"Hence, tempter," she shrieked—"hence; or I will send thy name out on the ears of the sleepers of Nain like ten-fold thunder. Hence, I say, for the devils which tear my soul are raving within me."

Unaccustomed to her strange mood, he left her apartment hastily. She threw herself prostrate on the floor and pressed her burning forehead against the cold marble, and wept, and sorrowed mightily—for mightily had the Magdalene sinned. When she arose from her humble posture, it was past the middle watch of the night and the inhabitants of the city had gone to rest, and all was silent, save the watch cry of the sentinel as he passed the wall, and the occasional clamor of his armor as he changed from hand to hand his heavy spear. The rippling of gentle waves on the distant sea, came singing past, mingled with scented winds, which had been sleeping through the day, amid orange groves and blossoms, and the moon, like a crescent of diamonds, showered a flood of beautiful glory over the earth; but still Mary could not slumber or rest. A costly robe of crimson confined around the waist by a girdle, inwrought with precious stones, fell in rich folds around her voluptuous form, and her long black braids of hair, which when unconfined, swept the floor as she stood, were gathered up in plaits and curls, and secured by bodkins of gold, and strings of rubies and pearls. Her arms, bared almost to the shoulders, were entwined with links of precious stones and silver; and as she paced with a rapid step to and fro the apartment, the constant glitter of her feet, displayed a costly taste in her sandals which were embroidered with tiny pearls and gems, and fastened by clasps of highly polished silver. She looked out on the Heavens—peaceful and bright in the glory of azure and silver—she scanned the calm landscape below—all were at rest, the very dogs had cease baying at the moon, and were slumbering quietly in their chains. She turned and gazed round her apartment—the singing birds were sleeping with their glossy heads behind their wings, undisturbed by the fountain which bubbled from the marble laver, and trickled down its sides with a ringing sound, Addi, the beautiful one was dreaming of Zimri, for there was a tear stealing over the roses of her smiling cheek. No where that she turned, could Mary see or hear aught, to still the agonies which tore her heart. She snatched her harp and commenced many soothing melodies, but her fingers trembled, and her hand fell along the chords, and crushed the music; that was thrown aside, and crossing her arms over her bosom, she lifted her now pallid face, and closing her eyes as if to shut out every object which had grown familiar, sat like some breathless statue, awaiting the touch of Promethean fires, to start it into life; but soon her breast began to heave, and her white ghastly teeth were pressed on her lips until the red blood gushed from beneath them—she threw her arms on high, and with a cry of anguish cast herself on her knees in all the despairing sorrow of a repentance like hers. She tore from her hair the gems which fell like a shower of glory around her, and trampled beneath her feet the casket of precious jewelry, until the floor was strewn with its rich contents, and beat her bosom in her agony, and sprinkled ashes on her head, and wept tears, such as had never swelled up from her heart before.

Addi, who had been awakened by the unrestrained grief of her mistress, ran and knelt at her feet, and clasped her knees, and comprehending well, from her expressions, the cause of her woe, exclaimed—"Go to Him lady—go to Him who raised the dead!"

"And wherefore, O maiden, should I the sinful go to Him?"

"Oh lady, if the sleeper in the shadow of death, heareth His voice, thy spirit can hear it, and to hear it is to live."

The mild and consoling words of Addi, as she told of what she had seen and heard, at the raising of the widow's son, and of what the disciples preached daily, soothed Mary's troubled spirit, and something like hope of eventual peace sprung up in her heart; and she laid her head gradually on the bosom of her hand-maiden, who clasped her beauteous arms around her, and laid her cool innocent cheek on the burning, throbbing brow of Mary. And thus they sat,—one breathing hopes of forgiveness, and the other listening as if life hung on each word; until day began to dawn behind the blue hills.

On that day while the Master sat at meat with Simon, a rich and learned Pharisee of Nain, a woman came and knelt at his feet, and bending her veiled head low to the floor, watered them with her tears, and unbinding her hair, wiped them with the heavy shining curls, then kissed his feet, and anointed them with ointment, the perfume of which filled the vast room. And he knew that she was a sinner who thus humbly and silently asked for pardon, and he said—"Thy sins, which are many, are forgiven thee—thy faith hath saved thee—go in peace!"

Mary Magdalene was no more seen in Nain. After kneeling at the Saviour's feet, and hearing his assurance of forgiveness, she sold the gold and silver and gave much goods to the poor. She was no more seen in Nain in the flashed glory of her beauty, but went forth alone into the wilderness; and in the solemnitude of its silence, raised an altar to Him who had forgiven her sins.

DISCOURSES ON PRAYER....NO. III.

BY REV. DAY K. LEE.

"Pray—that ye enter not into temptation." Luke xxii: 40.

In the discourses that I have delivered on the subject of prayer, I have spoken first of its nature, of its duties, and of its privileges; considered, secondly, the examples of the sacred writers, the authority of the sacred writings, of the Saviour and the primitive disciples, as not only obligatory on us, but as great encouragements to incite us to cultivate the spirit, and perform the duty of prayer, believing that our hearts will be made better, our enjoyments will be increased, and our rational, consistent desires will be answered.

In the present discourse I shall consider the importance, and benefit, and power of prayer, in restraining impure desires, suppressing unprofitable thoughts, and keeping the individual thus engaged from temptation, from the commission and the misery of sin. The examples and precepts of Christ and the apostles on this point, are many, and impressive. The words of the text spoken to the disciples in the garden, on the mournful night of the betrayal, are a sacred and eloquent command which may be well employed as the foundation of our remarks, and profitably obeyed by all who believe and trust in the merciful God of the Christians.—"PRAY—that ye enter not into temptation."

This language suggests 1st—That the custom, the habit, the service of frequent prayer, will operate as an influence—if I may so speak,—a powerful influence—in restraining us from temptation—from designs, and inducements to do evil; and will rear a fortress as impregnable as the mountain adamant, against the wiles of the charmer, and the shafts of the destroyer.

"PRAY—that ye enter not into temptation," establish your hearts, your souls in the spirit, in the impulse, in the unceasing habit of communing with your Maker, that you enter not into temptation, that you yield not to the pleadings, and commit not the evils of transgressors.

I believe that the habit of daily, humble, ardent prayer will operate as but few things can, to ennoble our desires, and fortify us against temptation. We are creatures of sympathy and imitation. In our intercourse with our fellows, we are apt to fashion ourselves, more or less, after the society we enjoy;—the company we keep, and the individual with whom our hearts can most ardently sympathise—the individual who has most of our reverence and love, and in whose society we spend most of our time, does more than we are apt unreflectingly to apprehend, to form our characters, to fashion our habits, to temper the impulses of our hearts, and regulate the standard of our moral virtues. Is he pure in his words?—we hasten our conversation. Is he virtuous in his deeds? we seek to walk in virtuous ways. Is he lofty in his integrity, ardent in his devotions, and warm, and wakeful, and enlarged in his benevolence? we catch his manners and imbibe his spirit, and emulate his noble example. And this reverence and love for him may be indulged until—

"We have no breath, no being but in his,—
He is our voice, he is our sight,
For our eye follows his, and sees with his,
Which colors all our objects,—we have ceased
To live within ourselves,—he is our life,
The ocean to the river of our thoughts."

Again, if that individual be a character just the reverse of what we have named, and still has a hold upon your esteem, if it be possible for any man to esteem and reverence a vicious character; and you spend much of your life in his society, you will irresistibly contract the leading and ruling impulses of his mind, and follow unwaveringly in his serpent-tangled footsteps. If the standard of our moral excellence may be thus elevated or lowered, if our conversation may be thus chastened or corrupted, our benevolence thus enlarged or contracted, and our whole character moddled, and remoddled by a commerce with men that have most of our society, reverence and love;—what excellent influence may we not expect; what elevation in the standard of our integrity, our purity, our wisdom, our benevolence may we not anticipate, if God be our chosen example, and a portion of our daily existence is devoted to his service,—spent in his society, in his communion, by prayer. Prayer when frequent, ardent and sincere, will bring us into the endearing communion and sacred society of God. It lifts us up to that sublime summit of life and enjoyment from which we can converse with him as Moses did out of the cloud that overshadowed the sacred mountain, and feel that his presence is near. We are led more and more to feel that "God is in this place," and every where. We feel that his all seeing eye is always upon us, and that there is no place in earth or heaven whither he can fly from his spirit. And having this conviction written as with living fire upon the soul, and realizing that a portion of our evenings and mornings are sanctified to the sacrament of his overshadowing spirit, we will irresistibly fashion our hearts, our virtues, our sentiments, after the conceptions that we have of his adorable character. He will be most in our serious thoughts, and we will emulate his ineffable perfection, and He will color all our objects. He will be the pattern after which our conduct, and our beau-ideal of moral excellence will be moddled—He will be the perfection of our nature, the fountain of our life, "the ocean to the river of our thoughts." And the conviction will become more sacred and more wakeful, as our habits of devotion are without intermission, and the spirit of our supplications and thanksgivings is without coldness, and insincerity, that in him we live and move and have our every moment of existence.

And while we dwell upon this beautiful thought and call to mind the conceptions which Universalists entertain of their Creator; the conviction strikes us as a revelation from heaven, that, MORE THAN ANY OTHER BODY OF BELIEVERS, WE SHOULD BE GIVEN TO FREQUENT, FERVENT, SPIRITUAL PRAYER, as it is the most practicable for us to moddle our characters after that of the God we worship; he being, as we believe, the most benevolent, and the most unchanging character in the universe.—Language would fail us to give our ideas—our lofty conceptions of his goodness. We believe that he is benevolent in the fullest measure of all his attributes, and hateth nothing to which he hath given being. We believe that his justice, his holiness, his mercy, are all streams flowing from the same essential, inexhaustible fountain—LOVE;—and that John the apostle gave us the sum of his whole nature, when he said—"God is LOVE." We believe that God is love in a measure as broad, as deep, and as high as the illimitable sphere that his presence fills, that love is his essential nature, and all other attributes, all other characteristics are but different modifications of it. We believe that "he is kind," as the Saviour said, "to the unthankful and the evil." We believe that his truth never wavers, that his wisdom never falters, that his purity never falls from the infinite summit of his transcendent perfection, and that no object of his mercy, no being of his tender and eternal love, is for one moment forgotten.

Such, in brief, are our ideas of the character of God. And when we recollect, as we have stated, that the habit of frequent, ardent prayer lifts us up to his communion, and the presence and society of his spirit, and that by being in that communion, and feeling that we are constantly in that presence, we will imitate his attributes, catch as by inspiration the image of his character, and emulate his adorable, his ennobling perfections; we see how requisite—how important it is, that we cultivate the spirit of prayer, and seek the presence of our Father, and aspire after the communion of so excellent, so pure, so loving a being, day unto day, and night unto night! How important it is for the Christian, and especially the Universalist Christian, whose conceptions of God are professedly and really the most lofty, and noble—who sanctifies him—sets him apart in his bosom as the most benevolent, and most holy being in the universe—how important it is that he should walk with that God—live in his communion, and thereby imbibe his spirit, imitate his excellence, and go out into the erring world exhibiting a practical image, and imitation of that which he makes the object of his adoration. We entertain no ideas of God, and we attribute to him no excellence or perfection that we can not make practical in our own deeds and meditations. In this I humbly conceive, that we have a pre-eminence over those of an opposite faith who attribute to their Maker, designs that would be esteemed the veriest cruelty in men; and who not uncommonly exhibit an excellence of character more lovely, more benevolent, than they are willing to ascribe to God.

If, then, prayer will exalt us to the spiritual presence of the God worshipped at this altar; and the frequent enjoyment of his presence and ineffable communion, will elevate us by some secret and ennobling sympathy to an image of his purity, his love, his wisdom, from glory to glory; what excuse have we to offer if we are not devoted to prayer? what escape can we effect from the thousand temptations around us if we are not regular, if we are not living, and serious, and soul-felt in our morning and evening devotions? What fruits do we exhibit—what testimony do we show to the world, that we find reality in our religion, and that its influence is animating and holy? "Pray—that ye enter not into temptation."

If by prayer we are changed from purity to purity, and from joy to joy, into the image of God,—if by the frequency and fervency of our devotions we are influenced to feel that we walk continually in his venerable presence and his all scrutinizing sight; we shall not be easily tempted to depart from that purity of heart which we imbibe by communion with, and in imitation of him. The seducer may lay his snares, and throw out his enticements; the destroyer may come on with his wiles, and work his plausible enchantments; but we will heed them not—we find no pleasure in their enjoyments, and no refuge in their tabernacle. We have tasted and found that the Lord is good. We have been living upon that joy and salvation which are found in the mansions of the righteous. We live in communion with God, we adore the excellence of his character, and continue to rise by slow but perpetual approaches toward the standard of His infinite purity which a progress as rapid as the up-soaring of angels, and as lasting as the uncounted ages of eternity will never, never reach! We will not dash away a cup of such unmingled blessedness, and such pure, ennobling excellence as we dip up from the river of God, for the mocking animations, and the debasing pleasures of transgression! We will hold fast our integrity. We will wait upon the Lord in our daily devotions, and renew our strength in moral purity; receive new supplies of his sustaining grace, and find new and more endearing satisfactions at his altar. We will be animated with his anointed Psalmist to sing—"How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts! My soul longeth—yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord; my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God." "For a day in thy courts is better than a thousand; I had rather be a door keeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness." We will be encouraged in the darkest seasons, and in the most perilous circumstances to walk in the ways of God, and dissolve not the pearl of our virtue in any deceiving cup that may be held to our lips.

If we establish our hearts in the habit, and inclination of daily devotion—if by prayer we are brought where we feel that our Father is mercifully, and endearingly near us, and we emulate in some faint degree that sublime and unfailing truth by which his counsels stand, and by which the ponderous worlds of creation are preserved in their eternal circles; we will not be easily tempted to cast that virtue from us. We will remember the sacred injunction—"buy the truth and sell it not." We will shun the walks of the lying, as springing up with tribulation and death. We will maintain our integrity at the most perilous hazard. Our lips will speak no guile. Our name will become excellent and honorable in the earth, and our reward will be rich and glorious. Our resolutions will be sanctioned, our hands will be strengthened by that sweet communion which we enjoy with the Lord our Maker, and we will "go out with joy and be led forth with peace." Prosperity, assurance of heart, and satisfaction of mind will be our daily portion. And evils may rise and temptations may come, but our souls are anchored within the veil, and may not be moved from their heavenly moorings.

By the habit of prayer, also, if we enjoy the frequent sacrament of God's spirit, and imbibe as we unquestionably will in some trifling measure, the warm kindlings of that love which we adore in his character, we will go out into the world imitating the LOVING GOD we worship, nor be easily tempted to hate our neighbors, or cruelly wound our enemies. All professedly praying men may not, perhaps, exhibit that love in their conduct, nor show that their hearts have been in any way improved. But it is not all who profess to pray, that perform genuine devotions, or live in God's exalted communion. There are hypocrites among men, who "draw near to him with their lips while their hearts are far from him." They sin in the eye of their Maker, to blind the eyes of men. They are an abomination to him. They are "whited sepulchres filled with dead men's bones and all uncleanness." They go up and down in the world in sheep's clothing, while within they are ravening wolves. They never have tasted the first joy of pure devotion, and never have felt the influence of the strengthening, refining, ennobling spirit in their souls. They make a mock of prayers, and verily they have their reward in the burnings of an inward hell which keeps eating their heart, and their life, and their peace away.

There may be others who profess to pray without ceasing from the custom, and who perhaps are tolerably sincere in their professions, really thinking that they are devotional, and do God essential service, and who, after all, do not imitate his love in their conduct toward his creatures. These are they who have permitted the cares of the world to quench the spirit, to choke up the good seed of the kingdom, and render all their devotions a dead and unmeaning letter. While they think they are near God, they see him not, and feel not his presence. While they think they are blessed with his high communion, they are only communing with the heart of their own sordid selves, and contracting a selfishness which will lead them to esteem themselves better than others, and to oppress their less affluent neighbors. They do not design to be hypocrites, they have no particular fondness in the principle of injustice and oppression, but desires of gain, and love for the world prevent their ever coming into the spiritual presence of Jehovah. They are hearers of the word and hearers only.

But there is still another class who by their generous prayers, and supplications, and intercessions, are made to dwell with God, to live in the blessed society of his spirit, and become liberal partakers of loving kindness. These are in uncounted multitudes—these are they who are living, who are fervent, who are unmissaken in their emotions of piety. They grow in grace, they increase in spirit, they rise up from joy to joy in the Lord's communion, and are fortified against all temptations to oppress or defraud their brethren. They drink in the perfections of Him whom they worship; and their whole souls, and characters, and doings, shine out with the divine radiance and the divine excellence. They see that the Lord is an infinite fountain of kindness and love to every human soul; they feel that he will have compassion according to the multitude of his tender mercies,—they rise up to a most endearing nearness to him, and are changed more and more, as their devotions continue, into his own lovely image. They find how good and benevolent it is to imitate his perfection in love; and strive to see how much of his goodness they can manifest toward their fellows, by having a respect for every man as the offspring of God and the heir of heaven; by having a compassion for the oppressed, the destitute and down-trodden—a sympathy for the mourning, the afflicted and distressed, and a deep and melting pity for the erring and the sinful. They can not be tempted; they can not be drawn away from a desire of the greatest conceivable good, and the greatest possible happiness of all men—of the entire intelligent creation; and a noble and uncompromising endeavor to be instrumental in the enlargement of that happiness, and the promotion of that good. They love God most because he first loved all his children, and they esteem themselves like God, and most worthy of his communion when they are bestowing tokens of love upon their needy brethren, and relieving them from their griefs and burdens, their sorrows and distresses. Their missions are blessed in the earth, and their feet are beautiful upon the mountains! They conceive of no greater love which can be shown for God, than that which they bestow in imitation of his own beneficence upon their neighbor. And they attach no narrow signification to the word neighbor. They esteem him to be any person of a human form, and a human heart, who needs their assistance, or deserves their respect. Their neighbor is the mourner, weeping the departure of beloved friends; the afflicted, groaning in the pangs of disease; the disappointed, languishing and sorrowing for blighted hopes, and unpropitious prospects; the poor man famishing for bread in his humble cabin; the destitute, the wayworn, the weary; and also the opposer of their sentiments, who is entitled to their respect for his rights of conscience, the purity of his intentions and the sincerity of his heart.—And in imitation of His benevolent character, upon whom they wait in their devotions—in whose presence they live and breathe and rejoice; and from whose spirit their own soul takes its manners, its lofty affections, its sublime charity—they go to that mourner and bind up his bleeding bosom; and to that individual languishing in sickness, and beguile his anguish, smoothe down his pillow, and mitigate his pains;—they go to the despondent and cheer up his hopes, and to the poor, and weary, and heavy laden, and assure them that though their brethren may despise them, and refuse them sympathy and comfort, yet that all the benevolent love them—that Christ loves them—that God loves them with an infinite kindness, an infinite pity, and that they will soon be delivered from every oppression, and every sorrow, and raised regenerated, glorified, and disenthralled to the land of their blest inheritance.

Thus far, my brethren, I have dwelt upon the first idea suggested by the text—that a devoutness of mind, and a frequency of devotion, will bring us into a nearness to God—where, not irreverently speaking, we can enjoy the constant society and communion of his spirit, and where we may model our whole soul and its sentiments and inclinations, after the conceptions that we entertain of his adorable, his merciful character; and wearing thus his image as dear children, and walking continually in his ways, secure ourselves against the wiles of temptation.

Another brief thought, and I have done. The text says, "pray—that ye enter not into temptation." Earnestly supplicate with God, and ask him to preserve you from all inclinations to go astray—to enter into temptation. This sentiment is frequently repeated in the Scriptures. The Saviour directed his disciples in the prayer he gave them to say "abandon us not to temptation"—suffer us not to forget thy counsels, or violate thy commandments. Let us cherish this sentiment—let us follow this requirement. Let us pray morning and evening, in the field and in the mart, in the store and in the sanctuary, in the assembly and in solitude—in all places, and at all seasons, where danger lurks and transgression lays in wait to deceive, let us lift up holy hands, and devout hearts, and grateful spirits, and say, "O Lord, abandon us not to temptation, but deliver us from evil."

Very cheerfully do we give place to the following communication from Br. Br. Lumsden in reply to our remarks on the subject a few weeks ago. We did not intend, by any means, to call in question his motives in publishing the warning—nor yet sit in judgment upon the evidence he possessed; for we believe the first to be good, and only complained that the latter had not been submitted along with the warning we had received, that we might judge for ourselves.

Br. L. refers with severity to some papers that are ready to condemn errors of faith, but are silent in regard to errors of practice. I know not to whom he refers—it is enough for us, that we are not guilty. I would venture to guess, however, that if there is any one guilty, it is some one who is rather fond of blazoning abroad all the vices and abominations of preachers of other denominations; for if any thing can make a man unwilling to acknowledge the "mishaps" of his own denomination, it is just such a practice as that.

Our Western brethren are now fully and fairly warned, publicly and privately, and able to take care of themselves. If they choose to support preachers who have left the East and gone West, to evade trial; or who refuse to come forward and clear themselves of strongly alleged charges; they must abide the consequences. And if those preachers are innocent, they cannot better, nor easier, make it manifest, than by coming forward at once, and meeting their accusers face to face in a full, fair investigation of the facts of the case. One side has been heard—the other side (and every story has two sides, even if both are nearly alike) remains to be heard before a final decision should be made.

REV. LEVI CHACE—AGAIN.

BR. GROSH—Your article in the Magazine and Advocate of last Friday, concerning the above named individual, seems to me to require some exposition to set the matter right. It appears that the "caution" which I recently published in the "Warrior," with a request that our papers would copy the same, (supposing them all friendly to a pure ministry.) was the occasion of the column which you devoted to this subject. Although you placed the caution before your readers, still you say that you did it "with great reluctance." That reluctance would not have been felt by you, I am sure, if you had known fully all the circumstances which impelled me to place that caution before the public. There is sufficient, however, in the caution itself, to show that I intended to be understood as warning the friends against receiving him as a minister in good—ministerial and Christian—standing. I emphatically stated, that, he was "not connected with the denomination in any way whatever"—thereby meaning, that he was not with us in spirit or in practice, although passing himself off as a Universalist minister. And I mean now to be understood, if not before, that Mr. Chace could not have become connected with any Universalist church in Massachusetts, just before he left for the West, on account of moral, say nothing about Christian and ministerial, character. This is not mere "hear say," it is fact. I have a caution in "black and white," written me by a friend to the cause of Universalism nearly eighteen months since, putting me on my guard against Chace. I have never seen Mr. C. from that time till the present. I am well acquainted with him. I know him well. I once thought him an honest, good, sincere Christian; but the more I became acquainted with him, the more I was shaken in my confidence in the man. The first thing that led me to think him not the pure minded man which I had hitherto supposed him to be, was his fondness for every thing obscene. Such things appeared to be his chief delight; and I could not but notice it. I endeavored to make every apology for him, because he was an old man. Although, I fully expected other and better things from one of his age, and one too, professing to be a teacher of the purest system of morals ever taught upon earth. But I am now perfectly satisfied that he is an unsafe man; and if any society wish to receive him as their pastor, they have the right to do so, but not as a Universalist minister, because he is not one with us—is not connected with us in any way whatever. I mean here, that he has no more connection with us as a body, and should not be recognized as such, any more than is every member of the human family.

There is one thing which I have observed in many of our editors, which to me is a source of much regret. It is a disposition to smother the criminality of any one who will only travel about and act as an agent. But let a man broach an idea in theology which does not chime in with every notion of a few I could name, and that man is made the target for every school boy to shoot at. How different with the same individuals, when a man goes forth as a preacher of Universalism and his garments stained with licentiousness! Not a word is said, unless it be that "he is a good pioneer; he can plough the ground; he opposes the orthodox so boldly; he will do much good for the cause," and much to the same effect. The little time I have looked around me, I have seen far too much of this; and I deeply regret its existence. Such conduct should be frowned down by every lover of pure religion. Let us have pure hearted and good men in our ministry, and we can cheerfully bear the reproach and the sneers of the age. But encourage crime by silence, from mercenary or other motives, and how dare we confront the teachers of Partialism? But enough on this topic.

In regard to what you say under your 2nd head, third paragraph, I beg leave to differ from you.—Because no Church, Association, or Convention has any right to arraign an individual who has no connexion with its body, and not under its jurisdiction.* And any member of the body has the right, ay, is in duty bound, to give other portions of the body warning against imposition. Thus I have acted. When I first ascertained that Mr. C. was in Illinois preaching as a Universalist minister, I wrote forthwith to Br. Gurley about the matter, which was published in the "Star of the West," of June 12th. I have done what I conceived was my duty to our brethren who were ignorant of the matter. Since I wrote Br. Gurley, and the publication in the "Star," the friends in Peru, Ill., have written a letter making inquiry concerning the charges, etc., preferred against Chace, which has been answered fully and clearly.

The following, which is a portion of the letter to which I alluded in the beginning of this sheet, will show you what kind of a man Chace is. I received this about 18 months ago.

"I understand that Levi Chace is preaching on the Eastern Shore, and has spent considerable of his time in that section. I regret this circumstance, as it will eventually greatly injure our cause.

* NOTE BY A. B. G.—An Association, or a Society, in which the preacher resides and in which he has accepted office, is surely possessed of a better right to call him to account for misconduct, or to caution the public against him, than any individual can be. And such warning will be better heeded and confided in by the public. This is what I alluded to in the remark.

"I have no desire to injure him or any other man, but the truth of Christ is paramount to all other considerations. There is the most undoubted certainty, that he has been guilty of the act, last fall, of going to the bed-room of a lady in the depth of the night in his shirt and drawers, and on her alarming the family by her screams, he suddenly retreated, and then resorted to the miserable subterfuge of saying that it was the ghost of her departed husband that she saw.† She says positively that she knows it was Chace. It is your duty to be on your guard against him."

The above has been fully corroborated by one in whom I entertain the utmost confidence. I understand also, that Chace was advised to return from Philadelphia, before he went out West, for the purpose of clearing up the above. He promised to do so, but never did it. So he still rests under the condemnation. And all I have to say in conclusion, is, that a man who would run off to the West instead of clearing up a stain on his character near home, is a man that should be watched, and like Cain, should be marked, so that he may be known wherever he goes.

The above constitutes my reason for acting as I have done. If I have said aught that is wrong, I am sorry for it. But I feel bound to watch, and to "sound an alarm," if others who carry this motto on their front, will not, or dare not.

THE CONFERENCE IN LEE.

Br. Grosh—Our friends here are making great calculations on having a good meeting on the 13th and 14th. And it will be a thrilling and interesting one, if enough of our ministers can be induced to visit us. This section is a benighted one as it regards a knowledge of God's universal grace, and one of the objects of this Conference is, to impart new zeal and energy to the cause and society in this place.

You know the history of this society, you was its pastor in its infancy; since that time it has been gaining, progressing and improving, slowly, but surely. And they now request and hope that their brethren in the ministry will not be unmindful of their wants at the coming Conference. Shall they have the pleasure of seeing yourself and Brs. Woolley, Brown, Cook, Soule, Morey, Stuart, Kibbe, and all others who may see fit to attend and encourage us with their presence? We name these brethren, because they are within a few miles of us. What say you, brethren, shall we be cheered by your presence? We extend a like invitation to all our friends. Come one and all, that we may rejoice together, and have our spiritual strength renewed. Strangers coming the day before the meeting will inquire for the following brethren, who are the committee, L. Eames, L. D. Baker, I. Chesebrough, I. Nisbet, C. Washburn, N. Wood, or the writer.

R. QUEAL.

Lee, September 2, 1843.

REMARK.—Lee Centre is but a few miles north of Rome—six miles from Rome lives Br. I. Nisbet, one of the Committee, so that it will be easy to get there. Br. Soule and self expected to attend, of course—i. e. he did before he married a wife, and I hope still does—and I trust the other brethren will not fail to be there.

BR. GROSH—Will you allow me to reply to your remarks, contained in your paper of Aug. 25th, if I will be very brief?

1. I am not much inclined to controvert a subject with an Editor of your critical acumen, mental power and moral worth, in his own paper; with all the disadvantages attending a residence distant from the place of publication; but if done fairly I hope it will not be thought objectionable.

[Certainly, not to one determined to controvert even to the last word. A. B. G.]

2. If I understand you, when you have carefully prepared an article for the press—you would have an Editor deliberately strike out a part of it.

[Yes, or the whole of it—even to condense the whole of it, as Br. Price did, if needed. A. B. G.]

3. "Article, bearing, not Br. Morse's name."

1. Br. Morse's name occurs six times in that article, besides in the vote appointing him to prepare the minutes for publication, and besides bearing his signature as Moderator. 2. "Addition to the minutes." If I had not made other additions, more than one vote would not have been recorded at all. 3. Clerks were appointed to record, and I to prepare for publication—all acted by authority of the Council. 4. Suppose the Clerk had been "held responsible" for telling the truth.

4. "Not true according to impression." This must be a mistake. It was true according to impression, as well as in fact—for the natural import of the phrase, "without a dissenting voice," is, that no one voted against it.

I remain yours affectionately, P. MORSE.

Henderson, Sept. 1st, 1843

Perhaps Br. Morse will wish to reply again to the two brief notes above. If so, I hope he will do so—the subject is an interesting one—VERY—especially to himself.

NEW WORLD PUBLICATIONS.

JUST PUBLISHED, From the advance sheets, purchased of the Translator in London, "THE PRESIDENT'S DAUGHTERS."—Also, "NINA," a sequel to the "President's daughters. By FREDERIKA BREMER, Authoress of "The Neighbors," "The Home," &c.

Price, each, 12 1-2 cents; $8.00 per hundred; 10 copies by mail for $1.00.

These works were brought out by our London Agent, in the Great Western; and he informs us that they were not to be published in London till October—consequently, we issue them six weeks in advance of the London edition.

No author of the present day enjoys so great and well-deserved a popularity as Miss Bremer, and surely none can so well present her to the English reader, as Mary Howitt—herself one of the most delightful writers of our times.—The works now presented in the first American editions, in advance of the European publications, are, if possible, more interesting than "The Neighbors," and "Home," and we anticipate for them an immense sale.

MAGIC AND MESMERISM. A TALE OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

A story of the most intense and absorbing interest, depicting the fearful uses made of Animal Magnetism by the Jesuits, a century ago. It occupies a double number of the New World. A limited type edition only has been printed.

Price 12 1-2 cents; $8 per hundred; 10 for $1.

MARY AND MARTHA.—A beautiful work by Mrs. Ellis, well known as the most instructive and pleasing writer of the day. It is worthy a most extensive circulation, and every lady should read it, as its tendency is to make Home happy—a consummation which all should strive after.

Price 12 1-2 cents; $8 per hundred; 10 for $1.

FROISSART'S CHRONICLES.—We have frequently taken occasion to advise the readers of the New World to subscribe for this great work during its progress through the press, and while it may be had for $2, remitted by mail.—The sixth number has just been issued, and the four remaining numbers will speedily follow. After the publication of the eighth number, the price will invariably be $2.50. It was thought a wonder in England, that this work could be published at $14. The pictures, of which there are one hundred and twenty, are better in the American than the English edition.

IN PRESS, and will be speedily published, the following original works, viz: "The Village Inn and other Tales of Love and Chivalry," by Henry William Herbert, author of "Marmaduke Wyvil," "The Brothers," "Ringwood the Rover," &c.; also, a new tale by the author of "Lights and Shadows of Factory Life;" also, new romances by the authors of "Philip in Search of a Wife," and "Kate in Search of a Husband." These, and many other attractive novelties, will shortly be presented to the public from the New World office. Address,

CAMPBELL AND SKINNER'S DISCUSSION.

A friend and inquirer under date of July 10th, writes as follows:

"Rev. D. Skinner, I have lately heard much about a Discussion you held a short time since with a distinguished controversialist by the name of Campbell; and I wish to inquire, who the said Mr. Campbell is? What were the questions, or subjects discussed? and where and at what price is the work to be obtained?"

Another, under date of August 13th, writes:—"Brother Skinner, I have heard nothing for some months past concerning your old friend, or quondam opponent, Campbell—where is he or what he is about—whether he has taken or vended any copies of the Discussion, or whether it is likely to bring him any converts from Universalism—or whether, since Br. L. C. Todd's return to the belief and ministry of Universalism, Mr. C. still regards him as a gentleman of an enlarged and cultivated mind."

In answer to the first inquirer above, I would inform him that the Mr. C. spoken of is the Rev. Alexander Campbell of Bethany, Va., a liberally educated and rather celebrated clergyman, more particularly noted for his controversial talents, having distinguished himself in a great number of discussions or set controversies, the most noted of which were the one with Rev. W. L. McCalla, (Presbyterian,) Robert Owen, (Atheist,) Bishop Purcell, (Catholic Bishop of Cincinnati,) and the one on Universalism with myself. He is a dissenting Baptist, the founder of the sect calling themselves Disciples, (usually styled Campbellites, from him) and considered the Lion of the controversialists of the West; so that, if he did not overthrow and completely annihilate Universalism as he threatened he would, in his discussion with me, it was not because he was destitute either of learning, talents or celebrity.

The questions discussed were the following, viz.,

1. Are Sheol, Hades and Gehenna, (commonly translated hell,) or either of them, ever used in the Scriptures to express a place or state of endless misery?

2. Do the words olam, aion, aiionis, etc., (commonly translated everlasting, eternal, etc.) when applied to the punishment of the wicked, mean duration without end?

*3. Is there any word in human language that expresses duration without end which is not applied to the future punishment of the wicked, or which can certify us that God, angels or saints shall have duration without end? And

4. Shall eternal life, (meaning thereby endless holiness and happiness,) be, according to the Scriptures the ultimate destiny of all mankind.

Our inquirer will see at once that these four propositions embrace the main points and nearly or quite all the grounds of dispute between Universalists and Partialists.

With regard to the inquiries of our second correspondent, I observe that I hear not a syllable from my quondam opponent, Mr. Campbell, directly or indirectly. Where he is, or what he is doing I know not. He has neither ordered nor vended a single copy of the Discussion, nor, so far as I can learn, has one of his followers done so, through the length or breadth of the land. He intimated to me, before the book was published, that he wanted 1000, or 1500 copies: but I have now no idea that he did want them, or that he would have taken them on any consideration. I believe now that it was his design to lead me to publish (if I pushed at all) so large an edition as to involve me in a heavy outlay of expenses, for an edition too large for the demand, with the expectation that he would take a part of it; and then, when published, to give it (as he actually did) the ban of his prohibition to prevent his followers, and as many others as he could influence, from purchasing the work. The ground of his proscription is, that an Appendix was added (of 4 pages) to the Discussion, mostly it is true from his own pen, containing two notes from his Family Testament. These Notes he had once thanked me (how sincerely the reader can judge) for approving, and once asked me to publish in the Discussion. And when I published them in a separate article, and requested and repeatedly challenged him to do the same, that his readers might see them, he declined to the last, never let his readers see them, and when they are added to the published Discussion in an Appendix, he makes them the ground of condemning the work as "not faithfully published!" although the work in reality was faithfully published, verbatim et literatim.

But why, it may be asked, did he object to the appending of his notes to the book containing the discussion, when they had so frequently been commented on both by him and me during the discussion? I answer—and both Mr. Campbell and all our readers know it is fact—simply and alone because he knew those notes of his completely, and effectually, and forever refute and nullify all his most important and valued criticisms in this Discussion.

I have heard of no converts that Mr. Campbell has made from Universalism, by or since the Discussion. But a number of Campbellite members, and several preachers, have come out Universalists; some of them I know from reading the Discussion. When on my return from the West Indies, via Cincinnati, at the close of a sermon I there preached, a very respectable appearing lady came to me and said she must take me by the hand of fellowship, for she was a member of the Campbellite church, and had been convinced of the truth of Universalism by reading my letters to Mr. Campbell published in the Harbinger.

What Mr. C. thinks of Br. Todd now, I know not. Whether he regards him as a gentleman of an enlarged and cultivated mind, is of but little consequence either to me or Br. T. I most cordially welcome Br. T. back to the ministry of reconciliation, and none the less so for having taken away Mr. C's apparent triumph over his renunciation, and confirmed all I said to the latter concerning him, and what I had before intimated, that he was not in his right mind at the time of his renunciation.

The Discussion is a volume of between 400 and 500 closely printed large 12 mo pages, handsomely bound, and is for sale at this office, and I think also at the Universalist Bookstores in New York, Boston, Albany, Buffalo, Cincinnati, Richmond and some other places. Price $1 single, $10 per dozen, $75 per hundred.

GLEANINGS.....NO. I.

HINTS TO YOUNG SPEAKERS.

BY REV. U. CLARK.

1. Never tell an audience that you have nothing, or but a few words to say, and then deceive them, by wearying their patience for an hour or two. If you have but a few words to say, say them at once—come to the point—get through, and then sit down. If you have nothing to say of any interest, your hearers will find it out, without your telling them, what they perceive is quite evident, but what you imagine, at the same time, to be quite interesting. Critical hearers always abominate long egotistical and apologetical introductions.

2. Never say that you have made no preparations—that you are taken by surprise; and then produce a written manuscript, which your hearers observe has cost you severest labor, perhaps of days. People, in such cases, think that you intend to take them by surprise; they are not so intellectually obtuse as to be unable to detect the difference between a superficial, and a deeply studied, labored, far-fetched production. You need not be ashamed of exposing your manuscript—they ought to be gratified to know that you have thought and labored for them. This is your business. And if you appear before them unprepared, you are inexcusable for not having attended to your business.

3. Never say, at the conclusion of a long prayer, "we shall not be heard for our much speaking." That idea ought to be in your head before you begin, and then you would owe no begging apology afterwards. It is not only irreverent to Deity, but aggravating to your auditors—inasmuch as you thereby confess that you have been tiresome, and that you now wish to break off and excuse the matter to them, by saying, what any one, to their sorrow and impatience, knows to be too true.

4. Never take the advantage in prayer to communicate news to your congregation, neither to the all-comprehending and adorable Being whom you are addressing. The minds of your hearers are thereby called off from devotion, and their thoughts are rambling every where but in communion with the Father of spirits.

5. Avoid vain, heathenish repetitions, and stale expressions; which appear to be thrown in as though nothing else could be introduced as substitutions. Be not hasty, either, in your petitions; but calm, collected, composed, with your mind deeply impressed with filial awe and gratitude and humility and confidence in God, and your thoughts will then flow free and full of devotion.

6. Seek to effect no sanctimonious appearances, either in looks or tones. Sensible minded Christians do not measure piety by the elongations of disfigured countenances, nor by the length of deep drawn sighs and interjections, nor by the wrinklins of the forehead, nor by the thundering extent of an unearthly voice, tuned or pitched according to the rules of Pharisaic musical dogmatism.

Should these hints, with many others which the writer proposes to glean, be taken by beginners, like himself, many superfluous and disadvantageous habits, into which young preachers are quite liable to fall, may be remedied. The progressive state of society requires attention to this subject, and numerous failures may be attributed to an inattention, on the part of the preacher, to the manner as well as the matter. With this remark, the author submits himself with deference and humility till—more anon.

OVERCOME EVIL WITH GOOD.

In meditating on these words, my mind was led to reflect on the course pursued by those who acknowledge the propriety of heeding the divine commands. And in so doing I came to the conclusion, that there is a great deal of inconsistency in this, our world, arising from some cause which ought to be found and removed. Reader, I will first treat of the inconsistency; secondly, of the cause; and thirdly, the remedy.

First I refer to the inconsistency of a professed preacher of the Gospel of God's universal love, who preaches, Sabbath after Sabbath, to others that they should overcome evil with good, while he himself suffers his personal feelings of dislike against an individual, to prevent him from encouraging and aiding a means of general benefit to the cause, merely because the individual disliked is connected with that means! I do not say positively there are any such; but if there are, all will admit they are inconsistent. Again, I should consider it to be wrong for me to leave a religious meeting, because a brother was going to preach (who is in good fellowship) that I supposed to be unworthy. I should not think this to be overcoming evil with good.

Now for the cause. It is simply this. The outward man rules.

The remedy I propose, is, to let the inward man rule—overcome evil with good.

A LOOKER ON.

P. S.—Perhaps I may, some other day, take a peep into some other inconsistencies among preachers and laymen.

NOTHING.

Messrs. Editors—The terms future punishment, everlasting burning, eternal hell, &c., &c., are the greatest wanderers known; they never come home to any body, and are often observed to belong to every body but themselves. It is odd, but the word nobody, and the term nothing, although no certain ideas can be affixed to them, are often made use of in arguments. Great men have declared they knew nothing, and it is very common for us to talk about doing nothing; for, from the age of 10 to 20 we go to school to be taught what from 20 to 30 we are very apt to forget; from 30 to 40 we begin to settle; from 40 to 50 we think as fast as we can; from 50 to 60 we are very careful; and from 60 to 70 we cast up what all our thinking comes to; and then, what, between our losses and gains, our enjoyments and inquietudes, even with the addition of old age, we can but strike this balance—[0]. Now nothing is a hieroglyphic of part of human kind; for in life, as well as in arithmetic, there are a number of nothings, which like cyphers mean nothing in themselves, and are totally insignificant; but by the addition of a single figure at their head, they assume rank and value in an instant. The meaning of which is, that nothing may be turned into something by the single power of any one who is lord of a golden wand. Now as these persons' fears come from nothing, we suppose they will come to nothing; and happy are they who, amidst the variations of nothing, have nothing to fear; for if they have nothing to lose, they have nothing to lament; and if they have done nothing to be ashamed of, they have every thing to hope for. Thus I conclude my remarks upon nothing, which we hope are properly executed by making nothing of it.

Read carefully, and herein you may find a key that possibly will unlock a great religious secret; and although partially guilty of the crime of plagiarism still we hope to be forgiven, as our motive is good, viz., to spread light. Yours, I. F. F.

HUMAN PREDESTINATION.

BY REV. JOHN H. WILLIS.

We are, so to speak, manufacturing tears, or smiles, joys or woes, for our offspring, in every word we speak, or act we do. Their destiny, either happy, or heart-rending we are now preparing.—Look forward parents as you love your children, on the future, and say with full purpose of soul, it shall be purity and peace, honor and happiness, smiles and heaven that you will ordain as their portion. This you have the power to do. In heaven's name, will you not do it then?

I want this important truth to be sent in flaming conviction to every heart, that we hold in a great degree the future destiny of the world in our hands; and that we can make that destiny a happy one, or a sad, just as you please.

Who, believing this, will not see to it, that his life shall be such, as shall make the future remember him with gratitude as a benefactor, and speak his name with praise. Rather than that his children's children should rise up and call him cursed?

The world is full of facts that go to prove my position correct. Yes, facts and philosophy, experience and the Bible, all utter their testimony, that we are responsible for much of the virtue and vice, the happiness or the woes of posterity. Our age will be named with scorn, and justly too, for the wickedness of that which shall come after us; but honor shall be written out for us by the wise and happy, in future times, if we now live for their good.

What a withering curse that must have been to that mother's heart—what a terrible rebuke! when she visited her son in the State Prison at Auburn, he said to her "had you put the BIBLE into my hands when a child and taught me to read it, I should not have been in this place." What a lesson of solemn warning is this to parents, and guardians.

I have somewhere read of a young man about to be executed who desired that his mother might be permitted to come upon the stand, for he wanted to speak one word to her before his death. She came to him; he bent forward as all thought to speak in a whisper to her, instead of which he bit off a piece of her ear. She started back, horror struck, exclaiming, "for what is this my son?" He answered, "that ear heard me speak falsehoods and blaspheme the God, and defy the laws of the State when a child, without leading you to correct, or teach me better." Comment is unnecessary.

How many a wretched felon could say the same, none but the Searcher of all hearts can tell. The three Thayers executed at Buffalo some years since, confessed on the gallows that in childhood and youth, that they were permitted to spend their Sabbaths in hunting, fishing, gambling and drunkenness. Their moral and religious education, was utterly neglected. There are scores of similar cases.

But let us turn to the brighter side of human influence. Men of eminent virtue and talents, ascribe their celebrity to some strong and happy impressions, received in childhood from those who had the formation and moulding of their minds.

Sir William Jones declared that his veneration for truth and his successful pursuit in useful literature, were entirely owing to the early precepts of his mother. But not to tire the reader with too many examples of this character, I will close with giving the very interesting anecdote recorded in the life of the illustrious West.

His mother on discovering some of the efforts of his early genius for painting, stooped down and kissed him. "That kiss," said he, "made me a painter." His mother by that well timed and affectionate approbation, kindled and encouraged the genius of the young West, and stamped his mind with a deep love for that fine art, in which he was so celebrated in after life.

The tender and pliant minds of children receive impressions readily. They mould like soft wax. The impress of an angel or a demon, may now be easily stamped upon them. Woman, how much depends upon your tender influence! O! give your earnest heed to this important work. Immense is the responsibility that rests upon all who have the care of children; especially upon women. She gives the earliest direction to minds that possess mighty energies to bless or curse the earth.

Now may be kindled the first impulses, that may end in those terrible vices and crimes, that make humanity to mourn or that they make a man to seem truly a bright emanation from heaven, sent to gladden, to beautify, and to bless the children of men.

How much too little is thought of the calamities that may be brought down upon society by the thousand poor, ragged, starving, ignorant thievish boys, that wander idly about the streets of cities, and large towns; leaving nothing but deception, profanity and vice. O! pick them up, ye lovers of safety and peace. Feed them—clothe them—educate them, mentally, morally, and religiously. Make them good men, and useful citizens, or they will be your scourge! You must live for their good, or they may live to your hurt.

Ye rich men, happy in the thoughts of security, and exulting in your affluence—see you not that dingy faced boy, in rags by the way side? He cries to you for bread, hear him, or you may repent it. Take him out of the street to some safe retreat, and see that he is rightly trained, though it cost you cash. He may make a Washington or a Franklin, and be to his country and you a benefit, a glory. Leave him in his rags, his ignorance, his sins, and he shall prove your bane!—become a Gibbs perchance, and make the perils of old ocean, on which floats your merchandise, more terrible, from thoughts of horrid pirates. Or he may wrap your marble palaces in flames about your heads, at midnight hour, that he may filch away some miserable pittance. We live for each other. "If one member suffers, all the members suffer with it. Or if one member be honored, all the members rejoice with it."

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS.

MY DEAR FRIENDS: It has not been the want of inclination or forgetfulness, that has kept me from this public acknowledgement of your kind regard, and favors bestowed upon myself and afflicted family. Many thanks are due to those whose Christian philanthropy sustained and comforted us in the days and months of our adversity.

It was a sad reality that awakened your kindness. My wife was brought down upon a bed of painful illness, where she had been confined about six months; but thanks be to God, she has been brought up from the borders of the grave to mingle with her family and friends, and spend a few more days in the social circle, amid the surrounding providence of a kind and unchanging Saviour.

Our son is now no more; his painful and protracted illness has required my whole time and care for more than four months past, so that I have been confined at home with the sick in my family about ten months.

There have been two circumstances, in my affliction, that have contributed not a little to depress my spirits; the want of social meetings in the house of worship, and my exclusion from the active exertions in the ministry of the Gospel of life and salvation. I would have gone out and preached the kingdom of God to my fellow men, but I could not, for God had another lesson for me to learn; I must pass through the vale of humility and tears. It was for me to know the fatigues, cares, and deep anxieties of a husband and father bending over the couch of pain and protracted illness. This I could not have learned in prosperity, nor in the splendid drawing-room, for that is not the place to learn dependence and humility. Had it been, Christ would have chosen it, rather than the open world, without a house where he might lay his weary head.

It was for me to see my friends in the house of affliction, and receive from them their kind favors that never failed to melt my heart into tenderness and my eyes into tears.

It is good for us that we are made to suffer in this transitory world of temptation and sin. It is also good for us to be brought low at the foot of the cross, as well as at the feet of Sovereign and Divine mercy. The greater our afflictions here, the greater will be our deliverance and salvation when we are healed of all our woes.

Our suffering child has gone to that holy state of ineffable bliss, for which he has been for a considerable time preparing, under the discipline of Providence, and the sanctifying grace of the Redeemer.

When his wounds of sin were healing,

Then his heart was all resigned—

Then a solemn feast of feeling,

Was a banquet to his mind.

Clothed in Heaven's best robe he stood,

On death's dark and dreary shore,

He gaz'd beyond the swelling flood,

And seem'd as one already o'er.

FUNERALS, LECTURES.

BY REV. B. B. BUNKER.

Without any rhetoric, and, indeed, without using many words, I wish to correct a matter connected with the labors of the minister of the Gospel, at all events so far as I am concerned.

I wish to say to my friends who are not connected with the society with which I may be connected now and hereafter, and especially as they do not in any way contribute to the support of said Society, neither by their money or attendance, and who may have occasion to call for my services to attend funerals and lecture in their midst, that, although I consider it my duty to answer such calls, and to be to the expense of keeping a horse and carriage for such service, yet I consider it also the duty of those who are able to assist me to money to meet my expenses, and take care of a dependant family, to do so, and do it freely. I have suffered sufficiently in this matter. I remember last winter of attending a funeral in a very wealthy family, it was on the notorious cold Monday;—it was only six miles distant:—I was five hours getting home, through cold and snow, horrible beyond description; and yet not one solitary thank did I get—which, by the way, was better than though they had thanked me—nor one solitary cent to bring bread or clothing. This is not a solitary instance in six year's ministry. I have had too many of them. I will cheerfully answer the calls of the poor, I will sacrifice anything for them in times of affliction. They must not think of paying me anything. But the able must, or they need not call for me.

Will Br. Grosh copy the above and remark as he thinks best? I should like to hear from him in the matter.

REMARKS.

I know not why Br. Bunker should so particularly wish to hear my remarks on the above subject; but, though not a pleasant one, and rather a delicate one, I do not feel quite free to decline complying with his request. And as nothing is gained by handling a delicate subject very delicately, (there being many people among those most deeply interested in not understanding you, who will not know what you mean unless you use the very plainest language,) here goes to speak about it in as business-like a manner as possible.

Clergymen, by the customs and notions of society, are not allowed to make charges for their services, as are farmers, laborers, mechanics, and professional men generally. If they do, they are considered sordid, mean and unfit for their station, and are soon treated with contempt. Yet it is a fact that, (except in a very few instances,) they are treated just as all other men are, in the way of business charges against them. They have to pay for their schooling and books—when they go to study for their profession, they have to pay for their boarding, lodging, washing and clothing, just as other men do. If they get books, they must pay for them—if they use a horse and carriage, or keep one, it costs them money, just as much as it does any other person—in most cases, too, they have to pay turnpike gates, blacksmiths, and waggonmakers just as much as other people. And even if they go on foot, it costs them as much time and shoe-leather as it does any other foot traveller. In short—every thing costs the minister time and money in these days, as well and as much as it does other people, of any other calling or employment.

After a young man, at a considerable expense of money, time, and labor, has qualified himself to enter the ministry—has purchased the beginning of a library—and commenced life in his new profession, his expenses are not at an end. If he has a family, they will need a support—if not, he will—and a support, too, in accordance with the requirements of his society. They may ask (by actions and custom) that he live in a certain kind of style (and style always costs labor and money)—that he entertain strangers, and relieve the poor who are always sent to him! (and that costs time, labor and money)—that he dress and appear as well as other ministers (and that costs money)—that he visit considerably (and that costs time—and money, too, to get the work done about his house which he is thus prevented from doing)—that his wife visit a good deal, and superintend various matters in the society (and that requires her to hire help, and thus more time, labor and money are needed). Now all this may be required by them without their speaking a word to him—and for every moment he gives them, he takes one away from his own use, which he has to make up in some way, or at some cost. This it is, that makes it necessary for clergymen to be paid for the whole week, and not for their Sunday labor only. This it is, too, that makes it only justice to pay a minister, lawyer or physician a larger sum for the apparent hour's labor, than the single hour would seem to demand—because, in order to prepare for that hour's labor, the professional man spent years of time and labor, besides much money.

Well—the society where the minister settles, knows these things, and pays him a suitable sum—sufficient to enable him to devote nearly all his time and all his talents to their service. Every member of that society has now a right to call on the preacher to perform the duties of his office. He visits the sick, prays with the dying, comforts the mourners, attends funerals, makes calls on the families, promotes the welfare of schools, literary associations, temperance, &c., &c., in his neighborhood, and does all other things pertaining to his office without charge. Why? Because that society has paid him, in his salary, for doing these very things. If, therefore, he goes to farming, merchandizing, or speculating in any way, he is censured justly for doing so; because he is employing time not justly his own, for his own benefit, to the neglect of his duties.

But suppose he employs that time for the benefit of persons not belonging to the society—does that render it any more just? Certainly not. A preacher who neglects his own society to lecture before other societies, (either for their benefit or his own,) does his society injustice and wrong. I have known preachers who were habitually culpable in this respect. They were half their time running away from their duties at home, to attend meetings, funerals and lectures abroad—to visit among strangers—while their people at home were needing their services in many ways—services, too, for which they were paying their absent preacher a fair sum of money, week by week.

But, to return to the main subject, which I think must, by this time, begin to look the reader in the face. The most of our societies allow their preachers to visit places around them, and attend funerals in the vicinity, that he may thus add some what to the small salary they are able to pay him. In such cases, the leisure time and self-labor thus allowed to the minister, are a part of his capital, out of which he is expected to make up the deficiency of his salary, so that he may be able to live and appear according to the reasonable expectations of his society. It is no less injustice to his society, than to himself and his family, to dissipate away that leisure time allowed him, in such a manner as to involve him and them in disappointment, trouble or disgrace. Yet if he does spend it in running around, without receiving any compensation for it, his income will not be sufficient to support him properly, and he must disappoint the expectations of his society as to his appearance, and entertainment of strangers—or he must run in debt for a part of his living, which must eventually give him and his friends great trouble, and may finally end in deep and deserved disgrace.

Now look at the circumstances (and though I have named a great many, I have not named half of what might very properly be named) look at what has been stated, and answer candidly in view of them all—is it righteous—is it honest—is it even DECENT for a man able to pay, to send for a clergyman to attend a funeral, or a wedding, or a lecture, out of his society, and then leave him to pay horse and carriage hire, (or keeping, for it is the same thing in the actual cost at the year's end,) and lose his time and labor? Would any man of common sense, and common honesty and decency, even dream of treating any other than a minister in this manner? Would you send for a farmer to come five or ten miles, with a horse and plough, to plough your lot, and then allow him to return home, and expect he never would charge you any thing for his time, labor and expense? Would you expect a lawyer or a doctor to go as far to visit you, and labor for you at his own cost, and charge you nothing for doing so? Would you go, yourself, under such circumstances, and lose your time and labor? Would you deem any man honest or decent who could ask you to go for him, under such circumstances, especially if you knew he was better to be able to pay you, than you were to go for nothing?

But, you may allege, the minister has never charged any thing for his services—he has not sent in his bill, and been refused payment—and therefore he has no right to complain. So! because the customs of society will not allow him to make a regular charge, he is to lose it! Shame on any man who will take such an advantage of his fellow man, merely to save a few dollars! The debt is one of honor—of sacred, solemn, religious honor—and should be paid more promptly, and willingly, and fully, than if it could be collected by law, instantly. No man, worthy of the name, will gainsay this. The more difficult it is to collect a debt actually due, the more readily will a truly honest and honorable man discharge it—whether owing to a minister, whom custom will not allow to sue for it; or to a newspaper-publisher, who can not well sue, by reason of distance. When will men become so honorable and honest, as to feel this to be true?

In conclusion—I say any minister is justified—I believe it is his duty—to refuse to attend a funeral at his own cost of time, labor, and money, in a family, none of whose members support the preaching of the restitution, and who he knows are able to reward him for his services, but will not do it. It is his duty to let such “dead bury their dead”—his duty to himself, to his family, to his society, to the world. I take the case of a funeral, because it is the strongest that can be adduced, and will therefore include all other cases. I know that this avowal may call up the cry of “hireling,” “mercenary,” “miserly” and “unfeeling priest”—but I can not help it—I believe, and so I speak. I have been without a cent of money in my pocket—dunned by creditors—my family wanting comforts, and necessities, even, which I could not get for them without running deeper into debt—and while thus, I have been called on to attend a funeral ten miles off. I have hired a conveyance, neglected pressing business that would have brought me money, gone through storm and cold to the injury of my health, performed funeral services, and returned home unpaid, to ask the livery stable keeper to trust me until I could pay him the additional debt thus incurred—not to say anything of my family's expenses during the time thus lost! Let any man, with a just regard for his family and his creditors, be placed in such circumstances, and be served thus once, and then be asked to go, a second time, and attend a funeral in that same family, and will he not be “mercenary and unfeeling” enough to refuse going? I am convinced, after much conversation on the subject with clergymen of different denominations, that such cases as I have given above are too common. No class of men are called on to perform so many and so great gratuitous professional services, as clergymen. Doctors and Lawyers lose much, I know—so do others—but they can sue, and attempt a recovery by law—their incomes are, also, in general, much greater, so that they can afford it. But clergymen are expected to perform much gratuitously—it is demanded of them by public feeling and opinion, as a part of their business—and this, too, when their incomes are small and uncertain;—and the demand is frequently made by persons who pay not one cent of their income—by persons, even, who talk of priestcraft, and a hireling ministry!

Reader—if you want to know any thing further of the sufferings of the tribe of Levi, ask your pastor, or any other experienced member of the profession. Aaron has said his say, for the present. A. B. G.

THE STRAIT GATE.

“Enter in at the strait gate: for wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat. Because strait is the gate and narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it.” Matt. vii: 13, 14.

Time was, when almost each Christian sect considered its peculiar church members to be the alone righteous, and all others of its own sect, and very nearly all of all other sects, to be doomed to perdition, that this passage was considered very descriptive of the very few—the ones out of the thousands—that would be saved, while the other 999 out of each 1000, who were regarded as certainly destined to endless sin and wo, were also as faithfully set forth in the passage. But a brighter light is beginning to be shed on their Bibles. The so-termed orthodox sects regard each other as Christians, and believe that not only these sects, but all infants, and idiots, and nearly all heathens, and many heretics are going to heaven—so that now they have almost reversed their former view. The one out of a thousand is going to hell—and the other 999 to heaven—and so the words of Dr. Watts are no longer sung with that peculiar relish which spiritual pride and exclusiveness formerly imparted to them.

“Broad is the way that leads to death
And thousands walk together there;
But wisdom shows a narrow path,
With here and there a traveller.”

Heaven, if not enlarged beyond the former limits assigned to it, is in danger of being over crowded—and the spacious fields of fire of the other region will well nigh prove to be a burning desert.

We mention these things in no complaining spirit—they show the rapidly increasing tendency of the Christian world towards Universalism, as light is increasing, and the spiritual visions of the religious world are growing strong enough to read the Bible by it. Among others, Dr. Adam Clark, who in so many of his interpretations of the Scriptures is some centuries ahead of the Methodist church, has given us a very correct application—I do not say exposition—of our text. He says of the injunction to do unto others as we would be done by—"This is a most sublime precept, and highly worthy of the grandeur and beneficence of the just God who gave it. The general meaning of it is this—Guided by justice and mercy, do unto all men as you would have them do unto you, were your circumstances and theirs reversed. None but he whose heart is filled with love to God and all mankind, can keep this precept, either in its spirit or letter. Self love will feel itself sadly cramped when brought within the limits of this precept—but God hath spoken it: it is the spirit and design of the law and the prophets: the sum of all that is laid down in the sacred writings, relative to men's conduct towards each other. It seems as if God had written it upon the hearts of all men, for sayings of this kind may be found among all nations, Jewish, Christian, and Heathen."

And of the text itself—"Enter into the strait gate"—he says—"Our Saviour seems to allude here to the distinction between the public and private ways mentioned by the Jewish lawyers. The public roads were allowed to be 16 cubits broad; the private ways only 4. The words in the original are very emphatic: Enter in (to the kingdom of heaven) through this strait gate—i. e. of doing unto every one as you would be should do unto you; for this alone seems to be the strait gate to which our Saviour alludes." A. B. G.

ANOTHER CHANCE.

We have come to the conclusion (for which we shall give some good and sufficient reasons some of these days) to place the Magazine and Advocate on the advance pay system, at the commencement of next volume. Now then, will be a good opportunity for those who have not paid for the current volume and who feel disposed to assist in sustaining our paper, to save the fifty cents due us after the first of May, last, by sending three dollars free of postage, and be credited in full for this year (1843) and next, (1844).

THOMPSON'S BANK NOTE REPORTER.

This paper is one of the best, if not the best of its kind published in the United States. It is much preferred to the old, and long standing, "Day's Counterfeit Detector," by most business men. It contains all the general and useful news concerning Banks, prices of Gold and Silver coin, whether foreign or domestic. And prices current of the most common and valuable vegetable productions of the States. It is such a paper as should be a regular visitor at the offices and stores of every merchant and business man. Its terms are:—Monthly, $1.00; Semi-monthly, $2.00; Weekly, $3.00; Semi-weekly, $5.00. Address J. Thompson, 52 Wall street, New York.

We are in the daily expectation of the reception of a quantity of the Rose of Sharon for 1844. It is said to be superior to that for 1843, as regards matter, illustrations, &c., and will be sold as usual, at the low price of two dollars.

We hope our western friends will embrace the opportunity of sending their dues for the Magazine and Advocate by our preachers, attending the Convention, from this section. We need the money. Br. J. S. Kibbe is authorized to receive money on our account.

DEATHS.

In Pittsford, Monroe county, N. Y., on Tuesday, 8th ult., Mr. STEPHEN MILES, son of the Rev. S. Miles, aged 35 years, 2 months and 19 days.

In this dispensation of divine Providence, the deceased has suffered beyond the power of man to describe. He was most sorely afflicted with the scrofula, which deeply afflicted his left eye, hip, and foot. He bore his protracted illness with an uncommon degree of fortitude and resignation. Seldom are we called to witness a more humble, calm, and happy being in the hour of death. He was sensible of his approaching dissolution some weeks before his exit, and made choice of Br. Cook to preach at his funeral; which has been granted. He also selected the text for this mournful occasion, 1 Cor. xv: 51-55. He was deeply devoted in prayer and singing. His favorite hymn contains the following lines:—

Soon will the wheels to piece break,
The fountain dry, the fabric shake,
The silver cord untie;
My days will end, my night will come,
My body lodg'd in yonder tomb,
My soul above the sky.
Well, if my days must end so soon,
My morning sun go down at noon,
The present I'll improve;
I'll take the cross, the shame despise,

And seek my mansion in the skies,
And bid the world adieu.

About two hours before his death, he called his father and mother, brothers and sisters to his bedside, and shook hands with them, and bade them a final farewell until they should meet in a higher holier and happier world, where parting is no more.—[Luminary.]

ANOTHER PATRIOT OF THE REVOLUTION GONE.—On August 11th, at the residence of his son-in-law, in Ellisburg, Jefferson county, JAMES GAULT, a soldier of the Revolution, in the 86th year of his age.

Br. Gault had, for many years, been a firm believer in the great salvation. His faith was his support in the decline of life; and during his last illness he frequently expressed to his relatives and friends, his unwavering confidence in the universal grace and goodness of God; thus giving another evidence that the doctrine of universal salvation is not only good to live by, but affords the sweetest consolation in the hour of death. His funeral was attended on the 12th ult., and agreeably to his request, the consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourning friends and relatives, by Br. O. Wilcox. D. STEARNS.

AND YET ANOTHER.—In Stratford, Fulton county, July 26th, Mr. ALLEN CLAFIN, a Revolutionary soldier, aged 87 years and 6 months. A. S. G.

In Exeter, Otsego county, on the 15th ult., Mrs. SALLINDA, wife of Mr. Henry G. Harding, and daughter of Mr. Nathan Brainard, in the 31st year of her age.

Thus has consummated another of the excellent of the earth its prey. For two full years she struggled with the destroyer, but at last was compelled to yield herself a victim. Adorned with the panoply of the Gospel, she bore disease with fortitude and cheerfulness. Endowed with more than ordinary intellect, and a faith in the final triumph of grace over sin and death, she remained unwavering till the last. For a time she expressed a desire to live for the sake of her children; but for the last month she gave up all in perfect reconciliation to God, evincing the strength and power of Universalism both in sickness and in death, when she fell asleep in Jesus, leaving a husband, two children, a father, two brothers and a sister, with a large circle of connections and friends to mourn her loss, but not without hope.

On the 16th ult., her funeral rites were performed in the Presbyterian church in that town, attended by a very large congregation of deeply sympathizing friends, who evinced their affection for her memory. The services were performed by the writer. JOB POTTER.

In Marshall, Oneida county, August 25th, Mrs. SOPHIA M., wife of Mr. Lucius Tius. Mrs. T. was one of those persons naturally of a cheerful temperament, a worthy companion, an affectionate mother, and respected by all who knew her worth. Her funeral was attended at the Universalist church on Sunday, the 27th, and a discourse delivered to a large assembly of sympathizing friends, from 2 Tim. i: 10, illustrating that life and immortality were brought to light through the Gospel, for the whole family of man. C. S. BROWN.

** Will the Luminary please notice the above for the benefit of her western friends?

In Novi, Mich., July 27th, of a congestion of the brain, Mrs. MARY ANN, consort of Mr. William Woodman, and daughter of Mr. B. Smith, of Henderson, Jefferson county, N. Y., aged 24 years, 3 months and 4 days.

By this blow of Divine Providence, a young and tender husband is bereft of one of the best and loveliest of companions, who was endeared to him by all the tender ties of our nature, and all the fondness of woman's love; with the care of an infant only nine days old.

She was beloved and esteemed by all who knew her; and is universally lamented in her death. Her disease was such as to render her insensible to her situation the most of the time after her case was considered hopeless, but at intervals she appeared to enjoy her reason, and manifested a particular willingness to die, for she enjoyed a rational hope of immortal glory.

Her funeral was attended on the 18th, by a large congregation of mourning relatives and sympathizing friends, and an appropriate discourse delivered by the writer, from 2 Sam. xiv: 14. J. H. SANFORD.

REMINISCENCES.

BY MISS CELIA M. TIBBITS.

"She was far from the sweet home of her young infancy,
 An orphan in a strange and distant land."—L. E. L.

I'm thinking of my childhood,
 And of my early home,
 Of all the bright and joyous scenes
 Through which I've loved to roam.

The music of its waters comes stealing on my ear
 In low and gentle cadences unheard for many a year.

I'm thinking of the mother that watched my infant years,
 Who soothed me by her kindness, and kissed away my tears.

But her voice is hushed forever in death's eternal sleep;
 Sad thoughts are flitting o'er me, O leave me here to weep!

The glad eye of my sister is beaming o'er me now,
 And golden curls are clustering like sunlight o'er her brow:
 O she indeed was beautiful! I loved that sister well,
 She ever breathed around me a more than fairy spell.

I'm thinking of my schooldays, and of my early friends,
 Of all the youthful fancies a happy spirit blends;
 For life was then a vision more fair than aught of earth.
 And there seemed naught in coming years to check my girlish mirth.

O how these moments hastened by! and years went flying on So lightly, that I wondered oft, where has my childhood gone?

And as I wandered forth and gazed upon the sunlit earth,
 I thought 'twas strange 'mid scenes so fair there could be aught but mirth.

Cowasalone, August, 1843.

THE CHANGES OF FORTUNE.

The following tale illustrates one of the many instances of distress among the poor seamstresses of the city, and the lady who has communicated it for publication in the Mirror, vouches for its authenticity.

"Do you give work here?" said a voice so soft, so lady like, that I involuntarily looked up from the purse
 I was about purchasing for my darling boy, a birth-day gift from his papa:

"Do you give out work here?"

"Not to strangers," was the reply.

The stranger turned and walked away.

"That purse is very cheap, ma'am."

"I do not wish it now," said I, as, taking up my parasol, I left the shop and followed the stranger lady.

Passing Thompson's, she paused—hesitated—then went in—and came out. I now saw her face—it was pale—her hair, black as night, was parted on her forehead—her eyes, too, were very black, and there was a wildness in them that made me shudder. She passed on up Broadway to Grand street, where she entered a miserable looking dwelling. I paused—should I follow farther? She was evidently suffering much—I was happy—blessed with wealth, and O, how blessed with husband, children, friends! I knocked—the door was opened by a cross looking woman.

"Is there any person here that does plain sewing?" I enquired.

"I guess not," was the reply. "There is a woman up stairs who used to work, but she can't get any more to do, and I shall turn her out to-morrow."

"Let me go up," said I, as passing the woman with a shudder, I ascended the stairs.

"You can keep on to the garret," she screamed after me—and so I did; and there I saw a sight of which I, the child of affluence, had never dreamed! The lady had pulled off her hat, and was kneeling by the side of a poor low bed. Her hair had fallen over her shoulders—she sobbed not, but seemed motionless, her face buried in the covering of a wretched, miserable bed, whereon lay her husband. I looked upon his high pale forehead, around which clung masses of damp brown hair—it was knit, and the pale hand clenched the bed clothes—words broke from his lips—"I can not pay you now," I heard him say, poor fellow! I could bear it no longer, and knocked gently on the door. The lady raised her head, threw back her long hair, and gazed wildly upon me. It was no time for ceremony—sickness, sorrow, want, and perhaps starvation were before me—"I came to look for a person to do plain work," was all I could say.

"O, give it to me," she sobbed. "Two days we have not tasted food!—and to-morrow—" She gasped and tried to finish the sentence, but could not,
 She knew that to-morrow they would be both homeless and starving!

I kept my word. In a few days she told me all: of days of happiness in sunny West-India's Isles—her childhood's home; of the death of her father and mother—of a cruel sister and brother-in-law—how she left that home, hoping to find a home in America—how she sought in vain, but instead found a husband; he, too, an Englishman, a gentleman and a scholar, had been thrown upon the world. Sympathy deepened into love; alone in the crowd, all the world to each other, they married—he procured employment in a school;
 she, plain needle work. Too close attention to the duties of his school, long walks and scanty fare, brought ill health, and confined him at length to his bed.

The shop from which his poor wife obtained work, failed, and their resources were cutoff. She had looked long, weary days for employment—many had none to give—others "gave no work to strangers." Thus I found them—to comfort them for a little time—then, I trust, they found indeed, a comfort in heaven!

The husband died first—died, placing the hand of his poor wife in mine! I needed not the mute, appealing look he gave me; I took her to my own happy home, but it was too late!

It was a very little time ago, I went one morning to her room; she had passed a restless night; had dreamed, she said, of her George; she called me her kind and only friend; begged me to sit a little while beside her, and looked so sadly in my face, that my own heart seemed well nigh breaking. I left her not again. In the still, deep night, I heard her murmur, "Sister Anne, do not speak so harshly to me! O, mamma, why do you leave me?" Then again she said, "Give me an orange, my sister, I am very faint." Her soul was again in her own sunny home.

"Lay me by my George, and God will bless you," were her last words to me. I led my hushed children to look on her sweet pale face, as she lay in her coffin.
 They had never seen sorrow or death, and then I gave them the first knowledge of both; and then I told them of the sin, the cruelty of those wound the "stranger's heart."

THE STRAIGHT WAY TO HEAVEN.—An itinerant preacher of more zeal than discretion, was in the habit of accosting those he met in his walks, and enquiring into their spiritual welfare. Passing along a country road that led through a small settlement, he met a simple country fellow driving a cart loaded with corn. "Do you believe in God, sir?" said he to the countryman.
 "Yes, sir," was the instant reply. "Do you read your Bible, pray to your Maker, and attend divine worship regularly?" And this string of questions was also answered in the affirmative. "Go in your way rejoicing, my lad," continued he, "you are on the high way to heaven." Clodpole flourished his whip, and drove on much delighted, no doubt, with the blessed intelligence.
 Another person came up by this time, and he also was interrogated with an unceremonious—"Do you believe in God, sir?" "What have you to do, sir, with what I believe!" replied the person accosted, with a look of surprise. "You are in the gall of bitterness, and boud of iniquity," cried the offended preacher—"look at that poor lad whistling along the road, and driving his cart before him, he is on the straight way to heaven." "It may be so, sir," said the person interrogated, "but to my certain knowledge, if he's going there, he's going with a cart load of stolen corn."

THE LAMA.

The lama is the only animal associated with man and undebased by the contact. The lama will bear neither beating nor ill treatment. They go in troops, an Indian walking a long distance ahead as a guide. If tired, they stop, and the Indian stops also. If the delay is great, the Indian, becoming uneasy towards sunset, after all sorts of precaution, resolves on supplicating the beasts to resume their journey. He stands about fifty or sixty paces off, in an attitude of humility, waves his hand coaxingly towards the lamas, looks at them with tenderness, and at the same time, in the softest tones, and with a patience I never failed to admire, reiterates "ie-ie-ic." If the lamas are disposed to continue their course, they follow the Indian in good order, at a regular pace, and very fast, for their legs are extremely long;

 but when they are ill-humored they do not even turn their heads towards the speaker, but remain motionless, huddled together, standing or laying down, and gazing on heaven, with looks so tender, so melancholy, that we might imagine these singular animals had the consciousness of another life, of a happier existence. The straight neck, and its gentle majesty of bearing, the long down of their clear and glossy skin, their supple and timid motions, all give them an air at once noble and sensitive.
 It must be so, in fact; for the lama is the only creature employed by man that he dare not strike. If it happens (which is very seldom) that an Indian wishes to obtain, either by force or threats, what the lama will not willingly perform, the instant this animal finds itself re-proved by word or by gesture, he raises his head with dignity, and without attempting to escape ill-treatment by flight, (the lama is never tied or fettered,) he lies down, turning his looks towards heaven—large tears flow from his eyes, sighs issue from his breast, and in half or three quarters of an hour at most, he expires.—
 Happy creature, who appears to have accepted life on condition of its being happy! The respect shown to these animals by the Peruvian Indians amounts to reverence.

When the Indians load them, two approach and caress the animal, hiding his head that he may not see the burden on his back. If he did he would fall down and die. It is the same in unloading. If they exceed a certain weight the animal throws himself down and dies.
 The Indians of the Cordilleras alone possess enough patience and gentleness to manage the lama. It is doubtless from this extraordinary companion that he has learned to die when he is overtaken.—[Foreign Quarterly Review.

THE CHANGE.—"Poor Jim is dead!" said a Washingtonian yesterday. "What a change! Four years ago I was a poor miserable drunkard, and he was a respectable tippler, with plenty of money. Now I am a reformed man, doing well; he has just died in the poor house, and buried in Potter's Field."

Is here not a true one? How many such cases have occurred!—The reformed Washingtonian goes up, up, up—while the moderate drinker goes down, down, down!

A vagabond called at a house one Sunday, and begged for some cider. The lady refused to give him any, and he reminded her of the oft quoted remark, that she might "entertain an angel unawares." "Yes," she said, "but angels don't go about drinking cider on Sundays."

ENDLESS MISERY CONTRARY TO REASON.

BY REV. A. SCOTT.

By searching the volume of Inspiration we find much instruction relative to the course we should pursue, as well, also, the effects which shall follow certain causes. But, in looking at these causes and their effects, man has arrived at various conclusions, the most prevalent of which, is, that the effects produced by vice, are eternal in their nature—that the punishments, which God will inflict upon his erring children, shall have no end. This theory, however, is in direct contradiction of the principles of nature and reason: volumes upon the same subject, and by the same author.

It is a principle of natural philosophy, that a stream can not rise higher than the fountain—that no effect can exist without a cause—and that no effect can be greater than the producing cause; also, that an effect is something growing out of, consequently depending upon, the cause, and must necessarily possess a strong connection therewith. Reasoning from these premises, we arrive at one great, and glorious conclusion, viz., that as the evils of which man is guilty, are finite, the effects growing out of these evils must be finite also. Sin being finite, must necessarily produce finite consequences, else there is no connection between the cause and the effect. It is impossible in the very nature of things, for a finite cause to produce an infinite effect. An infinite can not grow out of a finite—it can not be depending thereupon. An infinite may produce a finite, as may be discovered in those things that are seen which are temporal.—These come from, and were produced by, an infinite God; but all the finites, which the world contains, can not comprehend, much less produce an infinite. This is the case with man; he is a finite being, and as such, can not perform an infinite work. His acts must like himself be limited. It is beyond his utmost power to do a work which shall in any degree compare with infinity, and as such, he can not be deserving of infinite punishment, which at once, destroys the doctrine of endless suffering.

I know, however, that it is declared by many, yea, by the majority of the Christian world, that man in violating the laws of God, violates an infinite law, consequently must, in order to receive a full compensation, suffer endless torture. The conclusion here drawn I acknowledge is a correct one—the inference is natural, viz., that man has committed an infinite sin, if so be that the law is infinite. But I deny the premise. For such a premise there must be a foundation upon which it can rest; but here there is no foundation, as before shown; consequently the premise will not bear the scrutiny, and as a matter of course, all conclusions founded thereupon, are good for nothing, and fall to the ground of themselves.

The ground upon which this is founded is, man has violated an infinite law; consequently the act must be an infinite sin, and the consequences depending thereupon must be infinite also. This too is correct—it is natural reasoning—but I must be permitted to dissent from the foundation. I must deny that the law transgressed by man is infinite, from the fact before laid down—that a stream can not rise higher than the fountain from whence it issues. Man is limited in his nature; so much so, that it is impossible for him to become amenable to an infinite law. Such a law is beyond his comprehension—he can not understand it—he can not fulfil the requisitions thereof. To fulfil the requisitions of such a law; it must be seen, that man must perform an infinite work, for which he is wholly incompetent. In such case, too, we should see marked injustice in Deity, in requiring of him an act which he had made him wholly incompetent of performing. At least it would be so considered in an earthly parent. Do we see a father requiring of his children, the performance of deeds, which in the very nature of things, they are incapable of doing, and inflicting upon them a vast amount of punishment for a non-performance thereof, should, at once, declare him unjust, tyrannical and cruel.

To avoid this conclusion, man has taken another leap into the regions of inconsistency, and endeavored to establish another foundation; and here they have supposed themselves upon the rock of ages which can not be moved. The foundation is this, the law violated by man, was made and established by an infinite God; consequently the law must be an infinite law, and all violations thereof must be infinite, from which flow the other conclusions. But here a moment's reflection will teach us that the laws of natural philosophy are not strictly followed. This pre-supposes that the stream must rise as high as the fountain; or, in other words, that it can not sink below it. But our every-day observations refute such an idea; as we continually see the stream seeking lower ground. The reasoning would lead us to positions which every sense we are possessed of, would contradict. For one moment draw other conclusions in the same way from this position, and it will show the fallacy of the idea that because God is infinite, his law must be so likewise—it will destroy the position which man has established, and all those conclusions he has drawn therefrom, by which he has launched countless millions into the gulf of eternal perdition, fall to the ground from the fact, that they are destitute of a foundation, the premise in every case becoming changed.

God is an infinite being, consequently his law is infinite also. Reasoning, then, analogically, man being the offspring of God, created by him, must be infinite. Every beast of the field and fowl of the air must be infinite, because they are from an infinite source. The reasoning is as strong in one case as in the other. That these are not infinite, none will dispute; for there is within you every thing of which we have a definite knowledge, "passing away." The law of God was framed by a being of wisdom and adapted to the nature of man. It was made to be a guide through life, for him to obey. Taking this fact, we must arrive at the conclusion, that as it is adapted to the nature of man, and is made visible to his understanding, it must be finite—such as he is capable of fulfilling. The effects growing therefrom must also be finite. Hence, then, man, can not suffer endless, or infinite punishment as a consequence of his transgression.—But on the contrary, his punishment, being dependent upon his acts for its existence, must be finite, limited.

On the principle of natural philosophy in connection with reason, then, we learn the same lesson taught by the inspired penman, "The Lord will not cast off forever; but though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies. For he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men."

Such reflections tend to elevate man in the scale of moral existence and in his mind the character of the Deity, and enables him to put an implicit trust and confidence in him as a father and friend. Let us often reflect upon these things; that we may see more clearly the character of our heavenly Father; thereby shall we be enabled to glorify him in our spirits which are his.

SELF-INTEREST.

BY MISS C. M. TIBBITS.

The whole human family are brethren; children of one common parent; recipients of the blessings poured so bountifully forth by the God of all mercies, and destined to spend together the long ages of eternity in a brighter and happier land.—What then should we expect from the members of a community who were held bound together by such strong and indissoluble ties? Were a stranger from some far off planet, unacquainted with the actual state of things, but knowing how nearly allied are the members of the whole human family, suddenly transported to our own fair orb, and allowed to gaze upon its rich summer landscapes, where love beams in golden sunshine, and breathes through the balmy air; surely he would exclaim this is the abode of happiness; vice and pollution have never entered here, or breathed their pestiferous influence over a land, stamped so legibly with the seal of Heaven. He might gaze upon earth's children: upon man, created in the image of God, with brow of lofty intellect and searching thought; upon woman, the gentle and beautiful, who seems created for sympathy and kindness; and he would conjecture that the enjoyment of such beings would consist in relieving distress in every form, and diffusing happiness in every breast.—Alas, how different is the dread reality? Earth is indeed, most beautiful—with its lofty mountains, shadowy woodlands, deep rolling oceans and emerald lawns; yet man, the most beautiful of all; the crowning work of the great Architect—man, endowed with a soul that must exist through countless ages, when the bright canopy now glittering over him, mountains, oceans, ay earth itself shall have passed away—he wanders amid its gorgeous scenery like an evil though beautiful spirit, planning his own interest and aggrandizement, though obtained by sacrificing the happiness of thousands. It is a fearful picture, but is it not true? Does it even equal the reality? Have not the fair fields been deluged with man's blood, shed by the hand of his brother man? War, that hydra of mankind, has stalked through the length and breadth of the land, sweeping away its untold millions, to that bourne whence no traveller returns. Thousands are groaning in servitude even worse than death, and from every city, from every land, the voice of oppression and wretchedness is rising to the throne of God. And woman, even, has learned to look with indifference upon the woe of others; to gaze with a tearless eye upon suffering humanity; to look with scorn upon the imperfections and misfortunes of her sex. Life is a wearying journey even at best; but how doubly wretched is it rendered by the unkindness and unfriendly feelings entertained by man toward his fellow man! Self-interest is earth's deity, and fondly, most devotedly do mankind bow down before its unhallowed shrine, and sacrifice upon its altar, the hopes, the happiness, and the prosperity of others.

DEDICATION AND INSTALLATION AT ELLISBURG.

On Thursday the 24th of August, the new Universalist church at Ellis village was solemnly dedicated to the worship of the one living and true God, the Creator and Saviour of all men. A very able and useful sermon was delivered by Br. Wilcox, who was assisted in the services by Brs. Bruce and Jones and Morse. The house is a very neat, substantial and convenient building, 34 by 42 feet, with raised seats in the rear for the choir, and we understand is very nearly paid for.

In the afternoon Br. Wilcox was installed as Pastor of the church and society in that place.—Sermon by Br. Morse; aided in the other exercises by Mrs. Abbott, Person, Jones and Bruce.

The day was bright and pleasant—the house filled with very attentive hearers, during the long exercises both parts of the day—the singing from a numerous choir was well suited to the occasion, and all seemed to participate in the joys and blessings of the divine kingdom.

The church and society in Ellsburg are now furnished with a place of worship and a faithful minister of reconciliation; and we trust they will be regularly in that place, listening to the ministrations of the word of life, and encouraging each other in every virtue. They are now united, prosperous and happy. May the Lord of the vineyard long continue to bless them, preserving among them “the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace.”

SABBATH SCHOOL CELEBRATION AT CANTON.

The Sabbath Schools connected with the Universalist societies of Canton and Potsdam, held their 3d Annual Celebration at Canton, on Saturday, September 3d. The time having been appointed a few weeks previous, was looked for with a deep feeling of anticipation, and hopes were entertained and expressed by all interested, that the day might be pleasant.

The morning was gloomy and portended rain, but before 10 o'clock the clouds disappeared, and the sun showed his golden face, to the joy of every heart. At 12 o'clock, scholars, teachers, officers and friends began to assemble at the church. At 1 o'clock all moved in regular procession from the church to a bower built on a beautiful green near it, where stood a table 70 feet in length filled with any quantity of biscuit ready buttered, pies, cakes, cheese, ripe apples, etc., and with pails full of Washingtonian ale.

After rendering thanks for this bountiful banquet, with one accord, all ate, drank and satisfied themselves. They then were again arranged in formal procession by the Superintendents, and marched back to the church, which by the time the exercises commenced, was literally and overflowing filled. The exercises commenced about half past 2 o'clock, P. M., and were as follows:—

1. Reading service from Balch's Manual.
2. Prayer by the pastor.
3. Introductory address (original) spoken by Richard Hoy.
4. Recitation of lessons by the Schools.
5. Speaking, “Again we come,” by Alzina Winslow.
6. The Shepherd, by Mary E. Manley.
7. Hope of heaven, by Angeline Clark.
8. Forbid them not, by Isabel Clark.
9. The Sabbath School, by Catharine Paige.
10. Home, by Mary Swift.
11. Immortality of God, by Stephen S. Clark.
12. Happiness, by Moses Emery.
13. The happy life, by Persis Green.
14. Our School, by Mary Parmeter.
15. Don't kill the birds, by Dorcas Parmeter.
16. The goodness of God, by Louisa Mitchell.
17. Christ and Christianity, by Catharine Clark.
18. Dialogue, by Elizabeth Low and Caroline Sears.
19. Heaven, by Emma Ames.
20. The Testament, by Esther Boynton.
21. Dialogue, by Mary Jennison and Jane Paige.
22. Dialogue, by Cordelia V. and Cornelia Buck, Ellen Paige and Orra Hosby.
23. Precept and Example of parents, by Luman Smith.
24. Third attempt, by Master Benjamin Low.
25. Closing address, (original,) spoken by James F. Pierce.
26. Benediction, by the pastor.

The above exercises were interspersed with appropriate hymns, most of which were selected from Br. Balch's Manual, and Br. Thomas' Hymns of Zion, and were sung principally by the Schools, Miss Jane Paige, a scholar of only 12 years of age, presiding at the organ. The services throughout continued about two hours, and were listened to by the great congregation present, with constantly increasing attention, and with the highest satisfaction.

The recitation of lessons was perfect. The speaking generally good, and the singing truly excellent. The little lady who discoursed such sweet music on the organ, won for herself a golden meed of praise. O! how she touched the heart, when she both played and sung alone, “Mary at the Saviour's tomb”! We doubt whether that piece was ever performed much better, and we doubt, too, whether any address was ever much better delivered, than was the closing one on this occasion. The young lad who delivered it is already an accomplished orator. But all did well; and great credit is justly due to those teachers and officers who have been so faithful and diligent in this matter, and who have the gratification of seeing the pleasure of the Lord so abundantly prosper in their hands. May they continue in the good work they have espoused, until those whom they are now instructing in the truths of God's blessed word, shall be able to take their places, and advance the same cause of Sabbath School instruction.

I have as above, Br. Grosh, drawn up a notice of our recent Sabbath School Celebration in this place. It was truly a joyful and soul-satisfying occasion to us all. The notice gives but an imperfect idea of the meeting; but such as it is, I send it to you for publication, presuming it may aid in the advancement of other Sabbath Schools, and the progress of the Saviour's kingdom of love and grace. Following you have the opening and closing addresses.

W. H. WAGGONER.

INTRODUCTORY ADDRESS.

WRITTEN BY J. S. CONKEY, TEACHER.

Fellow School-mates—We have met once more to participate in the joys of another annual Sabbath School Celebration. Long and anxiously have we waited for this wished-for period to arrive, to make glad our hearts and give us an opportunity of manifesting our sincere and heart-felt gratitude to God, and also to our parents and teachers, for causing us in times past to come up to the house of the Lord, where we have been permitted to hear of his goodness and be instructed in the ways of truth and righteousness.

We feel truly rejoiced to see so goodly a number present on this occasion,—not only those composing our own school, but also many from neighboring schools, who have come hither to enjoy this rich treat with us—to all of whom we bid a hearty welcome, trusting that all of us may return to our homes this afternoon, better and happier children for having met together at this time, to hold sweet communion with each other and give thanks to that Being who has kindly permitted us to assemble in his sanctuary, and offer our oblations at the shrine of piety and virtue.

We meet together here, as brothers and sisters of one common family—as children of one kind and indulgent Parent, whom we have been taught to love and venerate—even “Our Father who art in heaven.” Let not, then, the voice of discord and contention be heard in our midst; but rather let peace and quietude reign in every bosom while we endeavor to gain fresh supplies of knowledge from the instructions that may be given on this, to us, interesting occasion. Seasons like the present are not in store for us always to enjoy. The time, at farthest, must be short in which we are to act in the capacity of scholars. Soon may some of us be called to occupy the places of our present teachers, while others will have appeared on the stage to fill the places we now occupy, and listen to such instructions as we shall be able to impart. How important, then, it is, that we should diligently apply our mind to the acquisition of religious knowledge while we have it in our power so to do;—while we are free from many of the cares and perplexities attendant on a more advanced age.

Since the establishment of a Sabbath School among us, nothing has transpired within its borders to mar our happiness, or in any way to retard its onward course. All has been apparently peace, quietude and contentment. We have had the seeds of piety and virtue implanted in our hearts, and it now remains for us to cherish and cultivate these Heaven-born plants, that they may “bring forth fruit an hundred fold.” Let us strive with diligence in all coming time, to live up to the principles that have been taught here. Let us ever bear in mind what has so often been told us from this desk, that to be happy and respected we must be good; and that an infringement upon the laws of God will certainly be rewarded with its merited punishment. But if, on the contrary, we live in accordance with the requirements of the Gospel—“deal justly, love mercy and walk humbly” in the sight of God, we shall not only command the respect of men, but be blest with the smiles of an approving conscience to cheer us in our journey through life. And when death comes to lay his cold and icy hand upon us, we can bid him welcome, feeling the assurance that ‘tis but the summons to call us “away to yon heaven, that blissful abode,” where we shall enjoy the society of the blessed, and bask forever in the sunshine of paternal love.

CLOSING ADDRESS.

WRITTEN BY Z. N. ELLIS, SUPERINTENDENT.

KIND FRIENDS:—The task devolves on me, On this returning jubilee,
While warm emotion swells my heart,
To say farewell before we part.
Called by the Sabbath bells away,
On each alternate Sabbath day,
We lift the heart and bend the knee,
With reverence and humility,
But what is still a richer treat,
Is, yearly, to each other meet,
And all with fond affection greet;
Kneeling with joy at Jesus' feet,
His great compassion there repeat—
All holding thus communion sweet;
And as we round the altar bend,
Rich streams of grace from heaven descend—
The chant of joy—the song of praise
In mingling melodies we raise;
Each youthful heart doth cheerful join
In work and worship so divine.
Tho' now in years and knowledge young,
And lisping praises swell our song,
Yet, surely, God will not despise
The early, tender sacrifice:—
Then let the mingling fragrance rise
In grateful odor to the skies.
Did not our Saviour, when on earth,
Remember those of humble birth?
And did he not with accent mild
Call unto him each little child?
The infant group around him press'd—
With joy he folds them to his breast;
And with a spirit all divine,
Where grace and mercy brightly shine,
And all his heavenly charms combine,
He condescends, with shepherd's care
To guard them safe from every snare:
“Forbid them not,” he meekly cries,
“Their mansion is above the skies;
Such, such, that happy kingdom is,
Where all is mildness, meekness, peace.”

KIND TEACHERS now assembled here,
Who've watch'd our steps from year to year,
Who, guardian-angel-like, have been
All powerful to allure from sin,
Our language is too cold to prove
How much we owe—how much we love.
The approving smile—the tender care—
The works of love—the fervent prayer,
Deep in our hearts engraven are;—
While life and thought and being last,
Our grateful mem'ry of the past,
With fondest love will turn to you;
And ever may we bring to view
How you our wayward hearts did rule,
Within our much lov'd Sabbath School.

To our KIND PASTOR would we say,
On this, to us, most joyful day;
A debt of gratitude we owe
For precept and example too.
How oft our hearts with pleasure beat,

And thrill with rapture when we meet,
To hear the Gospel's joyful sound
In tones of gladness here resound.
O, may the doctrine we profess
Be spread abroad, the world to bless;
May every nation, kingdom, clime,
Embrace a gospel so divine!
What great inducement do we need
To every virtuous precept heed?
Will words of terror—tales of woe
Engage our best affections? No!
Will constant fears of future ill
Our hearts with love and duty fill?
The responding echo loud prolong:—
"Full, free salvation" is the song
To lead our captive souls along
To heed the right, abhor the wrong.

KIND PARENTS—who, with tender care,
Have led us to this house of prayer;—
What tribute shall we bring to prove
The enrapturing joys our bosoms move
For all your kindness—all your love?
Dear parents!—may our future life
More virtuous be—more free from strife;
May love through all our actions run,
And every bad example shun.

And now to all convened to day,
A passing word I have to say:—
If what's been done this day should prove
The Sabbath School a work of love;
And if ye love the golden rule
O patronize the Sabbath School.

But I must close—our duty done
Reminds us that the hour has come
When we must say to all, farewell—
To meet again? Ah! who can tell?
Associates, Teachers, Pastor, all,
If death's cold hand should on us fall,
And on this earth we meet no more,
May all o'er Jordan's blissful shore,
Where tears and sorrows all are o'er,
Reedeeming love's loud anthem swell
And never, never, say FAREWELL.

"MOHAWK RIVER AND OTSEGO ASSOCIATIONS.

In replying to an article with the above caption, and over the signature of Br. Skinner published in the Magazine of the 25th of August, I will say that had Br. Skinner's efforts been confined to giving the reasons for the step recently taken by the Frankfort Society, any further public notice would have been uncalled for; but inasmuch as his article is calculated to leave the impression, that the Otsego Association has acted without cause, perhaps a word from one of the "committee" (referred to in his communication) may be expected.

Br. S. says that the passage of the resolution adopted by the O. A. was "a very singular and unheard-of measure"—but let us see what gives it this character. The state of New York is divided into fifteen Associations, and each Association has a constitution defining its territorial boundaries.—At a meeting of the Central Association (of which Br. S. was then a member) holden in 1833, it was voted that the Otsego Association should embrace within its limits those parts of the counties of Herkimer and Montgomery lying south of the Mohawk River. Now if by the establishment of these limits, it was not intended that all societies organized within them should seek the fellowship of the O. A., I must confess I know not what was intended. It is true, as Br. S. says, we have no power to compel a society to ask our fellowship; but it does appear to me that we have some reason to expect that Universalists and Universalist societies will manifest their love of good order, by avoiding a violation of those rules and regulations which are adopted to systematise, and thereby perpetuate our religious bodies; and it is the "singular and unheard-of deviation from these rules and regulations by the Frankfort society, that gives novelty to the resolutions of the O. A. I do contend that by "local affinity" we had a right to expect that the Frankfort society would ask the fellowship of the O. A., or make known to it their reasons for not doing so; and that these reasons should have been given before seeking the fellowship of another body; and I contend further, that after they had neglected to do either of these acts, the resolution calling for reasons was not only "harmless" but was positively right and called for, and should receive the approval of all who love system and have a desire to treat with proper respect and courtesy the religious bodies to which they are by "local affinity" connected. But Br. S. seems to imply that local considerations may be disregarded with impunity; but I must beg leave, (with all due respect to his age, experience and moral worth,) to differ from him, and for reasons so apparent and so almost universally regarded, that they will at once suggest themselves.

The reasons kindly given by Br. Skinner, and for which as an individual, I thank him, will of course be seen and passed upon by the members of the O. A. I consider many of them to be weighty and satisfactory, and my principal regret is that they were not offered at a proper time, and laid before the body having a right, from the circumstances of the case, to expect them, and not receiving them, a right to ask for them.

In conclusion I would remark, that none other than the best of feeling was manifested towards the Frankfort society by the council of the O. A., when they passed the resolution asking for reasons, etc., and I sincerely hope that none other may be produced by what has been written on the subject; and while I rejoice with Br. S. that we have no "old and new school Universalists," I likewise rejoice that we have old rules and regulations, by the observance of which, under God, we have been blessed.

SUNDAY SCHOOL REPORTS.

To G. L. Demarest—Dear Sir: I have now before me your Circular Letter to Superintendents of Universalist Sunday Schools, etc., and the questions contained therein I will now endeavor to answer so far as they have reference, or are applicable to our School.

1st. Our School commenced its existence in May, 1842.

2nd. The number of scholars is fifty—22 boys, and 28 girls.

3d. We have ten teachers; four male, and six female.

4th. Twenty five girls and fifteen boys is the average attendance.

We had no Sabbath School last winter—the above refers to this Summer's attendance.

5th. The teacher's attendance has been regular, except once, of a teacher or two from indisposition or necessity.

6th. We have as yet no S. S. Library.

7th. As a consequence—no number of readers on the Librarian's book.

8th. Balch's Manual, Hudson's Questions, Skinner's ditto, for children, Ballou's Catechism, Bible Class Assistant, Life of Christ, Scripture Doctrines, are the Class books used.

9th. Generally from nine till half past ten, or from ten till half past eleven A. M., on alternate Sundays. We have preaching on the 1st and 3rd Sundays in each month—then we take the earlier hour; on the other Sundays—the later hour.

10th. We have probably nothing original or novel in our discipline or management of the S. S.; all is common place—on that account nothing very interesting or instructive. Novelty you know, sir, leads many of our race. On that account, many of last Summer's Scholars ended their attendance, when the school ended last Autumn. Others went to the beggarly elements of the world for food, (they joined the Methodists,) who commenced an opposition school in our neighborhood. But the majority of those who attend, I believe love the institution, and are making respectable proficiency.

Yours affectionately in the bonds of the Gospel,
ANTHONY F. McCABE, Supt.
Skanateles, Aug. 25, 1843.

TOMATOES.—The editor of the American Farmer recommends that Tomato vines be pulled up when the frost is apprehended, and hung up in a barn or some other convenient place, where nearly all the fruit will ripen, and can be picked as wanted till late in the fall or even winter.—[Utica Dai. Gaz.]

Look Out.—A large amount of counterfeit $3's and $5's on the Albany Exchange Bank are in circulation. The paper is rather white and coarse; some part of the engraving is also rather coarse.

A fine healthy female Orang Outang was landed at Salem a short time since,—captured in the wilds of Africa.

Planets, &c.—A writer in the Courier Des Etats Unis says, that twenty-two planetary orbs are visible at this time on the same side of the heavens. These are Mars, Juno, Jupiter, Saturn, and Venus, with their respective satellites. They may be seen about eight o'clock in the evening, in the southern sky, near what are called the five zodiacal constellations.

SUMMER EVENING.

The Moon is rising o'er the hill,
And softly beams each star
In every sweetly murmur'ing rill
Whose music floats afar.

The flowers sleep, but fragrant air
Is gently wafted by;
While all around is bright and fair
As hopes that never die.

All nature sinks to quiet rest,
And each, in dreamy sleep,
Forgets the cares that fill the breast,
And ceases now to weep.

Sweet thoughts come o'er my spirit here,
Of scenes that could not last,
And eyes undimmed by any tear
Are gazing from the past.

Beyond the stars that shine and wane
In yonder azure sky,
Their spirits dwell, but ne'er again
Their forms will meet my eye.

I would not weep for such as those,
The beautiful and bright,
Who drooped and perished like the rose
In morning's orient light.

But still will fondest mem'ry cling
To those I may not see;
And such an eve again will bring
The pure and loved to me. UNKNOWN.

MILLERISM.

Messrs. Editors—Last Sabbath much excitement was caused in this neighborhood by the rumor that a Mr. Atkinson, a Millerite, was to preach on the doctrine of the second advent. We went, and found the house decently filled, and after a while in pops the youth that is called the orator of the day. He commenced, and truly to me it appeared as if the multitude had assembled to hear from Mr. A., instead of the Lord through a feeble worm. Having prayed and sung, he took a text, but to carry it out only traversed here and there over the Bible—1st, To prove God an immaterial being. 2d, Man possessed an immaterial soul. 3d, He quoted the Old Testament prophecies to prove Christ's first coming and reception; then assumed, as Christ first came and was received, so "mought it be" in the second; then quoted from Christ and other Bible sayings, as proof of our being in the latter day, and laid much stress on the 3d and 4th verses of the 2d chapter of Nahum, referring it to the invention of steam and rail road emigration as a certain proof of Christ's certain and almost immediate descent to judge the earth. From what he holds, Christ is then coming to spend 1000 years in judging the world, making 1000 years, according to 2 Peter, equal to one day, the saints having then finished their judgment, which is now going on. He then concluded with a very pathetic appeal to the wicked to turn, and to the righteous to hold on. Why? The midnight cry was now given, and go ye out to meet the bridegroom.*

Now, Sirs, the matter looks to me like this. The professed church has become so completely smothered in traditions that originally proceeded from heathenish darkness, and now the Gospel beginning to exhibit its benign influence and prove itself the harbinger of "glad tidings to all people," its former advocates feeling loth to let go such capital-making doctrines, like dying and drowning men have striven and labored hard to sustain themselves, and as if catching at a straw, managed to distort the prophecies, &c., into something very alarming and wonderful, by saying these things are hid from the foolish, and the wise alone shall understand; and thus they try to frighten mankind into a belief that all things are about winding up. Methinks they see the overthrow of their barque, and wishing also (the world) might go down with it, by the greatness of their anxiety they have, like a man who oft has repeated a lie and slander, become believers of it themselves, and now proclaim it to a half frantic world, blinded by their treachery and deceit, and made so to aid and aggrandize self. Now would it not be better for us, as a community, to refuse to go after such things, read the Bible more, use reason, and try to understand it for ourselves; instead of taking the ipse dixit of others and pinning our belief on other people's sayso? For one, I feel that if we did this, more of the religion of the Bible would be found to prevail in our streets, God would be more and better loved, religion would not be assumed quite so much as a cloak to cover crime, brotherly love would be more prevalent, and mankind would better be able to understand what is meant by Jeremiah, when he says "For the Lord will not cast off forever." J. J. F.

Scriba, July 28, 1843.

[The following article is full of sound sense and (to some) much needed information. How little do most people think of that wonderful race, the Jews! How few that regard them in their true character and destiny. Who knows that the Jews will not literally return and possess the country of their fathers? R. S.]

THE JEWS.

The present physical, moral and social condition of the Jews must be a miracle. We can come to no other conclusion. Had they continued from the commencement of the Christian era down to the present hour in some such national state in which we find the Chinese, walled off from the rest of the human family, and by their selfishness on a national scale, and their repulsion of alien elements, resisting every assault from without, in the shape of hostile invasion, and from an overpowering national pride forbidding the introduction of new and foreign customs, we should not see so much miracle interwoven with their existence. But this is not their state—far from it. They are neither a united or independent nation, nor a parasitic province.—They are peeled and scattered into fragments, but like broken globules of quick-silver, instinct with a cohesive power, ever claiming affinity and ever ready to amalgamate.—Geography, arms, genius, politics, and foreign help, do not explain their existence; time, and climate, and customs, equally fail to unravel it. None of these are, or can be spings of their perpetuity.—They have spread over every part of the habitable globe; have lived under the reign of every dynasty; they have shared the protection of just laws, the oppression of cruel ones, and witnessed the rise and progress of both; they have used every tongue, and lived in every latitude. The snows of Lapland have chilled, and the suns of Africa scorched them. They have drunk of the Tiber, the Thames, the Jordan, the Mississippi. In every country, and in every degree of latitude and longitude, we find a Jew.

It is not so with any other race. Empires the most illustrious, have fallen, and buried men that constructed them, but the Jew has lived among the ruins, a living monument of indestructibility. Persecution has unsheathed the sword and lighted the faggot; Papal superstition and Moslem barbarism have smote them with unsparing ferocity; penal rescripts and deep prejudice have visited on them the most ungenerous debasement—and notwithstanding all, they survive.

Like their own bush on Mount Horeb, Israel has continued in the flames, but unconsumed.—They are the aristocracy of Scripture, let off coronets—princes in delegation. A Babylonian, a Theban, a Spartan, an Athenian, a Roman, are names known in history only; their shadows alone haunt the world and flicker the tablets. A Jew walks every street, dwells in every capital, traverses every exchange and relieves the monotony of the nations of the earth. The race has inherited the heirloom of immortality, incapable of extinction or amalgamation. Like streamlets from a common head, composed of waters of a peculiar nature, they have flowed along every stream without blending with it, or receiving its flavor, and traversed the surface of the globe, amid the lapse of many centuries, distinct—alone. The Jewish race at this day is perhaps the most striking seal of the truth of the Sacred Oracles. There is no possibility of accounting for their perpetual isolation, their depressed but distinct being, on any grounds save those revealed in the records of truth.—Frazer's Magazine.

A PERVERTED PASSAGE.

"The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved."—Jer. viii. 20.

Perhaps it will be difficult to find a passage in the sacred volume, more expressive of the utter prostration of hope, than the one we have placed at the head of this article. The last rays of its faintly glimmering light, have faded away; and that spirit of despondency creeps over the soul, which throws a dark shade over this beguiler of our sorrows, our sufferings, and our misfortunes—hope, the star of our life, has left its circling orb—it no longer points to a good in the future—it no longer points to glories to be revealed by and bye, ah! and blisses too, to be soon enjoyed; but it leaves a deep, dark cloud, to brood over and around, for "the harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved."

So full of despair is it, that many have thought that it referred to that state, where nought but despair is known—where the gnawing worm of eternal vengeance would prey upon the soul, and its endless wailings swell in louder, sweeter chorus, the songs of that blessed abode above. How often have we heard the appeal to the sinner, closed with the declaration, thrice repeated; that soon they would cry out, when too late for succor to come, "the harvest is passed, the summer is ended, and we are not saved," while burning lightnings from the throne of God, were driving them on to hell's doleful prison.

This is but a faint picture of the horror, which many have thought that they saw embodied in this passage—but a faint picture of that untold misery, which it bespeaks for a portion of the creatures of him who is Love, in the spirit-world. But why it should be referred to the future world, I can not see. Here is certainly nothing, from which such an inference can be made in the context. True, the text is the exclamation of those pierced by the shafts of misery; but of the Jewish people in the calamity which fell upon their nation, at the time of the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar.

The following extract from Br. T. B. Thayer's "Bible Class Assistant," (an excellent work,) fully illustrates this, and other kindred passages. He says such is the diversified surface of Palestine, that it embraces almost every variety of climate, from the severe cold of the frigid zone, to the intense heat of the torrid. While the thermometer on the plains, or in the valleys, stands at upwards of 100 degrees, the summits of the mountains are covered with deep snow. As the winter advances, the winds and the cold become intensely severe, and, in some instances, prove fatal to those who are unacquainted with the country and climate. The roads are broken by the torrents, and filled with ice, and snow, and rubbish; and the paths over the mountains, especially the steep places, are rendered almost impassable, and can be traversed only with great labor and danger. In the light of these facts, we see the propriety of the Saviour's remark, when predicting the calamities that would attend the destruction of Jerusalem. He exhorts his disciples to pray, that their flight be not in the winter. The reason is very obvious—he knew the difficulties and dangers of a flight through such a country at this season, and he would have them leave the city while the roads were passable. The same remarks render another important passage perfectly intelligible. "The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved." The prophet is describing the coming invasion of Nebuchadnezzar, and the false security of the people, who have been deceived by certain of their leaders, probably the friends of Nebuchadnezzar, and in his pay. These assure them, that there is no danger, that there will be no war, when, in fact, the enemy are on the march. In the emphatic language of the prophet, —They cry, peace, peace, when there is no peace, suddenly, they are aroused with the news, that the invading army, is actually within their territories, and, in the bold style of the prophets, they are represented as so near, that the neighing of their horses is heard, and the land trembles beneath their march. The people are in consternation: they had suffered the warm season to pass without making preparations to defend themselves, believing there would be no invasion—now the troops of Nebuchadnezzar were upon them, winter had come, and they had no means of escape—they cry out in despair—"The harvest is passed, the summer is ended, and we are not saved." This was only another way of saying, after the style of Eastern circumlocution. "Winter has come, and we are not saved," or have not escaped. Their despair arose from their knowledge, that the winter rendered flight impossible, in consequence of the torrents swelled by the rains, the slippery and dangerous state of the mountain paths, and the extreme cold. They felt therefore, that they were at the mercy of their enemies."

* I quote the same as the speaker did.

As this article is already sufficiently extended, I shall defer making some additional remarks, which I proposed to make, in the beginning. I doubt not, sufficient has been said, to convince every reflecting mind, that the text refers to nothing beyond this "vale of tears." I repeat again, there is nothing in the context, that warrants us in saying that its application is to things in life—in this world, and in this world only. None of our race will say "we are not saved!" when Christ has finished his work. He can not fail in one jot nor tittle. All he undertook, he will accomplish. "He will destroy death, the last enemy," "and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain." Even so let it be. S. J.

ENDLESS MISERY—DR. BARNES' CONFESSION!

The following is one of the most extraordinary passages, considering the source from which it comes, that we have ever had the fortune to meet with. It is from the pen of the celebrated Dr. Albert Barnes of Philadelphia, whose talents and industry have given him an influence in the Presbyterian church unsurpassed by that of any man in this country. I confess I was astonished when I had finished the perusal of it, and repeatedly looked at the title page of the work to be sure I was not mistaken in the name of the author.

The passage contains one of the fullest and most candid expressions of the difficulties which must beset the mind of every thinking believer in the doctrine of endless sin and wo, that we have ever seen. Indeed it leaves nothing to ask for, and if we had been allowed to dictate the confession, we should not think we could have added to it, or improved upon it in any way. And we do most cordially thank Mr. Barnes for the candor and frankness with which he has spoken, and we honor the fearless and manly utterance of the difficulties which burden his mind and distress his heart, in view of the dreadful thought of endless sin and endless woe, and of the awful shadows that are cast from it upon the wisdom and benevolence of God.

Mr. Barnes may be assured that there is only one way open to relief, and that is through the faith that all this seeming discord is but harmony not understood—that sin and suffering are but temporary, and the means under the providence of God of working out the abiding good of his redeemed and glorified family—or in the language of Wordsworth, if the word "accident" may be used—

"One adequate support
For the calamities of mortal life
Exists, one only—an assured belief
That the procession of our fate, however Sad or disturbed, is ordered by a being
Of infinite benevolence and power,
Whose everlasting purposes embrace
All accidents, converting them to good."

This alone will meet the inquiries and yearnings of the wearied and troubled soul; and embracing this apostolic faith, Mr. Barnes may dismiss his anxious fears, walk calmly onward, whether his path be in present light or darkness, looking forward to the glorious period when all shadows, and sorrows and imperfections shall pass away, and the universe be filled with the glorious beauty of God!

T. B. T.

"II. To the general point of inquiry—the real difficulties in the case. I mean where a man has no prejudice; no embittered feeling; no cherished opposition; where he is not suffering under any ill in such a way as to sour his mind or pervert his understanding, and where he would wish to see such evidence that he may put unwavering confidence in God.

I think it is to be admitted that such a man may have great difficulties. There are many things which he can not understand. There are many things which he can not reconcile with such a view. Briefly, for this is a point on which we ought not long to dwell, such a man will advert to such facts as the following, viz:

That sin should have been allowed to come into the system formed by a holy God. That since he had power to create or not, as he chose, and since worlds have been made that were holy, and are still holy, that all should not have been made so. That misery has come into the universe, and that death, with many forms of wo, has been commissioned to cut down one whole race, and that, in doing it, the whole earth is strewn with hospitals, and sick beds, and graves. That the immortal mind should be allowed to jeopard its infinite welfare, and that trifles should be allowed to draw it away from God, and virtue, and heaven. That any should suffer forever—lingering on in hopeless despair, and rolling amidst infinite torments without the possibility of alleviation and without end. That since God can save men, and will save a part, he has not purposed to save all; that on the supposition that the atonement is ample, and that the blood of Christ can cleanse from all and every sin, it is not in fact applied to all. That, in a word, a God who claims to be worthy of the confidence of the universe, and to be a being of infinite benevolence, should make such a world as this—full of sinners and sufferers; and that when an atonement had been made, he did not save all the race, and put an end to sin and wo forever.

These, and kindred difficulties, meet the mind when we think on this great subject; and they meet us when we endeavor to urge our fellow sinners to be reconciled to God, and to put confidence in him. On this ground they hesitate. These are real, not imaginary difficulties. They are probably felt by every mind that ever reflected on the subject—and they are unexplained, unmitigated, unremoved. I confess, for one, that I feel them, and feel them more sensibly and powerfully the more I look at them, and the longer I live. I do not understand these facts; and I make no advances towards understanding them. I do not know that I have a ray of light on this subject which I had not when the subject first flashed across my soul. I have read, to some extent, what wise and good men have written. I have looked at their theories and explanations. I have endeavored to weigh their arguments—for my whole soul pants for light and relief on these questions. But I get neither; and in the distress and anguish of my own spirit, I confess that I see no light whatever. I see not one ray to disclose to me the reason why sin came into the world; why the earth is strewn with the dying and the dead, and why man must suffer to all eternity. I have never seen a particle of light thrown on these subjects that has given a moment's ease to my tortured mind, nor have I an explanation to offer, or a thought to suggest, which would be of relief to you. I trust other men—as they profess to do—understand this better than I do, and that they have not the anguish of spirit which I have; but I confess, when I look on a world of sinners and of sufferers; upon death-beds and grave yards; upon the world of wo filled with hosts to suffer forever; when I see my friends, my parents, my family, my people, my fellow citizens—when I look upon a whole race, all involved in this sin and danger, and when I see the great mass of them wholly unconcerned, and when I feel that God only can save them, and yet he does not do it, I am struck dumb. It is all dark—dark—to my soul—and I can not disguise it."—Barnes' Practical Sermons, p. 123-125.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

EDITED BY
Rev. A. B. Grosh, G. W. Montgomery and A. C. Barry.

UTICA, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1843.

THE NATURAL LAWS.

Man is so intimately and constantly connected with the world of matter around him—and is himself a part of that material creation—that a knowledge of the laws of matter is absolutely necessary to any great attainments in physical happiness and mental improvement. Every portion of our bodily frames is composed of matter, and is subjected, as such, to every general law by which any and every kind of matter in our world is governed—and every such law is as much the will and law of God, as any other law he has revealed to man. I would therefore base our obligations to learn and to obey those laws on moral ground, as much as I would the obligation to learn and obey any law God has given to man.

The natural laws evince as much wisdom in God, as do the mental and moral laws—indeed, in many respects, the wisdom will be found more apparent to general observation than in the moral laws. The natural laws all exhibit the wonderful goodness of God to man, and to all created beings, far as the imagination can reach—and they equally, and more apparently to the senses, give us evidence of that Almighty Power on which we all depend, and which sustains by its might, all systems, and worlds, and beings. And is it not our duty—a solemn moral duty that we owe to God, to our fellow beings, and to ourselves—to read the lessons God would thus teach us—to examine into and become acquainted with these exhibitions of his wonderful provisions for the welfare of all created things, and to so practice according to these laws, as to secure their benefits to us and to others, and to avoid or avert the violation of them and the evils resulting therefrom? Surely, if ever duty rested on us, this duty presses heavily its claims upon our notice—promising every reasonable reward for our attention and obedience, and marking its retributions for our neglect in widely spread misery and ruin. A. B. G.

TRACTS.

At the time of its reception we were too busy, and afterward we entirely forgot, to notice a tract of four 12mo pages received from Lockport in this State; and the plan of operations of the brethren issuing it. The tract itself, though a good one, is not what we so much desire to notice, as to throw out a few remarks on the great subject itself—a subject highly important in many bearings, and yet one that has been overlooked entirely by the great mass of our denomination.

Our popular Partisan denominations by their obtrusive and frequently insulting tract distributions have disgusted many of our friends overmuch; and by their injudicious and frequently most inappropriate selection and distribution of tracts, have rendered the whole subject ridiculous and expensively useless in public estimation generally. Hence it is that the very name, "tract," is hated by many, and in others it awakens only emotions of pity and contempt. And hence it is, that many otherwise really intelligent and zealous Universalists have neglected and even opposed the distribution and circulation of tracts as a means for spreading a knowledge of our real views in community, and correcting and refuting the misrepresentations and objections of our opposers. They will subscribe for and circulate our periodicals—they will purchase our books, and lend them freely among their friends—they will even buy a few sermons and essays in pamphlet form, and distribute them, as occasions may allow, among those who wish to learn what Universalists believe;—but "tracts"—do you suppose they will buy and "peddle" tracts!—do you think they would be so mean as to thrust tracts under their neighbors' noses, or throw them into people's front doors! can you justify Universalists for publishing tracts, "just like the Orthodox"? Now,

I confess a love for this spirit of indignation at every thing like a reckless violation of the proprieties of life, and mean intrusion on the rights and peaceful enjoyment of religious freedom—but as in the case of tracts and tract distribution itself, let us be careful that we do not confound the right and the wrong. Tracts—or, to reason the case without perpetually arousing prejudices long nourished—pamphlets carefully written, well adapted, and cheaply furnished, may be made eminently useful in advancing the cause of truth and righteousness, if only judiciously distributed and circulated. This no one will deny. The only half-objection that can be urged, is to the mode. The pamphlets should be carefully written, and well adapted to the object in view. Silly tales respecting Mr. A., of B., of the State of —, or dry spun arguments against Mahomedanism, or a vituperative essay against our neighbor for believing as he does,—all such trash must, of course, be avoided.—The object is, to show what Universalists do, and do not, really believe in regard to the various great doctrines of the religious world around us—why we believe or reject any of them—and to point out inducements to lead people generally to examine our faith, and adopt its practice in their daily walk. To this object, style, manner, everything, should correspond; and the pamphlets should be then furnished as cheap as possible, and circulated in the most proper and winning manner, consistent with that great object. Now, is there a real, hearty Universalist in the land, that would object to doing his share in such a work as this?

The preliminaries being settled, the next thing is to get the plan into operation. A number of trials have been made, at various times, by various brethren, and in different places; but for the want of a general understanding among the brethren throughout the Union, and of means to carry on the work, all of them have failed in some of the great requisites, and the publishers soon ceased the work. There are now on the shelves of our publishers in Boston, New York, Albany, Philadelphia, Utica, Cincinnati, and elsewhere, thousands of copies of most valuable pamphlets which have been published in the hope that Universalists would purchase and distribute them. There they are to mould and rot, for the want of purchasers! And some of them are as admirably written, as any thing in the whole range of pamphlet literature. Take the Reply to Hawes' Reasons, and where will you find a better controversial pamphlet, either in temper, style, or force of argument? The Boston Counterpart to a Strange thing, is also an excellently written article. And there are many—very many almost as good as these—as well adapted for general reading, and as useful—lying useless, unpurchased and unread, and the publisher unpaid for his labor and expence.

What is the matter—what is the reason of these failures? Simply, that the work was commenced on too small a scale to enable the publishers to furnish their works cheap enough, as well as good enough. Next to the want of right feeling among Universalists generally, the want of cheap as well as good tracts, was the cause of failure. "Whittemore's Hundred Reasons" could have been sold by hundreds of copies in a number of sections were I have been acquainted, had not their price stood in the way—Dean's 120 reasons sold still higher, and the tracts already named, are as high priced as either. It was the same with the Visitant, published monthly by myself. I was too poor to start it on a large scale, and too busy in other matters to push it into sufficient circulation to procure the means, and consequently it barely paid its way. The numerous little pamphlets published by Br. Price were also liable to the same difficulties—there was too much saving of paper, by the use of small type, and close print, and very small margins, so that they appeared to be very dear—so small a bulk for a sixpence! People did not reflect that the little page, not as big as a man's palm, actually contained as much as two large octavo pages in pica or small pica type, leaved, with a wide margin! And thus, one by one, all who engaged in tract publishing, failed to get a sufficient market to warrant their continuance in the business. Brs. Thomas and Thayer, while the former yet resided in Lowell, Mass., commenced the work of Tract publishing. I can not speak of the quality of the tracts themselves, never having seen them; but presume they were good—perhaps rather learned, labored and condensed to be popular. They stereotyped their tracts, so as to be able (should the patronage warrant the continuance of the enterprise) to furnish them hereafter as cheap as the cheapest. But after continuing until they reached the tenth number, they came to a stop, and after a time sold out to Br. A. Tompkins, of Boston, who still holds the plates, and is ready to supply all demands—at what price I am not now able to state. About the same time, Br. Gurley, of Cincinnati, commenced a series of tracts; but I believe he too has come to a stand still.—And now we are advertised in the Tract before us, that "The Lockport Universalist Tract Society publishes a tract every month, illustrating and defending 'the restitution of all things'"—but at what prices we are not informed, and perhaps they do not rely on patronage from abroad.

Now, take all the labor, time, talent, and money expended on publishing tracts, and see how very little has been effected in comparison with the amount—and all, because (after the first stated objection) the efforts were isolated, and by individuals unable or unwilling to render the tracts what they ought to be in quality and price, and to push them in the market by a systematic and long continued effort—in fact, almost make a market for them. Had one individual had the whole affair in his own hands, and had he combined the entire means and efforts used by all who have already tried the experiment, he would have succeeded—yes, made money by the operation, and effected fifty times the amount of good that has ever been done by all the tracts our publishers have ever published.

The conclusion of the whole matter is this, in my own mind—Universalists must unite and combine their means and efforts more than they now do, and pursue a more general and systematic plan in their endeavors to spread abroad a knowledge of their views, before they can hope for success commensurate with their expenditures of money and labor. We want about from 25 to 50 ably and clearly written doctrinal tracts, of from 8 to 24 pages each—and furnished at least as cheap as from 15 to 20 pages for one cent. These will embrace and clearly define and prove the great points of doctrine on which we differ from Partialists generally, and should be written so as to avoid giving any offence to a right minded opposer. We want as many controversial tracts, as carefully written against the most important errors held by Partialists. And we want a larger number of briefer doctrinal and especially practical tracts—say 100, of various sizes, from 4 pages up to 24, 12mo. All these may be made general, so that they will answer for any meridian—for every neighborhood in the United States, where Universalism and Partialism exist. These 200 tracts, if all furnished by one concern only, and if Universalists would faithfully purchase and circulate them, could be furnished at a retail price of 2,000 pages for one dollar; or from one to two cents a piece for each tract—cheap enough for every family to buy a few each month, to give away. To clubs of individuals, or societies, taking a considerable number, they might be afforded still cheaper than the above—especially if every Universalist society in the United States, enjoying stated preaching, would take up a monthly collection of not less than five dollars, for that very purpose. The collection thus taken up should be laid out in a good assortment, and after each member had been supplied with a certain number of copies of each tract, the remainder could be laid at some convenient place in the meetinghouse, and visitors be invited to supply themselves with such as they need, each Sunday. For local and special tracts, dependence must be placed on private means—unless, indeed, the tract could be made to suit several sections as well as one—say, for instance, a tract against Millerism, or some such travelling mania. In that case, the manuscript could be sent to the General Tract Publisher, who, by printing a large number, could afford them much cheaper than any single individual could furnish them at. Sermons on general subjects, particular texts or doctrines, could be published in the same manner—for they would answer for tracts, as well as if specially written for the same purpose.

On a plan, somewhat like that here hinted at, much time, money and labor now expended without effecting enough of good to pay the cost, might be made eminently profitable to some worthy and industrious publisher, or company, or to a denominational book concern, (for I would prefer even a despotism to anarchy!)—and could at the same time do fifty fold more good for our cause than we are now effecting. Whether we have yet suffered enough to learn us wisdom, and to compel us to seek out and adopt such a plan for the whole country, remains to be seen. I think that a few more finger must first be severely burned!

THE BLIND.

We had a very interesting exhibition in this city, last Friday evening. Fifteen pupils of the New York Institution for the Blind, on their annual excursion, attended by their Superintendent, gave an exhibition of their proficiency in music, reading, arithmetic, grammar, geography and astronomy—in all of which they delighted and astonished the audience. Eleven of the lads, some not yet in their teens, and none out of them, performed admirably as a Band of Music, while the girls and one or two of the boys, did as well on the piano—and all, as a choir, sung in very good style several pieces of sacred music—one or two of a difficult character. The exercises went to prove that the instruction in the Institution is very thorough—and the countenances of the pupils, prove that it is kind and cheering in its character and tendency. Miss Frances Crosby—for it must have been her—(well known to the readers of the Universalist Union and Christian Messenger by her numerous articles published there—) recited, in a very modest and impressive manner, some beautiful verses composed by her since leaving New-York. We called to see her next morning, (for it was too late when the exhibition closed,) but they had left for Norwich, Chenango county—so the pleasure was denied us.

This Institution is under the patronage of the State—and there are now about sixty vacancies which may be filled with indigent blind pupils by the overseers of the poor of the different towns in the State. It is principally to announce this fact, that we pen this article. There are nearly 1000 blind persons in the State of New-York, and surely among them all there must be more than sixty who greatly need, and are fully entitled to receive the provisions thus made for their instruction, by the State. Will not our readers look around them, and if this fact be known to any poor blind persons they may know? Application for the proper certificate to be made to the overseers of the poor of the town where the applicant resides.

But not to the indigent blind alone, should the existence of this Institution be made known. All the blind who have minds to learn, should be apprized of it. Some of them might there be instructed in mechanical employments that would not only enable them to earn a living, but would fill up pleasantly many a wearisome hour. The specimens of their work exhibited here were strong, well and neatly put together, and offered at a fair price. They were boxes of pasteboard, baskets, mats, rugs, etc.

Let none of our readers miss attending an exhibition of these blind children, should they visit their vicinities—they will well expend 50 cents for a family ticket, if they take their children with them—for it is a deeply interesting and useful sight to children to witness their skill in music and the various branches of a common school education.

A. B. G.

Br. Tompkins—Transfer Repository now sent to David Jennings, Jr., Ravenna, O., to Mrs. Amelia Underwood, Brimfield, Portage county, O. She will pay at the U. S. Convention. Credit Asaph Pratt, Whitewater, Wisconsin, $2.00, for current volume. Charge us.

ANOTHER CHANCE.

We have come to the conclusion (for which we shall give some good and sufficient reasons some of these days) to place the Magazine and Advocate on the advance pay system, at the commencement of next volume. Now then, will be a good opportunity for those who have not paid for the current volume and who feel disposed to assist in sustaining our paper, to save the fifty cents due us after the first of May, last, by sending three dollars free of postage, and be credited in full for this year (1843) and next, (1844).

ROSE OF SHARON.

Too late to give it a perusal, the Rose of Sharon, for 1844, came to hand. We have "looked at the pictures," and find them a decided improvement on those contained in former volumes—and as for the rest, it looks full as well as the others. The subjects are interesting in themselves, and from the known ability of most of their authors, I doubt not will be found fully equal, if not superior, to what has been presented in former years. We shall copy a capital Washingtonian tale in our next, as a sample—and notice the rest at length, as early as we can find time to read the work.

* * Grosh and Walker have received a lot for sale, at this office. All ye who wish to get a beautiful book, filled by capital writers, just step up and pay down two dollars. That will buy pictures and all. A. B. G.

CONVENTION AT AKRON.

I have appointed Br. D. H. Strickland a travelling agent to transact business in my behalf at the West. He will attend to the settlement of all accounts due me for the "Ladies Repository," or for books, and all receipts given by him will be the same as given by myself. He will be at Akron with a supply of the "Rose of Sharon" for 1844 and the "Family Prayer Book," and I earnestly ask of all those who owe me that may be there, or who can send there, to settle up their accounts with him. It will be the most favorable of opportunities that can be offered. A. TOMPKINS.

We hope our western friends will embrace the opportunity of sending their dues for the Magazine and Advocate by our preachers, attending the Convention, from this section. We need the money. Br. J. S. Kibbe is authorized to receive money on our account. GROSH & WALKER.

THE CONFERENCE AT PROSPECT takes place next Wednesday and Thursday. An error occurred in the published notice—it was printed 23d and 24th, instead of 20th and 21st days of September. We hope no one will be misled by the error—that the friends will take pains to circulate the notice correctly—and that all who can will attend. Prospect village is two miles from Trenton Falls. A. B. G.

Also, the elementary and higher branches of modern languages, with every possible facility for enabling the student to become proficient therein.

The art of fencing, (comprising broad and small sword exercise,) together with such military exercises as may be desired, will be taught to the student free of expense.

DEATHS.

In the town of Little Falls, August 11th, Mr. JOHN D. PETRIE, aged 78 years. He was an old inhabitant of that town, respected, useful and active through life, and died resigned in the hope of immortality and peace for himself and all mankind.

His funeral was attended on the following Sunday, at his late residence, and his remains followed to the grave by a large procession of relatives, friends and neighbors. Sermon by A. B. G.

In Lee, August 16th, of consumption, Miss MARTHA MATTESON, eldest daughter of Jesse Matteson, Esq., in the 22d year of her age. Seldom has death taken a fairer flower or one of more hope and promise. She was possessed of many excellent virtues—gentle, mild, unassuming, and retiring in her demeanor. She was known only to be respected and beloved by all. Her funeral was attended on the 19th, by a vast concourse of surviving relatives and sympathizing friends; when the writer spoke of the consolation contained in the doctrine of the great salvation. In this dark death-hour the parents of the deceased are comforted with a faith that lifts them above the world—that enables them to see a Father's love beaming brightly, even in this night of gloom and sorrow. They realize that

"Her spirit hath flown to its rest,
Afar from our sorrowing clod;
To the bright happy land of the blest.
And the smiles of its glorious God:
She lingered a season below,
But to wash from her spirit the stain;
Then soared from our valley of woe,
To the far heights of glory again!

"She hath flown to the mansions above,
And found out the blood-ransomed throng;
She hath drank of the fountains of love,
And joined in the Seraphim's song:
She hath gone to the land of her birth,
Where the anthems of holiness rise;
She wearied with dwelling on earth,
And returned to her home in the skies!

"Her spirit hath flown to its rest,
Its sorrows and sufferings o'er;
It hath gained the far clime of the blest;
It will visit our cold earth no more!
Then weep not—'twere sinful to mourn,
That the Tyrant one fond hope hath riven:
Though she's gone, and no more may return,
She bathes in the glory of Heaven."

RURAL REPOSITORY.

The Rural Repository will be devoted to Polite Literature; containing Moral and Sentimental Tales, Original Communications, Biography, Travelling Sketches, Amusing Miscellany, Humorous and Historical Anecdotes, Useful Recipes, Poetry, &c.

The character and design of the Rural Repository being generally known, as it has been published nineteen years, and received a widely extended share of public patronage, and highly recommended by a large portion of our contemporaries of the press, and as it must be acknowledged to be one of the cheapest journals extant, the publisher deems it unnecessary in his proposals for publishing another volume to say more than that it will be conducted upon the same plan, though somewhat improved, and at the same low rate, that he has reason to believe has heretofore given satisfaction to its numerous patrons. In short, all that can serve to instruct and amuse, all that is calculated either to enlighten the understanding, or to improve the heart, is eagerly and assiduously sought after to adorn the pages of this publication. Not an idea shall be found in its columns which would tend to "Give virtue scandal, innocence a fear,
Or from the soft eyed maiden steal a tear."

CONDITIONS.—The Rural Repository will be published every other Saturday, in quarto form, every number embellished with one or more superior wood engravings, containing twenty-six numbers of eight pages each, with a title page and index to the volume, making in the whole 208 pages.—It will be printed in handsome style, on medium paper of a superior quality, with good type; making, at the end of the year, a neat and tasteful volume containing matter equal to one thousand duodecimo pages, which will be both amusing and instructive in future years.

FAREWELL.

BY MISS. E. M. TILLOTSON.

Farewell to thee!

How many bleeding hearts this world has broken,
And hopes of bliss o'erthrown! be it never spoken
On earth by me!

The word 's not bad;

Yet solemn strikes the soul, and mem'ry will It's swell prolong,—we vainly strive to still
The echo sad.

Who has not heard

The sound repeated with emotion deep,
When every dreaded thought would spring from sleep,
At this one word?

Who has not seen

The pallid lip, pale brow, and paler cheek;
The eye with luster dim, the utterance weak?
This word had been!

Then, never swell

Upon the ear a tone, that through all time,
Shall darkly vibrate as the mournful chime
Of funeral knell!

But rather, when

The parting hand we must in tears extend,
Console the sorrowing heart, and say, my friend,
We'll meet again!

MISTAKEN SYMPATHY.

"Have you heard the news?" exclaimed a thin gossiping looking lady, as she entered the snug little parlor of Mrs. Norris, who sat beneath a heap of clothing which had been worn by her husband or herself, and which she was diligently ripping up, with the benevolent intentions of making of the old garments, new and tidy clothing for several poor children to whom she annually gave such Christmas gifts. "Have you heard the news?"

"I hope nothing particularly disastrous has occurred," replied Mrs. Norris, quietly, for she seemed to know well to whom she was speaking. "Nothing less than the entire failure of Mr. Raymond," cried Mrs. Ross, with an agitated manner. "O, I do sympathize with the ladies of his household, poor things! how agonizing it must be to them to be obliged to come down from their exalted station, and leave their palace-like residence—indeed it will break their hearts! I would cheerfully give the little I possess if it could save them from such degradation."

"The ladies of Mr. Raymond's family should be exceedingly obliged to you," said Mrs. Norris, with a half smile.

"Well, I am surprised!" responded Mrs. Ross.—"Have you no sympathy for the unfortunate? Why, you seem not half so concerned as you were when widow Jones lost her old cow."

"And I do not conceive, my dear neighbor, that the Raymond ladies are half so much objects of sympathy as the poor widow Jones."

"What a strange woman you are! as if the loss of a cow was more to be lamented than the loss of seventy thousand dollars! And then Mrs. Jones had not the agony of being hurled from an exalted station."

"Ah! Mrs. Ross, you estimate things as most of our race do; but listen to me a few minutes. The Raymonds have figured in an 'exalted station,' and notwithstanding their great wealth, have expended beyond their income, for magnificent dress and furniture, dinners and parties, which all served but to pamper their pride, and the love of pleasure, till now the pressure of the times has revealed their true situation, and Mr. Raymond has failed in the sum of seventy thousand dollars. He will probably remove from his palace, as you call it, and those who are just what he has been, will perhaps pass by him scornfully. But he will retain more than a comfortable competence, and why should I pity those who are wealthier after their losses, than I can ever hope to be? Does any one deem me an object of pity? and yet I fill a station on which the Raymonds will still look down scornfully. But poor widow Jones, who earns her daily bread by the labor of her hands, had no treasure but the good old cow, which had supplied her children with milk, and her table with butter so many years. When I saw her weeping amongst her children for the loss which they had no means of repairing, I felt willing to make some sacrifice to restore their comfort. Let those who are still wealthy sympathize with the Raymonds and other fallen great ones. It becomes such as I rather to pity such as lack the blessings which I enjoy; for to such I may hope to be of some service. Look around, Mrs. Ross, and observe how many poor sufferers there are on every side, who actually suffer for want of the common necessities of life, notwithstanding their severe and incessant labor."

"Oh yes, such objects are plenty enough; but they are used to poverty, and not to be pitied like those who fall like the Raymonds."

"How perverted are this world's sympathies! The Raymonds still possess all they need desire. They may still command all the elegancies of life; things that would be luxuries indeed to thousands. I believe they will be far happier, and much more useful in the world now than they have ever been. I dare say that if I were now to call on them with a request for a small subscription, as I did when widow Jones lost her cow, and I undertook to repair the loss, I should receive a far more courteous answer than they vouchsafed me then. I remember also that you who just now declared that you would give all you possess, could such a sacrifice restore to the Raymonds what they have squandered, refused to give me one dollar toward repairing the poor widow's loss. And yet this very widow Jones is all that constitutes a gentlewoman, every way superior to the objects of your present condolence."

"I do not see how that can be possible, I never heard that Jones was ever rich. But do tell me her history if you know it."

"I will give you a little sketch of her life as I received it from her own mouth. Her father was a rich merchant in Bristol, England, and educated her, his only daughter, in the best possible manner. She was affianced to a young baronet, and the world lay bright before her. But her young lover died of typhus fever; disastrous failures of foreign houses impaired her father's wealth, and he resolved to emigrate to America, and commence farming. He therefore turned the remainder of his great wealth into gold and silver, and with his daughter and a few domestics embarked. This was before there were Atlantic steamers, and the voyage to England often occupied several months. The merchant, who was unaccustomed to any hardship or exposure, sunk under the sea-sickness, which induced apoplexy, and ere he had been two weeks out, he died. Poor Eveline! how did her already bruised heart support this dreadful bereavement. How great must have been her agony when she saw the cold form of her kind father, her only parent, cast into the deep sea! Yet she saw it and lived. Mr. Jones had been a clerk in her father's employ, and a deep, yet hopeless love for Eveline had lured him to attend upon her fortunes. He was now all that was left her, and his heart throbbed in the dear consciousness that she leaned on him for consolation. But it seemed that she was marked for sorrow, for the ship was driven out of her reckoning by a fearful storm, and finally wrecked upon the coast of New Brunswick. Jones saved his lady's life by almost superhuman efforts, but the ship with all her cargo was lost. Thus was she, the timid, the gentle, the lovely and educated, cast alone and penniless upon a bleak and inhospitable land of strangers. The utmost that Jones could do for her was to procure her lodging with a family amongst whom she soon learned to be useful; while he worked for wages in a neighboring town. Thus they continued two years, during the last of which she received small wages; and then they resolved to seek a more genial climate. But propriety suggested a measure, to which affection gave joyous sanction, and they were married, and, immediately proceeded to New York, where he obtained a lucrative clerkship. Prosperity now seemed returning, and Eveline Jones was happy. But her happiness was only a sunbeam from between dark clouds, for her husband's health soon evidently began to decline. He sustained himself a long time, but was at length obliged to relinquish business, and she persuaded him to remove into the country in hopes that the pure air would be beneficial. So they came amongst us, and notwithstanding the grumbling of some who feared a town charge, here he was permitted to die."

"Oh, Mrs. Norris!" cried Mrs. Ross, "your words pierce me to the heart! I was amongst the murmurers you speak of. I shut my heart against that poor family at first; I have added to the afflictions of the widow and her fatherless children."

Mrs. Norris proceeded without noticing her auditor's agitation. "Scarce and small were consolations offered these poor sufferers; and few were there amongst us who ministered to their necessities. The poor woman sat by her husband's bedside, with her babe on her lap, her work in her hands, and the tears on her eyelashes. I appealed to several on her behalf; to the Raymonds amongst others, but every heart was closed, every hand shut. But the Lord in whom she trusted was with them, and they found support. Poor Jones died, and a very few attended the funeral. The poor widow was indeed forlorn—none came to weep with her or to comfort her. Her children were too young to sympathize with her, yet their claim roused her from the stupor of desolation, and she toiled patiently on. I was sitting with her a few weeks after her widowhood, when the pompous and numerous funeral of Mr. Norwood passed toward the cemetery. The tears began to start silently from her eyes, and at length she burst into a passion of weeping. At length she said—'the homage which mankind pay to wealth, attends it even to the grave.' I felt forcibly the bitterness of the comparison which had forced itself on her mind, and wept because I could offer her no consolation."

"For pity's sake forbear!" cried Mrs. Ross. "I am guilty of a great neglect of duty. If I had known her history sooner, I should have certainly done something for her long ago. But I will make amends—I will visit her this very day."

"You can visit her, but she does not now need your sympathy. By the will of a brother to her mother, who, on the death of his only son, sought her out, she has become possessed of an ample fortune, and will soon set sail for her native country, to take possession of wealth which will command the respect which her beauty of person, accomplishments, genteel carriage, and true Christian meekness and purity, failed to elicit, so long as the gilding was wanting. But there is plenty of room for any charity or sympathy which you may have intended for her. Many are the noble and generous spirits, struggling against misfortune, and shrinking from the world's cold pity, amid those who can not bring that magic key to your mistaken sympathy, 'the remembrance of better days.' I know many who were born and reared in cottages, fed by the healthy hand of labor, and taught from the high and precious book of Providence—who in every essential of true nobility, are far superior to most of those who claim homage, because their fathers have somehow become rich, and because they have been taught genteel accomplishments. ## DISCOURSES ON PRAYER.....NO. IV.

BY REV. DAY K. LEE.

"Trust in him at all times, ye people; pour out your heart before him; God is a refuge for us." Psal. lxxii: 8.

The text is not precisely suggestive of what I design to remark in the present discourse on the subject of prayer, but a more appropriate one I could not readily find, and as this exhorts us to acts of devotion, it may serve as a caption to a devotional sermon. If any people in the world can trust in God, believing him their refuge and strength; if any have just encouragement to pour out their souls before him in supplication, thanksgiving and praise, I apprehend it is those who profess the faith of the Universalist Christian. I have reiterated this idea because I desire to impress it upon your minds, and the minds of our neighbors. "Trust in him at all times, ye people"—said the Psalmist—"Trust in him at all times, ye people; pour out your heart before him; God is a refuge for us."

We should trust in him at all times, and there are times in which we are apt to trust in him. In health and prosperity—in happiness, and high enjoyment we are apt to trust in him thus much—we will be willing to leave it all to him, rather indifferently trusting that he will do all his pleasure, and will also do what shall be best for us.—But this is not the right sort of trust. It is not living, not soul-felt, not implicit, not enduring. It is a mere passive, common-consent trust which the first gale of discouragement, the first cloud of distress or disappointment will banish from our bosoms. Let us trust in him at all times—at all times, believing with all our hearts that God is a refuge for us. Trust in him in sickness, in sorrow, in bereavement and the bitterest tribulation, and be ready with the faithful Job to exclaim—"Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him;" and with the afflicted, yet confiding prophet to say, "Although the fig tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vine, the labor of the olive shall fail, and the fields shall yield no meat; the flock shall be cut off from the fold, and there shall be no herd in the stalls, yet I will rejoice in the Lord—I will joy in the God of my salvation." This—this is trusting in him, rejoicing in him, confiding in him, as men should at all times confide. But since we are apt to lack this confidence, and be wavering, if not totally wanting in this lofty trust, we should perform such acts—adopt such helps—as will establish our hearts, our lives, our inclinations, our hopes in it. Because we may happen to lack any good quality or sentiment which we do not already possess, we should not fold our arms, and cease from the endeavor to obtain it. But we should set ourselves about that which we think will bring us soonest into its possession.

I believe that much of the doubt and dark discouragement which prevails among mankind may be removed, and they may turn to the Lord with full and confiding, and believing hearts, casting their burdens upon him, and expecting in due time to be relieved from all their sorrows and distresses. It is not absolutely natural for us to doubt; but we may say it is too apt to be one of the weaknesses of our nature. The saying is a trite one, and a truthful one too that we are naturally religious—naturally devotional beings, and all that is requisite to perfect us in sentiments of piety and confidence, is an assiduous cultivation of the religious emotions—the devotional affections, and prayerful inclinations.

And there is nothing of which I can conceive that is in our power to do, which I believe will be more successful in promoting that trust, and drawing out, elevating, perfecting those sentiments of piety, than prayer—habitual, earnest, confiding prayer. It is possible that I may have hinted this before—whether it be so or not, I do not recollect—this much I will say, it will do no harm even to repeat the hint—say, to change it from a hint to a brief discourse.

We will understand this time, then, that prayer will increase, strengthen, exalt our trust in God—and incline us to look to him as our refuge, our strength, our help in trouble and in peace, in sorrow and in pleasure. By contracting a devotional, prayerful state of mind, we will of course learn more to appreciate the blessings bestowed upon us—more to value them, more to enjoy them, and more to look up to the source from whence they come, with the confident belief that they will be continued to us.

The more we see, and the more we appreciate of an earthly parent's blessings and kindness, the more we are led to trust in him for a continuance of favor, and the oftener we will pour out the desires and the gratitude of the heart before him!—And so I conceive it to be in regard to the blessings of our heavenly Father. By communing with him in the spirit and the soul-felt understanding, we will be led more and more to conceive and appreciate his loving kindness and unfailing, unwavering faithfulness toward us—and to look more confidently, and with a more joyful expectation, for repeated mercies, and unceasing help and consolation.

I would name secret, individual prayer, as of inestimable interest and assistance in this excellent endeavor of increasing our trust. Prayer, we have said brings us into a nearness to God, and leads us to think that he is very near to us, ready to sustain us in our good resolutions, and to deliver us from our griefs and sorrows. We should remember this when we go about secret prayer. We should remember that he has promised to draw nigh to us, and that our rational desires shall be granted, and our offerings of sincere gratitude accepted; and should therefore draw nigh unto him with pure hearts, and sincere devotion, and pray as David did, "Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength and my redeemer." We can not expect to go through this fickle, changing world alone, without the assistance and consolation of Him who is the refuge and abiding place of all his children. Indeed we should be ever impressed with the solemn thought that every breath we draw, and every moment of existence that comes to us, is the gift of God, and that without his constant care and his fatherly aid, we should cease altogether to exist. We can not expect to endure the trials, the cares and bereavements of life, and meet death with a becoming, with a Christian resignation, without we are habituated to frequent, secret communings with him. When we are about to enter upon some untried business—when we are going forth upon distant journeyings—or are engaging in solemn covenants, upon whose success or misfortune will depend the prosperity or adversity of life, we should come before the presence of our Maker in secret, and earnestly and humbly ask that he be very near to us—as a watchful, guardful, sympathizing father—and sustain us by his grace, comfort us with his assurance of help, deliver us from destruction, preserve us from degeneracy, and sickness, and want, and at last receive us to the heavenly habitation. And when misfortunes, and sorrows, and distresses come—as they come upon us all—and weigh down the spirit, and darken our earthly prospects; we should then come before him and increase our trust, and find mitigation in our afflictions, by prayer to him, and communing with his pitiful spirit. He who has never addressed his Creator in an expression of devotion, knows not, feels not even that priceless privilege which the prayerful enjoy in such seasons. He knows not what a hiding place from the wind—what a covert from the tempest—what a shield and helper our Lord will become then—when we most need assistance and strengthening favor.

I know of one at least who has enjoyed this privilege, and who thinks he has received aid that gold or rubies could not purchase. He has been somewhat a wanderer upon earth, has dwelt for a considerable time a great distance from all relatives and friends, and in that time has seen much agonizing sickness, and unpropitious fortune. But he has experienced the blessed privilege of solitary prayer. He has poured out his heart before his Maker, when the cold chill settled like an incubus upon his frame, and the burning fever was devouring his strength, and giving him poignant anguish—when no friendly, kindred hand, could bathe his hot brow, and no kind, loving, familiar relative or friend could engage in his lonely night-watchings. Oh, I do know of one, at least, if I can not remember more, who has, at such a season as this, felt that it was a blessed privilege to commune with God;—and felt moreover that God has answered his desires, mitigated his pains, restored his strength, his health, his peace; and been to him a Father and a Guardian. And he would not lose his trust, his confidence in God—he would not be denied the privilege of prayer, for the riches, and honor, and glory of the temporal world. He would feel himself prepared to meet with the sorrows that have fallen, and continue to fall to his lot—he would feel lonely and sad, and desolate, indeed, even in the midst of sympathizing friends, if the support and confidence of God, obtained in prayer, should be withdrawn. He knows not how he could meet death for himself or his friends with becoming cheerfulness, and with sustaining comfort, were it not that he could feel by the constant habit of prayer, that it is his Father who calls, his Father who wounds; and believed that "Happy is the man whom God correcteth," and whom God receiveth, "for he maketh sore and bindeth up, he woundeth and his hands make whole."

The remark has become a proverb, that money is the best friend to be found in a strange land—and in any land. Money is good, so far as its assistance goes—so far as it can procure some of the comforts of physical life. But if I were in possession of thousands, and felt that money was my only help and my solitary friend, methinks I should be in a most desolate condition, and be poor, and fatherless, friendless, joyless, helpless, indeed! What support—what assistance could I find in countless millions, unless I believed that a greater, heavenlier Friend were near me to give me life, and success, and consolation? God is the great, and in fact the only unchanging, unfailing friend that we can have in any land; and without him—without feeling that his smiles are upon us, and his kingdom is within us, we are at best but fugitives and vagabonds in the earth. God is the friend that can help us most in a strange land, in sickness, and in want; and to him we should look in a spirit of generous piety for support, for life and health, for other friends and other alleviations. And the individual who shares his communion—who seeks to enjoy his presence and his warming, life-giving smiles, is rich indeed. He has a friend in all countries and in all climates, in all seasons, circumstances and dispensations. He has meat, he has joy, he has help, that ye know not of. His soul is anchored in the paradise of blessedness and glory!

"What trouble, indeed, can overwhelm—what fear can discompose that man whose trust, whose hope, whose friend the Lord is; and who enjoys his daily communion? What earthly power can make such a man very unhappy? Will you take away his riches? His treasure is in heaven.—Will you banish him from home and friends? His country is above, and God is his Father, Friend, and Christ and the angels are his kindred. Will you bind him in chains? His conscience, his spirit, his affections, all are free—heaven itself is but an emblem of his happiness. As heaven is enlightened by the rising sun, his soul is illuminated by that Sun of Righteousness, which ariseth without setting in his heart. As heaven is intrinsically bright and beautiful, though clouds obscure, and, midnight darkness surround it, he is peaceful, happy and serene in the midst of trials and afflictions. As heaven is exalted above the storms and tempests of this lower atmosphere, he is elevated above the distractions and perturbations of this troublesome world. He is a Christian. He prays to God our Father. His conversation is in heaven. His life is hid with Christ, in God."*

If this then be the reward—the blessedness of the pious man—if this is to be enjoyed by the possession of a devotional spirit, and by the habit of secret prayer, as I most sincerely believe it may be—as I know in fact it has been the case—can I be too earnest, can I labor too hard to induce those of my people who have not attended to this thing, to go right about the cultivation of pious affections, and spiritual, grateful, prayerful emotions? Is it not my duty as an humble herald of the cross, to point out the course which I believe it will be right for Christians to follow, and urge those things upon them, in which they will taste most of the blessedness of their faith—most of the pleasure of life, and be best prepared for the endurance of bereavement and sorrow?

I have spoke of the assistance of prayer in sickness, in want, in bereavement and death. I have not spoken at random, neither have I made an assertion in regard to something here, of which I do not know—of which I have had no experience. I know how it has sustained—how it has consoled, how it has cheered and chastened my own heart, and animated it to seek, and to find refuge in him who is very near to the afflicted! I know how it has increased my delight in the Scriptures, in their precious promises, in their sublime and lofty truths; I know how it has seemed to lift me up into an endearing communion with God's parental spirit; I know how it has expanded my faith, exalted my hopes, brightened my prospects, opened the glory and rest and peace of heaven to my believing soul, and led me to exclaim, "Surely the gloominess of doubt, the heaviness of sorrow, and the bitterness of death are passed."

I know of others who have enjoyed the privilege of devotion in sickness—and who have felt that half their pains, and half their sorrows were in this way swallowed up of life, and peace, and joy.—They have raised a voice of supplication to the Lord in their distresses, and he has seemed to relieve them—he has seemed to open before them more cheering views, and not unfrequently to restore them to health and greater happiness again. They have been led to estimate more truly and more justly the value of the Christian faith; and to magnify its heavenly consolations. They have said, "what though the hand of disease is laid heavily upon me, what though the evil day is come in which I can have no pleasure in the things that surround me—yet I know I am rich in faith—yet I know that God loves me, that he lends me the blessed communion of his spirit, and that he holds me in the hollow of his hand, that he hath chosen a good and a glorious inheritance for me—I know that Heaven respects me, that Christ died to deliver me—and I am affluent, I am blest. I have friends the most faithful and loving in the universe—I have joy in my devotions, joy in the Holy Spirit, joy unspeakable and full of glory! I can say with the trustful Psalmist, 'Blessed is the man who thou chastenest, O Lord, and teachest him out of thy law.'" Such persons as these I have found among those who enjoyed the spirit of prayer in sickness and distress. And beholding their devotion to God and to heaven—seeing their cheerfulness in pain, and their sublime trust in the loneliness and grief of troublesome, wearisome nights, has increased my own faith, and led me to say with the grateful apostle, "thanks be to God for his unspeakable gifts." "Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

I have known also the blessed effect of prayer at the death bed. I have known the trusting, confiding, hoping spirit go down to the grave when there was a perfect cheerfulness, and heavenly radiance upon their faces, and they seemed to "Wrap the drapery of their couch about them, And lie down to pleasant dreams."

They would not pray to be saved from endless sorrow. They believed that the Lord of love had no such thing in reserve for one of his children. But they would pray for still more faith, and still loftier trust in his transcendent goodness. They would pray for strength to endure with becoming courage the pains laid upon them; they would pray for a resignation of heart, and will, and inclination; for a spirit that would be sufficiently grateful for countless benefits received, for the welfare of dear friends, loving kindred, needy neighbors, and fellow beings. They would pray for still more cheering anticipations of the future, and of that world where all are to be united again; and their supplications and thanksgiving would seem to make them new creatures. They have gone down to the opening grave—"not like the quarry slave at night, scourged to his dungeon;" not like a miserable culprit about to enter upon unimaginable torments; not as men and women afraid to die, and afraid to pass into another world—but they have gone down as shocks of corn come in their season; as happy travellers, about to step forth from a gloomy world into a more delightful country where the Eden of pleasure blooms, and where the soul shall take her fill of gladness and of peace.

If such, then, be the benefits of prayer and specially secret, individual prayer, in sickness, and in a strange land, and in sorrow and death, let us cultivate the spirit—let us trust in the Lord at all times, and pour out our hearts before him at all times; for he is our refuge and our strength, a very present help in every season.

UNIVERSALISM GOOD IN LIFE AND DEATH.

BY REV. A. SCOTT.

It is often said that Universalism will do to live by; a truer declaration than which was never penned, for it is moralizing in its nature, and peculiarly calculated to lead man in the paths of virtue and peace. There is no principle other than universal love and benevolence, that is fit to carry into active life. There is no sentiment so well calculated to inspire high and exalted opinions of Deity as this; it representing him as a being of unbounded benevolence, exercising all the feelings of a kind and indulgent parent towards his offspring.

Teaching, as it does, all the adorable perfections of Deity, with the assurances that this being is our Father, the father of the human race; it inspires in the bosom feelings of reverence and filial fear, and enables man in confidence to pray, "Our Father which art in heaven." Teaching, as it does, a universal brotherhood, it awakens feelings of brotherly love and kindness, and enables man to exercise towards his fellow-man, those principles which are calculated, in their nature, to elevate him in the scale of moral intelligence and raise him above the fluctuating scenes of earth.

Teaching, as it does, the impartiality of God, that he will reward every man according to his works—that vice will produce misery, and virtue happiness, it will cause man to love virtue for its own worth, and to hate and shun vice on account of its loathsomeness and direful consequences.—Thus we learn that it is peculiarly calculated to make man what he should be. Hence, then, the propriety of the declaration, "It will do to live by." Our most bitter opposers have been compelled to bestow upon it this meed of praise. And as this is the case, as it is good to live by, we should all live by it. That life we now live, we should ever live by faith in the Son of God. We should ever live by that which is good. "Eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness," is the language of the prophet. He well knew the worth of this sentiment; hence he made this injunction, preceded by an invitation to all that thirst, to come to the waters—to buy wine and milk without money and without price. But tell these professed lovers of souls, that as this doctrine is good to live by, all should embrace it and live in its light; they turn about and declare that notwithstanding it is so good in life it will not answer in a dying hour!

This, to me, is strange logic. That which is good, the very thing we want in life, will not answer our purpose on the bed of death! For my part, I have always believed that that principle which will answer in the one case, will do equally as well in the other. It is this idea, that it is not good in death, which has caused so many to entreat us to prepare to die; a requisition not once found in the Bible. One thing, however, is certain—we had better be preparing to live, for to him who is in a fit state of preparation for life, death will never come an unwelcome messenger. This being the case, and Universalism being so good for this preparation, it will serve an excellent purpose for the other. Just think of the idea which teaches that God is our father and heaven our home. Reflect that we are away from home and father, and naught will better prepare man to meet death with resignation than the fact, that we are but going from this state of trial, trouble, and disappointment to our homes—to a place of rest at our Father's right hand in that heaven prepared for the world of mankind.

Teaching, as Universalism does, a glorious rest beyond the tomb, "where the wicked cease from troubling, and where the weary are at rest"—that life and immortality is the portion of every individual of the human race, where they shall be purified from all uncleanness, through the purpose of God—which teaches that death shall be swallowed up in victory, and all be reheated in Christ the head of the church—I say, teaching, as it does, these glorious truths, it is the very truth which will enable us to lean our heads on Jesus' breast, and breathe our lives out sweetly there. Its sting thereby is taken away, and with a firm and unwavering trust and confidence on God, we may recline ourselves upon the dying couch in peace and joy.—Verily, it is a crown in life, and a solace in death—the theme that is worthy, above all others, of our reception, and the only one when carried into active life, which can make its rough ways smooth, and its end, peace, quietness, and assurance forever.

Let none, then, fear it; for it is our only ground of hope. Let those who have embraced it, live in its light; and those who have not, commence now to walk in its counsels, which alone will ease their troubled spirits.

Kind reader, how long think ye the idea will be preached, that the doctrine of God is good in life and evil in death? How long think ye will man remain in a state of wilful ignorance, and blindness? I answer, so long as he worships inconsistency and adores injustice. But my prayer for Israel is, that it might be saved—that Zion might travail and bring them to see his great goodness and loving kindness, which is showered without partiality or favor, upon every son and daughter of earth.

It is good in life. It is good in death. I will hug it like a bosom friend, and defend it so long as God shall spare my life and strength, he being my helper.

"THE UNIVERSALIST COMPANION,"

With an Almanac and Register, containing the Statistics of the Denomination for 1844." Edited and published by Br. A. B. GROSH, 32 Genesee st., Utica.

This very useful work to the Universalist denomination is now ready for sale at the publishing office, and very soon will be by Universalist booksellers and preachers generally, throughout the country; and every Universalist family in the United States should procure a copy as early as possible. It embraces 64 pages, and contains, besides an almanac adapted to the latitude and longitude of the Eastern, the Middle, and the Western States, four short, expository and pitthy sermons, by A. B. G.; a short and pungent article on Universal Salvation, by the same; a long, clear, pointed, nervous article on Punishment—its nature and object, by A. B. Grosh. This article is worth the price of the whole book. Then comes a brief article on the voice of the Past, by W. H. Griswold; and then one entitled, Universalism not a new doctrine, by H. B. S.; which is followed by 24 pages of Statistics of the denomination, which cost the Editor an almost incredible amount of labor; and which is, beyond all question, the fullest and most perfect table of statistics of the Universalist denomination ever published. It embraces the United States and Territories, and also the Canadas; and is itself alone worth, to every individual who feels any interest in the prosperity of Universalism, four times the price of the whole work. It gives the number of Conventions, General and State; the number of Associations, societies, churches, Sabbath schools, meeting houses, preachers and their residences, schools, periodicals, books published, etc., and the increase during the past year in the U. States, Territories and Canadas. It does seem to me that no family who know the contents of this little work, will delay procuring a copy for their own use, and half a dozen or more for distribution among their neighbors and friends of a different faith. Its circulation among such would do good; it would teach them that the small band of a few years ago in this country, has become a large army, and that they are increasing in numbers with astonishing rapidity; besides, by the articles it contains, giving them some knowledge of the doctrine itself.—Those who want, must send in their orders, accompanied with the cash, early, if they wish to secure them; for the edition is not very large and is rapidly selling. In closing, I must say that I do wish that every Universalist family could procure a copy of the Register; it is cheap, costs only one shilling per single copy, and one dollar per dozen. Who will not have a Universalist Register, nay, half a dozen or a dozen of them? H. B. S.

N. B.—I have said elsewhere that I am opposed to all self-puffing except my own. The above does not even come under this class, for I am obliged to Br. Soule for the favor, this time! It is very convenient to have a sympathising friend to note your labors, and thus comment on them when published, and inform the public of the fact of their worth. It is tempting one to remain an Editor, even yet longer. A. B. G.

MINUTES,

Of the Proceedings of the Chenango Association of Universalists, for 1843.

Met in Oxford, Chenango co., September 7th and 8th. Organized by choosing Br. J. S. Sherburne, Moderator; and after uniting in prayer with Br. A. G. Clark, Br. J. B. Gilman, Clerk. The minutes of the last meeting were then read and approved.

Received the Societies of Binghamton* and Pitcher into fellowship. Br. Berry from Walton, and Br. Comb from Hamden, were invited to take seats in the Council. The Standing Clerk reported that Conferences had been held at Smithville Flatts, Upper Lisle, and Pitcher. The Committee on fellowship and ordination reported "no application." On discipline, "no complaint."

Reports accepted. The Committee appointed by the Council organized at the Conference held in Pitcher "to draft a Constitution for an Itinerant Association," reported "progress," and requested to be excused from any farther report until the meeting of the first Conference of this Association. Request complied with.

Brs. L. Gross, W. Ogden and D. Brown, were appointed to nominate the several standing committees; and reported the following standing committees, which were adopted. On fellowship and ordination, Brs. De Long, Warren and Goodrich. On Discipline, Brs. Sherburne, Guild and De Long. Delegates to attend the State Convention, Brs. E. E. Guild and C. L. Shipman (ministerial,) C. Cole and J. Richards (laymen,) with power to appoint substitutes. The Clerk to prepare the Minutes for publication in the Magazine and Advocate, and request the Union and Messenger, and Luminary to copy—and to accompany the same with such remarks as he may think proper. Br. C. L. Shipman to preach the next occasional sermon, with power to appoint a substitute. The Standing Clerk to appoint Conferences during the year, at such times and places as he may be requested.

Friday Morning.—United in prayer with Br. Hollister.

The Committee on fellowship and ordination reported that requests had been received from Brs. J. J. Austin and J. B. Gilman, to be published as applicants for letters of fellowship at the next meeting of this Association. Accepted.

The following preamble and resolution were presented by Br. De Long, and unanimously passed.

Whereas our much esteemed Br. C. B. Brown is suffering under a protracted and painful illness, and his situation and circumstances are such as require immediate pecuniary aid; and whereas, it is customary for this Association to take up a collection to defray the expenses of our ministering brethren who come to attend its meeting—therefore,

Resolved, that the collection which shall be taken up at this time, shall be for the benefit of our suffering brother; and that a brother be appointed to present his case before the congregation, and solicit contributions in his behalf.

Whereupon Br. Cook was appointed.

Adjourned to meet at Preston Corners on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in September, 1844.

J. S. SHERBURNE, Moderator.

J. B. GILMAN, Clerk.

Sermons were preached by Brs. Hollister, Clark, Cook, Whitcomb and Skinner. On Friday afternoon water baptism was administered to nine candidates—and a church numbering twenty nine members, organized—after which the eucharist was celebrated—services by Brs. Pickering and Skinner. Usual addresses to the congregation by Br. Skinner. On Friday evening sermons were preached by Brs. De Long and Guild.

Lay Delegates present.—T. G. Lamb, Columbus; D. Brown, C. Cole, Oxford; P. Landers, E. W. Corbin, Bainbridge; W. Ogden, J. B. Gilman, Binghamton; E. Gorton, D. Jones, North Norwich; L. Gross, B. Hodges, Upper Lisle; J. C. Rogers, C. L. Beebe, Pitcher; U. Bartle, L. Ackley, McDonough; H. Bump, R. B. Beedles, Smithville Flatts.

Ministers present.—J. T. Goodrich, J. J. Austin, Oxford; E. E. Guild, So. Bainbridge; A. O. Warren, Lisle; W. M. De Long, Binghamton; D. Skinner, Deerfield; T. J. Whitcomb, Cortland; J. R. Mack, F. P. Hollister, Gibson, Pa.; S. J. Gibson, Monroeton, Pa.; L. Hyatt, Worcester; A. G. Clark, McLean; Z. Cook, Hamilton; J. S. Sherburne, Sherburne; D. Pickering, Louisville; J. M. Peebles, Lisle; — Haynes, Benton, Pa. —17.

REMARKS.—Every Society, I think, legally in existence was represented, and the prospects as reported, show that our cause was never more prosperous within the bounds of this Association. The congregation the first day, considering the unceasing rain which fell in torrents, was large—and on Friday many were unable to obtain an entrance within the house. The singing was good. The preaching interesting and instructing, and listened to by an attentive congregation. In fact, we had a glorious meeting. And to our friends in Oxford, Methodists as well as Universalists, would we tender our thanks for their kindness in ministering to our temporal wants.

At the close of the services on Friday morning, a collection was taken up for the benefit of Br. C. B. Brown, which amounted to twenty four dollars. Can not—will not other Associations "do likewise"? Per order.

J. B. GILMAN, Clerk.

MARRIAGES.

In New Hartford, September 14th, by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. NATHANIEL BARNES, of Kirkland, to Miss JANE BUSHNELL, of the former town.

In Litchfield, on the 14th inst., by Rev. Otis Thompson, Mr. J. C. HAINES, merchant of Chicago, to Miss EMMA A. FAY, of Watertown.

DEATHS.

In Westfield, Ghautauque county, September 1st, Mrs. RUTH STOWELL, wife of Mr. William Stowell, formerly of Otsego county, in the 66th year of her age. Mrs. Stowell had endeared herself to a large circle of friends and acquaintances, by her mild and neighborly deportment; and by uniform integrity in her associations with them. By this dispensation of Providence a beloved husband and four children have been deprived of her society, her counsel and her tender care; and community has lost one of its ornaments.

Though not a professor of any particular system of religious theology, yet she died reconciled to the will of Heaven. The Lord comfort the mourning family "with the fulness of the blessings of the Gospel of Christ." Sermon on the occasion of her funeral by the writer. L. PAINE.

In Phelps, Ontario county, August 24th, Mr. PETER J. ROBERTS, father of the Rev. Orrin Roberts, aged 61 years, 5 months, and 7 days. Father R. had been for sometime considerably indisposed, but had not been thought dangerously afflicted, until a day or two before his departure, a malignant attack of cholera morbus indicated that it was bringing him down to the grave. It is with no unmeaning language, and no common place emotion, that we say a Father in Israel hath fallen, and a servant of Righteousness gone to his rest. For many years he had rejoiced in the Universalist faith, and enjoyed the additional satisfaction of hearing it eloquently proclaimed by a dear, and an excellent son. And did he believe this divine and animating doctrine? so did he make it his living, practical sentiment, and his dying sentiment, also. He was truly "an example of the believers;" and after having enjoyed an earnest of the spirit on earth, we believe has gone to possess the blessed inheritance in heaven. The funeral was attended on the following Saturday by the writer, assisted in the services by Br. David Biddlecom. D. K. LEE.

In Lockport, July 17th, ALFRED MOYER, son of Philip and Catharine Maria Moyer, aged 6 years.

This interesting boy, though young, had attached all in his favor who knew him. The early flower which had thus early begun to unfold its delicate petals, God had taken to a more congenial clime—free from blight—to safely expand to the free and gentle zephyrs of the gardens of eternal felicity.

Also, August 19th, after a severe and trying sickness of a few weeks, Mrs. CATHARINE MARIA MOYER, aged 25.

Mrs. Moyer was indeed a Universalist. The few last days of her life on earth, though her mind was dreamy, still from her oft expressions of resignation—her constant quoting passages of Scripture, such as, "there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain;" and others of like import, none could fail to discover what the impressions of her mind were. Though her mind was broken and floating, yet as the fragments passed to view, and the written side came up, we could trace those legible inscriptions which had been, before sickness, written by the finger of God's love—by the pen of Divinity on the table-stone of filial love dedicated to the service of God. May her afflicted husband, her dear mother and brothers find abundant healing for their wounds in the balm which flows freely in Gilead.—[Luminary.

THE FAIRY'S GIFT.

BY MISS C. M. TIBBITS.

Fair lady, I have wandered o'er heaven, earth and sea,
 To gather from their treasures a worthy gift for thee!
 I've roamed through sunlit bowers, and culled each rosy hue,
 And held the lily's snowy cup to catch the pearly dew.

I've climbed the mountain's summit, where quiv'ring moonbeams fell;

And culled earth's brightest diamonds around thy brow to dwell;

I've sought the pearl and coral afar within the deep,
 Where, rocked upon the wavelets' breast, the sprite and mermaid sleep.

And then, on airy pinions, away, away I flew,
 Along the spangled concave of heaven's eternal blue;
 And from each gem that's shining along that starry dome,
 I gathered up a penciled ray to strew around thy home.

Here's friendship's wreath, fair lady, all in its dewy bloom, Bright flowers that ne'er shall wither, not e'en around thy tomb;

And from the distant heavens I've brought religion's ray,
 To shed its steady lustre around thy future way.

THE DUTIES OF A WIFE.

BY MRS. MARY E. AMES.

To enumerate all the duties devolving upon a wife, would require more room than is usually allotted to writers for our periodicals. Hence I shall be very brief —confining myself to what I deem the most important.

There are but few wives, who are duly sensible of the great and responsible duties which devolve upon them; and few are aware of the powerful influence which they are capable of exerting over their husbands, for better or for worse. It is impossible for the husband, situated as he often is in life—surrounded by, and subject to all the perplexities and trials which exist in the world—to continually wear a smile, or speak at all times in a pleasing and affable manner. Every wife should incessantly bear this in mind. She should often reflect, that she is in a great measure secure from those trials and unpleasant differences and contentions which unavoidably enter into business affairs, and consider, that oftentimes, they have an uncontrollable tendency to render her husband incapable of exhibiting that cheerfulness which he could wish, and which no doubt would be gratifying to her. At such periods, the duty of the wife is great, and she should not forget at this critical moment that a cheerful countenance and a disposition to participate in his troubles, would do very much to inspire him with hope, and dissipate those gloomy forebodings which overcome and depress the smiles of her kind and affectionate companion. Many wives have unfortunately established a rule, that when their husbands deviate in the least from what they deem to be strictly proper and just, to openly and frowningly manifest their displeasure, and exhibit a sort of superiority or physical prowess. This is certainly very unbecoming and can seldom fail to engender and perpetuate those unpleasant feelings, which unavoidably terminate in the destruction of domestic happiness.

I have not unfrequently witnessed family scenes like the following:—The husband, wearied and depressed, resorts to his wife and family as a source of consolation, and reasonably expects to be welcomed with a cheerful countenance and a placid heart; but in this he is un-happily disappointed. He however remains composed and apparently cheerful, observing more than observed, and at last in a mild and complaisant manner inquires of his wife, "Is tea ready, dear?" "No!" responds the wife. "You went off this morning without preparing me any wood, and how do you 'pose I can do any thing without it? People tell me if they were in my place they wouldn't try to do any thing—and I shan't!" Now, how pleasing and delightful such an interview must be to a husband! Must not home be a delightful abode—a cherished and consecrated spot! Will he not view the revellings of a dram-shop with disgust, and eagerly resort to his wife and family with an unusual degree of pleasure. Can I answer yes—when the one is but a grocery—the other a HELL!! But enough.

The wife, notwithstanding this slight neglect on the part of her husband—unintentionally perhaps—should endeavor to anticipate his wants, and labor to faithfully provide for them. This she can do in a great measure, as she has all the facilities for ascertaining his wants, being perfectly familiar with his disposition and habits.—
 Her patience may at times be unnecessarily taxed, yet they should never furnish grounds for a refusal to perform her sworn duties in a cheerful and acquiescing manner. The husband may at times be uncommonly peevish, and apparently without grounds, which is truly unpleasant and many times exceedingly trying; yet the truly good and amiable wife will carefully overlook these imperfections, and strive to overcome evil by doing good—by suppressing her grief, and adorning her countenance with an approving smile. She should in all such cases, diligently inquire the cause—ask herself the question, "Does he intentionally grieve me? Is he not naturally a kind and affectionate husband, and a bountiful provider?—and does not his melancholy countenance and irritable conversation proceed, from some cause to me unknown—a cause perhaps, which lies entirely beyond his control?" These are questions which every wife should put to herself before she upbraids her husband. A conciliatory course of this kind, is far more advisable than coercive manners; and will ever be attended with happy consequences.

But wives are many times too jealous of their rights—so tenacious are they at times, that they frequently detract from their noble natures, by assuming a sort of masculine independence, which, to say the least, is very disgusting, and not unfrequently fraught with the most evil consequences. Woman should by no means be a slave, neither should she desire to "lord it." A proper degree of concession is not derogatory to the female character; but is recognized in the Bible as a duty—a duty which no wife should, or can consistently, regard as an infringement upon her rights.

GOOD RESOLUTION.
 BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

Quite away from the dusty turnpike, and across sweet-smelling clover-fields, in a small, quaint, moss-grown edifice, dwelt Job Woodell and his daughter May.
 Job had been a fisherman in his better days, but, sad to tell, had been drawn away from his honest occupation by the seductive charms of the village inn. There he might be found from early morning till midnight, scarce turning his steps homeward to the frugal meals prepared by his patient child, and leaving with her the whole care and toil of providing for their family necessities.

Happy it was for May, poor girl! that her heart was as brave and hopeful, as it was patient and loving.— Whoever passed her door on a bright spring morning, might hear her voice, singing songs as sweet and merry as though she had not a care or sorrow in the world.
 And that little quaint old cottage! who would have deemed it the home of an inveterate tippler, with its neatly swept grass sward, its bed of fragrant carnations, its honey-suckles, azalias, and moss-roses!

Job loved his daughter May—was proud of her—and, saving his great neglect, always treated her with kindness. In his worst stages of inebriation, he exhibited no phasis of cruelty; he was only excessively and shamelessly silly, and disposed to lavish on May a world of foolish and foudling caresses. May, in turn, was always gentle and patient with her father, never re-proaching him for his vile habits, but often tenderly entreating him to stay and assist her about her garden, or to spend the long winter evenings with her, instead of hurrying away to the "Admiral."

One very beautiful spring morning, Job stuck his old hat jauntily on one side of his head, and stood crowding the tobacco into his pipe, ever and anon casting a wishful look towards May, who was busy wiping the breakfast plates.

"Can I do any thing for you, father?" said she, looking up with a pleasant and encouraging smile.

"Ah, you're a good girl, May, a blessed girl! I hate to trouble you—but just now I'm all out of change—and a curse on these times, I say, when an honest man can't get trusted for a shilling to save him from want."

"Dear father, I would willingly give you what little money I have, but if I do, we shall be forced to go without dinner or supper, I fear."

"Are we really grown so poor as that? Ah, well!
 these are melancholy times for us poor fishers. I'll not take your money, May; I can win a shilling from Ned Watkins, any day, at nine-pins, and that will be easier than to rob you."

"O, papa! if you will not go the Admiral, to-day, but will help me plant out my little garden, and transplant those fine strawberry-vines that yield us so many dollars every year,—O, dear papa, I can not tell you how happy you will make me, how very gratefully I shall remember the kindness."

"Little need of my assistance," answered Job, with a good-natured laugh, and a sly wink, that sent the bright blood gushing all over May's dimple cheeks.—
 "Younger and steadier hands are at your service, and an old man like me would be in the way."

"O, no! no, papa!" exclaimed May, earnestly, dropping her work, and clasping her arm in his, at the same time lifting up her beaming, tearful eyes most implor-ingly.

Job was touched. Tears were unwonted visitors to those joyous and radiant eyes; so, at least, thought he, who had saw few indeed of the many that were shed for him.

"You are a good girl, May," said he, patting her head, and kissing her white forehead with parental delicacy; "you are a good girl, and I wish I were a more worthy father. But let me go now, dear, and I will be soon back again to help you." With this promise, he tore himself away.

May had been too long accustomed to have her entreaties disregarded, to shed many tears for her present disappointment; so having completed her household arrangements, she tied on her little cottage straw—its blue ribbon somewhat faded, it is true, but thereby better suiting the exquisite delicacy of her complexion—and proceeded to the garden. There was a freshness and exhilaration in the soft, spring air, that soon removed from her heart and face all traces of unhappiness; and if her cheek had previously been a shade too pale, this defect was remedied the instant the sound of a buoyant and hasty footstep fell upon her listening ear.

The person who approached was the son of May's nearest neighbor, widow Lovell. He was a fine-looking fellow, with a complexion of the clearest white, eyes of the darkest blue, and hair that would rival the gloss and blackness of "a raven's wing." He held a basket on his arm, full of young plants.

"You were wishing for some of those gorgeous pansies, May. See, I have been fortunate enough to procure you some."

"You are my good genie, Harry. I have but to wish, and, lo! the prize is at hand. I thank you, a thousand times."

The young friends busied themselves in planting the the roots, for some time in silence. They were lovers, though not acknowledged ones. The confession had been long trembling on Harry's lips, (silly fellow! did he not know his eyes already had told it over and over again?)
 but there was something in May's manner which restrained and embarrassed him. This morning, however, he had sought her with the determination to avow his love.

For nothing was Harry Lovell more remarkable than for his readiness and eloquence of speech. It was astonishing what could keep him so silent on this occasion.
 Root after root was fixed in the ground, and still his tongue faltered in its instructed duty. "This is no place," thought he, "with the sun glaring down upon and in open view of half the village." He rose from the garden path, and lifting his new, palm-leaf hat—May's hand had braided it for him—brushed back from his forehead which was a very white and handsome one. a mass of black, glossy curls.

"You are weary, May," said he, "and the sun is really oppressive. I have my thoughts on a glass of your nice root-beer. Together with the shade of the porch, will be very refreshing."

May laughed, and led the way to the house. The beer was brought, drank, and praised; the glasses removed, and May, with her bonnet off, and her soft, brown hair parted smoothly from her brow, had seated herself on the threshold of the door. Harry chose a situation on the door step. Here they were quite sheltered from the sun, and quite hidden from the view of the villagers. Harry had no excuse for silence; and so, in a quiet way, but with a burning cheek and eloquent eye, he told the tale of his love.

May heard him with many heart-throbbings, and a few ill-concealed tears. "O, Harry! I feared this," she said. "Sweet as it is to know that you love me, it is bitter indeed to feel that we can never be happy in this affection."

"But what shall hinder us, dear May?"

"My father, Harry. I can never leave him."

"Of course not; but he shall have a home with us."

"You must not think of the thing, dear Harry. You have already a mother to support, and I can never consent to bring upon you such a burden as poor father would be. Were he merely old and decrepid, I might not look upon the case as so hopeless; I might almost then consent that he should become a burden to you; but as he is, O, Harry, you know his unfortunate weakness; you know how unfit he is to sit at any fireside, or be a partaker of any domestic society except such as nature has made sacredly his own. A daughter can pardon, can bear with his infirmity; but, O, Harry, your home would be desecrated by such an inmate."

Poor May! How bitterly she wept, as this painful and humiliating reflection was breathed into her lover's ears; but he, like a generous and devoted friend, soothed and encouraged her, and though he found that to combat her resolution was idle, he still declared that she only had, and ever should have, undivided empire over his heart.

Now all this while there was a little by-scene going on, which we must not conceal from our readers, especially since it has reference to the issue of our tale.—Job Woodell, when he parted from his daughter, struck across the clover-fields towards the Admiral; but instead of entering, as was his time-out-of-mind custom, he turned aside, and springing down the rocks, sat for some time gazing thoughtfully on the great expanse of the ocean that lay spread before him. On his left, frowning over the cliffs, rose the roof of the old Admiral, enticing him to his folly; but the sweet, pleading, tearful face of his loved May would steal into his heart, and paralyze the power of the tempter, in a manner that surprised even the poor victim himself.

"I told May I would soon return," said he; "but if I go there, Ned Watkins and a whole gang of loafers will beset me, and drive all thoughts of home out of my head. So I will keep out of their sight, and for once fulfil my promise."

Job reached his house just after Harry and May had entered it; and hearing their voices as he came up toward the porch where they were sitting, he stopped in front of a window that opened at the side of the porch, and, gazing through it, could not only distinctly hear the language, but could also see the faces of the young lovers. The mention of his own name kept his feet riveted to the spot. Their conversation has already been detailed, and its effect upon Job, in his present mood, may well be surmised. At first, the hot blood rushed in torrents to his brain and face, and the deep disgust he felt for his own folly, was pictured in every lineament and expression of his countenance. But when he saw May in tears, when he heard her sweet, tremulous voice pronouncing the doom of Harry's fondest hopes, and all for his sake, who had so cruelly wronged and disgraced her, he wrung his hands in agony, and, unable to suppress his feelings, hurried cautiously through the back entrance of the house, and shut himself up in his chamber.

A sad day was it for May Woodell after Harry retired. Her garden had lost its interest. Even the favorite pansies only made her weep when she looked on them. She prepared a dinner for her father, however, and strove, by an increased devotion to his wants, to forget her sorrowful thoughts. But the day wore on, and Job did not appear. The dinner was removed untasted. "Poor father!" said May; "I told him I had scarce money to buy us a dinner; I fear he has denied himself out of consideration for me." And she tried to believe this the true solution to his delay, though experience had taught her that his neglect of meals was usually occasioned by a worse than ordinary debauch. How different would have been her feelings had she known that her erring parent was this moment in his own chamber, overwhelmed with anguish and remorse! How quickly would she have forgotten every thought of self, and hastened to pour into his ears assurances of her forgiveness and love! Ah! it was better for him, May, that thy tender mercies were awhile withheld.

"I do think father will return to tea," thought May; and she hastened to prepare a dish for him which she knew he very much liked, and which she had made some personal sacrifice to procure. Then spreading the table very neatly, she sat down at the window to await his approach. Those who have but one object to care for, one being to smile upon their toils, one friend to whom their existence seems a peculiar blessing, can alone understand how every thought and feeling becomes a servitor at one shrine.

Job, meanwhile, hearing her light step about the house, rose from the bed where he had thrown himself, bathed his face in the basin of cool water that May's hand kept constantly supplied in his chamber, brushed his hair, and putting on his hat, stole cautiously down into the yard, and betook himself to May's bed of pansies and carnations. Here she at length espied, and ran out to meet him. Her first glance relieved and gladdened her heart. She held out her hand to greet him. "How long you have been away, papa! and how glad I am to see you home to tea!" she said, looking into his face with a smile that told him how happy and grateful she felt to meet him in a rational mood once more.

As they sat together at that tea-table, chatting in a social and affectionate way, of the thousand little interests dear to a father and child, even though one, alas, is but such in name, May felt not one trace of sorrow. If she thought of Harry, it was with love and gratitude, but scarcely with pain and regret, for though the same causes remained to prevent their union, how could she think of any thing unpleasant or melancholy while her dear father sat by, sober, and full of kind words and gentle attentions?

A week passed on, and Job daily assisted May in arranging and planting her garden, never once going near the Admiral, nor lifting a glass of spirits to his lips.—May was in raptures. Only one thing disturbed her felicity; Harry was not by to partake of it. "It is foolish in him to stay away so long," thought she; "for though we must not be lovers, we might certainly be friends." Perhaps the change would not have been so easy, May!

One morning, after breakfast, Job rose from the table, and put on his old hat, (May had just braided him a new one,) saying as he did so, "I am going up to the Admiral this morning. Ned Watkins, and some of my friends there, will begin to wonder at my long absence. Only think, May, it is a whole week since I have been there!"

May's smile changed to a look of undisguisable distress at this unwelcome announcement. "O, father!" she exclaimed, in a tone of touching entreaty, "do not go any more to that wretched place. I have been so happy this past week, I can not spare you away. You will not go, dear father?"

Job smoothed her bright hair, and looking good-humoredly into her troubled face, replied, "If I go, your friend Harry will come to see you again; but so long as I stay, you are not likely to enjoy much of his society. I will not be in your way, my child;" and without stopping to listen to her earnest remonstrances, he imprinted a tender kiss on her cheek, and hurried away to the Admiral.

He found the usual bar-room club assembled. Immediately upon his entrance they began their assaults upon him for his long absence. He evaded them, by marching up to the bar, and throwing down a sixpence. "Give us a mug of stout flip, Rawley," said he; and while this was preparing, he picked up the stump of an old pen, dipped it into the batter-thick ink that stood on the desk, and drawing an old letter from his pocket, tore off the back, and scribbled on it the following remarkable words:

"This certifies that I, Job Woodell, do hereby give my solemn pledge to abstain wholly, henceforth and forever, from the use of all intoxicating drinks as a beverage. (Signed,) JOB WOODELL."

"May 15, 1842."

This he placed in the hands of his old fellow-tiptpler, Ned Watkins, bidding him read it aloud to his companions, while he seized his mug of "flip," and hurried to the door. Lifting it toward his lips, to make the temptation as strong as possible, he suddenly turned it upside down, spilling its smoking contents upon the ground. Then placing the mug in this reversed position upon the bench, he took his pipe from his mouth and delivered this brief soliloquy: "Job Woodell, thou art a man, again. The fetters that bound thee are broken, and thou art free! Job Woodell, thou art a father. Henceforth, the child of thy lost Mary has a father's arm to rely upon for her support, and a father's heart to bless and cherish her. Job Woodell, thou art redeemed. Go home now, and sing thy hallelujahs!"

Having thus made and solemnized the good resolution, he entered the bar-room in quest of his hat. He found the group huddled together, in vain striving to spell out his rude hieroglyphics. "Here, let me read it for you," said Job. And taking the paper from Ned's hand, he proclaimed, in their astonished ears, the tidings of his redemption.

"—Job Woodell!" exclaimed Ned Watkins, pre-facing the name with a loud oath. "What in the d—! has brought you to this nonsense?"

"My daughter's love has brought me to this sense," was the calm reply, as he turned with a serious aspect toward the door.

When he entered his own house, he found Harry there, standing with May's hand clasped in his, and both looking very much afflicted. May sprang forward with an exclamation of joy, and twined her arms in his.—"O, father! I was sure you would return, you are so very kind of late."

"But why do you welcome me, my love, since my arrival will be a signal for Harry's departure? And pray what have you been saying to each other, to cause you to look so sorrowful?"

"Harry is going to leave us, papa. He has adopted your old profession of whaling, and goes out in the Dolphin, to-morrow. He was just bidding me farewell, as you entered."

"Ah! how is this? I thought you loved May too well to leave her," said Job, laying his hand on Harry's shoulder.

"I do! I do!" answered he with great emotion, rising to depart; "but what avails it? she refuses to be mine." He was hurrying from the room to hide the tears that forced themselves to his eyes, when Job's hand detained him. "Stop a moment, my son," said he. "As you will pass by Dix's grocery, just be kind enough, will you, to post this notice on their door. I wish to make it as public as possible."

Harry's eye glanced hastily over it. "Blessed be God!" cried he, his whole face lighting up with joy.—"Is this true? Have you deliberated? Are you serious, Mr. Woodell?"

"Yes, my dear Harry, it is my serious, deliberate, irrevocable pledge—signed, and sealed, and solemnized. Show it to May—she stands staring at us in dubious wonder."

May needed but one glance. She threw herself into her father's arms, and burst into tears. Father and daughter wept together, but they were delicious tears, expressive of joys that words could not utter. Harry's eyes, too, were overflowing with sympathy, but he retired to the porch, feeling that his joy was too sacred to be witnessed except by Heaven.

In a few minutes Job recalled him. Taking his hand, he placed in it one of May's, and held them clasped together between his own. "My dear children," said he, "one week ago, I was a witness and auditor of the interview you held in the porch. It awakened me to a sense of my great wickedness, and that very moment I resolved to reform. I have served a week's novitiate, and feel no desire to return to my old life. There lies my pledge. It was written in the haunt, and amid all the temptations of my old vice. I read it aloud to my companions. They sneered at me, but I did not shrink—I pitied them. And now, my dear children, since I have done all this for your sakes, show me your gratitude by making yourselves as happy as possible."

How could they refuse a request like this? Harry said nothing farther about going to sea, and in the following autumn took May Woodell to his home with the title of Mrs. Lovell. Job lives with them, and has never yet broken, nor repented of his GOOD RESOLUTION.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

EDITED BY

Revs. A. B. Grosh, G. W. Montgomery and A. C. Barry.

UTICA, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1843.

READERS, SUBSCRIBERS, ALL, TAKE NOTICE!!!

Read that you may understand. We have stated, for two or three weeks past, in the Magazine and Advocate, that we should place our paper on the cash system—payable in advance—at the close of the present volume; and promised to give some good and sufficient reasons therefor. We now proceed to give a plain and brief statement of them, believing that to every subscriber they will appear all we stated them to be—sufficient, at least, if not good. But here they are; therefore let those who read, judge.

1st. We frequently learn from some Post Master, (after the paper has been sent from 2 to 8 months,) that Mr. Such-a-one does not take it from the office, assigning as a reason that he subscribed for only one year, although he gave us no directions to discontinue at the close of the volume, for which he subscribed. Of course he will pay nothing, and we are the losers.—This loss would have been avoided, besides considerable trouble, had we followed the system of discontinuing the paper at the end of the time paid for.

2d. We frequently, aye, too frequently, learn from some Post Master, that Mr. So-and-so, "who has taken your Magazine" at my office, has left the country, and gone to the far West;" or perhaps he (the P. M.) knows not where. Mr. So-and-so owes us for one, two, or perhaps three years, as the case may be. Here we are actually defrauded out of from two to eight dollars, by the honesty of this subscriber. The advance pay system would have saved us this loss, and the subscriber, if he had any feeling, some qualms of conscience.

3d. We are dependent upon the cash for the support of ourselves and families; for our labor, materials for the paper, such as paper, ink, type, presses, and all the paraphernalia of a printing office; for the labor of our Editor, compositors, pressmen, roller-boys, rent of buildings, and a thousand other unavoidable expenses, all of which we have to pay, and at stated times, too.

4th. We find, on a recent examination of our books, that there is actually due us over nine thousand dollars, since the year 1840; and all this from subscribers for the Magazine and Advocate. What a shame! We are in debt for our establishment some thousands of dollars, and interest accruing annually, which need not have been, had our subscribers paid in advance.

5th. Although we have kept our heads above water thus far, with the assistance of those who do pay, honestly and promptly, (many thanks to them,) we find ourselves growing poorer from year to year, and consequently, less able to continue the publication of the paper, and of incurring expense for the gratification of those who do not pay.

What think ye of such reasons?—But these are not all. There are others of less importance, such as the expense of printing bills, the trouble and loss of time in making them out, to say nothing of the unpleasant task of dunning subscribers, and the tenfold more difficult one of collecting these bills. We are frequently necessitated to call for our pay through the paper. This is an unpleasant task; and it does seem to us, that if it made a delinquent subscriber feel as unpleasant and as sheepish to read such a call, as it does us to publish it, it would be his first care to cheat the publishers out of the exquisite pleasure of making another call, by paying up, and, also, paying in advance for the future.

We have been advised by other publishers, "who have been through the mill," to adopt the cash system; and we have also conversed with subscribers, who, without an exception, coincided with us in this matter.—We can hit the case of subscribers to a T, with regard to the time of payment. We are often told by them, that they can pay "after harvest." Now, then, as our volumes always commence the first of January, the subscriber has from two to three months between harvest and that time, to pay the small sum of one dollar and a half. It is apparent, and we are free to acknowledge the advantage that a good advance paying list would give us; but the advantage is not all on one side. By paying in advance, the subscriber gets his paper fifty cents or one dollar less—besides enjoying the satisfaction of reading his own paper. He runs no risk of being dunned. He gives us the means in season to lay out to the best advantage, that he may have a good paper; that he may get the worth of his money. These advantages, we trust, will be apparent to all of our readers. Those who have paid promptly within the four months heretofore allowed for advance payment, we doubt not, can make their calculation just as well, to pay for next year by, or before, the 1st of January next. They already know how we have served them with the paper, what it is, how they are pleased with it, &c. We wish it distinctly understood, then, that all papers will be discontinued at the close of the present volume, unless the subscription is renewed and paid, for next year, or any part thereof; except those, the payment of whose subscriptions are ensured by a responsible agent, in a short time. Also, from the first of January next, we shall discontinue all papers, at the end of the time paid for.

As INDUCEMENTS to subscribers to continue their patronage, we have to say, that those who are owing for the present volume only, shall be credited in full for this and next year by sending three dollars free of postage. Those who are owing for previous volumes can also have the present and next volumes on the same terms, but we shall expect them to pay the full price for volumes previous to the present. We think our reasons for the adoption of the advance pay system are sufficient to satisfy any reasonable man;—if not, all we have to say is, (although, from principle we are not in the habit of wishing evil to any one,) we wish he might, (especially if he be a delinquent,) stand in our shoes just one week, and realize the perplexities of the slow pay (or no pay) system, and we are morally sure he would either be satisfied or killed outright. Let him reflect upon the fact that he is owing some thousands of dollars, that he has a family to support, and a thousand other expenses to bear, and that he is depending upon the honor and honesty of individuals, scattered over the United States, for the means to meet these expenses, with the consciousness that there is enough due him from those individuals to cancel all his debts, would he be willing to continue such a system, toiling and laboring, all the time approaching nearer to absolute poverty? We throw not. Reader, THAT IS OUR CASE.

OUR TERMS THEN WILL BE,

One dollar and fifty cents per annum, or in the same proportion for a longer or shorter time than one year, invariably in advance. Any one who will send the pay for eight subscribers free of postage, shall be allowed a copy gratis; or in the same proportion for any number. All communications must be post paid or free. Post Masters will usually frank remittances. We would most respectfully ask our friends one and all, to assist in sustaining our paper by procuring some good cash paying subscribers for our next volume.

THE BOOK OF JOB.....NO. I.

The book of Job contains so much that is instructive in relation to the divine government, and the duty of man's resignation—much that is most excellent in morals and sublime in poetry—much that, by being misunderstood, is frequently quoted to refute Universalism, by those who are ignorant of our proper views on the great subject of punishments and sufferings—and is also so frequently quoted to prove the doctrine of a personal devil called Satan, that I am induced to make it the subject of a few editorial articles.

I. Was there ever such a man as Job—and does this book contain a real account of things happening to him?

The existence of such a person as Job, has been very seriously doubted by many learned and pious Christians—and the whole work supposed to be an allegorical and dramatic poem. But the voice of antiquity, and the testimony of several of the inspired penmen, are in favor of the opposite opinion. Ezekiel xiv: 14 and 20, speaks of him, in connexion with Noah and Daniel, as one who actually existed, and bore the character ascribed to him in this book. Ancient authorities agree in stating that he is the Jobad mentioned in the 36th chapter of Genesis—a statement confirmed by the book of Job, which locates him in the same region of Edom near the borders of Arabia. Taking for granted this plausible and rational position, Job was the fourth in descent from Isaac, by Esau, and lived before or about the days of Moses, who was fourth in descent from Isaac also, but by Jacob.

But although Job may be considered as a real personage, bearing the general character ascribed to him in this book; yet there are circumstances that may well justify a doubt whether the book itself is a literal narrative of real events that occurred to him. The reasons for this opinion are—1st, the book itself is a highly allegorical and dramatic poem, of extremely artificial construction and arrangement—prefaced with a prose introduction, describing the events on which it is founded, and the personages who are characters represented in it—and is concluded with a similar prose conclusion, in which the argument is summed up, and poetical justice performed to the hero.

2d. There are no more nor no fewer characters introduced than seem necessary to sustain the several parts of the dialogue and argument, with due dramatic effect—and the events or afflictions introduced, are all regularly and fully removed at the close; and the friends that were driven away, and the children that were killed, are all restored to him again as in the beginning; and his flocks and herds are replaced, and exactly doubled—so that his 7,000 sheep are multiplied to 14,000; his 3,000 camels, are doubled to 6,000; his 500 yoke of oxen and 500 she-asses are respectively increased to 1000; and the 70 years of his life which he had attained when these troubles came upon him, are doubled to 140 years which he lived after his troubles were all ended. Now we do not deny the possibility of all this exact duplication of a man's blessings and property; nor say that God could not restore to him the sons and daughters that had been killed—but we do say that it sounds too artificial to be considered probable—and that we therefore regard this as a good and sufficient reason for doubting its exact, and literal occurrence to Job.

3d. A last reason we shall give, is, that in each calamity that happens to his household and his servants, one, and but one, is always allowed to escape alive to tell the news. This remarkably artificial contrivance of the poem occurs in four instances—first, when the oxen were taken and the servants slain in the plough field—again, when the lightning struck and consumed the sheep and the servants—and third, when the Chaldeans fell upon the camels and killed the servants—and lastly, when the whirlwind smote his eldest son's house, and killed his children and their servants and guests. You can not avoid seeing the extreme artificiality of this poetical contrivance, and the improbability of its occurrence in real life.

Now understand me aright.—In thus investigating the literary character of this very ancient book—the oldest literary work probably known to the world—I by no means detract from its moral and religious character—I take away nothing from its lessons of divine wisdom, and of moral and religious truth. All these remain, whether the book is written in Hebrew prose, or in Hebrew verse—whether it is an allegory, or a narrative of real events—whether it is a literal history, or a moral drama. Nay—I go even further. If we can ascertain the true character of the Book of Job, and will examine it carefully in the light of that true character, we will be better prepared to understand what it was intended to teach us, than if we regard it in a false light.

II. By whom was the Book of Job written?

I have said, what is very generally admitted by all who have written upon the subject, that the Book of Job is probably the oldest book in the world. It is said to abound in Hebrew, and Arabic, and Syriac words and phrases apparently of an older date than the Books of Moses, which are next to the Book of Job in antiquity, and which books it strongly resembles also in its general style, and beautiful simplicity, and sublime poetic thought. Job probably lived 1600 or 1700 years before Christ—rather before the days of Moses—and the traditions or records of this poem were probably collated and woven into the general form they now bear, by that great Lawgiver, before, during, and after he led the Hebrews forth from Egyptian bondage—some writers suppose before he returned to Egypt—others, during the wanderings in the desert. Certain it is, that the Jews unite in ascribing to it an antiquity greater than the Pentateuch, and the other orientals, all of whom have many traditions concerning Job, ascribe to him a period prior to, or contemporary with, that Lawgiver. An able translator of the Book of Job, says—"the two introductory chapters, and the close of the last, are exactly in the style of Moses; and they display the same phraseology, the same turn of expression, and the same sweet simplicity which distinguish the book of Genesis." He thinks, also, that a comparison of the poetical portions of Job, with the hymns and songs composed by Moses, will show in both the same turns of expression, the same glowing thoughts, and the same sublime conceptions.

One other thing is worthy of notice. The forms of worship, the rites and ceremonies, are patriarchal, rather than according to the Law—nor is any mention made of historical events recorded in any of the Books of Moses, though some suppose they have discovered a few vague allusions.

In reply, then, to our first and second questions, we come to the conclusions—1st, that Job, himself, was a real personage; as probably, also, were the other persons sustaining the dialogue of the poem, apart from its introduction. 2d. That he lived about 1600 years before Christ, and 2400 years after the creation, and was the fifth in descent from Abraham, through the line of Esau, and was contemporary with Moses. 3d. That his residence was in Uz, near Edom and Arabia. 4th. That the events narrated in the Book, though founded on general facts, are themselves generally fictitious, artificially arranged, and the Book itself is a regular Hebrew Epic poem, of great power, beauty, correctness of moral and religious sentiment, and of very ancient date,

And, 5th, that Moses probably collected the materials of which it is composed, and copied and arranged them in their present form. A. B. G.

CONFERENCE IN LEE.

On Wednesday and Thursday, the 13th and 14th inst., a Conference was held in Lee Centre; and a most excellent and interesting meeting it was, and must, we believe, result in good to the cause in that place. This is the field in which Br. Queal is laboring, and if we may judge from what we saw and heard, he has done and is still doing there a good work. The weather on Wednesday was very good; a very good congregation assembled and was addressed in the morning by Br. Woolley who gave a very excellent and particularly touching discourse. In the afternoon Br. Grosh preached a clear, pointed, powerful sermon—in the evening the sermon was given by Br. Soule, which, by the way, in order to be in fashion, I will use the privilege of saying, was "a pretty good one"! After the close of the sermon, about an hour was most pleasantly and profitably spent in a social conference meeting, in which Brs. Grosh, Woolley, and T. L. Harris of this city, took part. The sermon on Thursday morning was given by Br. Soule—a good one of course!—Br. Grosh having been called home on business; in the afternoon we were delighted with a most admirable discourse from Br. Woolley. The choir performed their part of the services well, and added much to the interest of the occasion. The weather until Thursday afternoon was very fine, and even then though there was storm and tempest without, there was sunshine in the soul.

The preachers present were Brs. Grosh, Woolley, Queal, and Soule; two or three more would have been welcome, and certainly would not have lessened, in any degree, the interest of the meeting. As it was, it was a happy meeting; and I will only add that those preachers who were absent were the greater losers.

Our Lee friends will accept our thanks for the loving-kindness shown us during our visit among them. The table—for nobody, nor Soule either, forgets the table—literally groaned beneath the variety and abundance with which it was laden; and though we came well nigh, without any urging, making ourselves sick before leaving it, our good friends seemed really almost determined that we should eat and drink still more!—and this, too, morning, noon, and night. Is not this loving one's neighbor? It seems to me, if any man in this world can be truly, completely happy, that man is the good Universalist farmer with his abundance without and peace within; and I am half tempted to abandon the city forever, and seek me a home out amidst the free airs, and fresh flowers, and living streams, and the inexhaustible abundance of the beautiful "country world."

May the blessing of God be with the society in Lee, enabling them often to enjoy such seasons of spiritual refreshing from the presence of the Lord, as was that of which I have been speaking, until all in that region of our Master's moral heritage, shall know and praise Him from the least to the greatest.

GREAT OATS.

With this caption, we published an article on the 1st inst., from the Herkimer Journal, stating that a farmer in Onondaga county had raised a stalk of oats bearing 150 plump grains. Our young friend, Charles Wills, of New Hartford, has raised a stalk bearing 216 grains—so the Onondaga farmer must yield the palm.

Since writing the above, we read a statement in the Observer, stating that the stalks of a portion of a field of oats in Trenton, averaged 240 grains to the head; and one stalk was found bearing 260 grains. Who will beat old Oneida? Don't all speak at once! A. B. G.

THE UNIVERSALIST COMPANION—

With Almanac and Register, for 1844, is now for sale at this office; and bundles of the work have been sent (as per order) to Brs. Tompkins and Whittemore, Boston—Br. Eli Ballou (and Br. J. E. Palmer, Br. Ballou will supply,) Montpelier, Vt.—Br. Gurley, Cincinnati.

By circumstances entirely beyond my control, a disappointment awaited me in getting the supply to Akron. At the last moment, Pomeroy and Co.'s Express Agent informed me they could not carry a box across the railroad to Buffalo, and consequently refused to take the box they had previously informed me could be sent in that way. A. B. G.

* * Orders promptly attended to, and respectfully solicited. Prices—$30.00 for 500—$6.50 per hundred—$1.00 per dozen—12 cents single.

TO OUR READERS.

We shall be absent from home parts of the three week during which this and the next numbers of our paper is made up. It is probable, therefore, that some things sent in after we leave may be unattended to until after our return home.

This absence must be our apology also for not attending the Conference at Prospect, as we had intended doing. A. B. G.

OTSEGO LAKE.

Beautiful Lake!

The evening light is on thy tranquil breast,
And o'er thy surface skims the white-winged boat
Like some lone waterfowl. Around thee rise
The hills in grandeur, and their lofty forms
Break off the elements that fain would mar
Thy quiet wave. The breeze comes o'er the sweet
With summer fragrance from the closing flowers,
And strains of low, soft music meet my ear,
Recalling many a scene of other days
Which comes not back, save with the voice and tone
Of such sweet melody at eve.

Bright Lake!

The twilight fades away and stars come forth
Like gems to deck thy glassy wave. Around Thee lingers yet the calm which night but serves
To deepen; and the light sail steers ashore,
As when the sea bird seeks her downy nest.
Thou hast no sullen roar like that which starts
The mariner from his dreamy sleep, to give
One thought to home and those he holds most dear,
Then sink beneath the eddying surge. Thy faint
Low murmur soothes the heart, and one might sleep
To hear the flute-like tone that sings among The trees which shade thy brink. The chorus of
The gentle breeze, and waves, and birds, that wake
In fitful song, is Nature's sweetest strain.

Alone by thee I stand

And think how like thy tranquil wave, is that
One heart, which passion ne'er disturbs—so calm,
So pure and good, the angels better love
To keep it spotless from the world. UNKNOWN.

Delegates Present.—N. A. Alexander, J. Nye, J. A. Case, J. I. Morris, L. Harrington, S. Perry, E. Harris, W. Mumford, T. Gillis, D. McDonald, B. Stilwell, S. H. Jones—12.

REMARKS.—Although we had excellent weather, good preaching, and a large congregation, and though we had a very pleasant, and I trust, a very profitable time, and though many hearts were, no doubt, filled with gladness, and many souls were made to rejoice in the God and Rock of their salvation; and though I enjoyed myself, and many others appeared to feel a lively interest in the things of the kingdom; yet I can not say it was the best meeting of the kind I ever attended. It appears to me that many of the professed friends of Universalism, in this Association, are altogether to indifferent to the subject of religion—that they have more zeal for, and more attachment to, the perishing objects of time and sense, than for the kingdom of God and his righteousness. O! that the Universalists of this Association would arise and put on their beautiful garments and shine as a city set on a hill. O! that they would be more ardently engaged in the cause of Christ. Brethren and sisters of the Chautauque Association, may we not indulge the fond hope that you will feel the importance of more holiness of life—more zeal and perseverance in action—and of setting a constant example of piety before the world. Your own happiness, your own peace of mind, as well as the present condition of our cause, require a life of devotion, and a holy and determined zeal at your hands.

Brethren and sisters, let us awake to righteousness—let us manifest a zeal corresponding with the importance of the Gospel. The time is come that calls for action—the opposition is around us and in our midst, doing all that it can do to crush our cause. Brethren, shall we sit supinely down and die? No, rather let us do our duty as Christians, and God will give us the victory. Let us arise and shine, then the Gentiles will come to our light, and to the brightness of our rising. L. PAINE.

BAPTISM.

That there is an honest difference of opinion among Christians, relative to this ordinance, will not, we think be denied by any. All will agree that the baptism of the mind in the Holy Spirit is essential to salvation; but, as it respects the mere emblem or sign of this inward purification—we mean baptism by water—some think it was not designed to be continued in the reign of Christ; but was only to be practiced as a badge of Christian discipleship during the preparatory measures for the establishment of his kingdom. Others believe that baptism by water is a Christian duty obligatory on all the professed followers of Christ, though none, we suppose, consider it essential to salvation. Some are particularly strenuous in regarding immersion of the whole body in water, as the only thing which constitutes baptism. Others believe that sprinkling or pouring water on the body is all that is necessary.

We have not taken up our pen, at this time, in order to discuss this subject; but simply to say, that we regard it as a high Christian duty, that those who entertain these different views about water baptism should exercise towards each other that charity which is greater and more essential than all ceremonies, or even faith and hope. We wish every one to be fully persuaded in his own mind with regard to the rite, and practice in all sincerity according to the dictates of conscience, and we will fellowship as Christians, those who have been immersed in, or sprinkled with water, and also those who have not considered it their duty to be thus baptized, provided they give evidence of a Christian spirit by exhibiting in their conversation and conduct, "the fruits of the spirit." What we think to be essentially wrong in this matter is to, make water baptism a test of Christian profession and Christian fellowship. We sincerely hope never to see a test of this kind used in our denomination. We believe it will only sow discord among brethren and do much harm. Let those who consider water baptism a Christian duty, be baptized with or in water, as they choose, and let them do all they can by Scripture, reason and argument, to convince others of this duty; but let them not refuse their Christian fellowship to others who as conscientiously believe that water baptism is not obligatory on Christians. Let those who are opposed to practicing water baptism, also do what they can to convince others that this is not a Christian ordinance. We are not opposed to the investigation of this subject, but only to intolerance and proscription.

Such is our view of Christian duty, or, of that duty we owe to each other as Christians. We have simply stated it without presenting to any considerable extent, our reasons for our opinion. If we are wrong, our columns are open for the purpose of correcting our error, and any one who desires may freely express his sentiments to our readers.—Watchman.

HOW TO TEACH AND GOVERN.

The intellectual and moral advances of some portions of the country are not altogether behind the physical. Of this, I think the improvement in our Common School department may be good proof. And what is not done by the direction of the public authorities, will be effected through individual enterprise. A pleasing demonstration of this was afforded me a few days since, in the efforts of Mr. CONDON, of Skaneateles, an enterprising young man, who is teaching a school in that place. Mr. C. governs his school by no birchen rod, yet I have rarely ever visited a more quiet and orderly school, nor one which gave better evidences of improvement.

On going to the house, you see in the front yard, a beautiful and well arranged flower garden. This is the property of the school. The counsel and taste of the scholars were sought for the model, and their judgments taxed and gratified in the selection of blossoms, plants, etc., to adorn the variform beds. Every scholar feels an interest in the culture and preservation of them. Industry and care are taught with their pastime.

The teacher frequently sends out a truant boy or girl to pluck a blossom, and on their return a careful examination is made of it, and its nature and qualities explained. From this blossom then, before the whole school, is imparted by the teacher a lesson of instruction and reproof. All feel the force of it. He seeks to instruct and reform. How well his plan succeeds may be seen in the following anecdote: The teacher discovered one day that his pupils were in the practice of plucking green apples from the tree of a neighbor. Instead of scolding them at first, he went to the owner and procured permission for his children to use the fruit as their own. He then informed them of what he had done, but advised them to let it remain upon the tree until it became ripe. "Then," said he, "we will all pick and enjoy the fruit together."—Upon gaining assent to his proposal, he reminded his scholars of the folly and wickedness of taking anything by fraud or theft; and the impression thus made in love, was deep and lasting.—Onondaga Standard.

The London Times has the following remarkable item of news:

"The lovers of literature and admirers of one of its greatest living ornaments will be gratified to learn that Washington Irving has succeeded to a large fortune, which has been bequeathed to him by one of the Society of Friends, to whom the distinguished American author was personally unknown. Mr. Irving, in consequence, intends immediately to relinquish his appointment as American Minister at Madrid, where, we hear his health has suffered materially since his recent residence in that capital."

A REVIEW

Of the course of conduct pursued by Rev. H. Fraser, Pastor of the Presbyterian church at Branchport—relative to his treatment of Universalism.

Br. Grosh—At a meeting of the prominent Universalists in Branchport, Yates county, on August 22d, a unanimous vote was taken, requesting me to give a public exposition of Rev. H. Fraser, and also to give him a general publication through the Magazine and Advocate. The following, therefore, was read to a large audience in that place, on Saturday evening, September 2d, and is now sent for your disposal.

U. CLARK.

REVIEW.

In answer to a unanimous call from the liberal citizens of this community, expressed a few evenings since, I now present you with a brief, candid and provable representation of the conduct of Rev. H. Fraser, Pastor of the Presbyterian church in Branchport, in reference to his treatment of me and Universalism. It may be distinctly understood, that I do not do this from any private interest, or feeling, or grievance; but from motives which arise from my professed public capacity, in reply to the demands of truth, denominational interest, and the voice of a liberal, impartial people. However humble my private capacity may be, were I to act only from personal responsibility, I should treat the contemptuous and unprincipled conduct which I have received, with the resentment which one would naturally manifest in returning the compliments of graceless insignificance.

In making this exposition, I do not intend to attack any private member of the denomination with which Mr. Fraser is connected. Whether at all—or how far, he has been upheld by his lay brethren, I know not. It is to be hoped that but few of his neighbors have aided him in his course. It is satisfying to learn, that some of his friends have entirely cleared themselves, by acknowledging their disapprobation,—while others, have, from the beginning, advised him to keep from, and maintain a dignified silence towards Universalism. To have obeyed this counsel might have been the wiser policy, for the time being,—though in either case, silence or open warfare, the spirit of inquiry must go on, and Universalism endure the test.

In dealing with the reverend gentleman's conduct, I shall be obliged to use the weapons which he has prepared for use; confining myself to truth, and as much as possible rather to charity. I shall use no seeming severity, satire, or irony to retaliate,—but to convince him of the danger of using edged tools—to treat him in the only manner by which he appears capable of being touched and awakened, and to give the true coloring to his conduct. I shall stand ready for correction where it is due, and am prepared to prove any statement which I shall make.

To begin then: It will be remembered that I visited Branchport last March, at the request of some liberal friends, to lecture several evenings in defence and explanation of Universalism,—and that on the two first evenings of my lecturing, the Rev. Mr. Fraser made one of my congregation. In the first evening I was introduced to him, and was favorably impressed with his appearance. But after affairs have proved that,

"Every man in this age has not a soul
Of crystal, for all men to read their actions
Through; men's hearts and faces are so far asunder
That they hold (but little or) no intelligence."

At the conclusion of each meeting, I gave opportunity for any remarks or honest inquiries that might be made. On the second evening Mr. Fraser arose, and said he would have the candor to state the object of his attending. It was to take notes, that he might reply to me; and he intended to do so on the next Sunday evening. He would not desire to take any advantage of my absence,—and, in case I returned to the place, and wished to reply to him, he would freely furnish me with his notes. As an inquirer, professedly unacquainted with Universalism, he then presented several questions relative to doctrinal points,—which I answered promptly, in the spirit in which they seemed to be indited. Whether those questions were intended more to puzzle than to instruct, may be a matter of conjecture. But as they were asked in apparent candor, I answered them in the same manner. It may be a question of some importance, however, to know whether Mr. Fraser was really ignorant, or not, upon those points. It is presumed that one of his professions should be informed upon every important point of theology,—he well acquainted with both sides, in order that he might know whether he was preaching true or false doctrines, and be prepared to refute the false, and prove the true.—Universalism is not so insignificant and obscure in this country, as to excuse any man for ignorance, and especially one who has passed through the ordeal of a Presbyterian Theological Seminary.

On the last evening of my lecture, the following note was sent to me, which I read to my audience:

"Will Mr. Clark have the goodness to state to his hearers, that I will notice the sentiment of his discourses here, in my regular lecture on Sabbath evening;—and also answer any query in relation to the doctrine of endless punishment that may be presented."

H. FRASER."

Agreeably to the privilege granted in return to that which I had given Mr. F., I wrote thirty two questions, and left them with Mr. Shearman, who intended to present them in case an opportunity was given. Sunday evening came and the lecture was delivered. The lecturer paid but little attention to the "sentiment of my discourses," and less to the proofs;—but dwelt principally upon the answers which he said I gave to his questions,—not one of which answers did he wholly, fairly, and correctly represent. He acknowledged to me in conversation at his own house, since that period, before witnesses, that he undoubtedly gave reasons for supposing that he misunderstood or misrepresented me. A specimen may not come amiss here. In reply to his question relative to the antiquity of Universalism, I distinctly stated that it was proclaimed by God, not only to Abraham, but to Adam and Eve. Mr. Fraser stated that according to my acknowledgment, it was only thirty or forty years old! In reply to his inquiry, with regard to the wages of sin, he said I would make no answer, and no Universalist would. My hearers will remember that I plainly quoted, "the wages of sin is death." "To be carnally minded, is death." "The soul that sinneth it shall die." "In the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die."—And yet my veracious friend dared to affirm before those who knew better, as well as himself, that I made no reply,—was nailed by his prodigious query!

But this is not all.—After spending a long time professedly in noticing my answers, he has the remarkable sagacity to declare that my answers were all about alike, composed of the little monosyllables, "I don't know," "I can't tell," &c. Really, the community must deem it a singular freak of fancy in a man of Mr. F.—'s functions, on beholding him in the act of a long Quixotic battle with the monosyllables, "I don't know," &c! A great deal of "sentiment"—in these, for a preacher of the Gospel to "notice"! It may be judged how much credit for honesty and consistency is due one who could misrepresent and grossly pervert my answers, and then turn about and say that I made no answers of any importance, if at all!

After the gentleman had amused himself for a long time with acknowledged phantoms, the evening getting advanced, he dismissed his congregation, without giving any opportunity or invitation for the presentation of "any query in relation to endless punishment." Shortly afterwards he professed to make an apology for the omission, by saying that he did not know that any questions were on hand to be asked. Since that period, he has affirmed in this house, in my hearing, before this people, that he gave an opportunity. And since making the apology, with a full knowledge of the facts before him, he states in a letter to me, that "No one could be induced to put the questions"! I confess that all this looks rather intricate to me. But after all, there is one redeeming act which I must notice,—as such acts come from the great opponent of Universalism in Branchport, "like angels' visits," &c. He offered to call a meeting at the school house, (not in his own church, before his own congregation,) to fulfil his promise with regard to the questions!—not, however, until he had asked to see them before-hand; and having been refused, aware of his public promise, he made the contemptible offer—which he knew would not be accepted.—His great anxiety to see the questions before putting himself to the hazard of giving extempore and public answers, reveals the great secret to account for his refusal on the proper occasion. It would have been rather an adventurous risk for his dogmas—such a test.

In consequence of the injustice done to truth, and in compliance with Mr. F.'s public offer to me, I requested some of our friends to call for the notes of said lecture. They did so; and were told by the lecturer that he had none. This was rather surprising news to those who had seen Mr. F. on the evening of his lecture, fumbling over numerous loose scraps, odds and ends, which really looked like notes. Perhaps, however, they might have been phantoms, something like those which he was creating and annihilating.—"I don't know," "I can't tell," &c. Our friends really supposed that those papers which looked like notes, were not destroyed,—inasmuch as, perhaps, no very extensive bonfire of paper had afterwards illuminated Branchport and its neighboring scenery. But what comes next to Mr. Fraser's denial of having any notes? In his first letter to me, he says he will give me "all the notes he has got, and some which he has not got, whenever I shall put myself in an attitude to receive them." Whether I shall ever be able to place myself in an "attitude" pleasing to a man who, to use the language of "the great prince of poets," "like an angry ape plays such fantastic tricks," is more than can be determined. However anxious I might have been formerly, subsequent facts dictate but little exertion now. Open falsehood has refuted itself.

But one more note from the lecturer. Mr. F. concluded his "notice of the sentiment of my discourses," by complimenting "the young man."—However much he may now differ in opinion with those who heard him in regard to the nature of his allusions towards me,—it may be stated that he told me in conversation, that he made no remarks against my reputation, sincerity, abilities, &c. If the harmonious testimony of a number of his hearers is to be taken, however, it appears that he simply remarked, that the young man was rather hasty, inconsiderate, wanted mature judgment, &c., and that if he, (Mr. F.) "could have a few moment's conversation with the young man, he would convince him of his error." Mr. F.'s opinions of charitable consistency must be peculiar to himself, to intimate, at one moment, that I was insincere, was already convinced of error, and then in the next breath to talk of convincing me! This real interest and anxiety to convince—to enjoy the opportunity of conversing with "the young man a few moments," will be illustrated as I proceed. It is quite probable that he did not anticipate an offer at that time, nor that I should even venture to enter his vineyard again.

On the second and fourth Sundays of May, I had appointments in the place; but sent my brother on the second and came myself on the fourth. Mr. Fraser was absent on both occasions, having made exchanges both times to go to Rushville. It was half suspected that these exchanges were rather designed for—but surely no one ought to expect that "a personal encounter" with an "inconsiderate young man," who could be convinced in a few minutes, was to be dreaded! But I need not conjecture while there are plenty of indisputable facts.

On my visiting Branchport again in June, owing to the peculiarity of circumstances, I deemed it best to leave a few lines directed to Mr. Fraser, as I had not time to tarry over Sunday. The letter briefly stated how matters stood between us, and contained three requests—1st, that he would furnish me with the promised notes; 2d, that he would fulfil his word with regard to answering the questions, which were left for him; and 3d, that he would meet me to satisfy his desire for public conversation, and he might have as many days as he desired minutes. I then concluded by saying, that his word was publicly pledged; that his neighbors and the community around him knew it, and it was expected that he would not do himself the injustice of leaving matters as they then were.

As contemptuously as the author may have been treated, it appears that the letter itself produced some effect. What should he, to whom it was addressed, do? Something was to be done. But what, and how? *A meeting of the church was called to enter into grave discussion on the subject, and devise means for some extrication from difficulties—but as no minutes of that council were published to the world, it could only be conjectured that Mr. Fraser was advised to reply to my letter. But as much deliberation was necessary, the time of writing was delayed two months, until I visited Branchport, the third Sunday in August.

Determined to know the real state of his mind after nearly five months' meditation, on Saturday evening, August 19th, a friend with me called on him. Although we were warmly greeted at first, yet after a few moments' conversation our host's language became rather cold, measured and hesitating. Business matters were broached delicately. On being asked what he had thought advisable to do, he paused as though the subject had never occurred to his mind before, and at length made out to answer that he had not fully determined yet, but he would think about writing before long.—About this time he desired to be excused for the evening, as he had family matters to attend to—and having no disposition to intrude further upon his generous hospitality, we withdrew, and had the satisfaction of being politely treated with a "good evening" before we crossed the threshold, and before he had permitted us to say the same.

On Sunday afternoon, the next day, what was my astonishment to receive a capacious letter, with the following address and inscription written on the wrapper! "Will Mr. Clark have the fairness to read to his audience the contents of this paper, in reply to his communication when last in this place?" A few brief allusions to, and comments upon this paper may not be out of place here.

He begins very valorously by intimating that I had "cheered myself with the hope" of escaping "a personal encounter," but that I need not flatter myself with the delusive idea of getting off so easily. Unless he had judged me by his own conduct and feelings, I know not how this idea should have entered his brain. Numerous causes had been given—among which was his silence for nearly five months—to infer that he was flattering himself of an entire escape from an honest clearance and investigation. A repetition of an invitation on my part looks but little like a desire to escape "a personal encounter," even with so great a lion as himself.

Slurs and expressions like the following, I shall pass over, admitting them, as the classic selections of fancy and false intimation, becoming their revered author. "Religious notions—trumpeting your own fame—enjoy all the glory of a victory—obtruding yourself into such notoriety—glory enough for such a preacher to challenge a refutation of a creed, providing he can only make good his retreat under the covert of some excuse for not defending it," etc., etc. The head or heart that could dream these, without the least cause or foundation, may be deemed as befitting the source from whence they came, and one who is prepared to do wondrous deeds—in words.

But farther. He censures me severely for having taken the unbounded liberty of doing what I pleased with my own letter—for reading it before my audience previous to sending it to him. A pretty pass things must be coming to, if an individual is not permitted to read his own letters to his friends, before sending them away. Inasmuch as I had the "fairness" to do Mr. F.'s letter the same justice, he may complain till he is satisfied, and till I call on him to ask his sage advice with regard to my own productions. Before sending my letter to the audience I stated that one object I had in so doing, was that it might become subject to any corrections or confirmations that might be given with regard to the statements of the same.—The whole was pronounced to be correct by the unanimous consent of those who were better acquainted with some of the facts than I was myself. I had another object in view, which is now proved to have been a judicious one. I wished the community to know how Mr. F. stood, and that I had called upon him to acquit himself like an honorable man and a Christian, so that he should not maintain an eternal silence under the pretence that I had not invited him to an opportunity. Had I not publicly read and preserved a copy of that letter, he has proved himself none to good to have taken occasion to triumph in dignified silence.

But farther. He complains of the bad spelling of my letter, and attempts to make himself quite funny with the idea that I should have submitted the spelling also to my audience, and that some of the mistakes appeared to have been corrected either by myself or "a notary public." In reply to this, I would simply wish that a good grammarian might have the amusement of examining the structure of some of Mr. F.'s sentences—the connection of ideas—his punctuation, and in fact some of his spelling—one word that he emphasises. These things might possibly be excused in one who has enjoyed only the benefits of a common school education—but they become rather ridiculous when attributed to one who attempts to exercise a critical acumen in orthography; and one, too, who has passed the routine of a College and Theological Seminary discipline. To end this matter, however, I may just say that the copy of my letter sent to Mr. F. was transcribed by another hand!

Farther. He intimates that I have not given him a chance to do me better justice than he has done. I am puzzled to know what he means by this—except he means to infer that I ought to have left him entirely to himself, and not endeavored to bring him to an account for his doing. This might have afforded him a "better chance," inasmuch as he has only heaped abuse and injustice upon injustice, in attempting to screen himself at my request. But if five months with other privileges which I have given him, are not a sufficient chance, he may be advised to take a Rip Van Winkle nap, and then wake up to commence anew.

There is another part of his letter which demands particular note, although no reply to it is needed.—He says that "snivelling complaints, palpable falsehoods and vaporings of courage, are the three rare qualities which make up the sum and substance of my letter!" However uncharitable it may appear, yet I am bold to affirm, that the author of these infamous pieces of accusation, was as conscious of uttering most unfounded and malicious untruths here, as he was of his own existence.—Let him show that my complaints were not manly. And who made them first? I answer that they were first made by the liberal men of Branchport—those men whom Mr. F. says, to me, in conversation, are good, moral, intelligent men, in whom confidence can be placed. And now he virtually designates them with myself, by the handsome epithet of snivelling complainers. And where are the "palpable falsehoods" of my letter? He dare not make an attempt to show or prove this wilfully false charge. I call upon him to vindicate his assumed veracity, not only upon this point, but upon a number of others equally glaring, pitiful, shameful and degrading. Some of the most important facts stated in my letter, were given me, corroborated by those liberal Christians in Branchport, in whom Mr. F. says he can place confidence. And now he virtually accuses them with myself, of being palpable liars—and charitably allows me the honor of a discipleship in service to the "father of lies." However much I may be liable to err, I must confess, with due acknowledgments of gratitude to Mr. F., that my claims to such a discipleship are certainly superceded by his.

In reply to the charge of exhibiting "vaporings of courage," "polemic chivalry," "noble daring," etc., perhaps I may simply say, that I shall never manifest a desire to flee from an open investigation of the everlasting truths of the Gospel, when I am called upon to defend them. When I left father and mother, friends and home, and sacrificed the love and favor of the popular world, and all secular considerations, I did not do it for the purpose of entering a field which I have not surveyed, and a cause which I had not the confidence to vindicate. "For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds." And when occasion calls for a vindication of Universalism against the attacks and prejudices of opposers, I am not disposed to "shield myself against the hazards of a personal encounter"—to evade the opportunity of bringing out light upon the subject, and fear not the result. In the case before us, I have been dragged into the necessity of manifesting this openness, by the course of Mr. F., himself, and he knows it, notwithstanding his intimations that I have swaggered up to him and presented a challenge without the least cause or provocation. In answer to as modest an invitation as could have been given, he comes out and talks up to the work as though he was harnessed for gigantic undertakings. I will quote some of his own language, "You had better be pretty whist as to the probable result, for I take up the gawwils and will meet you; and in this you will more than meet any reasonable expectation that might be entertained. I would most respectfully reply that I am willing to protract the minutes even to months, if I might only 'convert a sinner from the error of his ways—for then I should save a soul from death, and hide a multitude of sins'—and then follow his proposals to meet for the making of arrangements for the investigation. Now if all this does not smack mightily of the "vaporings of courage"—as after facts prove—then we are to know what vapor means. I can easily imagine him to adopt Hannah More's paraphrase of the language used by the Philistine champion to David:

"Now I will meet thee,
Thou insect warrior! Since thou darest me then,
Already I behold thy mangled limbs,
Dissevered each from each, ere long to feed
The fierce blood-sucking vulture. Mark me well!
Around my spear I twist thy shining locks,
And toss in air thy head all gashed with wounds;
Thy lips, yet quivering with the dire convulsion
Of recent death! Art thou not terrified?"

From Mr. F.'s valorous introductory flourishes, something was really expected. But valiant men sometimes expend all their rage, and zeal, and ammunition before the crisis comes—and then, alas! are unable to present themselves. On the day ap-

ANOTHER WITNESS.

A week or two since we gave the confession of the Rev. Mr. Barnes respecting the difficulties which press upon the mind of the believer in endless sin and wo. The following is on the same point, from Professor Stuart. It is introduced here to show what the views of such men are, and to rebuke those who triumphantly exclaim that they find no difficulties, that it is all perfectly plain to them. It is often said by some of these, that they "are quite satisfied with the doctrine of endless wo, that they are perfectly happy in their belief." I confess I have little respect for the head or heart of the man or woman who can say this. It shows that they are incapable of thought, or that the heart is fearfully depraved, or that they do not speak the truth! But to the extract:

"That the subject is one of fearful interest, none will deny. That there are difficulties pressed by it on the mind, when any one thinks of his own condition, that of his beloved friends, or of his brethren of the human race, it would be mere pretence to deny!"

Such is the testimony of Professor Stuart, as contained in an article on the "Book of Enoch" in the Biblical Repository. I am led to note from it,

1st. That the strong minds, those who are the deepest thinkers, and the clearest reasoners, the most Christian and candid, find difficulties, insurmountable difficulties in the bare idea of endless sin and suffering in the government of an infinitely wise and good God—or in the language of Barnes, "it is all dark, dark, dark!" It is only the little minds, and little preachers, that find no difficulties, that see every thing perfectly clear, and treat the whole subject with a smile or a sneer.

2nd. That the influence of this doctrine on the minds and hearts of those who understandingly believe it, is widely different from the influence of the teachings of Christ and His followers. While this doctrine confessedly gives distress and anguish to the soul, and crushes the loving heart to the earth, the doctrines of Christ and Paul gave joy and rest to the believer, comforted the distressed, healed the broken hearted, and gave to the mourner the garment of praise for the spirit of weariness. Hence the apostle says, "We that have believed do enter into rest, and rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory." Whether endless wo is the Gospel, therefore, every one can judge—one thing is certain—"A sweet fountain can not at the same time give out sweet waters and bitter.—Star of Bethlehem.

DEATHS.

At the residence of his father, in the town of Windsor, September 3d, Mr. EZRA KEYES, of Chenango. Broome county, aged 31 years. Br. Keyes had long been afflicted with fits, which greatly impaired his usefulness. But although feeble in health, his goodness of heart and unspotted life endeared him to a numerous circle of relatives and friends. But he is gone. His troubles are over. His faith in God's universal goodness comforted and sustained him in the hour of death. He has left a wife and two children to mourn their loss. But hope in God is her strong confidence and consolation; and by it she is comforted in her bereavement. His funeral was attended in the Baptist meeting house at West Windsor, and a discourse delivered to a large congregation of relatives and friends, by the writer. W. M. DELONG.

At Middleville, on the 14th inst., of consumption, Mrs. LUCY, consort of Mr. Ira Farmer, aged 28 years. By this dispensation, Br. Farmer is called to mourn, for the second time within the short period of less than three years, the death of an amiable, worthy and exemplary wife. But although the ways of Providence are dark and inscrutable, and though he deeply mourns his great and irreparable loss, yet he mourns not as those without hope; but has the divine consolations of that Gospel which comforts the mourner, binds up the broken-hearted, and assures him of a happy and glorious meeting hereafter with the loved and the lost, and with a ransomed and glorified world. Her funeral was attended on the 16th, and a sermon preached on the mournful occasion, to a numerous congregation of sympathizing friends and neighbors, by Br. Alfred Day. D. S.

In Marshall, on the 13th inst., of consumption, Br. ASA DICK, aged 47 years. In this dispensation we have lost a much respected and beloved brother. When he expired, I was with him, and I do not know that I have ever seen any one pass away more calmly than he did. In his last conversation on the subject of his departure, he observed that he was willing to go; but if it was God's will, he should like to be spared until he could settle up his temporal affairs. His religious experience has, in some respects, been of a singular character; more than 20 years since his mind was brought to reflect seriously on the subject of religion. He told me he was about this time, strongly solicited to unite with a church in this vicinity which could not, consistently with its rules, allow him to extend his fellowship as far as he thought his religious experience would justify; and he could not therefore unite with it. He had the principle of love to all so deeply implanted in his mind that nothing short of a full and universal salvation could satisfy him.—About this time, father Underwood was preaching occasionally in these parts; and the views which he gave of the divine character and purposes, were such as to meet the enlarged philanthropy of our brother's heart. He said he had endeavored to cultivate the feeling of love to all; and though, he said, he had not always kept that spirit, yet when under its fullest exercise he was always the happiest. His faith in the Gospel, he told us in his last sickness, was what sustained him—it was his substantial comfort in life, and it did not fail him in death. And, he said, he wished me distinctly to understand, that the hope he had was for all.

It may be truly said of Br. Dick: "That when the ear heard me then it blessed me; and when the eye saw me then it gave witness unto me; because I delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless and him that had none to help him. The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me, and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy." He was truly a "father to the poor," as hundreds of witnesses can fully testify. We have lost a good man—one in whose countenance Heaven had written the very language of benevolence—of a benevolence too that was confined within the boundaries of no party or sect; but one which embraced the whole family of man in the arms of love. He believed that in so doing, he was imitating his Father in heaven "who is good unto all and his tender mercies are over all his works."

May the richest of Heaven's blessings rest upon the afflicted family, who are left to mourn his departure—may they be comforted with the reflection that their loss is his gain. He was a kind husband, an affectionate father, and devoted Christian; and his memory is embalmed in the hearts of his numerous friends. To the Universalist society in Marshall, the loss is very great; but we would submit with patience to the dispensation, believing that our Heavenly Father knows what is best for us. His funeral was attended on the 15th, by a large and sympathizing congregation—sermon by the writer from Acts xxvi: 8. C. S. BROWN.

In Mill Creek, Erie county, Pa., of consumption, SARAH ANN, wife of N. B. Partridge, and daughter of Dr. Nathaniel Goth, aged 41 years.

Sister Partridge was a member of the Universalist society in this place, (Hume), and she together with her beloved companion, done much towards placing the cause of our Saviour before the inhabitants of this vicinity in such a manner as to do honor to themselves as well as the cause of truth. They were among the first who engaged with me in forming a society here.

Had it not been for Br. P. and a few faithful friends, I do not believe there would have been a society formed in this place to this day. Oh! how much a few faithful brethren can do in the cause of the blessed Redeemer.

Br. P. is left with a number of small children in his charge as a father to impart the instruction of a mother's tender love. Oh! may the faith which he has long embraced prepare him for all the duties that God in his infinite wisdom may place him under, even so let it be. I. B. SHARP.

In the same place, January 9th, of bilious fever, JOHN, son of Leonard and Martha Vaughn, aged 2 years. May God bless all who mourn. I. B. S.

In Hamilton, September 3d, Mrs. P. SMITH, wife of Mr. Charles Smith, aged 66 years.

This is the fourth of the early members of our society which the writer has followed to the grave within the past year. They fall around us like ripe fruit, and we trust that the Gospel which they have enjoyed in its fulness, has prepared them as "shocks of corn fully ripe" for the Master's garner. Although strongly attached to earth, sister S. found resignation and willingness to depart—and has left behind her relatives and friends who look to meet her in the abodes of perfection and felicity. God give them peace.

In Phasix, Oswego county, September 10th, after a brief but severe illness, Miss ESTHER E. BROOKS, aged 26 years and 8 months. That Miss Brooks was one of the excellent of the earth, is proved by the united testimony of all who knew her—and the many tears shed over her lifeless remains by her neighbors and acquaintances, showed that she held a place in the warm affections of her hearts. It was her happiness to entertain an undoubting faith in the doctrine of God's impartial grace, by which while in health she was strengthened and qualified for the discharge of her many duties, and on a sick bed with a prospect of certain death before her she was enabled to triumph and rejoice "with joy unspeakable and full of glory." Only a little previous to the hour of dissolution, and when all expectation of recovery was gone, she declared to her friends that she was willing to depart, and entertained no doubt but that she should meet all her friends in the bright realms of eternal day.

To show how dearly she loved her religion, and how much she delighted to worship in God's sanctuary; it may not be improper to mention in this place, that several years since, in the depth of winter, she in company with a sister, actually walked from her father's house to Fulton (a distance of 10 miles) and home again, for the purpose of hearing Br. Dolphus Skinner preach an evening discourse. What a lesson does this circumstance afford, for some professors of Universalism, who can scarcely be induced to go ten rods (much less ten miles) to listen to the proclamation of the good tidings of great joy! The funeral of Miss Brooks was attended on the 12th, and the usual public services performed by H. L. HAYWARD.

GLEANINGS.....NO. II.

HINTS TO YOUNG SPEAKERS.

BY REV. U. CLARK.

While our first six hints are well remembered, particular attention is now solicited to the 7th. Never exhibit egotism in the pulpit. This ism is sufficiently disagreeable in social circles: but in the desk it becomes aggravating in the extreme—almost or quite intolerable. A preacher of Christ and his gospel is not commissioned to preach himself—making the pronoun “I” his constant theme, and one of the first importance. He is not to set himself up as the standard of perfection, nor be continually telling his hearers his—“my” peculiar opinions, feelings, interests, &c. An audience dislikes to see the preacher thrust himself so much in view as to hide every thing else. It is his sphere to hide himself in his theme—to call up deep, clear, holy and beautiful thoughts—to hold up the divine Master clothed in the living apparel of righteousness, and point to him—to gather up the glories of the Gospel, and point to its splendors beaming like the rainbow of promise upon the heavens. While the eyes of your hearers are fixed upon you in such a case, their minds will be lost in the subject, and this is what is desired. But let a self-conceited preacher talk of himself—tell personal anecdotes, tell how he feels, what he is ready to do and suffer for the cause, what he is enduring, what mighty wonders he has done, &c., and while the more sensible and modest part of his audience are disgusted, the remainder may become all absorbed in the man, forgetting Christ, and the Gospel too. Beware of this species of unblushing egotism. It may be well enough for elderly men to speak of themselves occasionally; but for young men to be calling attention to self, looks arrogant, immodest, and puts an audience to blush. An occasional use of “I” may be convenient and necessary; but let the occasions be few as possible.

8. Be more fond of reading than of talking. Let your mind be fixed upon the responsibility of your profession, and your study, your room will contain the most absorbing interests. That is your work-house, and there are your materials, or rather your tools. Work—stick to it. Take up those books and studies which are the most interesting and of immediate use, first. Do not begin a work and then throw it aside, without knowing what it contains, for something else, or to get up and run out, for the purpose of talking and lounging around a spell, without any particular object in view. If you have social or pastoral visits to make, attend to them—make them a business, and use all the necessary means of being agreeable, social, friendly and familiar. Study the art of pleasing and becoming earnest in conversation. Talk to the point—talk as though you was at home, at the same time without appearing too bold and independent. And while you are listening and conversing, study human nature—observe without being observed the tastes, feelings, dispositions, &c., of your people, and all with whom you converse; and thus be able, every time you talk, to get something for an idea or thought—get materials for your study and meditation. But remember to be fonder of reading than of talking. Cultivate a taste for the former, by concentrating your mind, and considering the necessity which calls upon you to impart things both old and new. Those who depend for success upon genius and inspiration are bitterly deceived. Such preachers are too numerous. They are either too indolent or self-conceited to study, or can not sacrifice the time necessary. They are fit only to murder “the King’s English and God’s theology,” and had better seek another profession. A successful preacher must pursue hard mental labor. It is worse than folly for him to think of succeeding without some foundation to work upon. He must have more than bare words. He must have ideas, thoughts, knowledge; and to get these he must read and think.

9. Cultivate a thorough knowledge of your own mother tongue. Do this first—before you waste time in the defunct languages, while you are unable to lisp your vernacular. It is outrageous to community, to respectable assemblies, to the common sense of the age, to hear a preacher endeavoring to instruct an enlightened people, while he is blundering to communicate himself in rough ungrammatical and barbarous sentences. To remedy this evil, and to cultivate a thorough knowledge of native language, together with a smooth and graceful style, pursue the reading of standard English and American authors. Mark the beauty and construction of every sentence; not however for the purpose of imitating any particular author, but to cultivate a taste for a natural, fluent, and beautiful style. Use no language in a private letter, nor in conversation, which is not correct and chaste, and which would not answer before a refined audience. This can be done without any stiffness or formality. Throw aside the daily scribbles of common news-mongers, Wellerism, Slickism, and all the like language-corrupting trash. Reading nothing that is not well written—it will exert a pernicious influence over your language or style. There are enough tastefully, well written productions to occupy all your reading hours.

THE VANITY OF ALL EARTHLY GLORY.

BY REV. A. SCOTT.

How frail is man. He cometh forth as a shadow, and is cut down. He flourishes for a moment, and straight is seen no more. We behold him in infancy, clothed in beauty and innocence, fresh as a May day flower, and tender as the germ just springing into life. In a moment it is gone, the remembrance thereof is forgotten. We can not cast our eyes upon a single object but we behold written thereon “passing away.” The whole vegetable creation comes up before us in bright array, but soon it languishes, pines away and dies. So too with man—that being created in the image of his Maker; a reasoning, acting, thinking being. He rises up and flourishes for a day; then passes back and mingles with his original. He flourishes as a plant, and stalks forth in all the majesty of the mighty oak; but soon his limbs tremble beneath their weight. He loses all his animation, and falls from his state of majesty, into entire forgetfulness. He passes away, and no one remembers him. “A rude stone may point out the spot where he lies, when he came here and when he went away; but even that will soon refuse to bear him record; time’s effacing fingers will be busy on its surface, and at length will wear it smooth.” The generation that comes up after him, may search for some rude marks by which to learn who lies entombed beneath, but all in vain. The busy tread of life passes over our grave, regardless of our worth.

Although we may have graced the proud halls of literature and science, it matters not. These will not always preserve our memories. We rush on to the shades of forgetfulness. It matters not whether we are among the rich or poor, the high or low, the honored or dishonored; the same events happen to all. Death, the enemy of our race, stops not to ask what stations we have occupied, but regardless thereof, hurries us away, and leaves our memories to perish with our bodies, and our places to be occupied by strangers, who think not of those who have occupied before them. They tread heedlessly upon our graves, hardly thinking or reflecting that they too are mortal and hastening to the tomb. But so it is; we pass away, and leave all the glory of earth behind.

By such surveys of our earthly glory and dignity, we verily learn that all flesh is as grass, and all the goodness thereof as the flower of the field.—The grass withereth, the flower thereof fadeth, because the spirit of the Lord bloweth upon it; which should teach us to place not our trust and confidence on earthly dignity and glory, nor on earthly strength, but upon God, who endureth forever and presides over the destiny of the universe.

May all behold the vanity of all earthly glory, and thereby be caused to forsake its trifles and vanities, and be enabled to lay up for themselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, or thieves break through and steal, that their hearts may be where nought shall corrupt, and where all shall be joy, peace, quietness, and assurance forever.

CONFERENCE IN FULTON.

BR. GROSH—Agreeably to notice, a conference was held in Fulton, Oswego, co., on the 6th and 7th inst. The principal object of the meeting was, to devise means to liquidate the debt existing against the Universalist Society in this place. Seven ministers were present, who preached nine discourses in the order of their names; N. Sawyer, — Sax, A. W. Bruce, O. Wilcox, J. Douglass, H. Van Campen, W. Sias, A. W. Bruce, afternoon and evening. After the sermon each evening, a short praise meeting was held. A collection was taken up for our afflicted Br. C. B. Brown, and the sum of $12.00 was contributed. On Wednesday after the close of the services, the object of calling the meeting was stated; after some deliberation the meeting adjourned to 8 o’clock next morning, when Br. N. Sawyer proposed the following plan for liquidating the church debt, viz., That the ministers present, and others who are situated so as to be able to tender assistance in that way, on the society’s raising $200.00, the present amount of debt unprovided for, will unite and preach to the society twenty Sabbaths, “free of charge;” and that the money thus raised instead of being paid, as usual, to the preachers, be used to remove the debt.—When the debt is removed, the society will be able to support preaching at least half of the time.

An arrangement was made with the choir belonging to the Methodist church, by which the choir was to attend our Conference and sing for us; but on Wednesday morning, at 8 o’clock, we were very respectfully informed that the choir would not sing for us. Elder Baker, the shepherd of the flock, hearing of the engagement, became alarmed and warned and commanded the female portion of the choir, at least, not to have anything to do with us. So we had the pleasure of doing our own singing. It is but just to add, that many of the Methodist society, and singers also, very much disapprove of the course pursued by Elder B.

I would address a few words to the Universalists of Oswego co. The house and lot, belonging to the society in Fulton, cost about $2500.00; there are now $400.00 to be paid or the property will soon be sold; the society, which is small, has raised $200.00 of this amount, which is all it is able to do; $200.00 more are to be raised to save the only Universalist meeting house in Oswego co., from public sale. Now, brethren, can you not aid us a little in this our time of trouble? If the Universalists in the different parts of the county, would all help us a little, it would enable us to keep our house. Only $200.00 are wanting. Brethren, will you not help raise that amount? What is done should be done as early as possible.

ORIGIN OF DEATH.

Among the superstitions that have been imbibed from a narrow, and illiberal interpretation of Scripture, that of the manœuvre of the devil, in the garden of Eden, and his abduction of Eve from the path of virtue, and thereby bringing a literal death upon her and all her descendants, stands pre-eminent, for its imbecility, and absurdity.

Nothing can be more certain, than that immortality and reproduction are incompatible with each other; especially upon a globe like ours, narrowly confined and limited in its extent. For, had Adam, Eve, and all their descendants existed, and continued to multiply to the present time, in the same proportion that they did during their existence, it needs but a very limited knowledge of mathematics, to discover that our earth could not contain the hundredth part of their number. That a literal devil did not bring death into the world by his wiles and artifices practiced upon Eve, is palpably evident from the fact, written upon the eternal rocks of ages, viz., "that animals of the carnivorous species existed, and preyed upon each other, many thousands of years before man was created." Consequently, death must have been in the world for numerous ages, previous to the period that the serpent, (as it is said, but evidently the popular devil is not the meaning intended to be conveyed by the sacred writer,) had this most momentous conference with mother Eve, which according to Milton affected universal nature.

"Earth felt the wound, and nature from her seat, Sighing through all her works, gave signs of woe
That all was lost."

Death, so far from being a curse, (as is too generally supposed by the vulgar,) is one of the greatest blessings that the Deity has conferred upon his creatures. For without the interposition of death, (unless the laws of nature, and their various relations were entirely altered,) what a spectacle of horror and wretched misery would this world present! I gladly refrain from the description of a scene which the imagination alone can fully depict; but suffice it to say, that mangled, memberless, mutilated, and ulcerous bodies, would not be wanting to disgust the sight, and agonize the feelings of humanity.

The most probable, and only correct theory of the origin of death, is that which is taught by facts and reason, viz., that death was instituted by the Eternal Mind, as absolutely indispensable to complete the great plan of his government of the universe, and could not have been omitted, without deranging the whole infinitely perfect system, and that it is co-existent with the animal kingdom, and a necessary consequence of its organization.

Cambridge, Mass.

JUVENIS.

NOTE.—The reason given by the Almighty Creator himself, for the death of man, viz., the result of his natural organization, is sufficient to account for the death of all things vegetable and animal—"Dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return." They also were dust, and reasonable it is to suppose that God made the law of earthly life the same to all things possessed of that life—yea, the law of all life, universal—for to the origin doth all life tend—"the body shall return to the earth as it was, the spirit to God who gave it." And thus is Revelation shown to teach the lessons of the most perfect human reason, ages before that reason was sufficiently developed in man to account for natural effects.

EDITED BY

Rens. A. B. Grosh, G. W. Montgomery and A. C. Barray.

UTICA, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1843.

THE BOOK OF JOB.... No. II.

We are now prepared to pursue our inquiries in regard to the teachings, and objects of the Book of Job itself. To do this, permit me to allude to the religious systems then existing in the world—for in my humble opinion an intention to correct their errors and counteract their influences, forms one of the objects of this Book.

It is evident from the Book itself, according to a translation by a Unitarian clergyman in England, as well as from general history, that idolatry was practised by Job's neighbors. Our common version represents Job as saying—"It may be that my sons have sinned and cursed God in their hearts." The German version by Luther, has it—"My sons may have blessed [postponed doing it, says the translator in a parenthesis,] God in their hearts." The Unitarian translator says—"I will quote the 4th and 5th verses,—"And his sons made a feast at the house of each on his birthday; and they sent and called for their three sisters to eat and drink with them. And when the days of the feast had gone round, then Job sent and sanctified them; and he rose up early in the morning and offered burnt offerings, according to the number of all of them; for Job said, Probably my sons have sinned and blessed idols [i. e. false gods, for the word is plural in the original] in their hearts: thus did Job on all the birth-days."

This shows the prevalence of idolatry, and Job's great and constant care to prevent his children from coming under its influence, and falling into its practice. Remember, that when Abraham was called of God, the land of Chaldaea, and probably the whole earth, was overrun of idolatry—and that the little knowledge of the true God that remained, continued to vanish away, except in the family of this patriarch. Job was fifth in descent from Abraham, and dwelt among the Chaldeans, the Sabeans and the Arabians. The Chaldeans had become worshippers of fire—the Sabeans worshipped the sun, moon, and stars; and it is believed that the Arabians did the same. The belief generally prevailed, at least among some of the people inhabiting that region, there were two principles, or two gods, or sets of deities, that governed the universe—one good; who was the dispenser of life, light, and all the enjoyments and blessings of existence;—and the other evil; who was the author of death, darkness, and all the evils and curses that afflict mankind. This system was afterwards revived and reformed by Zerdusht, or Zoroaster, and became the Magian or Persian religion—which, in its turn, became the Manichean religion in the early days of Christianity—and from which, again, was derived the popular notion of a personal, fallen angel, the author of evil, called the devil and Satan by our Partialist Christians at this day.

I will show you presently, that the Satan named in the Book of Job, is not not the devil believed in by our Partialist brethren—nor is the devil, nor any of the devils named in the Bible, the devil in which the Sabeans, the Persians, the Manicheans believed, and our modern Christians yet believe, as the author of evil. But for the present, let us remember the ancient form of this popular error—popular, even in the days of Job, among his heathen neighbors!

Now, the main design of the Book of Job is to show that all things are of God—that all events, whether good or evil, are permitted and ordered by Him alone—that He is the dispenser, not only of good, of life, of light, of enjoyments, but of evil, of death, of darkness, and of afflictions also. See also the 45th chapter of Isaiah, which was specially addressed to Cyrtus the Persian, years before he was born, and in which the prospective theological errors of that monarch are clearly pointed out and denied. The whole burden of that remarkable chapter, as well as of the Book of Job, is, to refute the Magian, Manichean, and modern Christian notion of the origin and source of evil. And yet how many are ready to deny us even the Christian name, because we receive the teachings of Job and Isaiah, and reject the dogmas expressly refuted in the books bearing the names of these ancient and truly orthodox worthies! But to return to the Book of Job.

Job's comforters, (or friends who visited him to comfort him,) labor continually to prove that Job's afflictions and misfortunes are in consequence of his personal wickedness—are just judgments, or punishment visited on him for his sins. Job, in reply, denies their cruel accusations, and argues that though these afflictions are all sent of God, yet they are not punishments, but sufferings—sufferings that are common to all—sufferings permitted to come for some wise, though unknown, purpose—for some good end which God has in view, though man sees it not, and can not even guess what it is.

Job's wife also mingles her reproaches in the controversy, and calls on Job to bless the gods, (i. e., the false gods, the idols,) that they may dispense the boon of death to him.—For though death is an evil, yet it is a less evil than those he endures. He reproves her for speaking as the foolish women (i. e. the heathen women) speak, and reminds her, that as we receive good from the true God, so we should submit when he gives evil.

One word in relation to our common version, which renders the frequent expression, "curse God"—"curse God and die." Hebrew scholars say the word should never be rendered by the word "curse"—that it always means bless. The German version by Luther always renders it, "blessed God"—"bless you in your face"—"bless God and die"—notwithstanding this rendering appears to render the sense contrary to what it evidently should be. Take for an example the i: 11, where Satan says to God, of Job—"But put forth thine hand now, and touch all that he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face." Luther renders this passage—"But stretch thy hand out, and touch all he has, and what boots it? he will bless thee to thy face." He adds in parenthesis, by way of explanation, "He will fawningly, or sycophantically, recite it to your face." The Unitarian translator renders the passage thus—"But stretch forth now thy hand, and smite through all which is his; surely he will not bless thee to thy face."

You see by these different renderings of this same verse—and all the verses where cursing God is named in our common version, are rendered similar to these examples in the German and this other English version—you will see, I say, by these examples, that there is a difficulty somewhere in rendering these passages, which none of them seem able satisfactorily to overcome.—That difficulty, in my humble opinion, arises from their overlooking the fact, that the gods and not God—i. e., that the false gods, and not the true God, are spoken of as being blessed, or worshipped by Job. It is certain that the Magian theory of two co-eternal and opposing principles, formed a part of the idolatry of an age immediately subsequent to the days of Moses; and many assert that it prevailed in the days, and long prior to the times of Moses;—and it is also certain that this theory sprang up, and flourished greatly, in the very region where the scene of the Book of Job is laid. And by adopting this opinion, many of the allusions now dark and perplexing, seem plain and clear. It is also certain that a part of the main design of this book, is to show that God's government extends to all beings and events—that evil as well as good comes from the hand of God alone—and that it is because evils come from a good being, they should be submitted to, and their final result be hopefully awaited.

True—in a few instances. Job, goaded and tortured by the unjust accusations of his friends, embarrassed by his acknowledged ignorance of God's design in afflicting him, and overpowered by the intensity of his sufferings and the bitterness of his griefs, becomes impatient, sinks into despair, and expresses himself rashly and hopelessly. But these are exceptions in his general conduct, and transgressions of right, of which he repents when God reproves him for them. The design of the poem is to teach patience and resignation under affliction, by showing that there is hope even in the darkest hour—that good will come after all the evil—that ultimately right will take place, and an abundant reward recompense the sufferer. And by teaching this, the great difficulty produced in many minds by the existence of present evil, was fully solved. And as it was on this difficulty that the Magian system was based, that system was refuted by this Book, as is also the present popular system of the origin of evil with a fallen angel, and its endless continuance under his dominion. My limits will not allow me to occupy more room, by dilating on this subject, and quoting largely from the Book itself, according to a new and better translation than our common version—but I refer you even to our common version itself, for proofs of these brief hints. I think what has been said will shed considerable light on the work. A. B. G.

NATURE AS SEEN BY THE BELIEVER.

The character we ascribe to God, and his purposes respecting us, are the media through which we behold all things and events, and they are necessarily colored and stained in our sight, by the opinions through which we view them. Therefore it is, that our Partialist brethren generally, consider this fair and beautiful world a valley of sighs and tears—not only when sorrows and afflictions press around, as was the case with the sacred writers when they thus spoke, but at all times; for at all times does their creed render it such a dark vale to them.

In like manner—seeing their fellow beings through the same distorted and gloomy atmosphere—man is looked upon as an incarnate demon—a totally depraved creature—one whom we must regard with loathing and distrust. Even the infant in the cradle, smiling in its innocence, is looked at as a young serpent or tiger—beautiful without, playful and harmless as yet, but waiting only till its fangs and claws shall be grown, to spread around consternation and destruction. (And truly such must man be by nature, if he is created in the image and likeness of a God of wrath and vengeance!) And death, and the grave, seen through such a medium, are terrific and fearful; for it leaves to the one its sting, and to the other its victory, throughout eternity—and well may the strong man tremble, and the brave man cower down before them! Eternity—eternity—oh!

how has the tongue eloquent with horror, terrified whole congregations into a temporary insanity, as it has described eternity as seen by the glare of modern theology; until this world, with all its duties and obligations, its pleasures and benefits, has been forgotten in the mad fear of futurity! Even heaven—the embodied idea of all that is pure and joyful in the Christian's faith, hope and charity—even heaven, when looked at through the medium of this modern theology, loses its brightness and gladness—becomes cold and repulsive—and is sullied by the uprising smoke laden with the cries of sufferers in the supposed hell below. Thus do false views of God cause us to form cruelly wrong estimates of life and all pertaining to it—of the world and all things in it—casting gloom over light, mingling death with life, and causing us to see stains where all is purity—deformity where all is beauty—and selfishness where all is benevolence.

While some of our Partialist brethren are exceptions to this general description, because they do not suffer their creed to gnaw on their hearts, or occupy constantly their minds—others will attempt to justify the correctness of their gloomy views, by appeals to the great sorrows of holy men of old, in their periods of deep affliction. But there are others, still, who, knowing the frequent injunctions of the Bible to worship God with cheerfulness and joy, will deny the correctness of our statements. In reply to their denial, I need only appeal to every one who has truly and feelingly realized the doctrine of endless sin and misery for themselves and their families—to the recollections of many who, in a former period, did thus believe that awful doctrine—and even to the countenances of many of our opposers; for “the show of their countenances doth witness against them.” I speak not jestingly or reproachfully on this subject; for God knows I deem them deceived and sincere, and to be pitied for those deep, and heart-wringing emotions which have imprinted themselves so firmly on the outward features, that, in many cases, the Methodist may be selected from a crowd of Calvinists, or the Calvinist from a congregation of Methodists, and both from a Universalist congregation, merely by the countenance—by the imprint of the creed on the features. And in further reply to their denial, if further reply is needed, I will, in conclusion, narrate an anecdote, which occurred a few years ago.

I was preaching on the character of God, as exhibited in nature, and proving his benevolence from his works. To show that the common opinions respecting God, were erroneous, I supposed what nature would exhibit were they true. In that case, I said, man would be created with the keenest relish for the beautiful and the good; but every sense and desire would fail to lead him to any thing but disappointment and distress. Colors would be glaring—sounds would be discords—odors would be stench—the air would be piercing with cold or burning with heat—every touch would be harsh and grating, and every movement agony. Then, to heighten the agony of these torments, a remission would take place, and the senses yield joy and happiness long enough to relieve them, so that they could again hear the suffering ordained for them in their exercise. Thus would life be slowly and painfully prolonged, and the senses be tantalized, until death, a sleep still more terrible, put an end to the pain, only to renew it in a state where sin shall be rendered endless, and pain immortal. At the close of the discourse, a sister, who for many years had been a member of the Baptist church, said to me, “Your description of nature, supposing God to be as cruel as he is generally represented, was perfectly correct. For long and weary years, I saw every thing look, and felt every thing operate, precisely as you described it. When any one spoke of the joys of living, of the beauties of nature, of the goodness and wisdom of God in his creation and providence, it seemed to me like bitter satire and cutting irony;—for to me, at that times the world seemed but the pavement of hell, life but the entrance to endless torments, and the bounties of Providence were merely means furnished, whereby the greater portion of my fellow beings were enabled more speedily and certainly to sink themselves into endless ruin. Ninety-nine-hundredths of all around me I supposed were daily sinking into inconceivable and ceaseless torture, through those very joys, beauties, and signs of goodness and wisdom of which people spoke—and how could I see any joy, or beauty—any goodness or wisdom in them?—Oh, God,” said she, with tears streaming from her eyes, “what years of agony, and of blasphemy were those days of bondage in the creeds of Partialism!”

Imagine yourself such a true and constant believer of endless misery—imagine, if you can, the daily and hourly tortures wherewith it would rend your bosom and embitter all your life—and then suppose yourself released from its cruel and narrow faith—from its fearful and narrow hope—and from its limited and restless charity, into, not only the assurance of your own salvation, but of the salvation from sin and misery of all mankind—and what—oh, what would be the feelings of your emancipated soul on that occasion! The bright beams of the sun, the songs of birds, the gay hum of insects, the perfume of flowers, the cheerful sky, and gilded clouds, and refreshing green of the earth, and the murmurs of running waters, would no more seem dazzling falsehoods, but glorious truths, teaching other truths still more joyous and glorious! And Winter's storms, and Autumn's rains, and Spring's sober changes—all would speak of wisdom and goodness; for the gloomy veil through which you had viewed them as exhibitions of God's wrath, would be removed from your mind, and your spiritual vision being purged, your eye would be single, and your whole body full of light. POSTPONEMENT OF THE CONFERENCE AT SOUTHVILLE. The Conference at this place, as will be seen by the notice, is postponed one week, and will therefore be held on the second Wednesday and Thursday, the 11th and 12th, of October, instead of the first as heretofore noticed.—This change in the time is made at the request of the friends at Southville through Br. Anderson, so as to avoid holding two Conferences so near together as Southville and Marshall, on the same days.

Note.—The appointing power, which is usually vested in the Standing Clerk of the Association, sometimes, however, in a committee, should always be consulted when a change in the time of holding a Conference is desired, as much as when the appointment of it is solicited. But in this case the time is now too short to consult the Standing Clerk; and we venture to make the desired alteration without his knowledge, feeling very sure that it will meet his approbation, as we know him to be a very obliging man. But where there are standing regulations they should, in all cases where it is possible, be strictly regarded; for if they are not regarded, they are useless. So, at least thinks them, as we have opportunity. The following is a list of them, with the names of those to whom they belong, what is due on them, &c.:

Wm. Currie, volume 2, old series, for 1829, volumes 2, 3, 4 and 5, new series, for 1831, 2, 3 and 4—due, $3.00. — King, volume 1, new series, for 1830—due, 63 cents. John P. Smith, Lockport, volume 4, for 1833—due, 63 cents. W. Wilbur, volume 4, for 1833—due, 63 cents. D. Sayles, New Hartford, volume 5, for 1834—due, 63 cents. S. P. #### BR. C. B. BROWN.

The case of this afflicted brother was mentioned in the Magazine and Advocate a few weeks since, by Br. Grosh. In a private note from Br. Simons, of Fulton, it is stated that he was taken sick in November, 1838; from that until the present time, he has been pretty much confined to the bed; and during the last three years, has been unable to help himself at all. He was a poor man when taken sick; what little means he had, has been long since exhausted by the expenses incurred in consequence of his long and severely painful illness. For a long time, the charities of his friends have alone supplied the wants of himself and family. His wife can not earn anything for the support of the family, for all her time, and patience, and strength are employed in taking care of her suffering husband. Br. Brown, I know personally, and by reputation, and I can cheerfully say, that no man is more worthy, and, with equal truth, must say, that no man more needs the substantial expressions of the Universalist public's sympathy than Br. C. B. Brown.

These remarks have been made with the view of calling the attention of those public meetings which may be hereafter held, to the situation of Br. B., that that assistance may be rendered which he absolutely needs, to keep his family comfortable, especially during the coming winter. A good example has been set by the Chenango Association, and the Conference at Fulton—the former contributing $24.00, and the latter $12.00—which I would propose for the initiation of all those Conferences which are yet to be held during the year. Let there be a collection taken up at each of these meetings—it will require but a small sum of each individual to make out a very handsome contribution—and forward directly to Br. B. In this way that long afflicted family can be kept comfortable during “the day of their trial.”

The fourth Conference of the Central Association will be held at Marshall, on the first Wednesday and Thursday in October, where we expect a very large and interesting meeting; and I trust the friends will indulge me in suggesting, that it would be well to take up a collection for Br. Brown; and that the friends will please to come prepared accordingly. Am I not right, Br. C. S. Brown? Brethren, don't forget our suffering brother and his family;—to do good is the way to bless. H. B. S., Ed. pro. tem.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Philo's Card and Puff (for such the latter is) appears too much like a burlesque on a possibly excellent man and physician; and we certainly would have so regarded it, had it not been for the hand writing! We decline inserting them notwithstanding—the first, because we do not publish advertisements—the second, because we are decidedly opposed to all self-puffing except our own! We are sadly in want of communications, but they would be too dear if paid for in that way. We hope Philo will not be offended at our plainness—we mean him well, not ill.

We thank Juvenis, of Cambridge, Mass., for his articles. We shall have to correct some errors, caused doubtless by his want of consideration and hasty writing—but still we thank him. His article on “universal sensibility” we are not botanist enough to prepare correctly, and are certain it has errors in it; so, as its publication in its present shape, will not do him much credit as a botanist, and particularly as our “common sense” readers will hardly call the loadstone a sensitive thing, or possessed of sensibility, we had better omit it entirely. In fact, we think he has either mistaken the word, or has for it an unusual definition. A. B. G.

ADVANCE PAY SYSTEM.

In our catalogue of reasons for adopting the advance pay system last week, we named as a reason that we frequently were notified by Post Masters that subscribers neglected to take their papers from the office, and had left the country, etc. To show that such is the fact we will name a few instances that have happened since writing that article. The Post Master at Auburn informed us a few days since that Alfred Gould had not taken his paper from the office for some time past—said Gould is owing us for last year and thus far for the present, say $3.83—Post Master at Cold Spring Harbor says that E. Mosher does not take his paper from the office. “Believes he has moved away.” Owes us for the present year. P. M. at Canton, N. Y., says that Charles Clark does not take his paper from the office, said Clark owes us $4.50. We wish our agents in these places would attend to the immediate collection of these accounts.—We shall give these instances of fraud and dishonesty publicity as they occur hereafter, until the close of the present volume. It is really unpleasant for us to do so, but when we are used in this way, we shall adopt the alternative. G. & W.

INFORMATION WANTED.

Can any of our friends inform us anything concerning Rev. R. W. Cheeny, formerly of Bradford county, Pa., and more recently of Tompkins county, N. Y. I hold an account against him for considerable of an amount, and have repeatedly written to him respecting it to Pennsylvania and Tompkins county, and as I have received no answer to any of my letters I would like to be informed, by any one who knows, of his whereabouts, occupation and circumstances.

The same inquiries and for the same reasons I would wish to make respecting W. W. Cady, formerly of Frankfort, N. Y. John O. Hill, of Triangle, N. Y. B. N. and O. Freeman, of Ray, Mich. W. L. Palmer, of Cazenovia, and Luman Carpenter, of Oswego, N. Y.

D. SKINNER,
Assignee of accounts of O. Hutchinson, and of Grosh and Hutchinson.

N. B.—There are several other individuals to whom I have repeatedly written; and for similar reasons, who have paid no attention to the letters, respecting whom I shall make similar public inquiries soon, unless I hear from them; and—two or three Sunday Schools. D. S.

YELLOW FEVER AT NEW ORLEANS.—On Sunday, 10th instant, there were six new cases, two cures and four deaths. On Monday, sixteen new cases, five cures and four deaths. On Tuesday, fifteen new cases, five cures and six deaths. One of the students in the Charity Hospital has died of it, and sister Regis, another of the sisters of charity is not expected to recover.

THE ANTI-MORMONS assembled in Convention at Carthage, Ill., on 5th inst. Next day they resolved that if Gov. Ford would not give up Joe Smith to be tried in Missouri, they would, assisted by such aid as they could obtain. They also resolved to require of the Mormons, blood for blood; and agreed not to obey the Mormon county officers. A crisis is evidently at hand.

HEALTH OF RONDOUT.—The Kingston Journal says: “The sickness at Rondout has now entirely ceased.—We are truly happy that we can announce the fact. We hope that the momentary suspension of its business will be more than supplied by the increased activity of the season.”

LARGE GRAPES.—A citizen of Hudson, who presented a fine basket of white Muscatels at the last meeting of the Farmer's club, has one of the most splendid vines in the state. It has clusters measuring thirteen and a half inches in length, and fifteen inches in circumference. The original slip of this vine was accidentally obtained several years ago from an aged colored man, who occupied a piece of land on this island, about four or five miles from the City Hall, on the East River side. The land formerly belonged to a sea captain who had been a trader to the continent of Europe, and imported the vine. The original vine is probably still there, and should be taken care of; for, if it equals its offspring in Hudson, it is very valuable.—Sun.

COMMENDABLE BENEVOLENCE.—We understand that one of our New York ship agents supports over one hundred destitute immigrants upon a comfortable farm provided for them on Staten Island. These persons were recently brought out to this country, and having been taken sick on the passage, the agent provides for them at his own expense. The best medical skill is employed to attend upon them.

COUNTERFEITS ON THE HUDSON BANK.—Within a day or two past, it has been ascertained that a large amount of counterfeit bills on the Farmer's Bank of Hudson, of the denomination of $1, have been sent to this city for circulation. They are made payable on demand to no particular person, and are signed Elihu Gilford, President, and Henry Jenkins, Cashier, coarsely executed, and the signature of the President partly printed.—[Sun.]

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on first Sunday in October, by Br. SKINNER at Little Falls.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in October, by Br. GROSH at Little Falls—Br. SKINNER at Sullivan.

Br. J. T. GOODRICH will preach at Chenango Forks, on Monday evening, October 2d.

DEDICATION AND CONFERENCE.—The Universalist meeting house in Boston, Erie county, will be dedicated to the one living and true God, on Tuesday the 17th of October next. Br. S. R. Smith is expected to preach the dedication sermon. On the Wednesday and Thursday following the 17th—i. e., the 18th and 19th—a Conference of the Genesee Association will be held at the same place, and our friends generally are respectfully invited to attend, “especially our ministering brethren.” A committee will be in waiting at the church, to direct our friends from a distance to places of entertainment. D. ACKLEY, Standing Clerk.

The First Quarterly Conference of the Hudson River Association will be held at Braman's Corners, on the second Wednesday and following Thursday in October. Friends who come by the rail-road or canal, will be met at Fort Jackson, (opposite Amsterdam,) and conveyed to the Corners by our friends from that place.

J. A. ASPINWALL, Standing Clerk.

CONFERENCE.—The first Conference of the Otsego Association of Universalists will be held in the Baptist meeting house at Southville, town of Danube, Herkimer county, on the 2d Wednesday and Thursday (11th and 12th) of October. A cordial invitation is extended to all ministering brethren in and out of the Association. Br. Anderson wishes me to state on the word of a Scotchman, that he will see that they are taken proper care of, and remunerated too. Ministering brethren and friends will call, on their arrival at Southville, on Br. Richard Wilson, in the village, who will provide for them places of entertainment.

O. WHISTON, Standing Clerk.

NOTICE.—The Susquehanna Association of Universalists will hold its annual session on the first Wednesday and Thursday (4th and 5th) of October, at Brooklyn, Susquehanna county, at 9 o'clock, A. M. of the first day. We desire a punctual attendance of the delegates from the several societies within the bounds of the Association, and extend our call to all who do, and those who do not, take an interest in the meeting, to come. “Come one, come all;” our Brooklyn friends, you will find, are expecting you, where, rest assured, you will meet with a joyful reception. Friends from a distance will call at the church, where a committee will be in attendance to direct them to places of entertainment. J. R. MACK, Standing Clerk.

"THY WILL BE DONE."

O, Father! give that heart to me
Which strives in thought and deed to be Like Him, thy suffering Son;
Teach me to feel and humbly say,
That if this cup pass not away,
Thy will, not mine, be done.

When pain and sorrows bow my head
And every hope in life has fled
Save that immortal one:
If all afflictions are not o'er,
But others yet remain in store—
Still, let thy will be done.

ALICE GREY;

OR, THE INEBRIATE'S DAUGHTER.

BY MISS E. C. L. ***** OF NORWICH.

It was a bleak, dreary evening in March. The wind whistled mournfully, and a shower of mingled rain and sleet was falling upon the now almost deserted streets of the city of M. In a large and scantily furnished apartment, beside a cheerless fire sat Mrs. Grey, busily plying her needle. A lamp burned upon a small table near her, and opposite her sat a young girl, bending over her work, and apparently lost in thought.

"This is a wild night," said Mrs. Grey, breaking the deep silence which prevailed the apartment, and drawing her shawl still closer around her shoulders; "our fire is getting low, Alice, and it grows cold here very fast."

Alice laid aside her needle-work and stirred up the half-dying embers. The last fuel which they possessed was in the grate, and as the fire blazed with a sickly glare, she sighed, and drew a low chair, on which her little brother Willie sat, still closer to her, and rested his curly head upon her lap.

"Will father come to-night?" asked Willie, looking up inquiringly into her face.

Alice did not reply, but Willie saw that her eyes were filled with tears as she resumed her work, and he said no more.

"Lay aside your work for to-night, Alice," said Mrs. Grey, "you look pale, and your eyes are heavy; we can rise early to-morrow morning, and finish the dress before Mrs. Ashton sends for it."

"She wants it at nine o'clock," said Alice; "I am afraid that it will not be possible for us to finish it so early."

"We can try," said Mrs. Grey, in a tone of cheerfulness: "you know we can work much faster by the bright light of the sun, than by this dim lamp."

"Yes, mother, and my head will not ache so badly as it does now; and if we get it done so that Mrs. Ashton will not be disappointed, perhaps she will furnish us with constant employment."

"No, she said that she had no more for us, after we finished this."

"Nor Mrs. Weston?" said Alice inquiringly.

"Mrs. Weston's sewing was already engaged when I applied," said Mrs. Grey, "and Mrs. Allyn has no more at present; every thing looks dark in future, Alice."

"Yes mother, but I think there are brighter days in store for us."

"If father would only sign the Temperance Pledge!" said Willie, raising his dark eyes to Mrs. Grey's face, "that would make you happy, wouldn't it mother?"

"Yes, Willie, that would make us all happy," she replied with a sigh.

At this instant a heavy step was heard in the adjoining passage.

"He is coming!" whispered Willie, as he instinctively crept closer to his mother and sister.

The door opened, and a man past the middle age, entered. He took in silence the chair which Alice offered him, and cast his eyes around the apartment.

"What! no fire!" he said at length; "get some more wood, Alice."

"There is no more, father," replied Alice, as she placed his scanty supper upon the table, and arranged it with care.

"There, that will do," said Mr. Grey, as he drew his chair toward the table. "Now get your cloak, Alice; you must go over to Mr. Osborne's to-night."

"Not to-night, William?" said Mrs. Grey, mildly.

"Yes, to-night; she can go now, as well as any time, and this letter must be sent to-night."

Mrs. Grey knew it would be of no use to say more, and Alice, taking the letter from her father's hand, tied on her cloak and hood to depart.

"Wrap your cloak closely around you, Alice," said Mrs. Grey, as she held the lamp for her daughter to descend the ruinous flight of stairs that led from their humble abode into the open court below.

Alice obeyed, and drawing her hood still closer over her face, walked with light steps, but a heavy heart, along the icy pavements. The moon, struggling through the clouds, gave a faint light, barely sufficient to render objects visible. Every thing looked gloomy and cheerless, and accorded well with the feelings of Alice Grey. She was thinking of other days, when her father was in affluent circumstances, and their home was a bright and happy one. But now, her father was a drunkard, and her mother's cheeks were pale and wan; even little Willie's laugh had lost its music.

"We are indeed wretched," thought she, as she reached Mr. Osborne's door, and paused to take breath. A bright light was shining through the half-closed blinds, and Alice heard the sound of happy voices, as she gently tapped at the door. It was opened by Mr. Osborne, who uttered an exclamation of surprise at seeing Alice there.

"Come in my child," he said kindly, "this is a bitter storm, and you look cold and wet."

Alice followed him into the pleasant parlor, where the family were assembled, and Mrs. Osborne placed a chair for her beside the bright fire.

"No, take my seat," cried little Ellen, springing from her chair; "mine is the warmest corner, and you can dry your feet best here."

Alice smiled as she accepted the proffered seat, but her eyes instantly filled with tears, as she heard Ellen whisper to her sister Julia, in a voice she did not intend should be heard by any one else, "Look at her shoes, Julia; they are full of holes; her father is a drunkard, isn't he?"

A reproving look from Julia hushed the little prattler, who, perceiving that Alice heard her words, ran to her, and threw her arms around her neck, exclaiming—

"You must not look sorry; I did not mean any harm—indeed I did not."

"You have not done any harm," said Alice, resuming her usual placidity, and drawing her father's letter from her bosom.

Mr. Osborne took it, and cast his eyes over the contents. Alice, who was eagerly watching his countenance, perceived a smile of pleasure pass over it, as he read, and he unconsciously murmured—"It can not be that he is sincere in all this, it would be a happy thing if he were."

"What can it be?" thought Alice, as he folded the letter and placed it in his pocket.

"Tell your father, Alice, that I will call upon him early to-morrow morning, and will assist him all that is in my power; and if he is really sincere, as I should judge from the letter, there are bright days in store for you all."

A thrill of joy shot through the heart of the inebriate's daughter, and she unconsciously murmured a prayer that it be so. At this moment Mrs. Osborne entered. She had been filling a large basket with articles for Mrs. Grey, whom she had known in better days, and whom she highly esteemed. Julia, too, had prepared a present for Alice; and little Ellen slyly slipped into her hand, a basket of nuts, for Willie. With a much lighter heart, Alice Grey retraced her steps to her parent's dwelling.

"All will yet be well," thought she, "the clouds that overhang our future path will disappear, and a bright sky lies beyond."

The clock struck nine as she ascended the stairs, and opened the door of her father's humble abode. Her mother was still engaged with her needle-work, and her father sat leaning his head upon the table. He arose as she entered, saying, "Well Alice, what did Mr. Osborne say?"

Alice related what had passed, to which Mr. Grey listened in silence, and again resting his head upon the table, seemed unconscious of what was passing around. The next morning, when Alice arose, she was surprised to find a bright fire which her father had kindled, with some wood which he had procured. He soon entered, and Alice observed that there was a marked difference in his appearance from what she had been accustomed to see.

"You work too hard, Mary," said he, turning to his wife, "you are killing yourself by such untiring labor; cheer up, our prospects are brighter than they have been for years."

A gleam of hope filled Mrs. Grey's heart. His voice was kinder than it had been for a long time, and she raised her eyes with a smile of joy, as she said, "How so, William?"

"I am a WASHINGTONIAN!" replied Mr. Grey, "I have this morning signed the PLEDGE, and I pray that I may never break it."

Mrs. Grey uttered an exclamation of joy, while Alice could scarcely express her happiness. Willie clapped his hands, exclaiming,

"Have you, father, have you signed the pledge? and I can sit upon your knee now, father, and you won't be cross again?"

Mr. Grey returned his little son's caresses, and Willie seemed perfectly happy, now that his father was indeed a Washingtonian.

"We shan't be cold and hungry any more, mother," said he, "and you and Alice won't have to sit up all night now, to work for any body."

"I should never have signed, had it not been for the faithful efforts of a few members of the Temperance Society," said Mr. Grey; "long have they been endeavoring to persuade me to abandon my wretched course, but so strongly was I bound by the chains of Intemperance, that it cost many a struggle to be free; last night, when I saw the wretchedness which I had brought upon my family, and saw you toiling by the light of a dim lamp, I resolved to abandon my wicked course; lest I should yield to temptation and break my resolution, I sent Alice with a letter to Mr. Osborne last night; I would not go myself—shame prevented me; he came to see me this morning, and now my name is upon the Temperance Pledge, and I hope, Mary, with the blessing of God, to be an altered man."

There were happy hearts that day, in the lowly and humble abode of Mr. Grey. His friend Mr. Osborne had furnished him with money to purchase necessary articles for his family. Comfort once more was theirs, and plenty crowned their board. Weeks passed on, and still Mr. Grey was "firm as the mountain oak" in his determination to touch not and taste not "the abominable thing." His family were removed to a neat and pretty dwelling, and Mr. Grey, who was naturally a man of fine talents, entered into business with every prospect of success. Mrs. Grey was no longer obliged to toil night and day; and Alice was again the light-hearted, happy girl of former days. She was no longer shunned as the "drunkard's daughter," but was restored again to the society in which she formerly moved. Little Willie often declared with pride, that his father was a Washingtonian, and was always kind to him now. Mrs. Grey and Alice could now sincerely say, "success to the cause of Temperance! It is indeed a glorious cause; one that heals the heart-broken, and brings plenty, peace and happiness."

A REVIEW

Of the course of conduct pursued by Rev. H. Fraser, Pastor of the Presbyterian church at Branchport—relative to his treatment of Universalism.

[Concluded from our last.]

Whether all or any of his leisure hours were taken up in perusing Edwards and Chauncey, is not certain, although he came armed with the panoply of the former. The night previous, to him, he confessed, was a sleepless one; and I have not the hardness of heart not to commiserate his anxious condition during the day; inasmuch as added to other toils, business compelled him to visit Penn Yan, through moisture and mud. It is said that a brother clergyman resides there, though I have never seen him; and probably it might not be safe for me to conjecture that Mr. Fraser was not seeking advice in the dilemma. This would be calling in question his confidence and courage.

But the night at length came, and an audience assembled with Mr. F. and myself. After a few preliminary remarks by each of us, I called for proposals with regard to the intended discussion.—Mr. F. first presented the question, "Is all punishment inflicted in this life? Or is there any punishment to be inflicted in the future life, for sins committed in this?" I objected to both of these, and gave my reasons. But he insisted upon my accepting, and began to intimate cowardice on my part. I proved to him that neither of his questions affected the main points of difference in our opinions. We wanted questions that would confine us to a discussion on the two great doctrines—endless punishment and final universal salvation.—Partialism and Universalism. But, no; he was unwilling to come up to this close work. Notwithstanding I represented the unfairness and pointlessness of his questions and called upon him repeatedly to present something in his defence—he continued obstinate, and did not attempt to give any plausible reason to justify himself. His arguments consisted in a Pharisaical consciousness of his own dignity, contracted features, writhing actions, contemptuous retorts, and in winking at a neighbor, whenever he imagined himself funny. Without being able to afford a particle of proof, he maintained that I had challenged him to discuss the question of present punishment. And with all the self-possession of hard faced bigotry, he began to proclaim a victory, taking it for granted that a man may be justly branded as a coward, for not having the simplicity to accept of all the proposals—no matter how mean or unfair—which his opponent might offer! If this is Mr. Fraser's honorable mode of judgment (?) I would advise him to suspend it unless he can communicate entirely with those who are ignorant enough to credit the priesthood for infallibility.

As he asked me with regard to my belief respecting present punishment, I answered him candidly; and in return asked him if he believed in endless punishment. He replied affirmatively, of course—though he said that he did not know as he had ever preached on that subject! It is hoped that he never has, and never will. And yet it is one of the most remarkable circumstances that ever came to my knowledge—a Presbyterian preacher, believing in eternal election and endless damnation, and never warn his hearers of the latter—never preach his honest belief!

Antiously waiting to hear Mr. F.'s next proposal, I finally accepted the question relative to future-life punishments—throwing him upon the affirmative—with an expressed understanding from him, that he believed that that punishment would be endless. My acceptance produced no little astonishment and alarm in the mind of the gentleman, and in his frustration he began to accuse me of having some underhanded design. I told him to read his own question—and that was what I had agreed upon, providing his further proposals were reasonable. With trembling anxiety he seized the paper to be satisfied that I could take no cunning advantage, assuming the discipleship which he had attributed to me. This ended the matter.

And now comes the second offer. Mr. Fraser proposed to have a written discussion. And how? Why he would first read an essay two hours long, and in that time finish up on his side of the question—leaving me to answer at leisure, and occupy as much time as I pleased. The fire of Mr. F.'s courage was kindled in his letter, and here it began to go out in vapor and smoke. He could not take the Bible in his hand, and meet, face to face, for an open investigation—he must retire into his closet for a month or less and work out an essay—he said "he could not talk extemporaneously as fast as some folks." Owing to the peculiarity of my friend's notions of debate, I frankly declined accepting his long-winded proposal. As the evening, by this time, was far advanced, and as the audience were anxious to retire, some gentlemen called for the reading of the correspondence which had taken place between Mr. F. and myself. They had called for the same about an hour before. But my correspondent stated that he could not wait then—he was fatigued, had family affairs to attend to, had been deprived of sleep, etc. Accordingly the reading was deferred. His anxiety to depart, abated then, and he tarried an hour afterwards—until the reading was urged again, and was about to begin, when he took up a line of march, bidding good evening, after having received a promise that I would call on him in the morning.

In the morning I sent him a note requesting that we should finish our meeting for arrangement, where we began, before the same audience—at the place he first proposed—in the evening. Accordingly I appeared with the audience at the appointed time and place. And my brave opponent, the anticipated exterminator of Universalism—came not! After waiting some time, the last "vapors" of his "courage" came in the form of another letter—which I immediately read to the audience. An individual who had the least decency, or respect for himself, would deem the character of that letter sufficiently mean, unchristian and filthy, to cut off all farther dealings with the author. I could not make up my mind to gratify his swinish, or bragging propensity by further notice.

After representing me as "dangling in inglorious suspense," "sueing for a little grace," he breaks forth in pitiful "commiseration of my sad condition." With regard to the question, he says, "You may take your own time to decide, and stand like the ass between two hay stacks, till he loses all stomach for either." While I would not be ungrateful for these generous tokens of truthfulness, charity and condescension on the part of my refined friend, I would respectfully inform him that my acquaintance with the gentlemanly animal he names, is not sufficient to enter into the sympathies of their stomachs, as he does. But suppose I allow part of the fable for a moment—that part which relates to the two hay stacks, between which I stand. By these two heaps of "hay," I suppose he means the two propositions which he has made—very properly compared to hay. These stacks are of Mr. F.'s building. Now the apostle Paul says—and my friend will take him as good authority—that "if any man build upon the true foundation," wood, HAY, stubble, etc., "every man's works shall be made manifest; for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work, of what sort it is." Mr. F.'s fable confesses that his is "hay"—he has manifested it—the day light of truth declares it to this community—it has been revealed in his conduct, when brought to the fiery ordeal of investigation—revealed in the fiery zeal of his first letter and first attempt to crush Universalism—and demonstration is doubled as we behold the last "vapors" or smoke of his "courage," going up in the letter before me, from the decayed ashes of his "two hay stacks!" So much for his elegant fable.

But farther. "In regard to the time," he says, "after giving me," (Mr. F.) "two hours to present my arguments, he" (meaning me) "may occupy his amount of time—even till doom's day—to refute them." Here is his condescension again.—Mr. F. may preach and present arguments as long as he pleases, without any argument on my part, at any time—and perhaps I may have the same privilege without his permission. And yet this is his discussion!

Farther: "in regard to the place of discussion, (he says) what thou doest here in Jerusalem, thou must do also in Jericho. It must commence in the synagogue where you reside, and be carried up from thence, to the great Sanhedrim that have been accustomed from time to time to hold their jubilee on these heights of Zion. These are the very honorable terms which I would most respectfully concede to you." And "I would most respectfully" add—"these are the honorable terms" proposed by a minister who professes to be a disciple of truth, candor, charity, love and sincerity—who professes to believe that Universalists are in danger of endless damnation—professes that it is possible for him to convert and save them from error and death—professes that in "a few minutes" he can "convince the young man of his error"—and who professes to confide in, and respect, his Universalist neighbors!!!

After making a few more flourishes—hurling out the most contemptuous and despicable slurs upon myself and the Universalists of Branchport—and dealing out a storm of impious irony, sharpened by his chagrin, disappointed hopes, embittered malice, fallen pride and greatness—he has the cold audacity, unparalleled hypocrisy, and unprovoked fool-hardiness to close in the following bloodlessly triumphant strain: "but if in despite of better counsel, you continue your retreat, then I must bid you an affectionate adieu in the language of the great Prince of poets,

If thou dost but consent
To this most dastard act, do but despair;
And if thou wantest a cord, the smallest thread
That ever spider twisted from her womb
Will serve to strangle thee; a rush will be
A beam to hang thee on: or wouldst thou drown thyself,
Put but a little water in a spoon,
And it shall be as all the ocean;
Enough to stifle such a pigmy in!

Yours truly, H. FRASER."

Having but little taste for such polite literature, and little acquaintance with such affectionate adieus as this, I do not know as I shall be better able to accommodate the taste of my affectionate friend, than by returning him a very natural parody "on the great Prince of poets."

If thou didst but consent
To own this vaunting spleen, pray shame thyself;
And if thou wantest a cord, the yarn of fibs
That thou hast spun from out thy self-conceited brain,
Will serve to strangle thee; or thou mightst take
The weakest of thy broken pledges; or take
A spear of thine own "hay;" and on thy stack-poles hang,

Dress'd in a priestly gown, to keep the crows away,
And swing for public note; or would'st thou drown thyself,
Draw but a little sap from out thy head,
And put it in the sharpened pen,
And it shall be as all the ocean,
Enough to stifle such a giant in,
Quench all thy fiery, phosphorescent rage,
Thy harmless wrath, and smoking valor too.

If Mr. Fraser needs any more from Shakspeare, he may apply to his own conscience, that fearful soliloquy of Richard III, which says,
"My conscience hath a thousand several tongues,
And every tongue brings in a several tale,
And every tale condemns me for a villain."

Perhaps when thus applied, there is as much truth as poetry in the passage. Let all the steps which he has taken to hinder the progress of truth and free inquiry, be retraced, and in what can he acquit himself as having acted the part of an honorable, honest, charitable Christian? Making every possible allowance, to say the least, his conduct has been such as to baffle description in the use of ordinary language—and I have merely followed it through, that it might speak for itself, and tell a "several tale" of shame and condemnation. In flattering himself that he might trample upon Universalism with impunity, and rail out in vain glory against one of its humble advocates, he has been sadly deceived, and must now eat of the fruits of his own doings. If his own rashness compels him to leave a place where his neighbors have lost all confidence in him, and where he is not able to walk out and hold up his head in vindication of his shame, it is presumed that he will carry with him a lesson of experience, to warn him against volunteering in a career of abuse against Universalists.

I bid him an adieu with no malice or unkindness. His pretensions, his conduct, and the partial principles upon which it has been based; I despise; but as a man, a brother, I love him, pity him, and forgive all his evil intentions against me and the Gospel I love, fully believing that all will result in good, and the mouth of man praise the Lord. I would affectionately exhort him to consider the evil of his ways, and to repent, with full purpose of heart to hereafter follow the path of honesty, charity and peace.

I conclude by remarking, that here again we have further evidence of the weakness of Partialism—the doctrine of endless misery—and the unwillingness and inability of its professed advocates to defend it in fair and open investigation. Allowing them sincerity in their belief, may we not marvel exceedingly that they have not sufficient confidence, resolution and zeal to come up in honorable defence!

CARD!

DEAR BR. GROSH:—I wish through the Magazine and Advocate, to express my sincere and hearty thanks to my friends, far and near, who have, for years, so unremittingly and so bountifully supplied the temporal wants of myself and family.—While I live my heart will overflow with gratitude towards such friends indeed. May God of his abundant goodness, bless them both temporally and spiritually; and at last crown them with a ransomed universe, with immortality and eternal life.

C. B. BROWN.

Hastings, Oswego co., Sept. 28th, 1843.

Accompanying the above card is the following letter, which we will take the liberty of inserting here for the information of our readers; hoping also that it may move them to deeds of universal benevolence to our afflicted and suffering brother.

H. B. S.

DEAR BROTHER—The distressed and helpless situation in which I have been so long placed, is my only apology (if one is needed) for not again expressing my thanks for the persevering liberality of my numerous friends, who have so long supplied my wants. For a few weeks past, I think I have been a little more comfortable, although I can not now sit up, or help myself in the least, except I have the use of both my hands. How much longer I am to remain in this distressed and severely painful condition, God only knows. Oh, for a double portion of his spirit, to inspire me with patience to suffer and do his will. It is very fatiguing for me to write, and I must close. God bless you.

Affectionately Yours, C. B. BROWN.

IMPORTANT FACTS,

Concerning the sect, every where spoken against.

The word sect, in the Scriptures, means the same as heresy. "This sect" means "this heresy," or the people who espouse this heresy—the Christian religion.

Heresy was not originally employed in a bad or reproachful acceptance. The word "heresy" comes from the verb, to choose; and certainly no one should be reproached for making choice according to the best of his ability. The use of the word is to be learned by the connexion. When St. Paul says, 1 Cor. xi: 19, "There must be heresies among you," he evidently meant, that there would be sects and parties, entertaining different and conflicting opinions. But, when in Gal. v: 20, he speaks of the works of the flesh, and connects heresies with evil fruits, thus—"seditions, heresies, envyings," there can be no mistake but that he uses the word in a reproachful sense, on account of the character and conduct of those of whom he was speaking. And the "heretic," spoken of in Titus iii: 10, 11, was one who was obstinately attached to Judaism; "he is subverted and sinneth; being condemned of himself." Hence, he was to be rejected according to his known character.

So long as it is admitted that men have a right to examine and decide, and consequently, choose, for themselves in matters of religion, so long it must also be allowed, that there is no harm in belonging to a sect, or denomination of professors of similar faith or opinion. No one need mistake the meaning of the apostle, when he speaks of "damnable heresies," 2 Peter ii: 1. It consisted "in denying the Lord that bought them." This shows that heresy does not of itself imply any thing "damnable," because, if it did, why employ that frightful epithet? At the close of a long and learned article on this subject Dr. Campbell judiciously observes that, "No person who in the spirit of candor and charity adheres to that which to the best of his judgment is right, though in this opinion he should be mistaken, is in the Scripture sense either scismatic or heretic;" and be, on the contrary, whatever sect he belongs to, is more entitled to those odious appellations, who is most apt to throw the imputation on others." Good and true.

The Sadducees were a sect, Acts v: 17. But the Pharisees, the most zealous and respectable class of Jewish religionists, chose a different way—separated from the Sadducees, and became a sect, distinct sect—they were Separatists. Saul of Tarsus belonged to this heresy.

When certain people became dissatisfied with their leaders—"Jesus of Nazareth"—they separated from the religion in which they were educated, and of course were called a sect—a heresy. Paul was accused of being a ring-leader among "the sect of the Nazarenes," i. e., the followers of Jesus. Acts xxiv: 5. This heresy was every where spoken against. But the great apostle to the Gentiles was not ashamed of the name. Acts xxiv: 14.—The word heresy came to imply something reproachful, by the use made of it by the Catholics. They assumed that they were the Church—the only true Christians—and that all who differed from them, were infidel heretics! All sects, save their own, were denounced, as anti-christian and hell-deserving. Hence the odium attached to heresy.

It is not unfrequently the case, that a people get a sectarian name by accident rather than choice.—Names sometimes bear analogy to sentiment, sometimes to forms, leaders, etc., etc.

The word Universalist, for instance, has its rise from a particular doctrine embraced; the name Congregationalist, from its relation to church government; Methodist, the mode and manner of living and acting; Calvinian, Arminian, Lutheran, etc., to the several men, who were distinguished leaders in the several systems bearing their names.

The early Christians who believed in the salvation of all men, were not called Universalists. As the Church became corrupt, and embraced cruel dogmas, those who did not follow, but kept along in the even tenor of their way, were called, "Heretical Doctors," "Origenists," and the like. Even in the times of the Reformation by Luther, "the German Baptists," were known to believe in Universalism, without incurring the reproach of the name. The Anabaptists had espoused the same views, previous to that time, without losing their caste.

The name "Universalist," we believe, was first used, in the 16th century, to designate those who believed in the universality of the atonement, and the possibility of the salvation of all men; those, embracing sentiments afterward known by the name of Arminianism. So that, if there be any reproach in the name, it must be set to the account of those who were the occasion of its use.

But, when a people arose in the midst of the sects, who profess to believe that all men will be saved, and held separate worship, in which this tenet was advanced, they were called by their opposers, "Universalists," and persecuted accordingly.

The reason of our having a particular Creed, in this country, is not known to so many as it should be.

As the Universalists agreed with Congregationalists, in regard to Church government, they could not be legally distinguished from them, so as to avoid paying taxes to support the then "standing order" of Priests, until they became a separate denomination, and made a formal Profession of Faith.

In New Hampshire they were so taxed, and the Supreme Court decided in favor of the Congregationalists, as late, we think, as 1803. To obviate this difficulty, which had been anticipated, a "Profession of Faith" was presented by the committee, previously appointed for that purpose, and adopted by the General Convention, holden at Winchester, N. H. The members of the committee were Zebulon Streeter, George Richards, Hosea Ballou, Zephaniah Lathrop and Walter Ferris: the Profession was composed by the last on the committee. There were some believers in the Trinity and in future punishment on the committee, and yet all could cordially agree to the Articles presented. They are as follows:

"PROFESSION OF FAITH."

Article 1. We believe that the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, contain a revelation of the character of God, and of the duty, interest and final destination of mankind.

Art. 2. We believe there is One God, whose nature is Love, revealed in One Lord Jesus Christ, by one Holy Spirit of Grace, who will finally restore the whole human family to holiness and happiness.

"Art. 3. We believe that holiness and true happiness are inseparably connected; and that believers ought to maintain order, and practise good works, for these things are good and profitable unto men."

This admirable production, which was absolutely necessary to save a whole denomination from the avaricious clutches of the priesthood of that day, has never been altered by the Convention, and probably, never will be. No particular Society or Church, however, is under obligation to adopt it.

It will be perceived then, that Universalists were under the necessity of adopting some distinguishing name, and of forming, and subscribing to, a particular Profession of Faith, generally declarative of their general system of sentiments.

They did it in good faith, and to save their lean pockets from the legal fingers, which, a penurious and grasping clergy had so feed, as to make them itch to plunge therein, and seize the last shilling which industry had acquired and prudence saved for the benefit of a needy family.

Now, for myself, though I am not particularly attached to sectarian names, or rather denominational names, nor desirous of having any creed, save the Bible, I can see no impropriety, situated as we are in the midst of various denominations, of different faiths in many or some important respects, in retaining our denominational character, and openly making a Profession of our Faith, accordingly. Still, I would by no means be tenacious, nor intentionally do any thing to disturb the harmony of true religious feeling and experience, or hinder the progress of the work of grace in the heart and life of all who love the cause of pure and undefiled religion.—Universalist Watchman.

ANECDOTE OF JOHN MURRAY.

There stood formerly, on the spot now occupied in School-street, Boston, by the Universalist Church, (Mr. Ballou's) a small chapel with one gallery in front, and another on the left side of the pulpit, which was semicircular, built by some of the Hugonots, who fled from France at the time of the repeal of the edict of Nantz, with their minister, Mr. La Massa; and by them it was occupied for many years. With some of their descendants I am personally intimate. One after another died; and their children gave up their worship, and mixed with other societies. The doors were of course, closed for a long time. At length, Mr. William Crosswell, a blind man, (whom I well recollect, and who has at this moment, a son bearing the same name, and a daughter, likewise, residing in the same house with him, somewhere at the south part of the city,) who was called in those days a new light preacher, was there for a long time within my remembrance. At length there came along the late Mr. John Murray, the Universalist, (Crosswell being old,) and he preached there, for a time, to any audience he could collect. He was earnestly opposed by the ministers in and about Boston, amongst whom the Rev. Mr. Bacon, then minister of the old South church, distinguished himself. It having been given out, that Murray was to preach one evening, in Father Crosswell's meeting-house, Mr. Bacon in his zeal went to hear him, in order to answer him after his sermon. As soon as Murray had finished, Bacon stepped up two or three stairs of the pulpit, and called out,—“All that Murray has said is a delusion. I beg the people to stop and I will prove it to them.” Amongst the audience, there were several of Mr. Bacon's parish, who attended in order to “put down Murray.”—Murray instantly stepped to the pulpit door, opened it, and begged him to walk in, which he peremptorily declined; not willing to stand even in the same desk with Murray, however, earnestly repeated his request, saying,—“The people can hear you much better, Mr. Bacon, from the pulpit, than they can from that stair.” Bacon, however, still declined. After he had finished, Murray rejoined, and excited great laughter, (for he was a great wit) at Mr. Bacon's expense, who grew very angry, and attempted a second reply; to which Murray instantly rejoined, producing increased laughter at Bacon. Bacon's friends were irritated, and ran to an old woman's huxter-shop, who occupied the next building, bought all her eggs, carried them into the church, and threw them at Murray, as he stood in the pulpit.—He humorously replied,—“Well, my dear friends, these are moving arguments; but, I must own, at the same time, I have never been so fully treated with Bacon and eggs, before in all my life.”—at the same time retiring from the pulpit. This brought a roar of laughter on Mr. Bacon, who left the church, and never afterwards interfered with Mr. Murray.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on the 28th ult., by Rev. H. B. Soutle, Mr. WILLIAM B. TAYLOR, to Miss ELIZABETH HERRINGTON, all of this city.

At German Flats, on the 28th ult., by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. JACOB H. CHISHOLM, to Miss APPHIA R. MERRY, both of that place.

At St. Johnsville, September 18th, by Rev. J. D. Hicks,

Mr. JOSEPH M. FISH to Miss ARMINTHA COUNTRYMAN, both of Minden, Montgomery county.

In Norway, September 24th, by the same, Mr. GEORGE BENCHLEY to Miss MARY GIBSON, both of Ohio, Herkimer county.

DEATHS.

In Columbia, Mich., August 14th, Mr. ASAHEL KNIGHT, of inflammation of the brain, aged 60 years. Mr. Knight had long been a believer in the doctrine of a world's salvation, and continued strong in the faith till the last. The consolation of the Gospel was tendered to the surviving relatives and friends by the writer. E. GAGE.

At Buffalo, on the 24th of September, after a short but distressing sickness, of bilious fever, Mrs. SARAH consort of Mr. Jacob Myers, of German Flats, aged 38 years. As long as reason remained she continued firm and unshaken in the faith she had held in health, of the great and glorious doctrine of the final restoration of all intelligences to holiness and happiness through the great Redeemer, and found its power all-sustaining and comforting in the hour of her trial, and when conscious that the hour of her death was rapidly approaching. She has left a husband and one son most deeply bereaved by her sudden death, but neither comfortless nor hopeless in regard to the future. They accompanied her lifeless body, by rail road, to German Flats, where her remains were deposited with those of her departed kindred, and on the 28th a sermon delivered in the Union church at that place, by the writer of this notice, to the afflicted family and a numerous circle of friends and neighbors of the deceased, from Job xv: 11. D. S.

In Sharon, September 5th, BARNABAS ELDERIDGE, in the 75th year of his age. The funeral was attended on the 8th, at the Universalist church in Sharon, and a discourse by the writer, to a large and attentive congregation. Br. Eldridge was a Universalist, and he that knows what constitutes one, knows what Br. E. was. So he lived and so he died, rejoicing in the truth and the fruits of righteousness; he was one of the first settlers in that country, and will long be remembered by its inhabitants with feelings of respect. ## THE MEETING.

BY SCHILLER.

I see her still, with many a fair one nigh,
Of every fair the stateliest shape appear:
Like a lone sun she shone upon my eye—
I stood afar, and durst not venture near.
Seized, as her presence brighten'd round me, by
The trembling passion of voluptuous fear,
Yet, swift, as borne upon some hurrying wing,
The impulse snatch'd me, and I struck the string!

What then I felt—what sung—my memory hence
From that wild moment would in vain invoke—
It was the life of some discover'd sense
That in the heart's divine emotion spoke;
Long years imprison'd, and escaping thence
From every chain, the soul enchanted broke,
And found a music in its own deep core,
Its holiest, deepest deep, unguess'd before.

Like melody long hush'd, and lost in space,
Back to its home the breathing spirit came:
I look'd and saw upon that angel face
The fair love circled with the modest shame;
I heard (and heaven descended on the place)
Low-whisper'd words a charmed truth proclaim—
Save in thy choral hymns, O spirit-shore,
Ne'er may I hear such thrilling sweetness more!

"I know the worth within the heart which sighs,
Yet shuns, the modest sorrow to declare;
And what rude Fortune niggardly denies,
Love to the noble can with love repair.
The lowly have the loftiest destinies;
Love only culls the flower that love should wear;
And ne'er in vain for love's rich gifts, shall yearn
The heart that feels their wealth—and can return!"

ATTACHMENT.

A STORY OF LOVE AND DEBT.

A curious anecdote was once related to us, with name of person, and place and the date of the event, which we shall repeat for the benefit of the rising generation, who, in their haste to carry out their views, may commit some mistake whose effect will be permanent.

Mr. Rhodes was the High Sheriff of — county, Massachusetts; and his good name, inherited from the father, and cherished by the son, made him not only popular as an officer, but rather wealthy as a man. Why Mr. Rhodes had never got married, the ladies could not ascertain, though they talked the matter over and over very often; but almost all said there must have been some cause in his youth, (Mr. Rhodes was thirty-five, at least,) which was known only to himself, and perhaps one other.

"Some disappointment," said Miss Anna, a young lady who thought it wrong that gentlemen should be disappointed; "some fatal disappointment."

"Not at all," said her maiden aunt, "not at all; nobody ever thought that Mr. R. had courage enough to offer himself to a lady. He is so modest, that I should like to see him make a proposal."

"No doubt of it, aunt, no doubt of it; and to hear him, too," said Anna.

"Your father and I," said Anna's mother, "once thought that Mr. Rhodes would certainly marry Miss Susan Morgan, who then lived in the neighborhood."

"Was he accepted by Miss Morgan?" asked Anna.
"I don't believe she ever had an offer," said aunt Arabella.

"Perhaps not," said Mrs. Wilton, "but she certainly deserved one from Mr. Rhodes; and I have frequently thought that, during services in church, he was about to make proposals before all the congregation, as he kept his eye continually on her."

"Do you think," asked Anna, "that Miss Morgan was as fond of him as he appeared to be of her?"

"She certainly did not take the same means of showing her feelings," said Mrs. Wilton, "for she never looked at him in church, and seemed to blush when, by any means, she discovered that others had noticed his gazing upon her."

"I should think," said Anna, partly aside, "that a man like Mr. Rhodes would not lack confidence to address a lady, especially if she was conscious of her own feelings, and of his infirmity."

Mrs. W. smiled, and aunt Arabella was about to say that no lady should ever evince her feelings under such circumstances, when Mrs. Wilton remarked that once when she had joked Miss Morgan upon her conquest, she rather pettishly replied, "that she may have subdued him, but he had never acknowledged her power."

"Conquest and possession did not go together then," said Anna.

"Well, is this attachment the cause of Mr. Rhodes' single condition? Was there no one else at whom he could look at in church, who would be likely to look at him also?" said Anna, nodding towards her aunt.

"No," said aunt A., with a hearty smile, "none in the pew to which you allude. I at least was too strongly impressed with the force of the tenth commandment, 'thou shalt not covet thy neighbors ox, nor his ass,' ever to be looking over Miss Morgan at Mr. Rhodes."

One morning Mr. Rhodes was sitting in his office, when one of the deputies read off a list of executions and attachments, which he had in hand to serve, and among them was one against a lady at a short distance. The amount was not great, but enough to bring distress upon a family.

"Let me take that," said the Sheriff, with some feeling; "it is out of your walk, and I will drive to the residence of the person to-morrow morning."

The modest vehicle of the officer stopped at the door of a neat dwelling house in a retired, delightful situation, where all things told of taste and economy. The Sheriff opened the gate, ascended the steps of the house, and asked if Miss Morgan was at home.

The servant answered in the affirmative.

As Mr. Rhodes passed along the hall he thought over the part he had to perform—how he should introduce the subject—how, if the debt should prove to be onerous, he should contrive to lighten the burden by his own abilities; and when he reached the door, he had coned his salutation to the lady, and his opening speech on the subject of his official call.

The servant opened the door—Mr. Rhodes entered with a bow. He blushed, hesitated, and at length took a seat, to which Miss Morgan directed him by a graceful turn of her hand.

After a few moments' hesitancy, Mr. Rhodes felt that it was his business to open a conversation that would explain the object of his visit; so he offered by way of preface, a few remarks upon the coldness of the spring.

"Yes," said Miss Morgan; "but yet cold as the weather has been, and even notwithstanding a few frosts, you see the trees have their richest foliage, and the flowers are luxuriant."

"True," said Mr. Rhodes; "it seems that though there may be a great deal of coldness, that nature will have her own way, and, in time, will assert her prerogative, late, perhaps, Miss Morgan, but still the same."

Mr. Rhodes felt rather startled at his own speech, and looking up, was infinitely astonished to see that Miss Morgan was blushing like one of the roses that was hanging against the window.

"We are always pleased," said Miss M., "to see what we admire breaking through the chilling influences by which they have been restrained, and satisfying our hopes of their ultimate disclosure."

Miss Morgan was looking directly towards the bush on which three roses were clustering in a most gorgeous richness.

Mr. Rhodes put his hand into his pocket, and felt of the official papers, to gather a little courage from their contact.

"I have," said Mr. Rhodes, "an attachment."

Miss Morgan this time lent blushes to the rose.

"The attachment, Miss Morgan, is of a distant date, and I felt that too much time had already elapsed; that indeed, instead of entrusting it, as I might have done, to another, I thought that in a matter of so much delicacy, it would be proper for me to come in person."

"For me, Mr. Rhodes? the attachment for me?"

"As I was saying, Miss Morgan, the attachment I have; and I felt it a matter of delicacy to come in person, thinking that my own means might be considered, if there was a deficiency in the value of the property."

"Mr. Rhodes, you seem to be rather enigmatical."

"I, nevertheless," said Mr. R., "mean to speak very plainly, when I say that with reference to this attachment, Miss Morgan, should you honor me so far as to accept my proposition, my pecuniary means would be devoted to the—to the attachment."

"I was," said Miss Morgan. "wholly unprepared for this."

"I was afraid that was the case," said Mr. Rhodes, "and therefore I thought it more delicate to make the offer in person."

"You are very considerate, Mr. Rhodes."

"Am I then to understand, Miss Morgan, that my proposition is agreeable to you? In other words, that it is accepted?"

"Mr. Rhodes," said the lady, with much hesitancy, "I must claim a little time to think of it."

"I will call, then, on my return from the village beyond."

"Let me ask a little more time," said she; "say next week."

"Miss Morgan," said Mr. Rhodes, "the matter requires immediate answer; the attachment is of an old date, and time now is every thing. My feelings are deeply interested; and may I not hope that while you are using so short a time to consider a subject, which you are pleased to view as of such great delicacy with regard to yourself, you will allow my wishes and my feelings to weigh with you in deciding in favor of my proposition, which, I assure you, is made after due deliberation upon my ability to perform my part of the contract?"

Mr. Rhodes then took his leave, astonished at his own unwonted volubility, which, indeed, nothing could have induced but his desire to relieve one so much esteemed as Miss Morgan from present embarrassment.

Mr. Rhodes drove to a neighboring place, deeply occupied with his good purpose towards Miss Morgan, satisfying himself that the pecuniary sacrifice he had proposed was due to his untold and unknown affection for her, and not beyond his means.

Miss Morgan felt a renewal of all those feelings which had rather been dormant than quenched in her bosom, and desired the advice of her married sister, who was unfortunately absent. That Mr. Rhodes had once felt a strong attachment to her, she could not doubt; that he had continued to cherish, as she had done, the reciprocal feeling, she had not ventured to hope. But as it was evident that the proposition of Mr. Rhodes was not from any sudden impulse, Miss Morgan resolved to signify her assent to a proposition so worthy of consideration on all accounts.

In less than two hours, Mr. Rhodes drove up to the door again, fastened his horse, and was re-admitted to the little back parlor, which he had occupied in an earlier part of the day.

"Miss Morgan," said Mr. Rhodes, "before receiving your answer, which I trust you are prepared to give in favor of accepting my proposals, I wish to state to you that I have reconsidered all the circumstances of my situation and yours, and find myself better able, from some previously unconsidered matters, to keep my part of the arrangement than I thought myself, when I ventured to make the offer; so that the kindness, if you will have that word used in this matter, is all on your side."

"Under present circumstances—I mean those of our long acquaintance, and our family intercourse, though of late rather interrupted," said Miss Morgan, "and my right, by years, (she added, casting a glance at a looking glass that showed only matured womanhood,) to speak for myself, I have concluded to consider your proposal favorably."

"Consider! Miss Morgan, consider favorably! may I not hope you mean that you will accept it?"

Miss Morgan gave no answer.

"Nay, then, it is accepted," said Mr. Rhodes, with a vivacity that Miss Morgan thought would have brought him to her lips—her hand, at least.

"How happy you have made me," said Mr. Rhodes;

"having now disposed of this matter, there are ten days allowed."

"That's very short," said Miss Morgan, "only ten days; you seem to be in haste unusual to you at least."

"It is the attachment, and not I, that is imperative."

"You speak rather abstractedly, Mr. Rhodes."

"But truly, very truly, Miss Morgan."

"But why limit us to ten days?"

"The attachment requires us."

"I thought," said she, smiling, "the attachment would be for life."

Mr. Rhodes looked exceedingly confused. At length he started suddenly towards the lady.

"My dear Miss Morgan, is it possible that, for once in my life, I have blundered into the right path? Can I have been so fortunately misconceived?"

"If there is any mistake," said Miss Morgan, "I hope it will be cleared up immediately. I can scarcely think that Mr. Rhodes would intentionally offend an unprotected orphan, the daughter and sister of his former friends."

Mr. Rhodes hastily pulled from his pocket his writ of attachment, and showed it to Miss Morgan.

"This is certainly your name, and this property—"

"Is the disputed possessions," said Miss Morgan, "of my sister-in-law of the same name, Mrs. Susan Morgan?"

Mr. Rhodes stood confounded. He was afraid of the course which the matter was likely to take.

"So Mr. Rhodes, you see the attachment was for this property. Now as it is not mine, and as, indeed, I have little of my own, you, of course, have no claim upon my person."

"I beg your pardon, my dear Miss Morgan, I beg your pardon. You have not the property, indeed, for me to attach, but be pleased to read lower down on the writ; you will see—look at it if you please—'FOR WANT THEREOF TAKE THE BODY.'"

"But, Mr. Rhodes, the promise was extorted under a misapprehension, so that I am released."

"Not at all; you are required only to fulfil the promise just as you intended when you made it. And as to the attachment for the widow and her property, I'll serve that by deputy."

In ten days the clergyman, and not the magistrate was called in, and the whole arrangement was consummated.

And aunt Arabella, who was so careful about the tenth commandment, declared that it said nothing about coveting a neighbor's husband, and if it had, she did not think that she should violate it.

thus—"And God's anger was kindled because he (Balaam) went: and the angel of the Lord stood in the way for an adversary against him."

Now it is a fact, that the word here rendered adversary, is SATAN in the original Hebrew, according to the testimony of Partialist authors; and it is as common a word in the Hebrew Bible as adversary in ours. Any accuser or opposer, is called satan—a letter, is called satan—the angel of the Lord, as we have seen; or the disciple of Jesus, or the Jewish people—any person, or body of persons, or any thing that opposes or obstructs, is a satan. This is the regular Scripture use of the term, and no Jew before the Babylonian captivity ever understood it to mean any thing else.

I will not stop here to press the arguments against the popular notions, that may be drawn from those very notions themselves—on the impossibility of sin entering heaven, &c., &c.—nor to show the absurdity that exists in supposing the account in Job is any thing like a literal account. Let all that be considered by yourselves at your own leisure. I only insist on the fact, that the word was never understood in the present popular sense, until long after the days of Moses—that the doctrine of fallen angels is not to be found in any of the Books of Moses, (where it certainly belongs as a matter of history if true,)—and that the book of Job, itself, opposes the popular doctrine, by showing that God is the only ruler of the universe, and that all evil, as well as all good, is of his dispensing. As a poem, all that is said in the two introductory chapters, is very good—very excellent for introducing the subject matter of the poem, and all its characters, to the reader. But it is ridiculous on the popular notions, to suppose it a literal history; and that the devil has such near access to God, and so much influence over him!

But I may be asked, what is meant, then, by the satan there introduced—what adversary was there, if not the great enemy of souls? I answer, that all opposing, or adverse powers are called satan—and that all the powers arrayed in opposition to God, or to Job, are meant by the term in this place—and that they are thus personified as arraying themselves against Job, and conspiring to prove him a wicked man, a defier of the gods, and a mere sycophantic worshipper of the true God. Accordingly, I would understand, in all cases where the word satan occurs, that it meant an adversary—and would suppose that the adversaries of Job were thus represented. The adversaries were—or this satan was—1st. Those tribes who envied Job's prosperity, and conspired to rob him of his possessions—the Sabeans, the Chaldeans, and the Arabs. 2d. Those calamities that produced distress and pain, as the lightning, the whirlwind, and the black leprosy, or elephantiasis;—and 3d. The advocates for idolatry, and opposers of religion professed by Job. A. B. G.

NOTES FOR MY FRIENDS.

DOING WELL.—Being unable to attend the U. S. Convention at Akron, in my own proper person; or transform myself into the likeness of the venerable Father Ballou, and go there; I did what was probably the next best thing that I could do to gratify our brethren at the West—I agreed to supply Br. Ballou's desk during his absence. (It is perhaps some mitigation of my immense claims upon the gratitude of all who were delighted at beholding and hearing Father Ballou at the Convention, to say, that he agreed to go to Akron before I engaged to supply for him!)

Missing the Cure.—I left home on Friday night, (after attending the Conference at Lee,) thinking to reach Boston on Saturday evening. But, going by the way of Troy, we reached Albany just in time to see the last puff of steam go up over the eastern hill, like the dying whiff of a smoker's pipe. That was vastly uncomfortable. To have been able to send a letter to a friend in the city of Notions, telling him the cause of my delay, and to assure him that I would be there in good season the next morning, would have been some satisfaction. Ay, it would have been less vexatious, even, to have arrived half an hour too late. But to be just in time to be too late!—well, there was no use in running to overtake them, and still less in fretting about it; so I visited Br. Van Schaack and family, and called on Br. S. B. Brittan, the present pastor of the Albany society, and thus passed away my time very pleasantly until the afternoon train left, carrying myself and baggage with it.

The Western Rail Road.—This is a much more beautiful and permanent work than any in our region. The embankments and excavations are very great and numerous from Albany to Worcester, and the excellent manner in which all these natural obstacles have been surmounted, awakens admiration of the powers bestowed by the Creator on man, as the High Priest of nature, and Lord of this lower world. There are some bold and beautiful views, and very picturesque scenery on this road—enough to make one regret sometimes that the rapidly moving wings of water hurry you on so fleetly. The Hudson and Berkshire road, for a part of the way, runs nearly parallel with the Western road, and it excites some interest to mark how singularly the two seem to cross and recross each other as they wind along on their respective courses among the hills and rocks, and over the ravines and streams. Two monstrous serpents could not do it more beautifully.

The awakening.—Having travelled all night on Friday, and slept only about 3 hours at Springfield on Saturday night, the passengers in the "mail train" snoozed as comfortably and steadily as the steam whistle (which seemed to be blown about every three minutes!) would allow. On our arrival at Worcester, finding we had about 20 minutes to spare, the most of us started on a tramp of observation. On our return, we found, to our surprise, that it is the fashion to change cars at Worcester—those in which we arrived having returned to "the other depot," carrying with them our valises, cloaks, umbrellas, &c., and those in which we were to depart, being nearly ready for a start. Here was a pretty race for a quarter or half a mile to be run by some dozen of us, against time! We ran—we won—and left Worcester wide awake, of course!

The robbery.—We had hardly left Worcester before we were more thoroughly awakened in feelings of sympathy for an elderly gentleman, who had been robbed of $1115 the day before, on his passage from Boston to Springfield. He had just drawn the money from the Bank, and put it in his pocket book, and that into his coat pocket behind, when the cars left. He kept his hand on the pocket, waiting for a chance to transfer it, without being observed, to some more secure place.—But on stopping, and while drinking a cup of coffee, the book was taken. When we arrived at the place, the emptied pocket book which had been found, was handed to him. The last hope vanished, and the poor man wept bitterly. It seems he had been unfortunate in business, and some friend endorsed for him to enable him to start again; and now that friend must sustain nearly the entire loss. While thinking how we might approach him, and ascertain his immediate wants, an Irishman, with the prompt benevolence and straightforward impulse characteristic of the nation, went directly to the man, and having ascertained that he was actually left penniless, took out a dollar, and went around among the passengers, and raised upwards of eight dollars for the sufferer. Commend me to an Irishman for laying aside all delicacies when any suffering is to be relieved—he does it "so quick" (as Harry Bushnell, our Utica Blacksmith, would say) "that it makes your head swim!" It gave much pleasure to learn afterwards, that the robbers were caught, and part of the money recovered. It may not be improper also to state, that the kind hearted young Irishman is Mr. J. J. Mahoney, and keeps a clothing store on Ann street in Boston.

At home—not in Utica, but at Br. T. A. Goddard's, in Boston. Arrived here at 8, A. M., and was cordially welcomed by this amiable and excellent family—the three members of which are actively engaged as members of Father Ballou's church and society—in the Sunday school and the choir. Was soon relieved of the evidences of having journeyed, and washed, and refreshed

UTICA, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1843.

BOOK OF JOB.... NO. III.

A few words in regard to the satan spoken of in this book. As the book of Job is acknowledgedly the oldest writing extant, we must depend on finding the meaning of words used in it, by examining other writings of the nearest date to it. The Hebrew of Shaitan, transferred without translation into our common version of the Bible, we are informed simply means an opposer—an adversary. It occurs for the first time in Gen. xvi: 21, as the name of a well—Sitnah, the term Shaitan in Hebrew. But why the name of a well? Because the well was an occasion of great strife, or opposition, between the herdmen of Gerar and the herdmen of Isaac—for it is written—"And the herdmen of Gerar, did strive with Isaac's herdmen, saying, The water is ours: and he called the name of the well Esek; because they strove with him. And they digged another well, and strove for that also: and he called the name of it Sitnah." The term Esek, in the Hebrew, signifies contention—of sitnah or satan, opposition or adversary. This is the first place in which the word satan occurs in the original Scriptures. I believe it does not occur again until in Numb. xii: 22, where it is applied to the angel of the Lord—and prepared for the duties of the day. And from that hour to this at which I write, I have found kindness on kindness under this roof, where I feel as much at home as I can be, absent from my family. More I would say, but it might not seem proper—less I could not say in justice to my own feelings.

Large shoes.—There is not a man now living in the United States, who has effected a greater, wider, and more permanent a change in the religious opinions of community, (not only of his own denomination, but of the entire religious world of these United States—) than Hosea Ballou, of Boston. He is not only the main moulder of the present peculiar form in which Universalism is professed and taught, but he is also the first writer in these United States who wrote and published a work on the Unity of God, and the corresponding views of the nature and object of the atonement, as held by the Unitarians, the Christians, and others.—And in force of native intellect, shrewdness and closeness of argument, the veteran is yet a match for any opposer who may venture to assail him. You may therefore well imagine that I felt like a very small man in a pair of large shoes, when, for the first time, I stood in Father B.'s desk, on that Sunday morning, and attempted to preach to a congregation, many of whom had been converted and taught under the ministrations of Murray and Winchester; and all of whom were accustomed to hear, not only Father Ballou, but all the great "wise men of the East," besides! It reminded me of the foolish feat I once undertook—of trying to preach, by lifting up my feeble voice amid the thunder-sounds of Niagara Falls! However, God is merciful to us—I have lived to wonder and smile at that feat of folly.

Boston.—Whatever the rest of the world may think of the matter, strangers are very apt to esteem hospitality one of the chief virtues. I have never found it deficient in this city and vicinity; but rather excessive. Anxious to see and become acquainted with those of whom I have heard much, as well as to visit again my old acquaintances, I have not been idle since my arrival here. Calls, visits, and walks have generally occupied me all day, and sent me to bed well qualified to enjoy its repose. In the course of my rides and rambles, I have seen many of the towns and villages around Boston, and intimately connected with it. Indeed, this city looks, in its location with regard to its environs, like a mighty hen surrounded by a large brood of chickens. Its crooked, winding, and sometimes narrow streets, rendered darker by the time-stained externals of the houses, are rather interesting, and some times puzzling to a stranger who wishes to go from one point to another, by the shortest way. Br. Chapin has well compared its winding to those in an old cheese.

I find our cause prosperous as usual in this section. All hands are engaged, each in his own way, in building up Universalism—one in doctrine, another in precept, and we trust all in practice, and some in all these varied parts of the great whole. The few excesses perpetrated in the Union Conference meetings held in this section last winter, appear to have done us very little injury, and we can not but think will learn us that even Universalists are not infallible, and may therefore need the admonitions given to the world by the numerous beacons erected by other denominations. The weekly Conference meetings at Br. Skinner's and Br. Streeter's churches, are well attended as usual. Br. Streeter's weekly Conferences have been regularly kept up since the days of Murray, and seem therefore like a relic of olden time. The pulpit of the conference (vestry) room, is that in which Murray preached—and his portrait hanging on the wall, smiles affectionately to the worshippers, while his spirit seems to speak in the warm and cheerful fervor of Br. Streeter's voice and manner. More anon.

WICKED CONDUCT OF CHURCHES.

There is a species of conduct that long has been, and still is very prevalent in the churches of almost every denomination, that appears to us to be very wicked and reprehensible. What we allude to is this:—when, a member of the church changes his views and embraces those of another denomination, and asks the privilege of withdrawing from the communion, the church reproaches and abuses him, stigmatizes his character, and represents him before the world as a very bad, if not indeed a very wicked man. And this is especially the case when the individual embraces views more liberal and cheering than those of the church to which he belongs—particularly the doctrines of Universalism. However much a man may be honored for his talents and loved for his Christian virtues, if he become a convert to the holy and cheering faith of the blessed gospel, that all men shall finally be made sinless and happy, with no change in his character save that his benevolence becomes more enlarged and pure; he at once is made an object of hatred and persecution, by the very church which, a few days before, respected and esteemed him. There seems then to be left in that church no charity for him; but like Paul when he became a Christian, he is pursued by his former brethren, with an unrelenting vengeance, day and night. Nor is the pursuit given over so long as there is the glimmering of a hope left of injuring his feelings, or working his ruin.

We have a case in our mind now of somewhat recent occurrence. It is only one of very many of the same kind that have come within our knowledge. An individual, who stood very high in a certain church, and who was, by all his brethren and sisters, regarded as holding a place second to none but the minister himself in talent and every Christian virtue, became by the study of the Bible alone, without any other aid whatever, a happy convert to Universalism. As soon as he made known the change that had taken place in his views, he was labored with by the church; exhorted, entreated, and besought with tears to give up his heresy and not leave the church. He felt, however, that his duty to himself, to the world, and to God, required him to be an honest man and to make an open profession of his faith in "Jesus as the Saviour of the world." To do this and continue his connexion with the church, would be impossible. Besides, he wished to go where he could hear those doctrines in which he believed, proclaimed from the desk. Hence he concluded that it was his duty to ask a letter of dismission from the church. He did so; but as soon as it became known that he was fixed in his resolution to leave them, the church, with a few exceptions, lost all sympathy for him, and turned into his persecuting enemies. They began to throw out insinuations, touching his character as a Christian; these were very soon followed by "darker epithets," "forged in malice's vengeful fires;" and then came "more fearful tales and ominous," until, if the language and insinuations of the members of that church, which, before he avowed his change of faith; was wont "to fold him in the bosom of its dearest kindness," had been believed, he would have stood before the world with "just no character at all," or rather with one as dark as hypocrisy could dye it.

Among those who were his bitterest persecutors, were to be found the very men who had been loudest in their praise of his talents, and warmest in their protestations of regard. These men, not satisfied with heaping upon the head of their dissenting brother, the withering anathemas which it is the prerogative of orthodox churches to denounce against whomsoever their holy wrath may move them, attempted in a dastardly, mean and most unrighteous manner, the ruin of his pecuniary condition and standing in the world! May God have mercy on such men, and convert them to gospel honesty and Christian charity; nothing else can do it; for the fires of hell, glaring them in the face, have been tried for years, in vain.

Now this conduct appears to us any thing under heaven but Christian. That brother was never suspected of any thing inconsistent with the most perfect Christian character, before he declared the change that the Bible had wrought in his faith. Until that moment, his reputation in the church and before the world, was "without spot or blemish;" not, if there had no change in his views taken place and he had continued his membership in the church, would there ever have been heard the faintest whisper against his character as a Christian or a man. Nay, more than this; if any one had spoken disrespectfully of him, they would have stood up manfully in his defence, and even pointed to him as a pattern of the true Christian's life. When, therefore, for no other reason than that he had ceased to believe as they believed—no change whatever having taken place in his character, only for the better—the members of that church set about, deliberately and with a fixed determination, to blast, if it be in their power, the reputation of that brother, they are doing a deed of such studied wickedness as should make them shudder to think of, and as must bring down on their guilty heads the severest retributions of a righteous God.

It is in vain for them to plead, as they often do, that the man's conduct was so bad—and had been known to be such for a long time—that the church would soon have expelled, or to use orthodox phraseology, excommunicated him. It is no such thing; and they who make the plea, know it to be a false plea; and that it was never thought of until after his conversion had come to their knowledge. And even then, instead of contemplating his excommunication, they labored with him; used all their arts of persuasion; exhausted all their arguments; expressed their deep sorrow; prayed around him and shed tears over him; and all this, too, to induce him to abandon his new faith and remain in the church. A singular comment on their plea, truly! It was not until they saw he was determined to leave them, that they ever mistrusted even he was in any way a wicked man. But when they saw him about to enter the bosom of another, and one whose sentiments were congenial with with his own, then it was that "Slander filled her mouth with lying words, Slander, the foulest whelp of sin;"

And

"Persecution mad, her bloody work
Began and ruin; and to steep in woe
The heart that long had had their praise."

I have much more to say on this subject; but I have already extended this article to a greater length than I designed; I will therefore, for the present, leave it.

HISTORICAL SKETCHES AND INCIDENTS,
Illustrative of the establishment and progress of Universalism in the State of New York. By S. R. SMITH. Buffalo: Steel's press, 1843.

This is the title of a new work from the pen of Br. S. R. Smith, which he has had in contemplation for the past two years, and from which he has furnished two or three extracts, at different times. In another column of this week's paper, will be found another extract, containing an anecdote connected with the lamented J. Whitnal, which may serve as a sample of the more humorous portion of the book. Its pages also contain much that is pathetic, and that can not fail to touch deeply the feeling heart. It is altogether what it professes to be, not a circumstantial and grave history of Universalism in this State; but a collection of incidents connected with the introduction and propagation of that doctrine, with historical sketches of the organization of the Societies, Churches and Associations, the building of the first meeting-houses, enlivened with biographical notices and numerous thrilling anecdotes of the preachers engaged in the great and difficult work of the ministry of these early times, in the State—all chronologically arranged. It commences with the year 1770, in the city of New York, and comes down with its sketches to year 1817; and will probably, in due time, be followed by another volume, as indeed the author has more than intimated it shall be. In the preface he says: "It will be perceived that the present little volume includes but a small portion of our progress as a denomination. Should the time and health of the writer permit, and other circumstances seem to require, the same general plan will be followed in farther attempts to supply what is here omitted."

We are confident that we express the feelings of all who shall read the little volume before us, when we say that we ardently hope Br. Smith will be able to accomplish his design, and bring the Historical Sketches down to the present time. The present volume supplies a, desideratum in our denominational history, which we verily believe, no man living is so well qualified to give as is Br. S. R. Smith. During the past thirty years, his own personal history has been inseparably connected with that of the denomination in this State. In its infancy he was with it—in its long years of trial, when hope seemed, at times, struggling with despair, he was with it in all the strength and ardor of his soul—and in the day of its prosperity and triumph, he has become its pride and glory.

It seems to us, therefore, that no person who has enjoyed the pleasure of making his acquaintance—and what man or woman is there in this State, large as it is—who has been a Universalist more than seven years, that is not personally acquainted with Br. Stephen R. Smith?—can rest until he gets into his hands his Historical Sketches. We have read it with intense interest and pleasure, and we may add, profit; and we therefore give it our humble and hearty recommendation to the Universalist public. It is for sale at Grosh & Walker's, 32 Genesee street; price only fifty cents. H. B. S.

GRAMMAR.—We shall have to cashier Professor Thayer—or, at least turn him over to Corrector General Drew, for rebuke and correction—unless he minds his business a wee bit better. The world will not, most certainly, tolerate such violations of the plain rules of Grammar as the following, which we find in the Rose of Sharon for 1844, beginning on page 67, and ending on page 68.

"System upon system go sweeping in solemn glory and beauty before him; while cluster after cluster, farther and farther on into the unknown, reveal themselves, till it would seem at last, &c."!

Why, sister Sarah! where were your spectacles, that blunder after blunder were thus passed by uncorrected, until they seem like blotch after blotch on the leaves of the Rose of Sharon?

It is but just to say that the article is an excellent one, save these errors—Br. T. B. T., don't you owe me one?

A. B. G.

Br. Whittemore—Can you inform us of the whereabouts of one E. H. Lake, whose name, as a subscriber, you sent us about the first of May, 1841. He took his paper at Lynn. We sent him the back numbers from the commencement of the volume. He continued to take the paper until about the close of the volume, when he removed to Boston. He owes us $2.50.

Post MASTER at Richmond, Va., says I. S. Cary has not taken his paper from the office for a long time, and refuses to take and pay for it. Said Cary, for aught we know, owes us $9.00. Post Master at Boonville, says James Simonds does not take his paper from the office. Said Simonds owes $5.50.

☞ We have on hand a quantity of volumes of the Magazine and Advocate, bound, which were left by subscribers, several years since. The binder with whom they were left, was about to sell them for what he could get, to pay him for his labor. We took them off his hands. Those to whom they belong can have them by paying for the binding and our trouble, (which will not be much,) if attended to soon. Otherwise, we shall sell them, as we have opportunity. The following is a list of them, with the names of those to whom they belong, what is due on them, &c.:

Wm. Currie, volume 2, old series, for 1829, volumes 2, 3, 4 and 5, new series, for 1831, 2, 3 and 4—due, $3.00. — King, volume 1, new series, for 1830—due, 63 cents. John P. Smith, Lockport, volume 4, for 1833—due, 63 cents. W. Wilbur, volume 4, for 1833—due, 63 cents. D. Sayles, New Hartford, volume 5, for 1834—due, 63 cents. S. P. Landers, volume 4, for 1833—due, 63 cents. J. W. Redington, volume 7, for 1836—due, 63 cents. O. or A. Allen, volume 8, for 1837—due, 63 cents. Nelson Wentworth, Lee, volume 10, for 1839—due, 63 cents. — Vanderpool, volume 11, for 1840—due, 63 cents. J. Jackways, volumes 8 and 9, for 1837 and 8—due, $1.25.

TREMENDOUS STORM AT PORT LEON, FLORIDA.—Our city is in ruins! We have been visited by one of the most horrible storms that ever before devolved upon us to chronicle. Wednesday, about 11 o'clock, A. M., the wind commenced blowing fresh from the southeast, bringing up a high tide, but nothing alarming; at 5 P. M., the wind lulled and tide fell, the weather still continuing lowery.

At 11 o'clock at night the wind freshened, and tide commenced flowing, and by 12 o'clock it blew a perfect hurricane, and the whole town inundated. The gale continued with unabated violence until 2 o'clock, the water making a perfect breach 10 feet deep over our town. The wind suddenly lulled for a few minutes, and then came from the southwest with redoubled violence, and blew till daylight. Every warehouse in the town was laid flat with the ground, except Messrs. Hamlin & Snell's, and a part of that also fell.

Nearly every dwelling was thrown from its foundation, and many of them crushed to atoms. The loss of property is immense. Every inhabitant participated in the loss more or less. None have escaped—many with only the clothes they stand in.

St. Marks suffered in like condition with ourselves. But our losses are nothing in comparison with that at the Light House. Every building but the light house is gone. And dreadful to relate, fourteen lives lost, and among them some of our most valued citizens. We can not attempt to estimate the loss of each individual at this time, but shall reserve it until our feelings will better enable us to investigate it. We give below a list of those drowned, so far as heard from.

At Port Leon.—A crazy negro boy, belonging to Tallahassee.

At the Light House.—Capt. M. C. Robertson, his wife and three children, and a child of Dr. Treadwell.

Joseph Wood, a portrait painter, from Tallahassee.

A child of R. V. Buffins, and five negroes.

Those saved are Capt. Hungerford, his wife and two children, Dr. Treadwell's youngest child, Messrs. Oglesbee, Blethen and Kennedy, pilots, and five negroes.

Our citizens are now out, looking for any that may have escaped, and bring the bodies of those that may be found. Such a total destruction of property has never occurred in our place.

Our loss is estimated at $250,000.

In addition to the above, we have learned that the family of Mr. Edward Walker, living on Shell Point, wife, children, five or six negroes, all perished. Mr. Edward Walker himself escaped by clinging to the branches of a tree until the waters subsided.

It is also stated that there are several other persons living at this point who have not been heard from, and of whose safety great doubts are entertained.

There are also several families from this county, in summer quarter on James Island, and on whose account much anxiety is felt. Indeed, such was the violence of the winds, and the height to which the tide rose, that our imagination can scarcely fix limits to its ravages.

Cedar Keys, Apalachicola, and St. Joseph, can scarcely have escaped without much damage.—Commercial Gaz., Sept. 15.

Wiskonsan Wheat crop.—The Southport American thinks 1,000,000 of bushels a moderate estimate for the wheat that will be exported from Wiskonsan, the product of the crop just harvested.

WEALTH OF GERRIT SMITH.—This distinguished advocate of emancipation is thus noticed by a correspondent of the Mercantile Journal, travelling in the State of New York:

"I visited Peterboro', the residence of Gerrit Smith, and the focus of those immense transactions in the purchase and sale of land property, which Hon. Peter Smith so long and so successfully carried on. About forty-five years ago, Judge Smith purchased of the Indians, 60,000 acres of land in one parcel, covering nearly the whole of the present county of Madison, for the sum of $225,000. He subsequently became the largest landholder in the State. His son Gerrit, who some years since inherited the greater part of his father's property, now owns more than one million acres of land in the state of New York alone, lying in forty-eight of its fifty-six counties. His annual land tax is upward of ten thousand dollars!"

Pick Pockets.—These gentry were quite busy yesterday in the Cattle Show, succeeding in cleaning out several of the unsuspecting among the crowd. One man caught a fellow's hand in his pocket—saved his wallet, but lost the would-have-been thief. One man, Mr. Pond of Brockport, came up minus a coat skirt, and fortunately his money was not in that quarter.—Rochester Rep.

The Rochester Democrat, of the 26th ult., states that the amount received from admission fees at the show ground was about $1,400, and from members and subscriptions about $1,000—making in all, say $2,400. The amount of premiums for the year $2,000, and the contingent expenses are nearly $1,000. The society receives $700 from the State.

Laege Calf.—Mr. George W. Davis, of Windham, Mass., raised a calf this year, which weighed when 17 weeks old, 550 pounds. The calf was weighed again last Wednesday, at the age of 21 weeks and weighed 670 pounds.

The census of Chicago, Illinois, has just been completed, and the population is 7580. The census taken in 1840 showed the number of inhabitants to be 4853. Consequently there has been an increase of 2727 in two years.

Counterfeit two dollar bills of the New England Bank are very plenty in Bangor. They are of the Perkins plates.

Rochester is in a very flourishing condition. About 300 buildings are going up there.

The sentence of death passed upon Isaac Leavitt, for the murder of Mary Knapp, at Scituate, in the county of Plymouth, Mass., has been commuted by the Governor and Council to imprisonment for life.

The ship America, just arrived from Bremen, at Baltimore, has brought a group of the Gipsy race, consisting of William Wagner, the father, and five small children. The girls have jet black hair, which falls in neglected style over the shoulders.

BIGAMIST CONVICTED.—On Wednesday, in the court of Salem, N. J., Alexander Novoscoski, alias Edward Bronowski, alias Smith, was convicted of bigamy. It was proved upon the trial that he had at present four wives living, and that the whole of them had been at the house of a relative of one of his wives in Newark.

REV. AMOS LEFEVER, says the Broome Republican, the seducer, who was lately tried and convicted at Tonawanda, Pa., has just been sentenced to imprisonment for three years. Before his sentence, he made a speech occupying three hours, to prove that he was the seduced and not the seducer, and concluded by expressing his willingness to marry the victim of his wiles. His speech, however, did not dispose the judge to lenity, for he sentenced the polluted wretch to the longest term of punishment permitted by the law.

FIRE.—On Saturday night, a fire was discovered in the building just erected on Columbia street, near the corner of Cornelia street, owned by Mr. L. Morgan. It was entirely destroyed; but by the well directed efforts of the fireman, the fire was got under without much damage to the adjoining buildings. It is supposed to be the work of an incendiary.—[Utica Dem.]

CENTRAL RAIL ROAD.—The business upon the Central Rail Road is fast increasing both in passengers and freight. For several mornings past the cars have gone out with upwards of 100 passengers. The quantity of freight going out is large and increasing. The amount of flour coming in averages about 1000 barrels per day, which, we believe, is less than last year this time. This is said to be owing to the farmers being unusually busy in putting in their fall seed, which, in the eastern portion of the State, they are doing more extensively this year than last.—[Detroit Free Press, Sept. 22.]

TRINITY.

The doctrine of the holy trinity is a fatal rock, on which many a devoted Christian has wrecked his hopes, and floated with the shattered bark down the stream of time, till he ultimately landed in the dominions of infidelity. A system that teaches us one of the fundamental tenets on which it rests, that there are one, and that a thing can be, and not be, at the same time, is too absurd to meet with encouragement, even from the implicit believer, much less from the vigorous and independent mind that dares to launch into the ocean of manly investigation.

Were this principle of reasoning to be admitted, it would confound all the transactions of human life, reverse the entire system of mathematics, and, in short, would reduce all things to irremediable disorder and chaotic confusion. To say that a square, a circle, and a triangle, have each an independent existence, and yet are one and the same, is an absurdity, that even the intellectual capacity of a child would intuitively discover. If a triangle has in itself qualities sufficiently distinct to entitle it to an appellation independent of that of a circle or a square, this fact alone affords conclusive evidence, that the triangle is neither a circle nor a square, but a triangle; and by that appellation alone is the qualities of the triangle conceived by the mind. When we are informed that a triangle is described on the blackboard, the conception of the mind is entirely different from what it would have been, if we had been informed that a circle or a square is described; and the mind irresistibly concludes that a triangle is there described, and not a circle or a square. So when we are informed that Christ suffered upon the cross, the mind necessarily concludes that Christ was there and suffered, and not God. And, again, when we are further informed that God sent his only begotten Son into the world to redeem sinners, the mind conceives that Christ, a personage distinct from Deity, was sent, and not God; for to say that God sent himself, is a perversion of human language, and an absurdity too palpable to need reflection. "But," says the objector, "the three personages are one in spirit, and not in substance." Suppose that I were to retort, and say, the three mathematical figures are one in essence, and not in quality; what idea has the mind of this oneness of essence, as distinct from that of their individuality in quality?—a distinction that involves a metaphysical subtlety too refined for the comprehension of any being.

It perhaps is not necessary to dwell any longer upon this complicated system of human folly, except to remark upon the tenacity with which Trinitarians support a doctrine so fraught with absurdity, and diametrically opposed to every principle of reason and common sense; when a doctrine perfectly consistent, which involves neither mystery nor contradiction, is distinctly taught in the same volume from which they have extracted, and by combination formed, this ideal phantom, the endeavor to comprehend which has called forth so many metaphysical disquisitions.

St. Paul was so sensible of the finity of the powers of Christ, that he does not hesitate to call him a man, 1 Tim. ii: 5, "For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus." The Saviour himself in repeated instances, acknowledges that his power was not eternal. Matt. xxviii: 18, "All power is given unto me in heaven and earth." Matt. xi: 27, "All things are given unto me by my Father." He also calls God "my God," indicating that God is a being so distinct from himself, that he claimed a property in him; which could not be the case, if they were identified. And again he says, "Thou hast sent me into the world, as I have sent them (disciples) into the world." These declarations, so explicit, are amply sufficient of themselves, to establish beyond doubt, the dependence of Christ, and his man-identity with Deity; exclusive of the numerous other Scriptural proofs that can be adduced.

Daniel who prophesied of the birth of Christ, gives additional evidence that Christ was not identified with God, either in spirit or substance, when he says that "there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom"—meaning undoubtedly that it was given to Christ—for if it was to Deity himself that this donation was made, (as Trinitarians virtually maintain,) He must previously have been finite in his attributes, and consequently imperfect. John still more explicitly declares the dependence of Christ and his powers, when he says, that "The Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father do." And further, Jesus (as recorded in Matthew and Mark) speaking of an impending calamity, distinctly declares that he is finite in knowledge, "But of that day knoweth no man, not even the angels, neither the Son, but the Father."

But says the objector, I have one passage of itself, sufficient to silence for ever any doubt as to the identity of Father and Son, viz., "I and the Father are one, and he that hath seen the Father, hath seen me." But I reply that this oneness of the Father and Son, intimated in this passage, was intended to mean nothing more nor less than their union and agreement in the great work which he had undertaken, and as a corroboration of this fact, I refer the objector to John xvii: 21, where Christ prays that his disciples may be one, even as he and his Father are one—not meaning that John may be identified with Peter, or vice versa, but that they may be well agreed in the Gospel salvation. And so of the passage, (upon which Trinitarians found their doctrine,) "I and the Father are one; he who hath seen the Father hath seen me"—unquestionably intended to convey the idea that there was an identity in the objects for which they labored, and that there was a union and agreement in the work which they had undertaken.

Now I believe it is a rule universally admitted, and practiced upon by learned and unprejudiced commentators, that where two constructions may be put upon a passage, that one should be received which is most directly supported by the context, so long as it does not contradict reason and common sense. Adopting this rule of interpretation, there can not remain a doubt as to the separate individuality of Father and Son, either in spirit or substance.

HOW TO FORM AN ACQUAINTANCE.

BY REV. S. R. SMITH.

The session of the Association was held this year in Homer, Cortland county, and the journey of about seventy miles, was made on horseback by our company, which consisted of several preachers and lay-delegates. On the day preceding the session—a genuine Spring day—damp, dreary, with a perseveringly steady and chilling wind, we travelled some forty miles over a detestable road. It would give but little idea of our situation on reaching our destination—to say, that we were wet and fatigued—we were cold, exhausted and covered with mud. But a shelter, a warm supper and a warmer welcome—together with the constant succession of new arrivals of friends, made ample amends for any inconvenience already suffered.

Among the new arrivals was Mr. Whitnal, already named; and who had been but recently converted from the Baptists. His appearance was as singular as his mental peculiarities were extraordinary; and he was in all proper senses of the phrase, an "everlasting talker." Too young and too little known to win his attention, I had leisure and opportunity to observe his movements and unfeigned tact. He literally flew from one person to another, like a bee from flower to flower—and apparently for the sole purpose of talking and rendering himself conspicuous. Nothing however was farther from his intentions; for no man living was less vain or pretending; and he talked perpetually for the simple reason, that he could not keep his tongue still.

The fatigue and discomfort of the day, sent several of us early to rest—but not to sleep. For the large lodging room, where some eight or ten persons were to spend the night, was directly over that in which our friends were still engaged in conversation; and the clear sharp voice of our new preacher seemed to penetrate the walls and flooring as if they were gauze—and came pealing in with unceasing din. Add to this, the bursts of laughter which his profoundly comic style and manner provoked; and it will be perceived that sleeping was entirely out of the question. At length the conversation ceased, the door of our chamber opened, and Mr. Whitnal entered. My bed was near the door, and turning to me and holding the light above his own head and looking steadily in my face for a few seconds—he commenced.

"Yes—this is Br. S.; well I have got acquainted with all the rest of the preachers; and now you must come to it."

"Excuse me to-night—it is getting late—I am fatigued; and besides, it may take some time to form an acquaintance."

"O no; it will take but a few minutes—it must be done you know, and may as well be done now as any time."

There was some reason in this; and while I was meditating whether to answer, or to laugh at our position, he took advantage of the pause, and proceeded.

"When travelling, I make it a rule to tell those where I stop, who I am, where I am going, and my business—this you know saves time and trouble. So in coming here to-day, I had occasion to call at a farm house for a drink of water; and while the good woman was getting it for me, I told her that my name was W.—that I was a Universalist preacher, and was going to a Universalist Association."

LADY.—"A Universalist—pray what will you do with the case of Esau?"

WHITNAL.—"Why—what of Esau madam?"

L.—"O, he sold his birthright, you know."

W.—"Yes; but what was his birthright?"

L.—"Why, his soul to be sure."

W.—"His soul! Well, do you suppose that Jacob had Esau's soul? You must remember that he fairly bought it."

L.—Hesitating—"Yes, that seems probable."

W.—"And what, do you think, became of Jacob?"

L.—"O he went to heaven no doubt."

W.—"Well—do you think he took Esau's soul along with him?"

L.—Hesitating again—"Yes, that seems probable."

W.—"Now what do you think became of Esau?"

L.—"Of Esau?—Why no doubt he went to hell."

W.—"But that is rather odd ma'am, that Jacob should go to heaven with two souls, and poor Esau to hell without any."

He gained his object—we were emphatically acquainted from that time forward while he lived.

Peace to his ashes, and honor to his memory.—He was truly "one of nature's noblemen," generous, self sacrificing and sincere. In the midst of opposition and reproach, he witnessed a good profession, and with all his eccentricities, he won friends and honored the truth. He died, as he had lived—believing and cheerful, resigned and happy in the hope of universal grace and salvation.

FAREWELL DISCOURSE.

Delivered in Auburn, August 27, 1843.

BY REV. G. W. MONTGOMERY.

[Published by request.]

"Finally, brethren, farewell. Be perfect; be of good comfort; be of one mind; live in peace; and the God of love and peace shall be with you." 2 Cor. xiii: 11.

It was with no ordinary feelings that this discourse was prepared—and it is with no common emotion that I speak it before you. And, with the vivid recollection that the numerous social and friendly ties which have rendered our communion so pleasing and so strong, are now to be torn asunder by separation; that the hallowed association of many years are to be broken up by what may prove to be a final parting; and that we may not again see each other on the stage of human action; gladly would I have avoided the painful service of bidding you farewell in the form of a public service. But the custom of society demands it—probably your wishes call for it—and it may be that the closing admonition of ten years of happy ministrations among you, may be productive of good, urged upon your notice, as it is, with the most ardent desire for your growth in the faith, for your increase in devotion to the truth, and for your steady advance in that practical religion which gives warmth to the affections, purity to the conversation, and holiness to the life.

For a long time, and with strong union, have we labored together as pastor and people. We commenced our work when we were few in numbers, and when the opposition was vigorous and determined. We strove for the faith, when the skepticism of a former teacher had brought reproach upon it, and wounded the cause of the Saviour in his own house. But the Lord abundantly blessed us. We have seen the cause steadily progress in power and influence, until it has compelled that respect to be given it, which was so tardily, and in many instances, unwillingly accorded to it. Under its silent and hallowing truth, we have seen the bitterness and prejudices of people softening into a better form of toleration and kindness. Together, and with joyful souls, we have beheld the grace of God, like the unseen river which causes the sandy desert above it to smile with fertility, pour its renovating vigor into the barren creeds of the day, until losing tradition after tradition, they begin to put on the aspect of that admirable system which was formed in heaven, and which, descending to men on earth, has gone forth in its ministrations of love and mercy, to bless the world with knowledge, civilization, morality and consolation.

The truth, in whose vineyard we have humbly labored, is beyond all things else, exceedingly precious. All material objects are perishable. As the swift meteor sends its lurid flash across the sky, and then vanishes forever, so passes man in all the pride of his strength and of his boasted works.—But truth is eternal, and ever bears on it the freshness of the Divinity. It is the sun which knows no setting. It is the rock which remains unmoved by the raging waves of time's stormy ocean. And though cherished objects slip one after another from our grasp, like straws in a flood before the eyes of a drowning man, yet truth will not fail us. Its clear light; its sustaining power; its warm and unvarying friendship; will ever shield us; and through the night of death, will dispel the gloom of fear, and will smile upon departing souls with that divine love from which nothing can separate us.

Truth is precious, because it shows us that the Author of the universe is indeed the Father of the human race, whose untiring love surrounds us with its continued affection. By its instruction, we receive such pure and ennobling views of his character, that we can, in the emotions of the soul, enter into his spiritual presence, and realize that he is our everlasting Friend. He is manifested to us as the ever adorable Sovereign, whose wisdom fashioned man in benevolence; whose power created him for a noble purpose; whose justice subjects him to punishment, that his soul may become pure, even as gold is separated from all impurity by the refiner's fire; whose mercy regards his lot with tender compassion, mingling all his evils with that hope, which, like the north star, never sets to the world of mind; whose goodness has filled the glorious and beautiful earth with multiplied sources of exquisite enjoyment; and whose love, unlimited by time or death, has developed a plan for his future exaltation, whose felicity no mind can conceive, and whose duration will be eternity itself.—Indeed, all truth in regard to the parental character of God, is embraced in the simple but expressive language of the apostle, "God is Love." It is hallowed, noble truth. And wherever we may roam; whatever disaster may befall us; and under whatsoever circumstances life's feeble taper may go out; if this truth sheds its steady light on the soul, we can realize that a watchful Friend is ever with us, from whose care we can not flee, and to whose spiritual presence all must ultimately return.

This truth is precious, because it reveals to us the Son of God, that exalted personage who knew no sin—who is invested with absorbing interest as one whose labors will extend their results to the entire race of Adam. As our Saviour, his mission relates to the redemption of the nations and families of the earth, and aims to deliver the soul from the slavery of sin, error, and death. As our Consolation, he exhibited unshaken confidence in God; and even when subjected to trials that would crush any courage which ordinary men are capable of exerting, he stood firm in the tried discipline of his soul, and said, "thy will be done." As our Example, he was unspotted purity. In the strength of his holiness, kindness, and obedience, he made benevolence more attracting, integrity of conduct more noble, and devotion to righteousness more admirable.—As our Light, his simple yet truly eloquent instructions are ever in our dwellings, to guide and to cheer us—and in the darkest seasons of life, fill the mind with divine light, and give it that strong faith by which, in spiritual communion with God, it rises above earthly evil. In few words, truth is precious, not only because it reveals to us God in all the glory of his paternal character, but because it shows us that Redeemer who is the Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus.

Truth is precious, because it communicates the startling yet sublime, the astonishing yet rejoicing news of the resurrection of the race to life and immortality. This fact is founded on the death and resurrection of our Lord. Consequently, while all have an absorbing interest in this great topic, all our hopes of another life cluster around the Saviour. You may dream that you have no interest in this matter—that from other sources beside those of Christian truth, you may obtain a knowledge of futurity. But where are those sources? You may call to the stars for this knowledge; but your calls will not disturb their awful silence. You may beseech the earth to listen to your desires; but instead of affording you one hope of immortality, it will point to the dust of ruined empires and cities sprinkled on its surface, and in the voice of death, say, "so passes man." You may lay your request at the feet of the wise, the philosophic, the most learned priests in the temple of nature, but on this subject, they can see no farther than can the wandering savage. But Christian truth develops life beyond the grave. The voice of the Saviour is eloquent with tidings from heaven. It tells us, that when the chemistry of death shall separate the mind from the body, it shall not sink into annihilation, but shall rise amid the universal knowledge of nature, and be clothed with the spiritual body, becoming an angel of God and immortality, to live forever in joy, in felicity as pure as the nature of him who imparts it.

Truth is precious, because it reveals what every one hopes for, viz., the ultimate reconciliation of the world. In accordance with strict justice, accompanied by mercy and goodness, God will fulfil the work in Christ Jesus. He was sent as the ransom for all—he tasted death for every man—he came to reconcile the world to the wise government of God. And by the system which Jesus watered with the tears of his anguish and sealed with his blood, he will accomplish his sublime mission.—In the unwearied assiduity of his love and the tireless ministrations of his mercy, the Saviour will go on with his conquering might, until the whole race shall be emancipated from the dominion of sin and mortality. So surely as God has revealed it in his holy word, so surely will mind, like a rising star, emerge from the clouds which obscure its glory—so surely will every tear be wiped away, every sin be finished, every error destroyed, and death be swallowed up in victory—so surely will God be all in all. Glad tidings these for poor, suffering humanity. The darkness of sin and error now broods over the world—but the glorious morning is breaking, and its meridian splendor will send the light of love and truth into every soul. The prophecy has gone forth from heaven, and its accomplishment will be unfolded in the "Restitution of all things."

Truth is precious, because it inculcates a religion which aims to produce purity in the soul and holiness in the life. Religion is not a mere statue, cold, lifeless, dead. It is a vigorous form, instinct with righteousness, and strong with virtue. It quickens man's moral perception—warms him with the law of kindness—fills him with love of holiness—arms him with perfect obedience—and strives to make him the noblest among men, by reason of inward and outward purity. It condemns all vice, whether frightful in feature and magnitude, or whether minor in character and deceptive in appearance. It makes virtue more attracting, because of the smiles of God which accompany its observance—makes it more desirable, because of the reward which always follows its practice. Religion consists not in what too many make it, of profession, of prayers, and of outward ceremonies. Religion has no other profession, but that which grows out of obedience to the rule of holy living given us by our Saviour—prayers are but the pure breath of the well-regulated soul within—outward ceremonies are but the forms of its sincere communion with God. And if it wins a soul from sin, and inspires it with love, charity, and virtue, none of its noblest victories is achieved; one of its greatest objects is effected. Very precious then, is the system which aims to so regulate the conduct of men, that they shall shine in the light of a pure example, and thus go down to their graves in peace, lamented by the living. Happy would it be for the world, if all observed and practiced this system.

But truth, some of whose prominent features we have thus imperfectly delineated, is the more precious to us, for its influence. That influence we have beheld, and, I trust, appreciated. With us, it need be no subject of speculation—our eyes have seen it; our ears have heard it; our souls have felt it. In our midst, Jesus has reigned and conquered by its power. The intemperate have become sober; the profane have cast away their evil habits; sinners have turned to a pure faith and a better life. It has calmed the fretfulness and murmurings of the sick into confiding resignation to the divine will. And the dying—how many of our society have departed out of life during our connexion—how many, from youth to the frosts of age, have approached death without a fear, and in the triumphs of faith and the glorious anticipations of immortal felicity, have fallen asleep, as the sun sinks to his rest, nobly. Such solemn scenes have been of frequent occurrence among us. And in vivid tones do they show us the importance of the hope we cherish. Nor has that importance been lessened, when, in the houses of mourning and lamentation, we have seen the oil of truth smooth down the raging waters of grief, the hand of faith wipe away the scalding tears of sorrow, and the assurances of divine goodness call forth the breathing prayer of holy resignation to the true and just ways of the most High. To small purpose, indeed, have these vivid lessons been read to us, if in them we have not been impressed with the grandeur and incomparable value of the truth which deprives death of its sting and the grave of its victory.

And now, about to part from you, and realizing the preciousness of our faith, may I not, as the last words I may ever utter in this desk, earnestly exhort you to vigorously carry out those measures which will insure your prosperity, will cause your society to be watered with the dews of divine grace, and will bring many souls to the knowledge of divine truth? Remember, that if your duty is performed, success will crown all your efforts—if you become cold and careless, your cause will retrograde. All depends upon your conduct.

As you have done heretofore, be united heart and hand. Without unity, you can not prosper. Contentment always indicates the absence of religion in a society, and the reign of passion and lust—for where envying and strife are, is found every evil work. Let your conduct in this respect, in past times, be your rule for the future. During the ten years we have been united, you have not had a single quarrel; not even in the choir. Every thing has been conducted with perfect harmony. The blessings of peace have been your reward. Continuance in this disposition and practice, will give you renewed illustrations of the truth, that it is pleasant for brethren to dwell together in unity.

Be careful to attend the sanctuary services, especially on the Sabbath. Neglect of public worship exerts a very injurious influence on the progress of truth—it is like frost in fruit-time. But attention to this delightful and easy duty has many results—it cultivates the spirit of worship in the soul; it gives wonderful prosperity to the society; it induces others to examine the system which so excites the zeal of its believers; and the preacher is encouraged to perform his duty more efficiently. There are many now before me, whose habit of attending divine service is such, that their non-appearance in their accustomed places on the Sabbath has been sure proof of either sickness or absence from town. Their example, if faithfully copied, will be productive of the happiest consequences.

But as the foundation of all prosperity, of success as laborers for the advancement of truth, a pure life, rich in virtue and warm with a devotional spirit, is indispensably necessary. No zeal, no constant attendance to the outward affairs of a society, can compensate for the want of moral practice. Success will not, can not attend those who hold the truth in unrighteousness. Be faithful, then, to know and observe your duty in all the relations of life. Cultivate charity—relieve the wants of the unfortunate—advocate your faith in the spirit of liberality and kindness—be just in all your transactions—speak truth with your neighbors—exercise love towards God and men—endeavor to be resigned to the allotments of divine Providence—strive carefully to follow the rule of doing to others as you would have them do to you—in prayer and devotion study the instructions of your dying Saviour—make the Bible your meditation and delight—and as individuals, you will be richly and abundantly happy—as a society, you will increase in numbers; you will increase in the measure of true respectability; you will become a shining star in the midst of a gainsaying world; truth will spread and be glorified in the conversion of many souls from the darkness of error. Let there be no despair among you—let no one utter disheartening words among you—but be patient, and faithful, and zealous, and charitable to each other's faults; and he who reigns in goodness and justice, will crown your labors with an abundant harvest. Assure as seed time and harvest do come to the industrious husbandman, so will you find the reward of well-doing in making your society more prosperous, more permanent than ever.

Brethren, my constant prayer is, that while God shall continue me in life, I may be able to say of you, as the apostle said of his brethren—"Only let your conversation be as it becometh the Gospel of Christ, that whether I come and see you, or else be absent, I may hear of your affairs, that ye stand fast in one spirit, with one mind, striving together for the faith of the Gospel." Phil. i: 27. Such a result will show that ye are of the right seed; a peculiar people, zealous of good works.

Oh! long may this house be filled with devout worshippers—long may this altar be surrounded by crowds of ardent, zealous, practical believers—long may those seats, as they have been in past times, be filled with a faithful band, whose voices shall chant the songs of Zion, and swell the soul with praise—long may this abode of prayer strongly attract you to its delightful services—here may you come from the cares of the market-places; the toils of business; the strifes of the world; and dwell upon that truth which draws in the wandering affections, and concentrates them upon God, the source of light and salvation—here may the mourner come, and find consolation in the blessed Gospel of Jesus, and behold therein the promise of the final victory over, and the destruction of, death—here may the sinner be guided to the Saviour; be led to the refreshing waters of virtue; be roused to hearty penitence; be reconciled to the divine rule—here may your children come in bands of beauty and health, and be instructed in the character of their Father; be taught the immense interest involved in the sacrifice of the Redeemer; be directed in virtue and obedience; that they may grow up free-born sons and daughters of holiness and truth. May this house long be the sanctuary in which your friendship and good feelings toward one another, may ripen into full Christian communion—and here may you often be brought to feel that you are fellow travellers in the journey of life, and that in kindness you should assist each other in business and in affliction.

Slips, ye that are dear to me by reason of the warm and ardent friends ye have held.—Gallery, pleasant to me by the continued presence of the singers in Zion.—Desk, delightful place, where long I have spoken the truth of my Lord to the mourner and the seeker after light.—House, familiar to my eyes as the place of kindred minds, and fixed in my memory as the sanctuary of praise and prayer.—I will say of you, as the royal singer said of Jerusalem, "Peace be within thy walls, and prosperity within thy palaces. For my brethren and companions' sake, I will say, 'peace be within thee.' Because of the house of the Lord our God, I will seek thy good." Ps. cxxii: 7, 8, 9. May the Lord command that the dews of his grace and the beauty of his love dwell here forever.

In bidding you farewell, with sincerity do I say, that the years of my connection with you, have been years of peace and happiness. And with equal sincerity it is said, that no cause of complaint rests in my soul—your warm friendship; your kind attention to my family and to myself; preclude complaint, and give rise to friendship and gratitude on my part, which, I trust, will not cease to be cherished so long as life shall continue. Indeed, when I see so many around me at this time, whose faces have long been familiar; whose sympathies I have long enjoyed and whose conduct has never changed from affection towards me; my soul tells me that I shall never find truer friends, wherever my lot may be cast. Nor are those friends confined to the society of which we are members. For from many individuals in other denominations, I have received the most generous exhibitions of of good will and warm feeling. To them my attachment is strong, and it is with pain that I part from them. May the Lord bless them, and the numerous friends, living in the surrounding country, dear to me by long and pleasant acquaintance. Brethren, remember that if we are never permitted to meet again in this life, we shall be permitted to meet hereafter, never more to be separated. "Finally, brethren, farewell. Be perfect; be of good comfort; be of one mind; live in peace; and the God of love and peace shall be with you." Amen.

LETTER TO A YOUNG FRIEND.

Dear Sir—The season of youth is an auspicious one in the life of man, and pregnant with events of the greatest moment to all. It is then that our habits and dispositions are formed, which will influence us more or less through life. And our characters will generally then develop themselves, which will characterize our future course of conduct. How important then, this portion of our lives, and how necessary that it be spent in a manner becoming its importance, in acquiring virtuous principles, and treasuring up knowledge, useful in all the various stations of life! We should strive to spend it in such a manner, that when old age creeps over us with its silver locks, we can look to this period with joy, and say, "this is one of the bright and sunny spots of my existence." Alas, how many date from this period, their downfall and ruin, in consequence of its misimprovement!

In the kind admonition of a friend, let me warn you, to beware of these latent principles of skepticism, that are taking root in your bosom; quench them in their infancy, for when once they have the ascendancy they surely will make you wretched. The mind in youth is buoyant, and delights to soar aloft in the bright regions of fancy, and the habits and principles are not so firmly seated, and have not yet acquired that power and strength over one which they attain in after life. We should strive, then, to acquire such as will stand by us, and be our consolation and support when youthful scenes, with their bright visions and joys, are vanished and give place to stern reality. Many minds, not having sufficient stability and firmness, are driven about by every wind of doctrine that has the least appearance of plausibility, and too often we find a lurking spirit of scepticism and infidelity take a deep and fatal root.

Many, laboring under false impressions, imagine they have only to discard revelation, and all things that pertain to our incorruptible state, and they are at once philosophers, men of great minds untrammelled by creeds and traditions that rise above these things which they consider fit only to amuse women and children. How awfully are they mistaken,—under how great an error do they labor! They forget, or at least do not know, that Christianity has enlisted the brightest and greatest minds in existence in its defence, such as Bacon, Locke, Addison, Sir Humphrey Davy, Sir Isaac Newton, and a host of others of the same class; men whose names will live in the memory of mankind, as long as science and arts shall have a being. As a young man, (I would say to you in the words of another,) "It becomes you to consider, with great seriousness and attention, whether it can be for your interest to esteem a few witty sarcasms, or metaphysical subtleties, or ignorant misrepresentations, or unwarranted assertions, as unanswerable arguments against revelation; and a very slight reflection will convince you, that it will certainly be for your reputation, to employ the flippancy of your rhetoric, and the poignancy of your ridicule, upon any subject, rather than upon the subject of religion."

You have chosen one of the best of missions, and as I learn are in successful prosecution of the same, the amelioration of the sufferings of humanity, restoring this mortal and perishing frame to life and vigor—the sick and afflicted to enjoyment and health again. Do you not perceive how important it would be, if you were enabled to heal their moral as well as their physical maladies—to pour the oil and balm of consolation into their moral as well as their physical wounds, and thereby in a manner hasten the cure of both? The Great Physician went about and healed all manner of disease that flesh is heir to; he healed the sick, gave sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, deliverance to the captive, and the opening of the prison doors to them that are bound in the chains of sin and oppression; no wound so deep that he could not probe, or no disease so desperate that he could not reach—truly all manner of diseases yielded before the touch of his plastic hand. Let me then enjoin upon you, earnestly desiring your happiness and welfare, to strive and pattern after that great Physician, study his precepts, and profit by his example; then will those sceptical principles that now darken your mental vision, vanish away like the mist before the rays of the morning sun.

Yours affectionately,

PHILOM.

VISIT TO THE POOR.

"There is a poor woman in this city, reduced to her dependence by the gradual failing of those resources which sometimes seem to come along in the events of Providence, and now in her old age she is dependent upon the different charitable associations who may relieve her. One society furnishes her with fuel, another with money to pay her rent, another with comfortable garments, and there seems a provision for every passing want, save that of food. She tells me she is often 'an hungered,' and the cause she ascribes, as I think aright, viz: to the apparent comfort which pervades her apartment. There is an extreme neatness about it. The mahogany table, made a half century ago, retains the polish of one in a rich drawing room; the bureau vies with the table in its shining surface; the bed is nicely made, with the 'patch covering' which belonged to the 'spare bed' of her marriage days; the antiquated looking glass has no specks upon its plate; the polished hand-irons have attained their brilliancy from being rubbed in an elevated position, her stiffened limbs refusing to bend; the nicely reddened hearth, and the two sticks carefully put together so so as to make a cheerful blaze; together with the 11st carpet in the winter, which is exchanged for the time worn, but spotless Kidderminster in the summer; every article in good keeping with each other, gives to the apartment, as I before said, an air of comfort, and even cheerfulness, beyond what we usually find among those we denominate 'very poor.'

Here sits the widow, day after day, year after year, rarely able to leave the house, being subject to rheumatic affection and other diseases of a prostrating nature, with her Bible for her library, and her trust in Him who there declares Himself the widow's God, dependent entirely upon the benevolence of those who may aid her. She sits alone! Who would not delight to bestow the means whereby that fire may still burn, and that heart be comforted?

In one of my visits, she remarked, 'I believe if I looked poor, I should be considered a greater object of charity; and yet,' said she, 'I can not part with any thing. I feel as if I could not.'

I replied, no one would wish it, did they know you. I should suppose the very neat and comfortable apartment which, by your toil, amidst suffering, is made to look so inviting, would induce many to visit you.

'Ma'am,' said she, (I give her own words as near as I recollect them,) 'I have had a visit that I must tell you about. Two ladies, who said they were sent to me, but refused to tell who sent them, came to see if I were really needy, as they had heard I was. They were finely dressed, and I endeavored to receive them politely. Soon after they were seated, they commenced staring about my room, remarking 'we were sent here to aid you, but really, you seem to be so comfortable, I think we were mistaken in coming.' 'Why,' said one of them, 'you look as neat as any body.' And here the old lady shrewdly remarked, 'as if poverty and dirt must go together.' 'I am sure,' added my benevolent visitors, 'you can not have suffered much, or you would have parted with your nice table, or bureau, or looking glass—not many poor people can keep such things, you know.'

This was a sensitive spot, which went to the poor woman's heart. She indignantly recoiled from further conversation, and only answered, 'My table I eat upon; my bureau contains my grave clothes, and my glass shows me if I am clean in my person.' They probably read her feelings, and bade her 'Good morning,' remarking, 'we may call and see you again.' Who could wonder, as she related the story, she added, 'But I hope I shall never see their faces again.'

The facts are, that these relics of 'better days' (as the world calls all prosperous days) she looks upon as old friends, and now husband and children are all dead, if she can derive any satisfaction from surveying those mute articles which recall associations so tender, when that table was well spread, and its provider was at its head, and the olive-branches around its sides, is it not a cruel suggestion, that she should put them away to buy herself bread? They make her home less desolate, and sometimes for days when her famished frame has craved food, she has withstood the temptation to part with her furniture, till the deliverer came with the needed supply. 'Why, the very day those ladies came,' said she, 'I had not a morsel of food to eat, and yet, I would not tell them of it. Had they found me squalid and dirty, with my hand-irons broken, and my chairs without a back, sitting upon three legs,' she ludicrously added, 'I supposed they would have believed me poor!'

The poor woman's self-respect is still left; and she often weeps that she is dependent upon the mercies of the world. Now who will not write a chapter upon the important qualifications of making our visits to the poor acceptable.—Ladies Repository.

DEATH OF REV. THOMAS F. KING.

BY MISS C. W. BARBER.

Who preached beside thy bed,
Thou pale and dying saint?
Thy lips were white as clay—
Thy frame was weak and faint;
But still with thrilling voice
You spoke of life and glory,
And deemed that o'er thy couch
Was told salvation's story.

Methinks I see thee now,
With high uplifted hands,
Listening as if ye heard
Some voice from angel bands;
And then with accents strong
I seem to hear thee say,
While rapture kindles in thy eye,
"Great preaching here to-day!"

Who knoweth what you heard
In those bright dying dreams—
Perchance you caught high eloquence
From where the "white throne" gleams—
Perhaps you heard a voice
Ne'er heard by mortal ear—
No wonder that you thought
"There is great preaching here."

There were strong ties which bound
Thy spirit down to earth—
Thy fair young children wept,
Hushed from their noisy mirth—
The partner of thy early life
Stood near with streaming eye,
But with a smile you turned from all,
And thought it "gain to die."

You know there was 'round them
The strong protecting arm
Of One whose foresight could discern
And shield from every harm—
Oft had you poured out balm
To heal thy neighbor's wound,
And now you proved your faith
Was not an empty sound

"Glory to God!" dwelt long Upon thy dying tongue—
How wildly sweet it rose
And in the hushed air rung—
Pass on! those were fit words
With which to meet thy God,
And tread the golden courts,
By mortals never trod.

"The next time I saw him, and the last while he could speak, it was very obvious that the balance of his mind had given way—that reason had partially, at least, deserted its throne.—After a wandering glance of his eyes about the room, he closed them apparently with the deepest reverence, and lifting both his hands in the most solemn manner, one peculiar to himself, for no one could fully imitate it, he exclaimed in a fervid and loud voice, "There is great preaching here to-day! there is great preaching here to-day."—See Happy Death Scenes.

CHANGE AFTER DEATH...NO. I.

BY REV. W. N. BARBER.

"Behold I show you a mystery; We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed." PAUL.

A very strange idea has gone abroad in Christendom, that for man there is no change after death. It is said that the present life is one of probation; and that the characters we form here, we shall retain forever. Before I yield assent to this doctrine, there are a few questions arising in my mind that must be answered; and in this, and one or two more articles, I propose offering them to the public; and should they meet the eye of any one who believes this stale and hackneyed notion, and thinks himself able to defend it, such an one would confer a favor by answering them.

If there be no change after death, will the future world differ in the least from the present?

For aught I can see, this question must be replied to in the negative. Does a man die intoxicated? to all eternity he will be a sot. Does a man die an infidel? Though he be brought into a situation in the future state where he will have ocular demonstration of the truth of Christianity, he will continue a stubborn unbeliever forever. Does a man leave the world as did Napoleon Bonaparte, calling on his soldiers in his last moments to rush to arms? As long as the throne of God endureth, he will have the same fighting propensity, and feel himself competent and qualified to govern empires. In fine, if the idea of no change after death be correct, people in the eternal world will have all the various passions and appetites that characterize the present life. We shall find there men of every occupation, doctors, lawyers, mechanics, merchants, preachers, politicians and pedlers. We shall also meet with all grades of character, from a Howard's to a murderer's. Misers will be there, grasping for gold; robbers plundering, and libertines seeking the indulgence of animal passions. Meek, unassuming, and practical moralists will be there; and there we shall find noisy church-goers, and impudent, ill-bred revivalists, together with little armies of unreflecting men and "silly women" to give them countenance and support. Hence I infer that if there be no change after death, the future world will not differ one whit from the present.

MORAL LAWS GOVERN NATIONS.

Such is the symmetry by which the moral world, equally with the physical, is governed, that even nations as well as individuals are subject to the eternal and unswerving laws established by the Creator. In taking a retrospect of the great drama of human action, we necessarily discover that there are two imperative injunctions imposed upon nations by the eternal mind, both of which must be strictly complied with, before they can enjoy the greatest amount of happiness attainable by mortals—viz., that they themselves individually, as nations, must not only conform strictly to the requirements of the divine law; but that they must also extend their efforts to induce all the habitable globe to pursue the same laudable course. For were they to establish, and even carry into execution, the ideal republics of Plato, Fenelon, Hardington, &c., (which were predicted upon the nature of man as he should be,) still the exquisite happiness resulting from the perfection of their government, would necessarily be marred by the lawless aggression of surrounding nations.

In turning over the pages of history, how forcibly are we impressed with the idea, that nations are under the immediate control of undeviating laws, which mete out rewards and punishments to observers and infractors, with a mathematical exactness!

The Egyptian nation in early stages of its existence, when its laws were politic and its rulers wise and restricted in the exercise of their jurisdiction, prospered beyond calculation; and its people were affluent and happy; but as soon as its princes transcended the limits of their authority, and superstition was introduced into their religion and incorporated with their civil laws, dire misery overwhelmed the people, and destructive wars the nation.

Persia, which once extended from the Hellespont to the Indus, and could boast of her Babylon and her Ninevah, and the corporative happiness of her people; by her wanton departure from that rule of conduct engraved in bold relief upon the face of nature, was Belshazzar-like, stripped of her greatness, and her people made menial vassals and tributaries of other nations.

Greece, once the abode of sages and school of science, whilst her virtue remained, beheld her people amply enjoying the benefits of life, and sustaining herself against the united powers of the world. But she, too, at length, by her civil contentions and a reluctance to disseminate her treasures of excellence among contiguous nations, ultimately prostrated herself at the feet of autocracy.

Rome, the seat of empire and mistress of the world, in her juvenility richly enjoyed the prosperity and happiness consequent upon a virtuous system of national policy; but lawlessly extending the limits of her jurisdiction, and cruelly oppressing other nations, and hoarding up in her garners the wealth extorted from them, she literally wrought out her own destruction, by inviting invasion from the avaricious and barbarous tribes of the north and south.

And finally behold old England on the verge of ruin, trembling and tottering beneath the uplifted hand of offended nature, expecting every moment the blow that will strike her to annihilation! She may oppress the poor—impose arrogant restrictions upon other nations, and dictate to empires, but she can not conquer nature, whose arm is omnipotent, and is never thwarted in her main operations.—Many years may elapse—many revolutions may fertilize Britannia's soil with human gore—many millions yet unborn may groan beneath her despotic sceptre—yet as certain as London is within her dominions, her iniquity must ultimately precipitate her into the gulf of destruction. JUVENIS.

Brs. H. H. Watson, Venice; Wm. B. Cook, Scott; E. Carpenter, Speedsville, having signified their intention to preach the everlasting Gospel, request their names entered into the minutes of this body as applicants for its fellowship.

Delegates present.—Chester Clark, Cyrus Glass, Mottville; John Case, Lucius Robinson, Onondaga; Calvin Jenks, Levi J. Osborn, Speedsville; Henry Boynton, Daniel W. Dodge, McLean; Samuel Brown, Wm. H. Coffin, Auburn; Abram Mudge, Orrin Parsons, Cortlandville; Nathan Howard, Luther N. Fuller, Niles. Total 14.

Tuesday evening and Wednesday morning we enjoyed the privilege of listening to the communications of Br. T. Whittemore. Wednesday afternoon we were entertained and instructed by our venerable Br. H. Ballou. During the evening of that day the installation of Br. H. L. Hayward took place. The service was interesting, and was conducted by brethren in the following order:—

Reading select Scriptures, H. Van Campen. Introductory prayer, N. Sawyer. Sermon, W. S. Balch. Installing prayer, S. Miles. Charge, H. Ballou. Right hand of fellowship, A. G. Clark. Address to the Society, H. Ballou.

The brethren to whom we had the pleasure of listening thus far during our meeting, were returning from the Convention at Akron, and could tarry with us only one day of our session, hence we had the best wine at the commencement of the feast.

On Thursday sermons were preached by Brs. H. Van Campen, A. G. Clark, and S. Miles, in the order of their names. The usual addresses were given by Br. Miles.

The weather during the session was good, and the congregations were large and attentive. Our friends in Auburn received us with open hearts and doors, and we were amply and bountifully supplied by their hospitality, for which they have our hearty thanks.

We regret that all the societies in the bounds of this Association were not represented, and that so few of the preachers were present—the rest being absent from home.

The most perfect harmony prevailed in council, and our hearts were made glad by the intelligence that the cause of the Restitution is making such rapid and successful progress in its limits. The Society in Auburn have made choice of a worthy and efficient Pastor, who will feed them with knowledge and understanding. May the blessing of God rest upon them, and strengthen the word of union that unites them; may their mutual efforts for the advancement of truth and righteousness be blessed until they shall overcome all opposition by the spirit of love, and the cheering message of the Gospel gladdens every heart, and corrects every evil practice. H. VAN CAMPEN, Clerk.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

EDITED BY

Revs. A. B. Grosh, G. W. Montgomery and A. C. Barry.

UTICA, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1843.

A FOOLISH ARGUMENT.

It is frequently said to us by believers in Partialism, Why, sir, if I believed as you do; if I believed that all mankind will be finally holy and happy, I would indulge every evil passion and propensity I have; I would do all the evil I could, and keep out of the reach of the civil law. Now this may be consistent with the feelings Orthodoxy begets in the hearts of its believers; but it is certainly a very poor comment on the religion such persons profess. To our mind, such remarks betray either the corruption of the heart or the weakness of the head. It, however, gives us a practical view of the good old Orthodox doctrine which we used to listen to in our younger days; that the way of sin in this world is pleasant; that there is more unmixed happiness to be found in this life in wickedness, than in the pure and holy religion of Jesus; and that if it were not for the fear of the judgment and hell, Christians would cease to pray, and turn into, if not demons, the very wickedest of human beings. What a pure and holy love towards God; what a chastened and devotional spirit; what a Christ-like temper and disposition; what a child-like gratitude, and humility, and obedience; what a heavenly peace; what ecstatic joy and heaven-kindled rapture, are, by such teachings and remarks, made to be the legitimate offspring of Orthodoxy!! Its love is inspired by the flames of hell, and its obedience by the fear of endless torments. And if what these persons tell us be true, is it any marvel that when they forget the miseries of hell, they should be guilty of such gross wickedness as they often are? For if the fear of an endless hell be the only thing that restrains them from wicked actions, of course, when that restraint is removed, or is absent from their minds, they will give license to every unholy passion which they have engendered and fostered in the soul. But, after all, we can hardly believe that they "know whereof they speak" when they utter such unholy sentences as those above; but if they do—if they really speak what they feel, and what they honestly think of themselves; then our exhortation to our readers is, beware—keep out of their way; for if they should happen to forget their creed, there is no telling what evil would be visited upon your innocent heads.

But, I repeat it, I can not altogether believe that those persons who use the language above as an argument against Universalism, fully consider what they say; for if they did, it does not seem to me that they would use an argument which, instead of bearing against Universalism, proves conclusively either that their religion is bad, or that their hearts are very corrupt. And my prayer is that they may be converted to a knowledge of God's everlasting truth, so perfectly as to be enabled to see the beauty and glory there is in the religion of Jesus, and to feel the bliss there is in supreme love to God, and universal charity to man. H. B. S.

BR. MORSE IN REPLY—AGAIN.

I give the following reply of Br. Morse, verbatim et literatim, without any contradiction, explanation, or comment of or on, any of its statements; for the reason, that Br. Morse may have nothing further of mine to reply to. I give Br. Abbott's note, also; because as he has been referred to, he should, in justice, have the right to say how far others have spoken of him truly, or incorrectly. His note is so framed that it appears to me to call for no reply; and while I think so, none will be inserted—so that here this matter ends, so far as I am concerned with it, either as party or editor. This assurance will, I hope, satisfy those brethren who have urged me to allow no more on that subject to appear in our columns; and as for others, if there are any, I can only say, I can not now satisfy them also. A. B. G.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

Br. Grosh—Having a "wish to reply again," not "to the two brief notes above," for those "notes" have not been replied to—but on the subject to which said notes refer; which reply is required by the notes contained in the Mag. and Adv. of Sept. 8th. I am glad you have so kindly expressed the "hope" that I "will do so;" and if I do not make the subject as "interesting" to your readers as it is to me, (though I have no extraordinary emotions on the subject) I would prefer an expression from some of them, rather than an intimation from you for them.

1. "Determined to controvert even to the last word." 1. To controvert in a suitable manner is lawful and right, and has been practiced by Christ and the Apostles, by philosophers, statesmen, philanthropists, &c., to dispel the mists of error from, and shed the light of truth upon the human mind. In a controversy, one of the parties must have "the last word." It is therefore not necessarily criminal "to controvert even to the last word." 2. Is it not your common practice to have "the last word" in your published controversies by remarks in brackets, notes, &c? 3. If you mean that I am very tenacious to have "the last word," I think you are mistaken. If you do not mean this, why give any intimation susceptible of such a construction? It is immaterial to me who has "the last word," provided false lights and shades are dispelled from the subject.

2. It seems you would have an Editor strike out a part of an article prepared by you for the press or "the whole of it" (do you mean annihilate it? If not, why "strike out" at all when the whole is rejected?) "even to condense the whole of it as Br. Price did, if needed." 1. There is a wide difference between condensing an article, which has been published, and giving notice thereof at the time of the condensation—and originally publishing an author's production, professedly as his production; first mutilating it, without giving any notice of the mutilation. One seems to me to be fair, the other unfair. 2. "If needed." The Editor must of course be the judge of what is needed. This rule, if I mistake not, makes every author's production, in the hands of an Editor like "clay in the hands of the potter." If this rule should be adopted and admitted; I see not why an Editor might not consistently allow, either individuals or public bodies to be attacked even by falsehood, and then refuse to publish a defence or refutation; or to state that he had received any! 3. I thank you for promising to deal with my articles as I requested; though it seems to be an exception to the rule you have established for yourself, or for editors in relation to you. As a writer, I would not have my productions mutilated, nor as an editor would I mutilate the productions of respectable and responsible authors without due notice or consultation.—If we can not see this subject alike, I hope we shall continue to see and feel the exercise of mutual charity and forbearance. Yours in the bonds of the Gospel, P. MORSE.

Henderson, Sept. 20th, 1843.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

Br. Grosh—In No. 36, present volume, in Br. Morse's reply to your note of August 25th, speaking of the minutes of the proceedings of the Black River Association he says, "If I had not made other additions more than one vote would not have been recorded at all." Now I can not believe that Br. Morse meant to insinuate that any important vote would not have been recorded. If he meant to be understood with reference to votes generally, that more than one vote would have been omitted, I can not say but what it would be right. For where so much was to be written, it would not be strange for a clerk to leave out some small votes, on arrangements, questions of order, &c., &c. But I think there was one large vote that ought not to have been passed, and never to have been recorded.

I see there have been some words with regard to my voting for the resolution touching Br. W. H. W. I wish to say that I did not vote for it, neither did I vote against it, as was the case with several that could be named. I well knew the state of feeling that existed. I knew it would pass. But before it did, I stated to the council that I believed it to be unconstitutional, and that it would be a foul stain upon the records of our Association, or words to that import. For I believe that this publishing a man as guilty, before he is proved so, and thus exciting public opinion against him without a chance of defence, is contrary to the spirit of our holy religion. G. S. ABBOTT.

Dexter, Sept. 18th, 1843.

NOTES FOR MY FRIENDS.

Schools.—Massachusetts is rapidly realizing, and some of her school districts have already realized, the desire, that the common schools should be the best schools. In Charlestown, I am informed, no select or private school can be sustained—the common schools in every instance being so good as not to be excelled by any attempt hitherto made. This is as it should be. It would sound not only ridiculous but barbarous to talk of supplying the lungs of the people with common air so inferior for the purposes of respiration, that the few must have select breathing spots through which the pure air could be reached. Every one would cry out for a general and thorough purification of what was so necessary to the life of the individual and the well-being of the State. Yet the atmosphere of the mind may be corrupt and abominable—the very nutriment of the soul may be deficient in quantity and quality for the "common people," and no adequate efforts be made to remedy the evil; because the remedy costs a few dollars per month extra, which few dollars are lavished on select schools!

I visited two schools in Charlestown, and was much delighted with nearly all I saw and heard. The system of education seems nearly perfect. The foundation carefully laid in the primary schools, is thorough and perfect; and the habits of correctness in behavior and learning there acquired, are carefully built upon as the pupil advances onward and upward. If any fault could be found, it would be, that the reading, writing, &c., of the scholars was too uniform—to exactly alike—stereotyped, if I may use the phrase. This uniformity begets a suspicion that it is all by rote—morely mechanical.—But on examining the scholars in reading, they readily analyzed words—giving the sounds and uses of each letter—and sentences, giving the omitted words, and transposing the members so as to give the sense in the clearest manner—thus showing that every part was thoroughly understood. I think I never met with as many good, accurate readers, not only in any school, but in any company. And these schools, be it ever remembered, are for all; for there are no other schools in the place—rich and poor, white and colored, here meet as the children of Massachusetts, and receive the same excellent training and instruction.

The teachers of these schools are raised, generally, from among those who have been educated in them—and are promoted gradually, according to their merits. Assistant pupils receive about $50 per annum; assistant teachers, a higher rate; teachers of primary schools receive about $250 per annum; and teachers of the higher schools, at from 600 to 800 dollars a year. In Boston, the head teachers of the principal schools receive salaries of from 1000 to 1500 dollars per annum—which may be considered the highest stations in the profession, to be filled by those only who have proved themselves superior teachers.

The East wind, of which I had often heard as being disagreeably cold and uncomfortable, I found by experience to be a very fair mixture of all that is disagreeable in our winter South wind, and our Fall western wind accompanied by cold shower. It not only goes through the clothes and skin to the bone, but appears to reach the very marrow. But bad as it is, I suppose a body may get used to it.

Homeward.—Having lengthened my stay one week longer than I intended, it may be well to shorten these notes to make up for it. I will therefore conclude by saying that I left Boston at 7 o'clock A. M., October 2d, and reached Utica at 3 A. M. next day—in 20 hours. I made no stop, for I became anxious to get home—and well it was I did reach it; for I was taken down shortly after my arrival—the evening of the same day—with a severe bilious attack, which required prompt, active treatment. By this course, I have got rid of my physician for a few hours to day, (Thursday,) to prepare copy. I hope to be able in a day or two to attend to matters as usual.

HISTORICAL SKETCHES: BY BR. S. R. SMITH.—This small book has afforded me so much pleasure and instruction, during the reading intervals allowed me during a brief but severe illness, that I can not forbear adding my humble recommendation to that already given by Br. "H. B. S., Ed. pro tem." Many of the anecdotes and sketches had been heard by me from the lips of the author himself, years ago—others were learned now in print—yet all alike seemed new yet familiar—like a faintly remembered event of early life. There is much of the author in the style of the anecdotes—such an occasional flash of his peculiar aptness and power—and so much of his own busy life mingled in the events he describes, that it really seems like hearing Br. Smith once more by his own fireside. It is to be regretted that the illusion of naturalness is broken in upon by his speaking of himself so much in the third person, as "a certain preacher," &c. It is not the frank, free, easy social manner of Br. S., at all, at all. The pleasure of reading was also much marred, especially to a nervous invalid, by the blue spotted, dark colored paper, on which the book is printed, and the numerous, gross typographical errors by which the pages are defaced.—Br. S. R. S. deserves to have his thoughts (and the subject also should be) recorded on the whitest and best paper, and with the best typography. He is also correct in his own orthography, except one word which he spells almost invariably with a very "short cut" across three silent letters—and yet, strange to say, the proof reader has not failed once to print that word correctly, while nearly every other important word has been, somewhere or other, marred in its fair proportions!—But to most readers, indeed to all of steady nerves, these faults of paper and type are mere trifles—and even to myself while deeply interested, it required two or three in rapid succession to engage my notice. The book is one of the most interesting to the denomination that has ever issued from the press—to it the future historian of our cause in this country, will resort for many of his materials. Let it be well read also by our preachers—it will teach them what trials were patiently endured by our fathers in the ministry in this State.

A. B. G.

Br. ASA DICK.—Melancholy, but not altogether unexpected, was the news of this good brother's departure for the spirit-land, which was announced in an obituary notice contained in this paper, No. 39. One fact should have been noticed in that obituary, even though it might have added to its length; for he merited all that could be said of him. Br. Dick was an Indian of the Brothertown tribe, in which he always held the office of Peace-maker, or reconciler of the disputes and misunderstandings that arose among his red brethren. He was ever an active man among them, and enjoyed their confidence. In their removals to the west, (the region of Green Bay,) he always aided largely, and several times went with them to their new home—once, but a few months before his decease. He began life poor—without any school education; but by his habits of industry and economy, aided by excellent business talents, he acquired a handsome property, which, by a series of misfortunes, he leaves greatly embarrassed—and by his close observation of men and things, he acquired an excellent fund of general information. But his main characteristic was his high sense of honesty—his warm and active benevolence—his Christian liberality to all denominations, combined with a decided preference for his own—and a constant, unaffected piety and devotion to God and the Saviour.

His hospitality was warm, easy, and free—I shall never forget it—and it was the hope of my heart to be able, on my return from the East, to attend the Conference in Marshall, and again, and probably for the last time, see Br. Dick amid his family and under his own roof. But he had departed ere I left, though I knew it not—and even had sickness not prevented, one strong inducement to go to the Conference was taken away with him. It is a pleasure to know that he died as he had lived, a Christian—a Universalist, yet acknowledged to be a Christian by all of every denomination who lived in his vicinity, whether of Indian or European descent. And greater is the consolation of believing that we shall meet with him in that world, where all shall be one in Christ, and where his desires for the harmony and unity and happiness of all will be overflowing gratified.

MRS. SCOTT'S POEMS.

It must give great pleasure to almost every admirer of this departed sister's productions, to learn that the first volume of her collected works are now being prepared for publication by Br. Tompkins, of Boston.—While there, I had the pleasure of seeing some 70 or 80 pages of the work in proof sheet. It is edited by her friend, Miss S. C. Edgerton, who has prefixed a brief Memoir of the author, to the work. This biographical sketch is well written, and will be found quite interesting. A portrait of Mrs. Scott, engraved by Sartain, also accompanies the work. Sartain is hardly to be excelled for his mezzotint work, and the likeness is so striking as to bring the original vividly and most painfully before me. It has the fulness of health combined with the languor of illness, and presents the countenance in a state of complete repose. The ever-speaking and rapidly varying countenance of Mrs. Scott could not, of course, be transferred to canvass or paper. The poems will contain all her best poetic writings that were published in the Casket, Saturday Evening Post, New Yorker, and our various Universalist periodicals; and, probably, some that never were published at all; but of this last I am not certain. A stipulated sum on each copy of the work will go toward defraying the expense of educating her child.

The work will probably appear during the present year—in November or December—and should the sales warrant, will undoubtedly be followed by another volume containing her prose writings, edited by the same faithful friend. We have no doubt that a large edition of the poems will be sold readily, for their own merits demand such a substantial testimony from Universalists generally.

THE ROSE OF SHARON FOR 1844.

I am unwilling that our readers should forget to treat themselves to a copy of this annual for each family that can at all afford it; though I have not yet been able to peruse it entire myself, during my absence from home, and the other duties that have occupied my time. But what I have read of it, though only by brief snatches, has delighted me much with its pages. Its articles are interesting, and profitable—all, so far as perused, evincing a polish of style and depth of thought, and a high order of talent. And then it is cheap—so cheap compared with other annuals. A large duodecimo, splendidly bound in morocco, gilt, with four or five beautiful engravings, and filled with choice matter from many able pens—all for two dollars only. Surely all ladies and gentlemen of taste will desire to supply themselves with copies either for their own use, or to present to some chosen and beloved friend, or more than friend, as an appropriate token of pure affection. Grosh and Walker are agents for the work, and keep it for sale at this office.

A. B. G.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Br. Wm. Paul—I will order Grosh & Walker to give you credit for $6.25—you can then order what you want of them. Discount off, and that is the balance—postage paid by myself.

Brs. Billings and Thornton, I have sent you 500 copies of the Companion and Register, directed to you at Ann Arbor, Mich. You gave no other direction; but I trust they will reach you in safety and in time.

Br. Davis Bacon, you may make what appointment for me you please, on the fourth Sunday inst. I have written you as requested.

Our copy drawer is again nearly empty. May we not hear from a number of our friends very soon? We need a constant supply of favors of almost every size and kind, only so they are well and plainly written.

A. B. G.

THE UNIVERSALIST COMPANION, WITH REGISTER AND ALMANAC FOR 1844.—Now is the time for our preachers to supply themselves, that the friends in every district may be able to get copies in time. Being a periodical they can be sent by mail at a moderate postage. Cash orders always promptly supplied at this office, at the publisher's prices. Send in ones, threes, fives, or tens, and a proper number of copies of the work will be returned as the order may direct.

"ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE DIVINE GOVERNMENT BY T. SOUTHWOOD SMITH."—This admirable English Unitarian work—admirable whether we regard subject, style, argument or spirit—forms the 4th and 5th numbers of the "Select Theological Library" of Brs J. H. Gihon and Co. It forms a large, beautifully printed and covered pamphlet of 100 large double columned pages; which are furnished at only 25 cents per single copy—very cheap indeed—one third only the ordinary price of the book.

Do Universalists realize the importance of sustaining.

liberally this Select Theological Library?—the cheapness of works got up this way, and the excellence of the works thus furnished! It is to be hoped they do. This work of Dr. Smith's is one of the very best in the English language, to convince a thinking man of the truth of Universalism. Let it be widely circulated. For sale at this office. A. B. G.

CONFERENCE at BRAMAN'S CORNERS.—A letter from Br. H. Lyon desires us to give notice that the First Quarterly Conference of the Hudson River Association will be held at Braman's Corners on the third Wednesday and Thursday in October, instant, instead of the second, as named in the Minutes of the Association, for special reasons not necessary to name here.—[Messenger. (See Religious Notices.)]

THE EXPLOSION IN LOUISIANA.—We received yesterday a slip, which should have reached us earlier, from the Louisiana Chronicle, containing particulars of the loss of the steamboat Clipper while leaving Bayou Sara. She blew up just as she was leaving her moorings: all her boilers burst simultaneously and the whole vessel was hurled in fragments into the air. Many of the pieces fell upon houses three hundred yards from the scene of the disaster. The hapless victims were scalded, crushed, torn, mangled and scattered in every possible direction—many into the river, some in the streets, some on other side of the Bayou, nearly 300 yards—some torn asunder in coming in contact with pickets and posts, and others shot like cannon balls through the solid walls of houses at a great distance from the boat. The Chronicle thus pictures the scene presented at the temporary hospital to which the dead and wounded were removed:

"The floors of the two large ware-rooms were literally strewn with the dead and dying, and others pouring in as fast as it was possible to convey them—praying, groaning, howling and writhing in every possible contortion of physical agony. In the midst of this confusing din, up to their arm-pits in oil and cotton and bandages, we found our praise-worthy physicians—like good Samaritans doing good—quietly and silently, but with the energy and activity apparently of fifty pair of hands—now washing a burn, now dressing a wound, now splinting a fractured limb. Indeed, our citizens generally, every man and mother's son, appeared only anxious as to how they might render most service to the poor sufferers—white and black, without distinction."

The crew consisted of 43 persons; of which 28 persons were undoubtedly killed. One of the passengers, Mr. L. Thomas, of Bayou Sara, is missing.—[Tribune.

Gov. Morton has appointed Thursday, the 30th of November next, to be observed as a day of Thanksgiving and Prayer, in Massachusetts.

Gen. Wm. A. Mills, of Mt. Morris, Livingston county, had a pair of oxen at the Cattle Show at Rochester, which weighed 6250 pounds.

The Buffalo Gazette states that Benjamin Rathbun, had returned to that city, and been visited by many of the citizens.

LARGE SQUASH.—We have had at our office for two or three days, a Squash of the mammoth kind, weighing one hundred and eleven pounds, raised by James G. Redfield, Esq. of this town. It is the largest we ever saw, and has attracted many visitors. It will be exhibited at the Fair this day.—Delaware Gazette.

A YOUNG PRINCESS.—The London Times says that the Princess Christophe, of Hayti, gave birth to a daughter on the 29th of Aug. Mr. Elkins, surgeon accoucher, of Foley Place, was in attendance. The Princess Christophe is only 16 years of age, very interesting and pretty; and we believe, this is the first instance of an African Princess giving birth to a child in that country.

A band of native pirates at the Isle of Pines took possession of an English merchant vessel trading there in April, and massacred most of the crew. The captain, who was on shore at the time, succeeded in regaining the vessel, principally through the desperate courage of the mate, who had remained on board, and as a last resource, blew up a cask of powder, which sent the natives and a large portion of the vessel into the sea.

STATISTICS OF LUCIFER MATCHES.—One of the witnesses before the Childrens' Employment Commission in London, stated that he is a maker of the boxes for containing Lucifer matches; and for the American pine wood of which he makes them, he is in the habit of paying the large sum of $1000 a year. According to his belief, from 12,000 to 15,000 of such boxes as he manufactures, were made every week in London during the year 1841. Each box contains 50 matches. Upon these data, the sub-commissioner calculates that the weekly consumption of lucifer matches amounts to 97,200,000, or 5,055,000,000 yearly!

NATIONAL LITERATURE.—We received the following epistle yesterday from one of Uncle Sam's P. ## MEDITATIONS BY THE SEA-SIDE.

BY J. O. ROCKWELL.

I stood by the shining sea—when all the west
Glowed like a weltering furnace in conmotion
When every cloud in glory was at rest,
And balmy breezes fanned the golden ocean;
When the south sky was blue as violets are,
(Save some reflection from a sunlight billow.)
And rain-drops wavered in the evening air,
From drooping flower, and bush, and leaning willow.

I stood by the shining sea—and gazed away,
First on the sky, then on the towering mountains—
Then on the lesser hills that stretched away,
Then on the sea, and then upon the fountains—
And felt, while thus I sent mine eye abroad
Upon this brilliant scene, that is diurnal,
That the universe was fashioned by a God,
And that he dwelt in all, o'er all, eternal.

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE INQUISITION AT MADRID.

In the course of a lecture delivered a few days ago, in the chapel of Brown University, Col. Lehmanowsky gave a most graphic description of the capture and destruction of one of these establishments, by soldiers under his own command.

In the early part of the year 1809, Napoleon commanded all the buildings occupied by the Inquisition to be destroyed. Col. L. requested Napoleon to give him a command in an expedition against one of these dens of vice and cruelty. (If I remember right it was the Inquisition of Madrid.) "My request," said the Colonel, "was complied with, and I had the command of the 11th regiment of the line. Upon approaching the building we saw several soldiers on the walls. We summoned them to surrender in the name of the Emperor of the French; they turned and bent over as if conversing with some who were inside, and after carefully scanning our number, which was but small, they answered our summons by firing among us. Several were wounded, and one man killed. We then procured some heavy timbers, and by the united strength of all the men made a breach, and entered within the walls. As soon as we were inside, we had a specimen of the cunning jesuitism of these rascals. The whole company of priests and inquisitors, came towards us in a very humble attitude, with their hands crossed over their breasts, and the first we heard, these artful fellows were reproving the soldiers on the wall for having made any resistance, and for not having politely admitted these very fine gentlemen,—although it was, of course, by the directions of these very men, that resistance had been offered.—The only answer we gave was by placing a guard over these very obliging fellows, with directions to keep a sharp look out after them that none might escape.

Upon examining the interior of the building, we found it beautiful in the extreme; everything appeared quiet and in excellent order.

The floor of the principal hall was paved with slabs of fine marble, and at the end of this hall was an altar with several wax candles burning. The priests appeared so quiet and submissive, and every thing appeared so quiet and orderly, that my suspicions," said Col. L., "were almost lulled to sleep, (which was the effect they intended to produce,) and I began to suspect that a great many falsehoods had been told about the cruelties practised in these establishments. We could discover nothing of the secret rooms and underground cells, of which we had often heard, and I was upon the point of retiring with my men and leaving the building for the present in the hands of its old occupants, when a brother officer urged to a most diligent examination of the whole building. We proceeded to examine carefully the principal hall, to discover if possible, some trap door, or other entrance to the regions below. Some of the soldiers tried to thrust the points of their bayonets, others of their swords, between the slabs of marble, but all without success. I was upon the point of giving up, when it was suggested that water should be poured over the floor to see if it would find an outlet through the crevices. After watching the water carefully, we ob-observed one place where it evidently escaped between the slabs—"Ah," said some, "what's here? we shall make some discoveries now"—while the captive inquisitors stood by shaking with fear.

Presently a soldier struck a heavy blow with the butt-end of his musket on one side of a slab when all at once a spring seemed to give way, and the slab at once turned into a pivot by which it was fastened at the two sides, disclosing an opening, and a staircase leading to some dark cavity below.

I at once walked up to the altar and seized some of the lighted candles, when one of the bald-pated priests stepped up very sanctimoniously: "O, my son, these are holy candles, you must not touch them." "But," said the Colonel, "my only reply was—very well, I want them for a holy purpose. I want to see holy things." Below we found an apartment of considerable size, furnished with settees, &c., which we knew by the infernal contrivances to be the hall of torture. We went round and soon discovered an alley, and on each side of this alley a number of dark and gloomy cells. In these cells were a large number of the victims of the popish cruelty, young and old loaded with chains, and some of them, women as well as men, literally as naked as their mothers bore them. The soldiers threw their coats and cloaks over these poor miserable wretches, and loosing them from their chains, proceeded to help them to the hall of judgment above ground.

When the soldiers had provided for the safety and comfort of the weeping wretches, they turned their attention to the inquisitors, and insisted upon putting them all to death. In their excited state of feeling," said the Colonel, "it would have been in vain for me to oppose their will.

Among other instruments of torture, we found an image of the Virgin Mary, so contrived with spikes, knives, &c., that when a person went to kiss it, the arms closed and the victim was pierced with a thousand wounds, and cut to pieces. The soldiers insisted upon the chief inquisitor kissing this image; he refused; they pricked him with their bayonets and compelled him to do so, when the arms closed and he was cut and hacked to death in a most shocking manner. After taking out the most valuable books and other valuable articles, we placed a number of barrels of gunpowder in the building, and setting fire to the train, soon had the satisfaction of seeing this horrid abode of cruelty a heap of smoking ruins.

After we had seen the end of the inquisition, we invited all in the neighborhood whose relations had been torn from them by the officers of this bloody tribunal, to come and convey to their homes such of them as they could find alive; "And," said the Colonel, "never shall I forget that sight! The soldiers whom I commanded were used to scenes of blood, the sight of human misery and slaughter had become so common to them, that they could eat their meal, with none the less relish because they were using the dead body of a comrade for a seat; but when they saw this miserable company of living skeletons standing before them, and their anxious relatives pressing around to discover their long lost loved ones—when they saw, now a weeping father or mother embracing, as though they had recovered from the dead, a beloved son—then a husband clasping in his arms the half murdered mother of his children—and then a weeping wife and mother turning in despair from the search after a beloved husband and father, convinced that he had found a grave in these horrid dungeons—when these iron hearted warriors witnessed this sight," said Col. L., "they wept and sobbed like children."

BABOONS.

Lieutenant John Shipp, in the account of his amusing military adventures describes several rencounters he had with the baboons near the Cape of Good Hope. "On these hills, (says he,) whole regiments of baboons assemble, for which this station is particularly famous. They stand six feet high, and in features and manners approach nearer to the human species than any other quadruped I have ever seen. These rascals, who are most abominable thieves, used to annoy us exceedingly. Our barracks were under the hills, and when we went to parade, we were invariably obliged to leave armed men for the protection of our property; and even in spite of this, they frequently stole our blankets and great-coats, or any thing else they could lay their paws on. A poor woman, a soldier's wife, had washed her blanket, and hung it out to dry, when some of these miscreants, who were ever on the watch, stole it, and ran off with it into the hills, which are high and woody. This drew upon them the indignation of the regiment, and we formed a strong party, armed with sticks and stones, to attack them, with the view of recovering the property, and inflicting such chastisement as might be a warning to them for the future. I was on the advance, with about twenty men, and I made a detour to cut them off from caverns, to which they always flew for shelter. They observed my movement, and immediately detached about fifty to guard the entrance, while the others kept their post; and we could distinctly see them collecting large stones and other missiles. One old grey-headed one, in particular, who often paid us a visit at the barracks, and who was known by the name of Father Murphy, was seen distributing his orders, and planning the attack, with the judgment of one of our best generals. Finding that my design was defeated, I joined the corps de main, and rushed on to the attack, when a scream from Father Murphy was a signal for a general encounter, and the host of baboons under his command rolled down enormous stones upon us, so that we were obliged to give up the contest, or some of us must inevitably have been killed. They actually followed us to our very doors, shouting, in indication of victory; and during the whole night, we heard dreadful yells and screaming; so much so, that we expected a night attack. In the morning, however, we found that all this rioting had been created by disputes about the division of the blanket; for we saw eight or ten of them with pieces of it on their backs, as old women wear their cloaks.—Amongst the number strutted Father Murphy. These rascals annoyed us day and night, and we dared not venture out, unless a party of five or six went together.

One morning, Father Murphy had the consummate impudence to walk straight into the grenadier barracks; and he was in the very act of purloining a sergeant's regimental coat, when a corporal's guard (which had been relieved) took the liberty of stopping the gentleman at the door, and secured him. He was a most powerful brute, and, I am persuaded, too much for any single man. Notwithstanding his frequent misdemeanors, we did not like to kill the poor creature; so, having first taken the precaution of muzzling him, we determined on shaving his head and face, and then turning him loose. To this ceremony, strange to say, he submitted very quietly; and when shaved, he was really an exceedingly good looking fellow, and I have seen many a 'blood' in Bond street not half so prepossessing in his appearance. We then started him up the hill, though he seemed rather reluctant to leave us. Some of his companions came down to meet him; but, from the alteration which shaving his head and face had made on him, they did not know him again, and, accordingly, pelted him with stones, and beat him with sticks, in so unmerciful a manner, that poor Father Murphy actually sought protection from his enemies, and he in time became domesticated and tame. There are many now alive, in His Majesty's 22d regiment, who can vouch for the truth of this anecdote.

Those who are so skillful in making excuses generally are those who have the most need of them.

A particle at a time will remove the world.

CHANGE AFTER DEATH....NO. II.

BY REV. W. N. BARBER.

"Behold I show you a mystery; We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed." PAUL.

In this number I propose calling the attention of the reader to the following question:

If there be no change after death, will there not be much virtue in hell, and much vice in heaven?

I know not how it may appear to others, but it verily seems to me that this query must receive an affirmative reply.

It must be apparent to every observant mind, that there is a class of men in the world who are good moralists, but who never make pretensions to any thing more. They are honest in their dealings, benevolent and accommodating as neighbors, good to the sick and poor, and by their good deeds and benevolent dispositions gain the respect of all. Still, they go through life and finally die, without ever meeting with a mysterious change "from nature to grace." There are thousands of this character who leave the world every year. The much-talked-of tear of repentance never washes the stain of guilt from their sin-polluted spirits; and according to the once popular theology, they go down, down, down, nobody knows where, for the story is, that hell has no bottom to it. Now if there is no change after death, these men, of course, will not be changed for the worse; the good characters they form here, they will retain forever. With all their virtues they sink into eternal perdition. Much virtue, therefore, according to the erroneous notion in question, will find its way into the murky regions of endless perdition.

Turn we now, and look on the other hand. Here is another class of men in community styling themselves new born creatures, whose natures have undergone, as they suppose, a radical change. They call themselves something more than mere moralists. Now I do not refer to them for the purpose of censuring truly religious men of any denomination. No, no—God forbid! Many of these men are good men,—are what we all ought to be; honest, peaceable, industrious, continent and faithful to their word. And some of them, I must say, are what we all ought to try not to be,—deceptive, tavern-hunting, tattling, mischief making people. But taken as a whole, they are nothing more than men; they have all the passions and imperfections of men. It requires as much caution to trade with them, they have as much thirst for riches and power, are as likely to quarrel with their neighbors abroad or in their families at home, as those to whom they profess to be paragons of piety. But these men have been born again, some of them three or four times over, and of course, expect finally to take up their abode in that heaven whose territories none but themselves ever will be permitted to enter. But instead of being "changed" at the resurrection from dishonor to glory, from weakness to power, from natural to spiritual and earthly to heavenly, they anticipate carrying all their evil propensities with them. But alas! if such be the case, I fear for them. If they carry these earthly-formed characters to heaven, I fear that it never will be a holy place. Will not those "professors" who cheat each other in trade, and wrangle and dispute here, be likely to do the same there? Will not those new-born creatures who tattle and slander here, be apt to tattle and slander there? In short, none are perfect here, and if there be no change after death, it is plain, that there will be no perfection in heaven,—that is, if anybody goes there. And with this theory before me, I see so much virtue in hell, and so much vice in heaven, that I am puzzled to conclude which will be the most desirable place.

People sometimes object to Universalism because the advocates of the doctrine teach that men are going to heaven in their sins. Nevertheless the blow aimed at us with this false weapon, it must be seen, rebounds upon the head of the assailant. Universalism teaches that men will be changed at the resurrection, and that no impure being can ever enter the immortal state. Who is it, therefore, that teaches that men will go to heaven in their sins?

Dummerston, Vt., 1843.

THE TEST OF CHRIST.

BR. GROSH.—It is not often that I trouble the readers of any religious paper with articles for their consideration; for the very good reason, that there are so many others that are better qualified to interest and instruct the public mind. But when I see many good and eminent brethren stepping beyond the bounds of religious liberty marked out by Christ and his apostles, I can not remain silent upon those subjects which interest the public generally.

It is well known to all believers in the Restitution, that for many years the pioneers of Universalism in the United States, laying aside their differences of opinion upon other subjects, united their efforts in promulgating the all-important truth, "God will have all men to be saved;" and success followed their labors. Our Murray, Winchester, and others no less worthy, would often meet in our ecclesiastical councils for the purpose of taking into consideration such measures as would tend to advance the cause of the Restitution, without creating disputes concerning some minor points of doctrine about which they differed as individuals. Universalism they considered to be a "land of liberty," and having drunk of its spirit they were willing to make love to God and man the only test of discipleship. For more than fifty years this spirit has been kept up in the denomination, causing the wilderness to rejoice and the desert to blossom as the rose.

But a change has come over some sections of our beloved Zion. In too many instances the harmony of our councils must be broken up by the introduction of preambles and resolutions, calling upon the denomination to acknowledge certain rites and ceremonies as the necessary attendants of a belief in Christianity. The time that should be occupied in the discussion of more important subjects, must be spent in useless debates about some few ordinances, which both our laymen and ministers had much better leave to the consciences of individuals, than to make laws about them that will be violated by those who differ from the (supposed) majority.

Many of our clergymen also seem to delight in selecting such subjects for their discourses as will lead them far from the glorious truths of a world's salvation from sin and suffering, and to dwell upon individual differences of opinion, and draw lines of demarkation between believers in Christ as the "Mediator between God and men." A short time since I attended one of our religious meetings, and a better meeting I am sure I never attended. We met as brethren should meet, to sympathize with each other, and to encourage and strengthen those who had undertaken the task of enlightening the blind, and giving to the weary rest in Christ. The first sermon was calculated to unite all hearts present—the preacher spoke of charity, of its power to heal difficulties, its liberality, and of its uniting heart to heart in sweet communion, and of its triumphs in uniting all souls to God. The next speaker spoke from the parable of the Prodigal Son. He described the love of the "Father of spirits" for his off-spring, of his regard for the welfare of the sinful and disobedient, and of the final return of all prodigals to the Father's house, drawn to him by the watchfulness and love of the Saviour. These were themes worthy of the attention of every Christian, as they have been themes upon which angel harps have been tuned. Then followed a discourse upon water baptism—upon immersion. The speaker said much respecting the church, its standing and importance, and of the duties of its members—and well did he perform his task thus far.—The next spoke of baptism by immersion. Faith and repentance towards God he considered to be necessary, yet God could not consistently forgive sins, until we were baptized (or immersed,) "or, in other words, without immersion there can be no remission of sins." All professed Christians who have not been immersed in water by some genuine Christian, (I care not how good they may be in conduct, or correct in faith, or devout in feelings,) are not true disciples of Christ!

Now I ask, what is the tendency of such preaching? Does it convince the unbeliever—does it lead us to embrace Christianity because it is liberal in all matters pertaining to the conscience? No, far from it. It makes true Christianity consist in an outward observance of some rite which can not affect the heart—it can do no good, because it is opposed to the teachings of Christ. When the woman came to Jesus while he sat at Simon's table, and knelt at his feet, and watered them with her tears, and wiped them with her hair, and kissed his feet and anointed them with ointment, Jesus knew that she was a sinner, and he knew that she thus humbly and silently asked for pardon, yet he did not say to her, "Go, and wash in some pool," as he did to a blind man upon a certain occasion. But he says "thy sins which are many, are forgiven thee; thy faith [not immersion] hath saved thee. Go in peace." Let us do likewise!

As much as I love this ordinance, I dare not say to my brother, who as firmly believes in, and practices, the doctrine of love to God and man, "Thy sins are not forgiven thee. Go not in peace, until you comply with my views of my duty." I love the ordinances of God's house, and I will use all desirable means to bring them into use in the church; yes, I should like to see all believers sitting at the table, and there break the bread and drink the wine in remembrance of their Lord—I would like to see brethren wash each others' feet in imitation of Jesus and his disciples, and all such as believe in the utility of immersion, buried with Christ in water. Yet I would have them observe these ordinances, because they are Christ's disciples—and not for the purpose of making them such; because their sins are forgiven, and not to cleanse them from sin; for "by this, (said Jesus,) shall all men know that ye are my disciples—that ye have love one for another"—and these ordinances administered in love, would tell to the world—"how these Christians love one another."

If those ministers and editors who preach and write so much about the ordinances, would first cultivate this heavenly principle of love, and teach it to others—would make supreme love to God and universal love to man the only religious test, and say and write less about other tests of discipleship, but urge upon the minds of community the appropriateness of the ordinances as appendages—and would at the same time, manifest a disposition to respect the opinions of brethren who are as good as themselves, though they may differ from them on some points of faith or practice—it would unite the members of our denomination, and make not only our faith and our hope, but our interest one. And let me say, in conclusion, to my brethren of the Central Association, let us be very careful not to interfere with the rights, liberties and opinions of our brethren; but if we differ on some minor points, let our faith remove mountains of jealousy and our charities cover all our neighbors' sins, and destroy our own.

"WHAT WAS THE DEVIL MADE FOR?"

Universalists are frequently puzzled with many curious and perplexing questions. It was my lot to be asked by a respectable lady of this place, not long since, "what the devil was made for?" "If Universalism be true, what was the DEVIL made for?" This was truly a puzzling question. If I gave her my notions of the devil and his use, of his origin and fate, it would be unsatisfactory. So my answer runs in this wise.

The Deity, from the morning of time, looked through all space to the end of duration, and beheld all things that would, in the whole process of time, come to pass. With his all-surveying eye he saw that the greater part of his intelligent offspring whom he was about to call into being, would remain, against his wishes, (for "he has no pleasure in the death of the wicked,") finally impenitent and disobedient, and desired to inflict on them eternal damnation. Not for their benefit, as a worthy and loving parent—not for the gratification or benefit of any of their fellow beings, did God desire this to take place; but as a sort of revenge, to gratify the spiritual nature of the immaculate Jehovah for their disobedience to him and to his requirements. This is not to take place to gratify the feeling, better the condition, or enhance the happiness of the saved; for as corrupt as human nature is, it can not desire the endless torment of its fellow nature. Especially would the nature of those heavenly feelings of the immortally "saved," desire a happier fate to dawn on the family of spirits of which they were a part. The most degraded wretch even, who wallows in the very mire of iniquity and vice, and seemingly does all in his power to blacken and deface the picture of human nature and the chart of human happiness, would be touched at beholding the child of endless woe; would shrick with horror as he listened to his bideous yells of despair, and exert himself to the utmost to snatch from his quivering lips the cup of ceaseless torment. The Deity, ever holding forth to his offspring that he is the unchangeable "Father of the spirits of all flesh," that his love is infinite, and therefore extends to all the children of his care, that his mercy is illimitable and "endureth forever," that he loves all the works of his hands and "never would have made anything to have hated it," was unwilling to perform the immediate work of damning endlessly so many souls himself,—and therefore created a malignant, personal devil to act as his AGENT. To accomplish this object, it was requisite that God should bestow upon him such power and disposition, as would enable him to inflict pains on the subjects of his wrath, with pleasure and rejoicings. So the Ruler of the universe made a malicious devil to execute judgment on the subjects of his displeasure, which compose about three-fourths of our race.

The devil, ever rejoicing in his work of destruction, goes about seducing all he can, from the path of virtue to the vortex of vice; and, owing to the frailty of human nature, succeeds in obtaining by far the greater portion; and in this he is peculiarly interested, for the more he gets, the more his own happiness is enhanced. So that all must see that he is bound by the strongest of all ties, namely, that of interest, to decoy the greatest possible number into his arms of death. The devil sits, at the day of judgment, and as the innumerable hosts of rejected spirits created in the image of the Most High, pass on to the judgment seat, triumphantly sings, as he contemplates his triumph over our Saviour, (for he has already three-fourths, and would fain see disappointed the travail of Christ's soul, and be satisfied with nothing less than whole),

"husbands and wives here must part; brothers and sisters here must part, must part to meet no more."

This is a favorite song of the devil's, for it expresses so admirably the feelings of his heart.—When he gets his unnumbered hosts of dejected spirits who are destined to irretrievable ruin congregated within the gloomy walls of hell, blackened with the venom of the serpent, crimsoned with the fiery indignation of God's wrath, and smoking with the sulphurous flames of the victim's torment, and they begin to repent of their sins as the "rich man," and beg to be released from this torture, and inquire why in justice they should be doomed to infinite woe for the finite deeds they committed in this world, the aged and affectionate parent can look down from his seat in the paradise above, and behold seven, and perchance ten of his natural offspring, wailing, wailing in torment, and exclaim, "you lived in sin in the world, neglected to secure your soul's salvation, and are now suffering the just demerits of your deeds—my cup is full to overflowing with joy in the Holy Ghost." When we look upon this heart-rending picture, which is naught but the faith of many devout worshippers at the altar of the Most High, our sympathetic nature shrieks within us, and humanity weeps. "What was the devil made for?" The Deity is the universal parent of mankind. His infinite power and goodness calls into being all classes and species of the human race. His benevolence watches over them and provides for their wants. He is good unto all, and his tender mercy is over all his works. He is the same loving and unchangeable Father in all circumstances and conditions of our life. He is the widow's God and the orphan's Guardian; the author of every good and perfect gift to man, who hears the young ravens when they cry, and affectionately supplies the natural wants and desires of all the children of his care. His presence is felt in all climes, and his beneficence extends to all people. The devil is vice versa. His character is the opposite of the parent of the universe. He seeks to destroy. He grasps the smallest inheritance of man and fiendishly dashes it into the depths of oblivion. He rolls the dark pall of ceaseless woe over most of mankind, and buries them in the grave of endless despair! He forever rolls the wheels of sin in the bosom of men, and their souls into the ruin of perdition. He throws the gloomy veil of ceaseless death over the greater part of our race, and forever shuts from their aching souls the slightest ray of peace and the minutest spark of hope. He delights to torture; this is his nature. Not a glimmer of joy can penetrate his demon-woven mantle; and gladden the soul of the wailing sufferer. All is gloom—all is dark forebodings. Their hearts lit up with no prospect or hope of escape.—He is the adversary of man; he seeks to bury all in one common sepulchre of eternal death. And "what was he made for?"

Is this the object for which the immaculate Parent of our existence gave him birth? Does he answer the object of his creation? And is he therefore an assistant of his Maker? If these questions are not to be answered in the affirmative, "what was the devil made for?"

PERSECUTION.

It is a remarkable fact that, in all ages of the world the identical people who were persecuted for opinion's sake, when they gained the ascendancy in power, invariably indulged in the same puerility. The Israelites, after enduring the most intolerable suffering in consequence of their Egyptian slavery, and clamorously condemning the cruelty of their oppressors, no sooner found themselves extricated from the tyrannical grasp of Herod, and established in power, than they began to persecute the Gentile.

The Christians after being scoffed at by Jew and Pagan, and driven as it were from human society, when subsequently elevated to power, exercised it with the same severity against their persecutors. In a more modern period, when they had silenced all Pagan opposition, and when all Europe cringed beneath the Roman pontiff, we find them turn the hellish torrent of persecution upon those of their own denomination. As the Huguenot slaughter, and the many thousand that died with excruciating torture, by the mandate of the infernal inquisition, fully testify. The Reformed church, being for many years the object of popish vengeance, when released from the folds of this monster, did not fail to mete out persecution to Dissenters, with the same malignity and unrelenting severity. Even the hands of the notorious Chalmers are stained with the innocent blood of Van Paris, and Joan of Kent. The Puritans, after being hunted and driven from home by the established church of England, found in turn their objects of persecution in America.—And so it may be said of all the multifarious sects and denominations of Christians, each in their turn have persecuted, and been persecuted. And finally, before concluding, one word to the Universalists who are now with a manly fortitude, writhing beneath the rod of persecution, wielded by Christian professors. If ever they ascend the throne of power, (which I have no reason to doubt, but every reason to expect,) let it never be said by after generations, that they too, (whose motto is, "freedom of discussion and no physical shackles for mind,") have disgraced humanity, and outraged common sense, by a participation in this cowardly and infinitely contemptible practice, of annihilating by scurrility and physical might, what they can not silence by a manly appeal to intellect and reason.

JUVENIS.

NOTE.—Juvenis writes carelessly, and hence uses words in an improper sense. Thus (and I have left the error stand uncorrected, purposely to show the necessity of, not only an author's being careful to write, but also of an editor's correcting what is sent him, by altering, adding, or omitting, as he may deem necessary—) in the sentence at the commencement of his article, he names Herod, a Jewish ruler in the days of Jesus, instead of Pharaoh, an Egyptian king in the days of Moses! We do not marvel that after this he accuses the Jews of persecuting the Gentiles for opinion's sake!—and this, too, when the Law of Moses is probably the only code of ancient religion that does not even allow—for the rest generally command—proselyting surrounding nations, neither by argument or by the sword. Has Juvenis ever noticed this remarkable fact? The Gospel of course does not allow persecution for opinion's sake.

Juvenis might have added another most remarkable instance of modern times in which the persecuted became persecutors in despite of all their professions of superior and almost exclusive liberality—I allude to the skeptics and deists and atheists of France—who legislated on their religion as zealously as ever did Catholics or Protestants, and made their penalties fall as heavily on the priesthood as ever the priesthood did on them. I agree with him, therefore, in cautioning Universalists to take heed how they stand, lest they fall—professions of liberality, as we have seen, are no surety against a persecuting spirit. In our opinion, nothing but a firm adherence to Christianity—the only unpersecuting religion suitable for civilized man—a firm belief of Christian truth, and adherence to the precepts and example of Christ, can keep a spirit of persecution out of the heart of man.

KNOWLEDGE.

I saw a child in the rosy dawn of existence. He was a fair, blue-eyed boy, and a profusion of golden curls half shaded his beauteous face. His home was where religion and education flourished, and as I passed that way, I saw his little form bent in prayer by his mother's side. I heard her voice raised in earnest supplications for that precious one and I heard her speak of the "dreamless sleep," and of Him who died that we might have a life beyond the grave.

Far away in the deep forests, I saw another child. He too was beautiful, but his complexion was dark, and his hair and eyes of a jetty hue.—

His mother doated upon him, and I saw her point to the greatest warrior of her tribe, and bid her son be like him.

When many years had passed away, I saw those beings no longer children, but men. I saw one in the house of God, rivetting the attention of an assembled multitude, by his powers of persuasion and eloquence. Piety and intelligence illumined his countenance, and he explained the truths of the Holy Book like one inspired. I followed him to his home, and saw cheerful faces gathered around his fireside; in his walks, I heard the poor and distressed whom he had comforted, bless him, and I felt that he was happy.

I saw the other—a fierce untutored Indian. He had a wife, but she was treated as a slave. He had children, but it was weakness to love them. In the battle and chase he was foremost, and his lodge was hung around with trophies of cruel deeds.—His aged mother was neglected, and his brightest dreams were of war and bloodshed. He was a creature to be pitied, for no gleam of light dispelled the midnight darkness of his soul.

As I mused upon the condition of those men, and marked the difference between them, I saw how important was true knowledge to a useful and happy life.

U. S. CONVENTION.

Akron, Ohio, Sept. 25, 1843.

Brs. Thayer and Minor—The Convention closed its meeting last evening. Though the Council adjourned on the 21st the friends would not consent to have the meeting terminate at that time. Hundreds had come a great distance, expecting that it would continue till Sunday night. Many of the clergymen expected that, and had made their arrangements accordingly. Thesequel proved that it was wise thus to continue the meeting. The attendance on the 22d and 23d was nearly as large as on the 20th and 21st; and on the 24th the congregation was larger by several hundreds than on the previous day. Besides, the interest in the meeting did not abate in the least. On the contrary, it seemed rather to increase.

I have never attended a Convention with which I was so much pleased as this. The people all came to hear, and they listened with devout attention to all that was said. For order and decorum the people excelled any numerous gathering I ever saw.

The number present was variously estimated. Some thought there were three thousand in attendance on the last day. From what I was informed, I think there is no exaggeration in saying, there were four thousand different persons at the meeting, though I can not think that there were 3000 persons at any one service. There might have been however. Though the house would hold 600, and the awnings spread on the side of the house was very large, hundreds could not obtain seats on the last day, and were obliged to stand around the awning, and on the opposite side of the church.

The preaching was very able and effective.—There were sixteen sermons delivered. Sunday [Tuesday] evening Br. Rogers preached. Wednesday, Brs. Gurley, Balch and Skinner. Thursday, Brs. Ballou, Sawyer and Whittemore. Friday, Brs. Hawes, Brown and Hathaway. Saturday, Brs. Todd, Ashton and Pingree, and Sunday, Brs. Cook, Skinner and Gifford.

My limits will not permit me to speak of the different sermons, though I must say a word in relation to that delivered by father Ballou. He had travelled 800 miles to attend the Convention, and there were many hundreds present, who, though they had never seen him, had been brought to rejoice in the truth by his labors, a great anxiety was manifested to hear him. I never saw such a strong regard and deep reverence for a man as was manifested by the friends generally. They all felt that the denomination owed more to him than any other man. It gave me great pleasure to see these manifestations of love and esteem; for none who have known father Ballou, will hesitate to say, he richly deserves them. He is not only an old and able soldier of the cross, but on all occasions he has proved true to the interests of our Zion. His sermon was equal to the occasion, and the circumstances under which he was placed. It more than met the expectations of all who heard him, and was one of his happiest efforts. His reasoning was strong and clear; his allusions to the occasion and his declining years, happy; his delivery effective. The old gentleman seemed to have renewed his vigor, and to have restored to him for the occasion his native fire and pathos.

I wish to say a word in relation to the sermon by Br. L. C. Todd. This is the man who a few years since renounced Universalism and joined the Methodists. He is the one too who wrote a book against Universalism from which Campbell in his discussion with Br. D. Skinner, and Matthew Hale Smith in his lectures make such large quotations. He has renounced his partialism, and been received again into the fellowship of the Universalists. He appears to be a humble, devout, sincere man. He at times has been greatly depressed in mind. It was in one of his seasons of depression that he left us and wrote his book. The friends have entire confidence in him, and think that he has acted honestly in all he has done.—When he left us he was in good standing, and has uniformly borne an irreproachable character.—He is not therefore, to be classed with M. H. Smith, who renounced Universalism after the Universalists had lost all confidence in him, and he could not gain admittance into the church where he had preached for two or three years. I listened to the sermon by Br. Todd with great pleasure. He is a good speaker, and a powerful thinker. He has two qualities of mind not often united, viz., strong reasoning powers and a fine fancy. As a preacher he is excelled by few. His reasoning was not only very strong, but original, and his language bold and beautiful. His sermon did great good.

There was not much business of importance transacted. Two amendments to the constitution were proposed. The first changes the name of the Convention, and the second extends its territorial limits. The objects of the change is to embrace our friends of the British Provinces.

Some resolutions on slavery were passed. They were the best I have ever seen. There was but one dissenting vote.

The friends at Akron gave us excellent accommodations, and are entitled to our warmest thanks. The Convention adjourned to meet in Baltimore.

Yours, etc., O. A. SKINNER.

REASONS FOR BEING A UNIVERSALIST.

"Because, though sorrow and grief have so widely and so long prevailed in the world, yet, "The Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces." Isaiah xxv: 8. "There shall be no more sorrow nor crying." Rev. xxi: 4.

"Because, though death with all its evils entered into the world by sin, and passed upon all men, for that all have sinned; yet "He (God) will swallow up death in victory." Rev. xxi: 4. "Death the last enemy shall be destroyed." 1 Cor. xv: 46.

"Because, though all have sinned after Adam's example, and come short of the glory; yet "The Lamb of God taketh away the sin of the world." St. John i: 29.

"Because, though the death that followed transgression affected both body and soul, and for any thing that men could do would have reigned forever; yet in the purpose of God it was not eternal; for he hath said, "death, I will be thy plague; O grave, I will be thy destruction." Hosea xiii: 14.

"Because, though the way to the garden of Eden was closed and guarded by Cherubim, yet Christ hath opened a new and living way to the favor and presence of God; for Jesus hath "entered into heaven itself," now to appear in the presence of God for us." Heb. ix: 25.

CONFERENCE OF THE ST. LAWRENCE ASSOCIATION AT SOMERVILLE.

On the 27th and 28th of September a Conference was attended at Somerville, St. Lawrence county, which, on many accounts, was peculiarly interesting and useful. It was anticipated with high expectations, which, in the sequel, were fully realized.

As there was no house of public worship in that pleasant little village; it became necessary for our Christian friends to make some provision to accommodate the multitude when assembled for public worship: and they very judiciously prepared a store room and an adjoining shed with temporary seats sufficient to accommodate 600 or 800 persons. Nine ministers were present, viz. Brs. Hall, Swan, Wood, Wilcox, Boughton, Worden, Abbott, Morse and Potter: and eight sermons were delivered by Brs. Abbott, Wilcox, Worden, Potter, Boughton and Morse, which were heard with profound attention, unwearied patience and undisguised satisfaction by the increasing throng of devout worshippers of "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named."

The singing led by a Mr. Condat, was unusually spirited and animating, and gave a rich zest to the solemn and delightful social worship of our common Father in heaven.

On Thursday afternoon Br. B. Hall was solemnly ordained as a minister of the Gospel of universal reconciliation. Order of ordination services.

1. Voluntary from the Choir. 2. Reading select Scriptures by Br. Wilcox. 3. Hymn. 4. Introductory prayer by Br. Worden. 5. Hymn. 6. Sermon by Br. Morse. 7. Voluntary by the Choir. 8. Ordaining prayer by Br. Boughton. 9. Delivery of Scriptures and charge by Br. Potter. 10. Right hand of fellowship by Br. Wilcox. 11. Addresses by Br. Morse. 12. Voluntary by the Choir. 13. Benediction.

Br. Hall is entitled to the confidence of a Christian community for his moral worth, and to the approbation of all those "who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity," for his faithful and successful exertions in building up the cause of Gospel truth in that portion of the moral vineyard of God in which he labors.

Our Christian friends in Somerville greeted those who came from abroad with salutations of peace and good will, and bountifully supplied their temporal wants during the meeting, and gave evidence of the purifying and healthful influence of the grace of God upon their hearts.

After the close of the meeting a subscription was presented to raise funds for the erection of a Universalist church in that place; and in a few minutes with a few names, one third part of the necessary sum was subscribed. May the Lord prosper and bless them forever. During the whole meeting harmony and love prevailed.

"Thus in the heavenly hills,
The saints are blessed above,
Whose joy like morning dew distils,
And all the air is love."

DEDICATION AND ORDINATION.

On Thursday, September 14th, the new Universalist meeting house in Madrid, St. Lawrence co., was solemnly consecrated to the glory and worship of the one living and true God. The services commenced at half past 10, A. M., and were as follows:

1. Voluntary by the choir. 2. Reading Select Scriptures, by Br. S. W. Squire. 3. Hymn. 4. Introductory prayer by Br. S. W. Squire. 5. Hymn. 6. Sermon by Br. W. H. Waggoner, from Psalms cxlv: 1, "I will extol thee, my God, O King: and I will bless thy name forever and ever." 7. Dedicatory prayer by Br. Job Potter. 8. Anthem by the choir. 9. Benediction by Br. W. H. Waggoner.

This is a neat and convenient house, and enjoys the advantage of a very fine location, being situated in the more elevated part of the village. It is built of wood, after the Gothic order. Its dimensions are 42 by 63 feet. It is an interesting monument of the liberality and zeal of "The First Universalist Society of Madrid." Long may it stand as such, and thither may all its members repair on every Lord's day, to extol and bless their common Father.

Br. D. Mott, the pastor of this Society, was ordained in the afternoon of Thursday. Services as follows:

1. Voluntary by the choir. 2. Reading of the Scriptures by Br. S. W. Squire. 3. Hymn. 4. Prayer by Br. W. H. Waggoner. 5. Hymn. 6. Sermon by Br. Job Potter. 7 and 8. Ordaining prayer and charge, by Br. Potter. 9. Right hand of fellowship by Br. Squire. 10. Address to Society by Br. W. H. Waggoner. 11. Benediction by Br. Mott.

A very large congregation was in attendance, throughout all the services of the day, and gave the most undivided attention to every part thereof. Eyes "unused to the melting mood" were seen to shed tears of contrition and joy, and the soul seemed to be overflowing full of the glad tidings of the Gospel of a world's salvation. Upon the whole, the Dedication and Ordination at Madrid, will long be remembered as an occasion of the deepest interest; and we most sincerely pray that the Society in that place, (which is composed of some of the best men of the town,) with its young but talented pastor, may see even brighter days than they have yet enjoyed. They have been prospered—may they prosper more abundantly.

W. H. WAGGONER.

Canton, Oct. 3, 1843.

CONFERENCE IN PROSPECT.

By a letter from Br. Davis Bacon we learn that this Conference had nearly proved a failure, by the almost total failure of preachers to attend it. It is in the Mohawk River Association. Brs. Kibbe and Hathaway were absent at the U. S. Convention—Br. Skinner, I believe, was busy about some matters at home, and Br. Hicks faithfully attended, though at a late hour. Of preachers out of the Association, none had been relied on with any confidence, I believe, except Br. Soule and myself. I was absent in Boston, and Br. Soule if he went must have gone alone, and borne the entire expense (about $5.00) out of his own pocket. He did not feel it his duty to do that—especially as it was not in his own Association; and so, at a late hour, after considerable hesitation, he gave up the idea of going. Had I been at home we would probably have gone together, and by dividing the expense of a hired conveyance, made the burden endurable. Such, I believe, are the excuses and apologies of all the preachers concerned, and they present all the reasons I am acquainted with, why there were not more preachers at Prospect. And now for the doings of the Conference itself, as furnished by Br. Bacon's letter. Br. B., it will be remembered, has lately commenced preaching, and resides in Prospect, and was therefore placed in a very embarrassing situation by the almost failure of the Conference. His letter was not written for publication, but the extracts we give, contain nothing but what is perfectly proper, and indeed should be given to the public.

A. B. G.

Prospect, Sept. 24th, 1843.

Br. Grosh—Our Conference has been held, and I now sit down to give you a little account of it.—The weather was very pleasant, and between 9 and 10 o'clock of the first day the people began to collect, so that by the time of the usual commencement of services, a respectable congregation had assembled—but no preacher. The reason we could not divine; but we waited, expecting every moment that some one would arrive; and in this way time slipped along until near one o'clock. Many of the people getting quite impatient, we then concluded it best to have an intermission of an hour, in which time probably some minister might arrive, and we could take some refreshments and be ready for afternoon services, should one arrive.

But we collected again after dinner—and still no preacher. Some almost began to murmur; had they not been Universalists, I should have expected much more of it. Finally some began to start for home; but others not willing to give up so, having come from 10 to 15 miles, urged me into the desk, without the least preparation. I reluctantly commenced the services, that I might keep the people together a little longer; for I still had hope that some preacher would yet arrive. I acted from the spur of the moment; and as I always speak extemporaneously, I had nothing prepared more than would be suggested by the occasion, at the moment of speaking. But I succeeded beyond my expectations, and kept the people together the best part of an hour; but I had one invaluable help, that was excellent singing. A few minutes after I closed, as we were about to disperse, giving up in disappointment, Br. Hicks arrived, and in fifteen minutes we had him in the desk speaking. He gave us a good extempore discourse and another in the evening.

In the morning I again took the desk, with only an hour or two of preparation, and was followed by Br. Hicks. In the P. M. he gave us another long and excellent discourse—as, indeed, were they all, all excellent. The singing was still better this day, than the day before; and thus ended our Conference.

Though we were sadly disappointed in not seeing and hearing from those ministers whom we confidently expected—although some went away, and many did not attend that would have had they been here—yet over all this, we had a good meeting, and I believe a profitable one. Why were not Br. Skinner and Br. Soule present? Did you (all of you) account us unworthy of eternal life, because we have just started in a religious course? For my own part, I could bear the disappointment very well; but it gives our Partialist friends a chance to talk of our indifference—"your ministers, (say they,) don't care anything about you; and if I believed as they do, I'd be so too—I'd not travel away out here, over these hills, just to preach Universalism." Respectfully yours, DAVIS BACON.

OPPOSITION IN RACINE, W. T.

The following card, which we copy from the Racine Advocate, a secular paper published in Wisconsin, will show the means used by sanctimonious looking pretenders to godliness and piety, when they wish to put down Universalism or prevent its spread among the people. And yet these Pharisees will talk about the licentiousness of Universalists!—will lie for a theatre's sake, and pretend that Universalists are immoral and irreligious!—will defraud neighbors out of their just rights, and then talk about "a God all mercy is a God unjust," and affirm that Universalists deny the justice of God!!!—Wonder what kind of truth, morality and justice these men believe in?—we know by this sample what kind they practice when they would serve God by attempting to put down Universalism. They will find, however, that there is a moral sense in community, planted deep in the human heart by Almighty God himself, which will rise in detestation of such mean iniquity, and cause their tricks to recoil on their own pates. By this moral sense, when duly enlightened, Universalism will yet be recognized as the truth of Heaven, and sustained against all opposition. Here is the card. It is the same referred to by Br. A. C. Barry in his account of his tour to Wisconsin.

A CARD.

As there has been a misunderstanding respecting the occupation of the Court house, in this village, on Friday evening last, and as the Universalist society had the right to the use of the same, for that evening, but were prevented from gaining admittance, it has been deemed advisable, to present a brief statement of the facts in the case. On Sunday evening last, the Rev. Mr. BARRY, after lecturing in the Court house, and before the audience withdrew, announced that he would lecture again in this village, on the following Friday evening—being his last discourse here, before his return East, at such place as might be agreed upon. The Universalists, knowing that the Baptist Society had the use of the Court house, on Friday evenings, for their regular prayer meetings, called upon or the leading members of that church, on the subject of obtaining that house, which was kindly relinquished by the said society, to the use of the Universalists, for that evening, they having before had the goodness to do the same. Accordingly the meeting was published in our village newspaper.

Subsequently, we learned that there was to be a theatrical performance in Racine, on the same evening, and that they designed using the Court house for that purpose. On Friday, the remark was frequently made, that the theatre would be held there. One of the Trustees of the Universalist church, the same gentleman who obtained permission from the Baptists, called again upon the member of that church, by whom permission was granted to use the house—as the report was, that the Baptists had relinquished their right, in favor of the theatre—who stated, that that was not the fact, but that it was given up to the Universalists. After fully investigating the matter, it was found, that H. T. SANDERS, who has been appointed District Attorney, for Racine County, by the Board of Supervisors, who have been in session this week, acted a very conspicuous part in defrauding the Universalists out of their just rights, by using falsehood and misrepresentation.

At the time appointed for the meeting of the Universalists, they, and their friends, assembled; some had come from a distance, expressly to attend that meeting; when they found that the theatrical corps, and their allies, had taken possession of the house, and refused to give up the same, saying that they had been promised it on the Sabbath previous, by MATTHEW B. MEAD, President of the village; and also, had the consent of the Deputy Sheriff, and the Board of Supervisors; which last was corroborated by WILLIAM H. WATERMAN, another person who has always acted a conspicuous part in our county—he stated, that a majority of the Supervisors had been promised a free ticket of admittance to the performance, on condition of their giving consent for the use of the Court house.

LETTER FROM AN OPPOSER.

The following was received during our absence from home. It is given now as a mere sample of the indefinite and pointless letters we frequently receive from anonymous opposers, notwithstanding that propriety, and our frequently published rule, require that the real name of writers be given us, if they would secure our attention.

Utica, Sept. 16th, 1843.

Mr. A. B. Grosh—Sir, I saw a piece in your Almanac of 1844, headed Universal Salvation. You ask, does God feel averse to such an amount of holiness and bliss existing in his universe—is he opposed to the destruction of all evil and misery?—You say certainly not; so say I, but I would say to you, that Christ wept over Jerusalem, and said how oft would I have gathered you as a hen gathereth her chickens, but you would not. And for farther particulars I would refer you to Matthew x: 15, 28; vii: 13 and 14; viii: 12; xviii: 3 and 8; xxiii: 37; xxv: 41 and 46; John v: 28. 2 Thessalonians i: 7, 8 and 9; Hebrews ix: 27; and Revelation xx: 11 and 15.

Now, then, since these passages are so plain that a wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err, how important it is, that we try to persuade mankind to repentance, and tell them that unless their righteousness exceed that of the Scribes and Pharisees, they shall all likewise perish; or, in other words, they shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven. Yours respectfully, G. W. B.

"Now, then," what is there in all this letter of a definite character, or bearing on any special point? G. W. B. agrees with the very article he writes as if he intended to oppose it. And, as if in opposition, he refers to Christ's weeping over the prospect of the temporal destruction of Jerusalem! What has that to do with endless sin and endless suffering in another world? He then refers me "for further particulars" to a number of passages of Holy Writ, not one of which makes any denial whatever of the final cessation of sin and suffering—or affirms the endless damnation of sinning and torments! I might as well refer G. W. B. "for further particulars" to Weem's Life of Washington. "Now, then," he says these passages are so plain that a wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein. Admitted—and why then does G. W. B. refer me to them as if they taught the doctrine of endless sin and misery, or denied the doctrine of final universal holiness and happiness? Why does G. W. B., who is neither a wayfaring man nor a fool, err in understanding them, when they so plainly teach nothing against what I believe, nor in favor of its opposite? Does G. W. B. suppose that Universalists, and especially Universalist preachers and editors, are unacquainted with the passages he refers to—that we have never read and considered them, so as to understand their meaning? I can not think that he believes us so ignorant and careless. Yet, if he does not deem us such unfaithful readers and teachers, why does he not show us our error in understanding these passages—why does he not take up our frequently published views of these very texts, and show us wherein we have erred in our expositions of their meaning?—Frequently have we published our explanations of those very texts, giving our reasons for dissenting from the popular construction of them, and showing that the most learned and candid commentators in the ranks of our opposers—Drs. Clarke, Campbell, McKnight, Wakefield, Whitby, &c., &c., &c.—gave essentially the same explanation of them that we do. If G. W. B. was in earnest, why did he not show wherein our views of these passages were wrong—wherein his own Commentators were mistaken in regard to them—and wherein lay their strength and pertinency as proofs of the endless continuance of sin and woe in God's universe, and against God's will and desire and purpose? The probability is, that G. W. B. is a young man, and full of zeal—that he has received his knowledge of the Bible and religion from the lips of others, rather than from his own careful and thorough examination of the Bible, and its expositions and commentaries—and that therefore, without much reflection on the subject, he wrote his letter. He certainly is ignorant of Universalism, and the texts and arguments by which we defend and support it, or he would not have referred us to some of the passages named in his letter—nor referred us to any of them, without showing wherein or how they applied to the subject.—Take Hebrews ix: 27 for an instance. What is that passage? But a part of a sentence, making no sense whatever of itself. Take it with its context, and what is it? Not an affirmation teaching any thing directly, but a comparison. And a comparison between what? Between Jesus "our High Priest," and the "men" who were high priests under the law—between his sacrificial death "in the end of the world," and their sacrificial death "once every year"—between their appearing with the Judgment (on the Urim and Thummim in the breast plate of Judgment) to the children of Israel, after their entrance into "the Holy place" of the Temple, and Christ's appearing "the second time without sin unto salvation," to all who looked for him. And this comparison, the summing up of the preceding chapters, when misquoted and mutilated, is urged as proof of a great day of judgment in another world!!—is set forth as a prop to support the horrid, unscriptural, and God-dishonoring dogma of unending sin and torments!!!

G. W. B. and we are agreed in the importance of trying to persuade men to repent and believe the Gospel, and to do works of righteousness. This is a work Universalists are very actively engaged in. We preach that the righteousness God requires, must be induced by love of Him, and not by fear of an endless hell—that the repentance He asks, is that induced by "the goodness of God," and not a fear of the devil—and that it must consist in love to God supremely and to man universally, and not in mere outward show, loud talk, and much profession. The righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees was to make long and loud prayers; to perform their devotions publicly, that they might be seen of men; to trumpet abroad their alms, that they might gain the applause of the religious world; to be full of professed zeal, compassing sea and land to make proselytes, and punctiliously paying tythes of mint, anise and cummin, and performing all manner of outward forms and ceremonies—all these things they did, and were proud of them, esteeming themselves righteous and despising others—but they neglected fidelity, judgment and mercy, they despised the poor and the sinner, and oppressed the widow and the orphan. "Such righteousness can never give entrance into the kingdom of God, which is at hand; for that kingdom does not consist in outward forms and appearances and empty professions, but "in righteousness, peace, and joy in the holy spirit." And so Universalists teach—and for this all true Universalists labor—whether G. W. B. knows the fact or not. And the strongest motive we can find to lead men to repentance and faith in God, and to induce them to enter into this kingdom of heaven by a practical and experimental knowledge of its power and goodness, is that very doctrine which G. W. B. seems desirous of opposing—viz. that "God is love"—that He "is the Saviour of all men"—that finally he will be "all in all."

In conclusion—for really our subject has led us to say four times more than we intended when we began—if G. W. B. wishes to show us (our readers) our error, our columns are open to him—only let him do his work—if he refers to what he considers proof of endless sin, let him show that our views of that proof are wrong, and that the text does really teach the doctrine of ceaseless transgression. If he will do thus, we will listen to him patiently, and answer him respectfully, publicly or privately—but if he will not—if he will persist in treating us as if we had never read our Bibles, nor what our opposers have to say for their views and against ours, and as if his understanding of a text is the only sense it will bear; why then, we must in all candor advise the young man to save his labor and use his time for some more hopeful understanding. We have been all over his ground, and believe we are as well acquainted with it as he is—and we have for about 20 years very faithfully examined ours, and are perfectly willing to be shown any errors any person can point out in it. We want the truth, and the truth only, let it come from where it may. But we do not want assumption, and error, and ignorance, and will not willingly receive them, as God's truth. If G. W. B. or any one else can give us any truth we have not already, or will take from us any error we now hold, we will most thankfully bless their labors. Will he do it? A. B. G.

VISIT TO WISCONSIN.

Br. Grosh—On Monday, August 14th, I left home for the "Far West," having long entertained a desire to visit our friends beyond the great lakes—with several of whom I had corresponded—and to ascertain something relative to the prospects of our wide-spreading cause, in that far-off section of this mighty Republic. I will pass by an account of my journey, and say that I was landed at Racine from the steam packet Illinois, on the morning of Monday, August 21st, at half-past two o'clock; having travelled a distance of thirteen hundred miles—by way of the Upper Lakes—in a few hours less than one week's time.

Racine, the county town of Racine county, is a fine, flourishing village, beautifully located on Lake Michigan, 25 miles above Milwaukee, and 65 miles below Chicago. Its settlement was commenced in 1836 or 1837, and it now contains between 1200 and 1400 inhabitants. An excellent harbor is being built at the mouth of Root river, which when finished, will add much to the importance of Racine, as also to its growth and prosperity—making it second to none, perhaps, on the Lake.

My first call was on Mr. Ly Brand, a merchant, by whom I was cordially welcomed to Wisconsin. I had long corresponded with this gentleman, and was right glad to take him by the hand, for I knew that he possessed an excellent heart, from the deep interest he manifested in the cause of impartial grace. With other brethren I soon became acquainted, among whom I may name Mr. Stebbins and Mr. Parmelee; the former of whom removed to this place from Clinton, N. Y., at an early period in its settlement.

Sunday, August 27th.—To day—for thus reads my Journal—for the first time held forth in Wisconsin.—We had three exercises, agreeable to public notice.—Owing to the rain, but few were in attendance in the morning—more came in the afternoon, and in the evening the schoolhouse—which was a large one—would scarcely contain the congregation that assembled. A Series of Lectures which I delivered—two of them in the court house—were afterwards listened to by very respectable audiences, and with much apparent interest; and I have reason to believe, that they were blessed of God to the furtherance of our holy cause, in this portion of our Master's vineyard.

Our friends in Racine have occasionally, for a year or two past, enjoyed the labors of Br. Barnes, whose praise is in every place where he has been; and now, through his instrumentality, and the constant accessions to their numbers, they feel themselves able to employ a preacher one half of the time, and to build a house of worship. They are warm-hearted, active and devoted; and with a pastor as faithful and true as themselves, they could not fail of prospering beyond any society in their midst. They have already effected an organization, and are doing what they can of themselves to advance pure and undefiled religion among their fellow men.

Southport, the next place that I visited, and where I preached the second Sunday after my arrival in the Territory, is also situated on Lake Michigan, 10 miles above Racine, and is a flourishing village of the same number of inhabitants. It is a place of extensive business—has a pier or steamboat landing, and efforts are being made to obtain for it a harbor; which when obtained, will enable it to keep pace with its sister villages on the Lake. In Southport, as in Racine, we have many warm-hearted and active friends, who are anxious to have stated preaching among them, which they have never yet enjoyed. They are both able and willing to support a preacher half of the time, and support him well; but they must have one (to use the language of a correspondent) “faithful and true, and well qualified for the calling.” Such a one would be warmly welcomed—hearty co-operated with, and would find his labors greatly blessed.

I think Br. Barnes wrong in the statement made in his paper concerning the friends in Southport, and the condition of the cause. There are Universalists there—excellent men and women, with the spirit of our doctrine in their hearts, and who do honor to the profession they have made. They must therefore have been misrepresented to him; and from our acquaintance with Br. B., we know he will do them and the cause the justice to correct what is so manifestly wrong.

In Southport, I preached two discourses on the Sunday named, and gave several lectures on week-day evenings, to intelligent and respectable congregations. As I have already more than intimated, there is nothing to prevent a large and flourishing society being built up in S. And with a preacher of our faith there, a house of worship would soon be erected, and filled, with attentive and devout hearers. Esq. Kimball pointed out to me several beautiful lots, either of which were at the service of the friends whenever they wished to build. And more than this he will do; for he has means, and will be liberal. In addition to this gentleman, I became acquainted with Major Davis, Mr. Rounds—a correspondent—and Esq. Eastman—men of intelligence and moral worth, to whose kindness and hospitality I feel myself greatly indebted; as also to the attention of my friend Welsh and family, who were for a short time members of my congregation in this place.

On Wednesday evening, September 6th, I lectured at the house of our friend Judge Berry, recently of Homer, Cortland county, N. Y.; now of Rochester, Racine county, Wisconsin. Here, too, my parents, and brother, and sister reside. The congregation was not large, though very attentive. Br. Bartholomew is laboring in this vicinity a portion of the time, to very good acceptance. Believers are already somewhat numerous, and the number is constantly increasing. The same may be said of Troy, and other places west of Fox River. And go where he will, the preacher finds in this beautiful country, men and women hungering for the bread of God. Certain I am, that had I been six preachers instead of one—and that one none of the best—I could not possibly have answered the demands upon my time and labors.

Saturday, September 9th, bidding my friends in Racine (whom I ever shall remember for their great kindness,) adieu, I took my seat in the stage, bound for Milwaukee, where I arrived late in the afternoon of the same day.

Every body has heard of Milwaukee, the Emporium of Wisconsin. It, too, is situated on Lake Michigan, 180 miles from Mackinaw, 90 from Chicago, and 910 from Buffalo. Its settlement was begun in 1836—it numbers now between four and five thousand inhabitants, which fact exhibits a rapidity of growth not much, if any, excelled by the history of any place. There are, in this village—or city, as it is called—eight religious societies, six of which have churches, the Universalist society being included in the number.

But few sermons have every been preached in Milwaukee by clergymen of our order. Br. Barnes has occasionally extended his labors as far as here, and it is due him to say, that it is measurably throught his instrumentality that our cause in this place owes its establishment and present prosperity. In saying this, we do not forget those who have toiled with him, and nobly seconded his efforts. They have accomplished that which deserves to be told to the world. With no preacher among them, and assisted only by the occasional services of one whose field of labor was far away, they have builded them a sanctuary, much as Potter of old builded his—in the hope that God would send to them a minister of the reconciliation.

Public notice to that effect having been given a week or more previous, I delivered three discourses, in my humble manner, on the Sabbath following my arrival, to very respectable audiences. I was much gratified with the profound attention that was paid to the preached word, and the deep interest that was manifested. And I am confident from what I witnessed, and the information I derived from highly respectable sources, that nothing is now wanting but regular, stated services on the Lord's day, to ensure the rapid and permanent progress of our cause in this city.

My stay in Milwaukee, though short, was a pleasant one. Every attention was paid me, and all I had to regret was, that I could not remain longer. But my visit was limited to a few weeks, and it was necessary that I should return home to my society and family who would be expecting my arrival. I accordingly left on board the Madison, bound for Buffalo, Tuesday morning, September 12th, and reached Fort Plain the Monday following, having been absent five weeks, travelling during this time nearly three thousand miles, and preaching fourteen discourses.

To conclude—my visit throughout was a very agreeable one, and one which I shall always look back upon with pleasure. Friends seemed to multiply around me as I remained, from whom it was hard to part; and every where I saw the principles of a pure, Gospel faith taking root, and felt that a day of triumph was at hand. Universalism needs only to be preached faithfully in the West, to have it prevail rapidly over every other system. But Wisconsin has but one or two, to proclaim the Gospel in its fulness, though there are multitudes waiting to receive it, to whom the doctrine of the Restitution would come as the water of life.

The opposition in the places I visited, though powerful, is nothing to what it is with us at the East. In one instance it prevented a meeting that had been appointed, an account of which you will find in a paper I send you; but they accomplished that by intrigue, which they could not have effected openly. They were boldly met, however, as you will see, and so they will be met in every encounter.

A rich and beautiful country, all over which God has written Universalism with his own hand—a liberal and enquiring people—friends, warm, energetic, and with the love of truth in their hearts,—what can we expect but that our cause will be onward, and that its rest will be glorious! We shall see. A. C. B.

“FIVE PILLARS IN THE TEMPLE OF PARTIALISM SHAKEN AND REMOVED; by J. F. Witherell, Ambassador for Christ.”—The passages explained are Luke xvi: 19–31; Matt. xxv: 31–46; Psalm ix: 17; Matt. xii: 31, 32; and Luke xii: 4, 5. Br. Witherell is able to do them justice, and has no doubt, by their proper explanation, refuted the false construction frequently put upon them, and thus removed five pillars as stated in the title. We have not had time to read the work; but it is by a good writer, neatly printed, bound in a paper cover, contains 72 pages, and is sold cheap. Published at the Balm of Gilead office, Concord, N. H.

The reason for taking the title Br. W. has given himself, is, that he can not understand that the word “Reverend,” when applied to a preacher, means anything less than the name of the Almighty; or, when used as a mere prefix, that it can mean any thing else than “awful.” He differs therefore from the whole world of lexicographers and writers, who use it as a mere professional title, as “Dr.” “Prof.” &c.; and mean only to have it understood as synonymous with teacher or preacher of religion. Br. W. still calls men “Mr.” i. e. Master, contrary to Matt. xxiii: 10; and women “Mrs.” who are not his Mistresses! But probably he will soon cease to do that also—for surely he that strains out a gnat will soon learn to keep out the camel also!

“THE AMERICAN AGRICULTURALIST'S ALMANAC FOR 1844.”—We have just received from the office of the New World, 30 Ann street, New York, a copy of this work, edited by A. B. Allen, Esq., aided by an Association of eminent Agriculturalists. Being no farmer I am not capable of sitting in judgment on its merits, but have no doubt that any industrious and ingenious farmer will make it yield him more than cent. per cent. on its cost, which is only one shilling per copy. It contains a full Almanac, calculated for all necessary meridians—for the United States and Canadas—with a Northern Calendar for every month in the year, giving directions for managing a farm, garden and orchard; and a Southern Calendar for the plantation;—also, miscellaneous matter of importance to the planter, farmer, breeder of stock, horticulturalist, &c., &c. Agents, booksellers, &c., will be supplied at $3.00 per hundred. It appears to me that the work would be very useful to every farmer who can get one; well worth more than the shilling merely as a pamphlet on the subjects of which it treats. If any one after purchasing it, finds that my opinion is not a correct one, why—the knowledge will only cost them a shilling, and I venture to say they have often paid more money for less information!

P. M. at Harford, Cortland county, N. Y., sends back the last number of the Magazine and Advocate, addressed to Enos Cook, and writes on the wrapper that said Cook has met with a change of heart, and does not take his paper from the office. Wonder if the change will cause him to pay that dollar and a half that he owes us. One Warren Stearns, at Ledyard, N. Y., has left the place, without paying for what papers he has had; say about one dollar's worth of current volume. We understand he has gone to Lee, N. Y. Also, one Ezekiel Style, of Springville, N. Y., has left the place and gone to Wisconsin, without paying us $6.50 which he owes. Can any one inform us of his whereabouts exactly. P. M. at Smithville, N. Y., says Horace Ames does not take his paper from the office. Reason, does not pay the postage, also owes us $6.50.

BR. BULLARD—G. & W. have books only on commission. If you send a cash order for Hymn Books, or Registers, or both, please state in what manner they shall be sent you, at your risk. A. B. G.

UNIVERSALIST BOOKS IN BUFFALO.

Mr. L. M. Smith, son of Rev. S. R. Smith, has opened a store in Buffalo, and will keep an assortment of Universalist books for sale. The arrangement is a good one, and we hope it will be well sustained by our western friends generally. A. B. G.

THE UNIVERSALIST COMPANION, WITH REGISTER AND ALMANAC FOR 1844.—Now is the time for our preachers to supply themselves, that the friends in every district may be able to get copies in time. Being a periodical they can be sent by mail at a moderate postage. Cash orders always promptly supplied at this office, at the publisher's prices. Send in ones, threes, fives, or tens, and a proper number of copies of the work will be returned as the order may direct.

Br. Tompkins—Credit S. L. Knight, Fayetteville, N. Y., on account of Repository, seven dollars, and send it to him hereafter at Plainfield, Willco., Illinois. Charge us $6.93.

A CHANCE TO SAVE ONE DOLLAR!!!

Those who are owing us for three volumes of the Magazine and Advocate, including the present volume, ($7.00 according to terms,) shall be credited in full for them and the next year (making four volumes) if they will send seven dollars, free of postage, immediately.

Those owing for two years, including the present, shall be credited in full for them and next year, (three volumes,) by sending five dollars, free of postage.

Those owing for the present year only, shall be credited in full for this and next year, by sending three dollars postage free.

Friends and patrons, can you doubt that we need the money?

JAMES LEANDER CATHCART, Esq., for the last twenty years second Comptroller of the Treasury, died at Washington on Friday, aged 77 years. He entered the Continental Navy at the age of ten years and served as midshipman on board the Confederacy and Tyranicide during the Revolutionary struggle, and soon after the peace was captured by the Algerines off the coast of Spain. He remained eleven years in captivity.

A curious piece of gold, of twisted workmanship, said to be worth, as old gold, £20, was lately found by a farm servant in ploughing a field belonging to Mr. H. Lillywhite, of Ripley, Hants, England. It is supposed to be a collar worn by the Romans, of very neat workmanship, in a good state of preservation, and is now in the possession of the Rev. S. Maddock, vicar of Ripley.

The great Fair of the American Institute commenced in New York, on Tuesday, at Niblo's garden. The opening address was delivered in the evening by Gen. Tallmadge. The exhibition is to continue for several days and addresses will be delivered on every evening.

ROBBERY AT THE MUSEUM AT NIAGARA.—On Wednesday night last, the Niagara Museum, on the Canada side, was robbed of its collection of Roman and Grecian coins, for the recovery of which a reward of $200 has been offered.

A Clergyman at Rochester, on leaving a barber shop, put on in mistake the coat of another person. When the gentleman to whom the coat belonged came to put it on, he was greatly surprised to find it gone. A pursuit was made, and the reverend gentleman was found comfortably taking his breakfast without having discovered the mistake, and of course was greatly surprised when told that the coat he had on contained a pocket book with five thousand dollars in it.

The Hon. Minthorne Tompkins, of Staten Island, has presented a handsome lot of land to the ladies of the Samaritan Society, upon which to build a commodious edifice or manufactory for the accommodation and employment of destitute females.—[Utica Dem.]

The Warsaw (Ill.) Messenger states that Mr. Bennett of that place, on Sunday went up to Nauvoo with the intention of attaching himself to the "Saints," but instead of being well received, Jo. Smith gave him a caning. He went home and applied to Justice Rockwell for a warrant to arrest the Prophet, but it had not been issued on Wednesday.

TREMENDOUS EXPLOSION.—The boiler in the India Rubber Factory in Providence, blew up last Tuesday and damaged the building and a small one story dwelling, adjoining, very materially, injuring slightly some 2 or 3 of the hands.

The boiler burst through the thick wall of the basement of the factory, and passed by an adjoining house, carrying away both corners of the same in the rear, and lodged some fifty or sixty yards from the factory.

DEATHS.

In Henderson, Jefferson county, August 27th, after a short illness, which she bore with Christian patience and resignation, Mrs. ANN TYLER, consort of Mr. Harry Tyler, in the 35th year of her age. For many years sister Tyler had been a devotional and sincere believer in the Gospel of universal grace—her faithfulness in all the duties of her station was unwearied, and her confidence in the saving grace of God was unshaken.

As a companion, mother, and member of society, she richly merited and long received the confidence and respect of her acquaintances. She delighted in the law of the Lord, and drew divine consolation from the promises of his grace, and died in the triumphs of the Christian faith. A bereaved husband, four children and numerous friends are left to lament their loss and drink the bitter cup of affliction prepared by the paternal hand of God.

On the 28th, a very large concourse assembled at her funeral in Smithville, to whom the never-failing consolations of the Gospel were administered by the writer of this notice, assisted in the public service by Br. Wilcox. May the blessings of the Gospel of God our Saviour ever rest on all who mourn.

P. M.

In Veteran, Chemung county, N. Y., Oct. 4th, Mrs. ANN HULETTE, consort of Charles Hulet, Esq., aged 33 years. The subject of this notice was formerly a resident of Wallingford, Rutland county, Vt., and was a member of the Congregational church in that place when she left there for this country; and though she did not unite herself to any church here, she lived the life and died the death of a pious and exemplary Christian. In this dispensation of Providence her worthy husband has sustained an irreparable loss, her four little ones (the last an infant) are bereaved of an affectionate mother, while society is shorn of one of its brightest ornaments. Her funeral was attended by a respectable congregation of sympathising friends to whom and to the deeply afflicted mourners, the consolations of the Gospel were administered by the writer, from 1 Cor. xv: 49, "And as we have borne the image of the earthy we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." Selected by the husband.

In Clinton, on the 11th inst., of scrofula, Mr. JOSEPH P. WOOLNOUGH, aged 24 years. Br. W. had suffered long and severely with the painful disease that finally brought him to the grave; but he bore up under all with almost unexampled patience, no murmurs ever escaping his lips on account of his afflictions. He lived a short but good life; every one who knew him, esteemed him for his virtues, sympathised with him in the day of his trial, and lamented him in death. He left the world strong in the faith of the Restoration, and rejoicing in the hope of a world's salvation. He selected the writer to preach his funeral sermon, which he did on the 13th, by the request of the mourners, from Rom. xii: 12, "Patient in tribulation; rejoicing in hope"—these being the last words of the departed.

FROM ISAIAH.

Awake thee, oh Zion! arise, for the hand
Of Israel's God overshadows the land!
Put off thy grey garments of sack cloth, and haste
To rebuild the high place the foe hath laid waste!

Look up in thy beauty, oh Zion, look up!
Thou'st drained the last drop of thy trembling cup;
And tho' like a desert thy city may be,
I will open a fount in the desert for thee.

And the foot of the spoiler that trampled to scorn
Thy vine and thy myrtle shall wander forlorn;
In thy desolate Sharon the rose tree shall bloom,
And the green grass wave over thy places of gloom.

The bird of thy vineyard no longer shall sing
Alone on the hill side, a desolate thing;
For the mountain their notes of glad music shall raise,
And creation re-echo the sound of my praise.

When Egypt oppressed thee, the strength of my arm
Beclouded a host to redeem thee from harm;
And at my rebuke, in the depths of the sea,
A pathway was made for my ransomed to flee.

And now, oh my people, Jehovah is nigh,
He hears the low moan of the prisoner's cry;
And thy bondage is broken—my arm is revealed,
And Judah's oppressions and sorrows are healed.

A SKETCH.

"For what knowest thou, oh wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband?" 1 Cor. vii: 16.

The room, though scantily and meanly furnished, still bore marks of neatness; the uncarpeted floor had been carefully swept, the few chairs, the old mahogany table and the mantle piece were free from dust, the books were arranged on the little shelf, and in the middle of the room on a small stand, was burning a flickering tallow candle. On the bed, whose poverty could not be concealed by any art, lay a young woman, wasted by disease. Her glossy hair was parted over her marble brow, and on her wan cheek was the bright hectic of that syren disease of our climate, consumption; consumed indeed was that patient sufferer; but there is a disease which preys more upon the heart than upon the lungs. She lay now completely exhausted, for it was her exertion that had made that cheerless chamber wear its present appearance of comfort. To be sure there was no fire, though it was deep winter, and the storm howled piteously without, and the chill wind came in at every crack—but how could she make fire with out coals? And indeed, she did not feel able to go out and get any—and even if she should venture, where was she to apply? Mr. B. had repulsed her rudely when she last went. She raised her clasped hands to heaven, her lips moved, then came over her pallid features a trusting smile, as she murmured—"Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief!"

The door opened, and the storm rushing in nearly extinguished the taper; a man in the prime of life, of good figure, but alas, alas! bearing too plainly the evidences of ruinous excess walked hurriedly into the room.

"Dear George," exclaimed the woman, starting from her pillow, "how glad I am you come so soon. I have been so lonesome."

The man approached her bed, and taking her hand in his, said—

"Yes, Mary, and I am glad, too; for it is an ugly night to be out in, and I am lucky enough to get off sooner than usual this evening. I have brought you some medicine." His voice choked, he hastily dropped his wife's hand, and approaching the fire place, began raking up the ashes, to make a fire with some bits of board he had brought in.

Mary covered her face with the quilt, and burst into tears, but with every sob was mingled a thanksgiving. She felt at that moment as if she would willingly have died, so great, so ecstatic was the bliss that filled her soul; her husband, her dear, dear George, was himself, his own generous self, once more. God had heard her prayers—the burning tears had gone up to the mercy seat; but she is trembling again—perhaps—nay, nay,—"with God, all things are possible,"—and drying her eyes, she arose and stealing to the fire, threw her arms around her husband's neck and they both wept, locked in a fond embrace.

Mary's happiness gave her strength; a pan of water was soon boiled, and a cup of tea made; and though without sugar or milk, and accompanied only with dry biscuit, it was sweeter to both than the richest meal in the days of their prosperity; for the angels who rejoice over returning penitents, sat at the board, and made the meal a heavenly one.

The wife spoke tenderly on bright and happy topics; she recalled the sweet days of their first acquaintance, of their mutual love and pride—she spoke of her own errors, but never breathed a word of his—of the future, of better times, coloring the future with woman's trustings, faith and love. George sat in silence, but his kind looks and unbidden tears told Mary that his degradation had not steeled his heart to better influences.

The morning dawned, and Mary having slept tranquilly on her husband's bosom, awoke refreshed. The breakfast was as frugal and as happy as the supper, and as her husband kissed her she murmured, "Dear, dear George, trust in God's strength, it is perfect in our weakness." Long, long did that sweet sufferer kneel in prayer; fervently did petitions go up to Him, who pities us as a father pities his children, that strength might be vouchsafed to her husband, to persevere in the path of rectitude. She arose refreshed, comforted, filled "with the peace that passeth all understanding"—she felt assured that God would hear her prayers.

About 11 o'clock she was started by a loud knocking at the door; for a moment her heart died within her, her knees smote together, a deadly faintness came over her, but recovering, she murmured—"I knew in whom I have trusted," and hastening forward, she opened the door.

"For Mr. Edgar," said a rough voice; "some things for Mr. Edgar. I s'pose he lives here."

"Yes," replied Mary, "this is the place; Mr. Edgar does live here: but you must be mistaken—these things can't be for him."

"Yes, they are, though," returned the man; I know George Edgar, and he told me to bring 'em; here's the paper."

The trembling wife took the direction, and recognized the hand writing of her dear husband. The man, unheeding her, had pushed in, and was emptying the contents of a large basket on the table. Mary mechanically went forward, to hide in apparent business her feelings, and the man, rough though he was, felt for her, and hurried away. Bread, dried beef, sugar, tea, fish, candles, and many other little parcels. O, how rich, how happy she felt! Now there is a load of wood at the door. Mary can but fall on her knees and thank Him on whom she has cast all her cares.

A hot dinner was smoking when George returned, and she, in her sweet, angel spirit, spoke to him so cheerfully, and so delicately avoided all recurrence to the cause of the joy, except by looks of happiness, that he could but press her to his bosom, and sob his gratitude.

This was the beginning of their happiness—George did not fall back, though fierce was the contest, sore his temptation—he did persevere; they who had sought out the wandering sinner, and with gentle persuasion, induced him to sign the charter of his emancipation from the fell tyrant, on the temperance pledge, were faithful still to watch over and encourage him; it was they who had advanced money to furnish his sick wife with necessaries and medical aid, until such time as the good resolutions of her redeemed husband should enable him to procure them himself.

And she, whose uniting love had never once reproached, who had borne poverty, disgrace, sickness, insults—praying without ceasing—had now received her reward—her faith had saved her, and him whom she had never forsaken, even in thought, was now restored by her means to respectability and honor.

Pray for the poor inebriate; he may withstand counsel, persuasion, tears, reproach; but he can not prevent us from pleading his cause at the bar of the All Merciful, who willet not the death of a sinner—pray without ceasing, and it shall be unto us according to our faith.—[Olive Plant.

ELOQUENT.

At a recent gathering of the friends of Temperance at New Market, N. H., an aged mariner by the name of Fall, made a most touching speech. We cut from the columns of the White Mountain Torrent, the following extract:

"I have come, he continued, twelve miles to attend this meeting—yet I do not value my time—I feel rewarded by what I see around me. My friends, I have seen more of the world than most of you. I have trod the streets of proud old London; and the winds of distant India have fanned these furrowed cheeks of mine. My keel has been upon every sea, and my name upon many a tongue. Heaven blessed me with one of the best of wives—and my children; oh, why should I speak of them! My home was once a paradise. But I bowed, like a brute, to the 'killing cup'—my eldest son tore himself from his degraded father, and has never returned. My young heart's idol—my beloved and suffering wife, has gone broken hearted to the grave. And my lovely daughter, whose image I seem to see in the beautiful around me—once my pride and my hope—pined away in sorrow and mourning, because her father was a drunkard and now sleeps by her mother's side. But I still live to tell the history of my shame, and the ruin of my family. I still live—and stand here before you to offer up my heart's fervent gratitude to my heavenly Father that I have been snatched from the brink of the drunkard's grave. I live to be a sober man. And while I live, I shall struggle to restore my wandering brethren again to the bosom of society. This form of mine is wasting and bending under the weight of years. But, my young friends, you are just blooming into life; the places of your fathers and mothers will soon be vacant. See that you come up to fill them with pure hearts and anointed lips! Bind the blessed pledge firmly to your hearts; and may it be the Shibboleth of life's warfare!"

SIGNS OF INTEMPERANCE.

1. If you have set times, days or places, for indulging yourself in ardent spirits.
2. If you find yourself continually inventing excuses for drinking, or availing yourself of every little catch or circumstance among your companions to bring out a "treat."
3. If you find the desire of strong drink returning daily, and at stated hours.
4. If you drink in secret, because you are unwilling your friends or the world should know how much you drink.
5. If you are accustomed to drink, when opportunities present, as much as you can bear without public tokens of inebriation.
6. Redness of eyes, with a full red countenance, and tremor of the hands, especially when connected with irritability, petulance, and violent anger.

A physician, passing by a stonemason's, bawled out to him, "Good morning, Mr. W——. Hard at work I see. You finish your gravestones as far as 'In memory of,' and then you wait, I suppose, to see who wants a monument?" "Why, yes," replied the old man, resting for a moment on his mallet, "unless somebody is sick, and you doctoring him, and then I keep right on!"

ORIGINAL SERMON.

Delivered at the Ordination of Rev. G. S. Abbott, in Dexter, N. Y., September 21st, 1843.

BY REV. H. BOUGHTON, OF WATERTOWN.

Son of man, I have made thee a watchman unto the house of Israel: therefore hear the word at my mouth, and give them warning from me. Ezek. iii: 17.

The prophet Ezekiel, to whom this language was originally addressed, was a resident of the city of Jerusalem when it was besieged by Nebuchadnezzar, in the year of the world 3405. He was among the captives which this prince carried into Babylon—where, for 70 years, they were obliged to endure the most cruel and distressing bondage. Soon after the commencement of his captivity, the Lord appeared to him in a vision on the banks of the river Chebar, and gave him instruction to communicate with his fellow prisoners that he might cause them to understand the reason of their overthrow and subjection. At that time he heard addressed to him the words of our text. "Son of man, I have made thee a watchman unto the house of Israel: therefore hear the words at my mouth, and give them warning from me." And every individual who has carefully perused the instructions and the prophecies of this servant of God, is convinced of the fidelity with which he performed the duties then and there assigned him.

Notwithstanding he was placed in circumstances of the most trying and discouraging nature, he nevertheless yielded strict obedience to the divine command—he did on all occasions as he was requested to do—he preached the truth, plainly and forcibly, without fear of hatred or censure—and although he was compelled, in doing so, to expose the great wickedness of his own countrymen, yet he manifested no hesitation or reluctance. He had heard the word from the mouth of his Maker, and he faithfully gave warning to those for whom it was intended. He proved himself a watchman, indeed—one who felt the responsibilities of his office—who was determined to do his duty, to walk in the commandments of God and to proclaim whatever he should receive from him to proclaim.

But we do not intend to dwell upon the life and labors of this individual—we have made the foregoing remarks in relation to him, simply, to show the applicability of the text to the present occasion; and also that we might realize the obligations and the duties which devolve upon the minister of Christ.

It is no more certain that the prophet was made a watchman unto the house of Israel while they were in suffering and bondage, than it is, that every true hearted preacher of the everlasting Gospel, is a watchman. For every man who enters into the vineyard of his Master, to labor publicly for the spread of truth, and the consequent good of the world, is under as strong obligation to look after the interests of Zion, as was Ezekiel to instruct and watch over enslaved Israel. And it was no more the duty of the prophet to hear the word of God and give warning to his fellow captives, than it now is for every Herald of the Cross, to hearken to the same word, and giving warning to those who may attend upon his ministrations.

Therefore, to every proclaimer of "Good Tidings" and especially to every young man, who is setting out to labor in the ministry of reconciliation, the language of our text should come home with force—and in whatever circumstances he may be placed—whether in prosperity or adversity—whether in joy or sorrow—whether among friends or enemies—with those who will hear or those who will forbear, he should constantly reflect on these words—"Son of man I have made thee a watchman unto the house of Israel: therefore hear the word at my mouth, and give them warning from me."

That the good of the world requires a Gospel ministry, I presume no candid individual will dispute—and that this ministry should be such as might give influence and power to the truths promulgated, is what every lover of virtue would sincerely desire—therefore, we see that the office of minister is one of no light or trivial character—it is one which involves the most weighty responsibilities—which places the individual under obligations to exert all his powers of mind and body, for the furtherance of the cause in which he is engaged—to so live as to give influence to his teachings—and to so devote his time to the study of the great truths of Christianity, as to be able to present them to the world in their own native and attractive form.

A preacher should consider himself God's servant, and should be willing under all circumstances, to yield strict obedience to his requirements. He should look upon himself as an instrument in the hand of his Creator, for the promotion of truths in the earth—for the advancement of holiness—for the turning of men from vice to virtue, and the consequent increase of real and substantial enjoyment. And to effect this, he must walk in imitation of the examples of the Lord Jesus Christ—he must do justly, and love mercy, and walk humbly—he must exercise, in his intercourse with the world, the spirit of charity and forgiveness—must practice that religion which is pure and undefiled; or, in other words, be careful always to maintain good works.

Without such a course, on the part of a professed minister of the Gospel, his labors can not be crowned with success. For it is impossible for a bad man to effect any permanent good—as much so, as it is for an evil tree to produce good fruit. Therefore, if the individual who promulgates the doctrine of Christ to the world, would wish to see any beneficial influence result from his labors, he must so conduct, that his conscience will be void of offence in the sight of God and man.

Nothing exerts so powerful an influence as example. And this is peculiarly the fact in relation to one, who publicly advocates the importance of a religious practice. To him the people naturally look for an exhibition of what he teaches to be the duty of man. And if he fails of carrying out in his life, the principles which he presents for the guidance of others, his influence is lost, and his sincerity questioned. But, on the other hand, if he lives as he exhorts others to live—if he pays strict regard for truth and uprightness—if he deals honestly, and evinces a spirit of benevolence and charity, then his teaching will exert a power which can not be resisted—"then he will have the confidence of the world—men will believe him to be honest, and the principles which he advocates will go on triumphing over error, and bringing multitudes to a knowledge of the truth.

That such is the fact, will not be questioned.—For we are all sensible of the influence a good man exerts—and we know that in all past time, those who have preached the Gospel of Christ, and have exhibited its spirit in their daily walk and conversation, have met with wonderful success in the advancement and promotion of their favorite principles. Such was the case with Luther—with Melancthon—with Wesley—with Whitfield—and with Murray. Such was the case with the apostles of our Lord and Saviour. And such was the case with the Redeemer himself. When he went about doing good, as well as preaching the message of a world's salvation, the influence of bigotry, was, in a great measure destroyed—his noble deeds applied to the better feelings of men—they found their way to the heart—and notwithstanding the violent prejudice of the world, and the desire which existed for his destruction, and the destruction of his message, yet multitudes were constrained to say, in the language of the centurion, "Truly this is a righteous man."

And by this course the Saviour gained for himself devoted and warm hearted friends—they loved him for his goodness—they revered him for his patience, and mildness, and gentleness—they respected him for his unflinching devotion to truth and righteousness—and when they saw him doing good to his enemies, binding up the broken hearted, curing the sick, and restoring the dead, they felt to say in sincerity of heart, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God."

The Saviour seemed to know of no other way to enforce the truths which he came to establish, but by example—and therefore he was constantly engaged in acts of benevolence, and forgiveness, and love. He blessed ever his most cruel and unjust opposers—he rendered good for evil—and in every period of his ministry—whether among friends or foes—he was seen actively exerting himself for the good of that world, which he came to save from sin.

His life was a most beautiful commentary upon the doctrine which he taught—it was a life without sin—a life devoted to the cause of truth—to the cause of humanity—to the cause of heaven, of righteousness, and of God. It was a life spent in the performance of those good works, which are good and profitable unto men—a life of philanthropy—a virtuous life—a life such as no man ever lived before or since—a constant practice of all the duties, which man is required to discharge—a doing good to all men as opportunity offers, and keeping unspotted from the world. And so should every man live—especially every man who wishes to be a successful minister of the everlasting Gospel.

It is true, a man may preach, and become somewhat noted as a preacher, if he is possessed of more than ordinary powers of mind and eloquence—notwithstanding he may not imitate the God-like examples of the Saviour—but still, without this imitation, he never can become truly great. His preaching will be like a sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal—he will fail to exert a good and healthy influence: he will not live in the affections of his fellow men—neither will he gain for himself that confidence which community would like to place in the herald of the cross of Christ.

But let the individual who preaches the goodness of God, and the impartiality of the Saviour—who represents to the world the beauty of virtue, and the joys of godliness—who professes to believe in the truth, that of one blood were made all nations of men—that we are all brethren, and all destined to enjoy the blessings of immortality and bliss beyond the grave; let this individual show his gratitude to God, by keeping his commandments—let him live virtuously and uprightly—let him treat every man kindly and affectionately, and strive to overcome evil by practicing righteousness—and depend upon it, his influence will be felt and appreciated. He will be looked up to as one whose conduct should be imitated, whose example should be followed, and whose spirit should be cherished and practiced. He will be considered what he really is, a good man—and the sentiments which he preaches will command the respect of the world; at least, they will derive beauty from his character, and multitudes will be brought to examine them, to behold the evidence of their truth, and to cherish them as that message which is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth.

Hence we see the necessity of every one who becomes a watchman unto spiritual Israel, living as he ought to live. We see the necessity of his shunning all vicious habits—of his being honest in all his dealing, faithful in the discharge of his every duty, kind to the suffering and the distressed, ready to do good, and to forgive injuries—and of his having his heart so full of the love of God, that he can say of his enemies, in the language of the Lord Jesus Christ, “Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do.”

But there is something more required of the preacher than this—and that is, that he faithfully proclaim the word of God. This we learn from the text, “Son of man, I have made thee a watchman unto the house of Israel: therefore hear the word of my mouth, and give them warning from me!” The word of God, or the Revelation of his will, was given evidently for the good of the world—and the doctrine contained in that word is so pure, and so holy, and so god-like, in its character, that its tendency must be to reform, or make better. And consequently, as the object of every herald of good tidings should be to bring men to a knowledge of the truth—to turn them from evil to a practice of true holiness, and thereby enable them to dwell together as brethren of one family; therefore he should declare boldly the whole counsel of God—he should preach as Jesus Christ and the apostles preached—should give line upon line and precept upon precept—should exhort and rebuke with all long suffering and doctrine and thus strive to lead the erring to God, and the lost to happiness.

But it may be inquired, What does the word of God teach? In the first place, it teaches that He is love. And this is one of the most prominent doctrines of the Bible. The sacred writers have presented this truth as one of the fundamental principles of Christianity. They have dwelt with peculiar emphasis upon the benevolence of Deity as displayed in all creation—upon that love which governs the Universe—which controls all events—which brings the seasons in their order—which makes the earth produce her abundance of benefits for man—which “Warms in the sun, refreshes in the breeze,

Glow in the stars, and blossoms in the trees;
Lives through all life, extends through all extent, Spreads undivided, operates unspent.”

To teach men this love, the Saviour directed their attention to the animal and vegetable creation. He said, “Behold the fowls of the air; for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns, yet your heavenly Father feedeth them!” And again he said, “Behold the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin, and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these; wherefore if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much rather clothe you, oh, ye, of little faith?” And again, when speaking on this subject and wishing to show the impartiality of the love of God, he declared that, “He maketh his sun to rise on the evil, and the good, and sendeth rain upon the just and the unjust.” And it is a remarkable fact, that in all the preaching of the Son of God, and likewise in that of his disciples, this truth was presented to us as of the utmost importance. They preached it as the grand means of bringing men to repentance—as the converting power of the Gospel—as that heaven which is finally to succeed in changing the entire mass of mind, and bringing every intelligent creature to a knowledge of God, and his Son Jesus Christ. They represented this love as boundless—as encompassing all beings—as being God himself—as the grand moving, guiding, regulating, and sustaining principle of the universe—as that on which we must rely for a deliverance from this bondage of corruption into that glorious liberty beyond the grave—and as that unchangeable grace, which is the same yesterday, and to-day, and forever.

And so should every man preach, who would be a faithful advocate of the word of God. He should present the character of his Creator in its true light—he should contend for the goodness of God, and point to the evidences, as seen in the heavens above, on the earth beneath, and in every object by which we are surrounded. He should urge home this goodness, that it may lead to repentance, to holiness of life, to a virtuous course of conduct, to a shunning of all viciousness, and to the adorning of the doctrine of Christ, with well ordered lives, and a godly conversation.

And how pleasurable to do this! To tell of the impartial kindness of that Being who created us—who has preserved our existence—who has generously given us all things richly to enjoy—who has watched over us for good—who has blessed us temporally and spiritually, and whose bountiful hand is daily opened to satisfy the desires of every living thing. To preach this glorious truth to the world, affords a satisfaction which is unspeakable and full of glory—it gives to man a foretaste of heaven, and it enables him to become the messenger of good—to give peace to the sorrowing, joy to the disconsolate, hope to the desponding, and strength to the feeble. It is the bread of God which came down from heaven to give life to the world—and it will continue to operate until man is redeemed and brought home to that inheritance which is incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away.

But again—the word embraces the messiahship of Christ, and represents him as the image of his Father, as the brightness of his glory, as the friend of sinners, as the Lamb of God and the Saviour of the world; and this every watchman on the walls of our Zion, should publish. And not only this, but he should tell of his wondrous works, of his pure examples, and how he suffered, “the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God.” He should tell how this Saviour labored for the good of his enemies—how he toiled amid persecution and abuse and insults, that he might plant in the purifying principles of the Gospel—how he exerted himself to overcome unkindness and enmity—how he wrought miracles in attestation of the truth of his teachings—and finally expired on the cross, praying for those who were cruelly robbing him of life.

And furthermore he should preach the resurrection of the dead—for this is one of the prominent doctrines of the Gospel. To make known this truth, was one object in sending the Saviour into the world—he came to bring life and immortality to light—and therefore he proclaimed the resurrection wherever he went—he demonstrated its truth by raising the dead—by giving life to the deceased son of the widow of Nain—by calling Lazarus from the sepulchre—and, finally, taking up his own life—by bursting the cerements of the grave, and showing himself to those who had known him previously—who had heard him preach, and who saw him die.

This truth was so firmly established by him, that the apostles were bold in proclaiming it—they declared the resurrection of the just and the unjust—that “in Christ,” or the spiritual nature, “should all be made alive”—that “the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed”—that “this corruptible must put on incorruption and this mortal must put on immortality”—that those who sleep in Jesus will God raise up with him, and change those who shall remain, when time shall be no longer, and so shall we ever be with the Lord.

And they likewise preached the reconciliation of man to God. That sin shall come to an end, and an everlasting righteousness be brought in. They declared that the resurrection shall be perfected in incorruption, immortality, glory and power—that “as we have borne the image of the earthly we shall also bear the image of the heavenly.” This truth was the great burthen of all their preaching—they declared it to be in accordance with the will of God—that he had purposed it in himself—that Christ was sent to effect it—and therefore he gave himself a ransom for all—a propitiation for the sins of the whole world.

And this was proclaimed by the Lord Jesus Christ—he assures us that in the resurrection, we shall be as the angels of God in heaven, and he further testified that the Father gave him all things, and that all the Father had given him shall come to him, and that him that cometh unto him he will in no wise cast out. And more than all this, the restitution was preached by the prophets. Peter declares, Acts iii: 21, that “the restitution of all things had been spoken by the mouth of all God’s holy prophets since the world began.” And any individual who will carefully and impartially peruse the writings of those spiritual watchmen, will be convinced that Peter stated nothing but the truth—for they affirm in plain and unequivocal language the entire destruction of all error—the finishing of iniquity, and the universal spread of the spiritual kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ. They declare that “all the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before him”—and much more to the same import—and consequently this doctrine is a part of that word which every Herald of the cross is bound to proclaim to his fellow men.

But in addition to all this, the servant of Christ should preach the consequences resulting from human conduct. He should declare the joys of godliness—and the peace produced by the constant practice of good works. He should teach, as did the Son of God, that “Blessed are the meek, the merciful, the pure in heart, the poor in spirit, and such as hunger and thirst after righteousness.” That “blessed are they that mourn for they shall be comforted”—that “blessed are the peace makers, for they shall be called the children of God”—that “blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and shall persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for Christ’s sake, for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you.” And then he should declare the wretched consequences of sin—that the way of transgressors is hard—that there is no peace to the wicked—that whoso doeth a wrong, shall receive for the wrong which he hath done—that although hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished—that they are like the troubled sea when it can not rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt; and that God will visit tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil, of the Jew first and also of the Gentile.”

This truth he will find clearly taught in the glorious volume of divine revelation. And notwithstanding he may be obliged, like Ezekiel of old, to apply this to the case of some of his own brethren, yet he should discharge his duty fearlessly and boldly. He should hearken to the word of God, and give warning to all those who are out of the way—he should lift up his voice like a trumpet and show the house of Israel their sins—he should declare the whole counsel of God—and thus show himself a true and faithful minister of the New Testament.

As it regards where men are punished for their iniquities, he should be guided by the voice of revelation. And he will be instructed by this, that the sinner shall be recompensed in the earth—that we shall receive in body according to that we have done, whether good or bad—that in the day we eat of the forbidden fruit, we shall surely die; and as illustration of this fact, he might cite the case of Cain, after having destroyed the life of his brother, who was compelled to declare in the bitterness of his anguish, "My punishment is greater than I can bear." He might also present the language of David, who in reference to his past misconduct, affirmed that the sorrows of death encompassed him, and the pains of hell gat hold upon him—and that consequently he found trouble and sorrow. And to this point would apply the case of the prodigal son, of Judas and Peter, all of which is verified by the experience and observation of every individual.

These things, then, the minister of God should preach. He should preach them faithfully, and forcibly, and feelingly. And his object should be, while performing this duty, to make the world better, and happier. He should desire to instruct the ignorant, to console the afflicted, to humble the proud, to reclaim the dissolute, to convert the unconverted, to bring men into that kingdom which is righteousness and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.

And to do this effectually, he should go to the sinner in the spirit of brotherly affection—should proclaim to him the goodness of God which leadeth to repentance—should kindly warn him of the certain effects of disobedience—should strive by gentleness and persuasion, to draw him from the road of error into the peaceful pathway of wisdom and holiness. And this is a work which the servant of Christ should delight to perform. This is the work which our Redeemer came to accomplish, and to do which, he labored, and toiled, and preached, and suffered, and died. To aid in the accomplishment of this, is the object, I trust of all who have entered the ministry of reconciliation—and now if we only pay due attention to the directions contained in the word of the most High, our labors will be blessed, and the knowledge of the Lord will be increased.

May God grant that such may be the case. And may we all go forward, proclaiming the unsearchable riches of the Gospel of Christ, laboring for man's liberation from sin and misery; striving to lead the doubting to truth, the sinful to repentance, the wretched to enjoyment, and the lost to salvation. Such is our duty—and such is the duty of every watchman upon the walls of our spiritual Zion. Our light should constantly shine before men, that its influence may lead them to a knowledge of the truth, and in all the circumstances in which we may be placed, we should so conduct ourselves, that others may take knowledge of our ways, and realize that we have been taught in the school of the Redeemer.

Then may we individually discharge the obligations which devolve upon, as laborers in the vineyard of our Master. May we preach the truth with a realizing sense of its importance. May we study to be good, and to do good. May we proclaim peace to the mourning, joy to the sorrowing, comfort to the afflicted, and good tidings of great joy to all peoples. By doing this, we shall be effectual preachers of the word. God will bless our efforts for the up-building of the everlasting kingdom of his grace, and we shall constantly hear the whisperings of conscience saying, "Well done, ye good and faithful servants." Amen.

NOTE TO BR. WHITEMORE.

We give publicity to the following note from Br. S. R. Smith, not only because the virtual donation of the Steam Boat Company's Officers to aid our preachers and delegates on their way to the Convention merits this public notice; but also, because our good brethren of Buffalo who obtained it deserve, and undoubtedly will receive, the thanks of every individual of that large number, who was thus saved the expenditure of five dollars. It was doing good all around the company.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

Br. T. Whittemore—I have read with much satisfaction your editorial letters, giving an account of the particulars and pleasures of your journey to Akron in company with Br. H. Ballou. It was not expected that you would either name or recollect every particular which occurred, or in which you or others might feel interested. And most of such omissions, being local, your readers concerned in a given case, can easily supply. Those who live in Buffalo, can, so to speak, "blow our own trumpet," as far as our own peculiar affairs are concerned.

But there is one important fact, which you have wholly omitted, and which we feel extremely desirous of having supplied. You recollect that some forty or fifty persons—clergymen, delegates and friends spent the Sunday preceding Convention in Buffalo, and that nearly as many more arrived the next morning—all on the way to Akron. Part of these went up on Sunday evening, the residue on Monday morning. But all went as far as Cleveland (200 miles) and returned for half price. This arrangement was effected by the immediate exertions of B. Caryl, Esq., assisted by Mr. Hooker,—both members of the Universalist congregation in Buffalo; and J. Hollister, Esq., of Perrysburg, Ohio, and saved to each person five dollars—and in the aggregate to those who then went and returned, between $125 and $200. We feel that the officers of the Steam Boat Combination, should receive the grateful acknowledgments of those concerned, for this generous courtesy. And we can impute the omission of its mention by you, to no other cause, than the little interest which you take in matters that involve pecuniary considerations.

Yours very respectfully and fraternally,

S. R. SMITH.

CHANGE AFTER DEATH. NO. III.

BY REV. W. N. BARBER.

"Behold I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep but we shall all be changed." PAUL.

The next question that we propose considering, is, viz. —

What scriptural testimony have we, that there is no change after death?

Now all denominations in Christendom profess to make the Bible the standard of faith; and before we believe the unreasonable theory in question, we want, at least, some Scripture to support it.—Can not those who believe in it, find one passage in its favor? Only one passage is demanded; for if that, taken with its connexion, supports it, that one passage is as good as ten thousand. But alas, for the once fashionable D. D.'s! It seems, that with all their sagacity, they have not been able to find a solitary phrase, that could possibly be twisted into its defence. Some ingenious bodies therefore have made a passage, and while they were about it they made one precisely to the point: "As a tree falleth so it lieth, and as death leaves us, so judgment shall find us." Now this would be as good Scripture as ever was penned, and would seem, in fact, to prove that there is no change after death, and that saints are going to heaven in their sins, (i. e., should they go at all,) were it not for one thing. It so happens that it is not Bible language—it can not be found in the Bible—like creeds and catechisms, it owes its existence to the wisdom of frail, finite, erring man.

So far from the Bible furnishing any thing in favor of the doctrine of no change after man shall have passed the cold Jordan of death, I am happy to state that it teaches a sentiment as opposite as the East is to the West. "We shall not all sleep but we shall all be changed." "For our conversation is in heaven; from whence we also look for the Saviour.... who shall change our vile body that it may be fashioned like unto his." "Ye do err, not knowing the Scripture nor the power of God; for in the resurrection, they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven, being the children of the resurrection."—"In Christ shall all be made alive." "If any man be in Christ he is a new creature; old things are done away, behold all things have become new." "It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption; it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power; it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body."

It is sometimes said, that the change that the Bible speaks of, as taking place at the resurrection, is a mere bodily change. But if to be changed from "natural" to "spiritual," from "dishonor" to "glory,"—to be made a "new creature" "in Christ,"—to be raised up like unto "the angels of God in heaven,"—to "change our vile bodies" and fashion them like Jesus Christ's,—if all this does not indicate something more than a mere corporeal or bodily change, then I am at a loss to think of any language that would. And the man who contends that it does not, must be uncandid, or in possession of very obtuse intellectual faculties. At least, thus it appears to me, and if the reader contemplates the matter, I apprehend it will appear so to him.

Dummerston, Vt., 1843.

Brethren of the Christian Warrior:—We drew our conclusions with regard to Mr. Cary's indebtedness to us, from the following: and leave you and him to judge whether, under the circumstances, we could well conclude otherwise.

We received a letter from Mr. Cary, (which letter is now before us,) dated September 19th, 1841, in which he gave a statement of what he had done as agent. In that statement he claimed to have paid Mr. George W. Toler, (succeeding agent to Mr. C.) a balance of money, which he (Mr. C.) had collected of subscribers, claiming also to have paid his own subscription up to the close of that volume. We wrote to Mr. Toler shortly afterwards, mentioned Mr. Cary's statement, and in December following received a letter from Mr. Toler, in answer, saying that Mr. Cary had not paid him one cent of money as he stated. In a more subsequent letter from Mr. T., he informs us that Mr. Cary, had given him a lot of accounts to collect, by which, as we understood it, he was to obtain the money which Mr. C. had failed to pay him as stated. In the fall of the last year (1842), we sent our accounts to Mr. Toler for collection, and requested him to give us a full statement of what he had done, so that we might give credit to whom credit was due, &c. The required statement we have never received to this day; although, we received (in July last) a remittance by draft, from Mr. Toler, in conjunction with R. T. Wicker, Esq.; in the letter containing which, Mr. Wicker mentioned that Mr. T. had sent us a statement, &c., but which never came to hand. Consequently, we know nothing of Mr. Cary's having paid his account until your last paper reached us, nor of his desire to have the paper discontinued, until we received a notice to that effect through your post office, only two or three weeks since. Whether the fault was in Mr. Cary, Mr. Toler, or the mail department, we knew not, but circumstantial evidence was so strong that Mr. Cary had not done justly by us, that his name was published as you have seen. We had not the slightest intention of doing him wrong, or mentioning his name in a public manner, without cause. His honorable settlement with our agent being true, (which we doubt not) hereby induces us to acknowledge the injustice done him, and that we deeply regret the same.

G. & W.

P. S. Will our brethren of the Warrior have the goodness to say to Mr. G. W. Toler, that we should be glad to have him forward us a full and detailed statement of his agency, as soon as practicable.

UNIVERSALIST BOOKS IN BUFFALO.

Mr. L. M. Smith, son of Rev. S. R. Smith, has opened a store in Buffalo, and will keep an assortment of Universalist books for sale. The arrangement is a good one, and we hope it will be well sustained by our western friends generally.

THE UNKNOWN BELLE.

I am no lover of mystery. Enigmas are my detestation. When a boy studying Ovid, I used to regard the conduct of Sphix with unmitigated disgust. I considered her the most intolerable of antique bores, and Oedipus a patient dunce. The proceedings of Alexander in cutting the Gordian knot, instead of puzzling himself by attempting to untie it, met with my hearty approval. I loved him from the moment I was made aware of that incident in his career. But when a mystery comes in the shape of a pretty woman, that is a different matter altogether. My antipathies give way like blocks of ice before a spring freshet. Listen to my story.

It was one of the gayest of the gay seasons at Washington. The first of a series of brilliant balls at the White House had commenced. The east room was crowded with all the beauty, resident and transitory, of the District. Foreign ministers and attaches, with their cars, garters, ribands, breeches, and silk stockings—members of Congress with their thumbs in the arm-holes of their waistcoat—Indian chiefs, deputed by their tribes, with their plumes and painted feathers—office-holders, office-seekers, idlers, and lobby-loungers were the principal constituents of the male portion of the assemblage. Add to these some hundreds of invited guests, who came because they felt they had a proprietary interest in the mansion, and an idea may be formed of the density and mixed character of the crowd.

Half a dozen quadrilles and waltzes had been completed. A number of the more provident and sagacious of the guests had begun to take up a line of march toward the supper-room; and the dancers, tired of jostling one another, were endeavoring to retreat, when one of the managers called upon the gentlemen to form a new cotillion, and at the same time, causing the standers-by to fall back, opened a circle, and led forth from the dense throng—from which she seemed to emerge like the evening star from behind a cloud—a young and beautiful female. A general murmur of surprise and admiration greeted her appearance.

'Who can she be?' 'Did any one ever see her before?' 'What a figure!' 'What a face!'—were the hasty whispers exchanged among the spectators. So great was the anxiety to see her, that the space cleared for the dancers was almost immediately filled up. No one seemed able to give the slightest information as to who she was—when or whence she came. It all seemed to me, for a moment, a fairy-like delusion. Was I not at the ball given by Prince Fortunatus, and was not this Cinderella herself? I glanced down at her feet; they were marvellously small, and the glossy white satin slippers shone like glass. The delusion grew stronger. Never before had I experienced so forcibly the potency of the imagination. I began to wonder whether or not she would disappear in coarse attire when the clock struck twelve.

I was roused from my reverie by being seized by the hand by the manager, (at the moment I took him for Prince Fortunatus,) who had hastily introduced me as a partner to the fair unknown, and, as I afterwards learned, bestirred himself to keep back the crowd, and create room for the quadrille. How dazlingly beautiful she was! Ordinary beauties may be described in detail—but Miss Smith (yes, that was the name by which she was introduced to me) startled you by the perfect unity of her charms. You could not pick out one feature or one quality as beautiful because it was a part of a perfectly beautiful whole, and was therefore faultless, as a matter of course. Her countenance was a lucid mirror of every passing thought and emotion of her soul; and if occasionally the expression was melancholy, it was always lovely, like a mountain lake, the aspect of which no change of sky can render less picturesque, but in which every change develops new beauties.

It took a minute or two to rally my thoughts and recollections, and to convince myself that I had neither walked into the wrong room nor the wrong century.—The lady spoke first. Her voice touched me like an Eolian harp, it was so musical and sad. Some young fops of my acquaintance twitched me by the elbow, and, by significant winks, indicated their wish to be introduced. Miss Smith penetrated their designs, and said to me, in a delightful and confidential tone—"Don't introduce any one to me but members of Congress." The remark puzzled me excessively, but I bowed my acquiescence.

We squeezed through the quadrille with tolerable success; and as the gentleman manager, who had consigned the fair incognita to my charge, did not make his appearance, I was felicitating myself with the idea that she would accompany me to the supper-room, when, slightly pressing my arm with her hand, she directed my attention to a young gentleman, who had been gazing at her with undisguised symptoms of admiration, and asked if he were not Mr. K.—the member from New York.

I replied in the affirmative.

'He is quite a favorite with the old Roman—is he not?' asked the lady.

'Undoubtedly, and in the lower house he is fast acquiring influence.'

'Is he married?'

'Ye-es,' I replied, confounded at the quiet, business-like manner in which the question was put.

'Then introduce him,' said Miss Smith.

'Certainly. But why is it that you are less merciful than that gaunt Indian chief, who gave such a connoisseur-like glance at your flowing hair?'

'Interpret.'

'He contents himself with taking scalps; but you—you must have hearts.'

She answered only by a melancholy smile and shake of the head; and I forthwith introduced Mr. K.—to her.

Puzzled and chagrined, I made my way to the supper-room, where I was instantly assailed by a shower of questions from the ladies, and of compliments from the gentlemen, whose importunities I had disregarded.—Murmurs, low but deep, were uttered against me, when it was found that I had elicited nothing from my late partner that would allay the general curiosity in regard to her. All that I could communicate was, that she Miss Smith; and every one seemed to regard this piece of intelligence as involving the subject in profounder obscurity. The lady's remark in regard to the members of Congress, I kept to myself.

A series of brilliant entertainments, given by the hospitable and noble-spirited residents of Washington, succeeded the ball at the White House. At all of them, Miss S. was present, and at all of them she was indisputably the belle of the evening. Perhaps the appellation is a wrong one; for, apart from her dazzling beauty there was little of the self-assured and flattered belle in her appearance and demeanor. Her conversation was always cheerful and animated; but an interested observer (and I acknowledge that I soon became one) could detect beneath her apparent gaiety the pre-occupation of a heart filled with some secret sorrow. This conviction soon checked the tendency of my feelings towards her; and I had not met her three times before the lover was merged in the friend.

Still the mystery as to who she was and whence she came was kept up. All that the most inquisitive observer could discover was, that she resided in a respectable private family at Georgetown, the mistress of which, (Mrs. Bothwell,) though she did not go into society herself, yet she held that position which would secure an entree to any young female under her protection.—On being questioned on the subject of Miss Smith, Mrs. Bothwell would reply that she could vouch for her respectability; but beyond that, she knew nothing in regard to her parentage or history. Of course, this half way intelligence contributed still farther to pique public curiosity, and to render the unknown belle still more an object of interest. The fact that no one among the throngs who daily visited Washington, from all parts of the Union and of the world, had ever seen her or heard of her before, also added to the general perplexity. Several young men attempted to lay direct siege to her heart, and innumerable were the japonicas and the serenades with which they endeavored to facilitate their approaches; but they elicited from her no manner of encouragement. She received their attentions with 'sad civility,' and, as soon as possible, got rid of them, and exerted her powers of fascination over some influential member of Congress.

One morning I called upon her at Mrs. Bothwell's. As I ascended the stairs, in advance of the servant, I accidentally glanced at a mirror through the open door of an apartment. A reflection of two figures attracted my attention. One was the lady I had come to visit; the other was that of a young man, with features wan but highly intellectual, and a somewhat attenuated frame. The lady's hand was run through the thick hair that clustered about his pale forehead, and she was gazing in his face with an expression of deep and tender solicitude. A sound very much like a kiss succeeded this momentary attitude. Reluctant to disturb such an interview, I turned to retreat, but accidentally came in contact with the servant, who tumbling half-way down stairs, effectually interrupted the affectionate scene in the parlor. Without more ado, after a preliminary shuffling of my feet to apprise the parties that some one was coming, I entered the room.

An opposite door closed as Miss Smith advanced to receive me, and I heard a dry, ominous cough proceed from the departing visitor. It seemed to fall heavily on the lady's heart, for she stopped short, pressed her hands to her eyes, and heaved a sigh. Quickly rallying, however, she summoned a sweet smile to her lips, and received me with kindness. We conversed a few minutes on different subjects, and I took an early leave.

As I drove home to Gadsby's, my mind was more lost than ever in conjectures as to this exceedingly beautiful but mysterious young lady. Who could the gentleman be on whom she had lavished such tokens of endearment? Was he a lover or a husband? If either, why did he not accompany her into society? Or, if his health did not permit such indulgence, how could she quit him to become the cynosure of a ball room? Perhaps he was a brother. No, a sister could never have bestowed such a look and such an embrace. What could it all mean?

A week after this interview, I called at the White House with a friend from England, who was desirous of an introduction to the remarkable man who then occupied the presidential chair. We were received by Jerry Grant, the Irish doorkeeper, who, with an absence of ceremony which astonished my transatlantic companion, took us up stairs, and pointing to the cabinet chamber, said: 'you will find the old man in that room.' Aware of Jemmy's despotic character, I entered without farther question. The first object I saw was Miss Smith, lifting the President's hand to her lips, while an expression of earnest gratitude irradiated her face.—She held a document with a seal, which looked like some official commission. Two or three members of Congress, who had apparently accompanied her, were present. On beholding the group, I drew back; but I was too late to escape unobserved. The President called upon me, by name, to enter; and Miss Smith turning at the same moment greeted me with inimitable grace.

'A call of the House!' exclaimed Jemmy Grant, in his gruff voice, thrusting his head abruptly into the room, and as quickly withdrawing it.

'The sergeant-at-arms will be after us,' exclaimed one of the representatives.

'We are not wanted at the Capitol,' said another.

'Will you not accompany us, Miss Smith, since we can not return to your home with you?'

'Here is one to whose care you may confide me.—May they not?' said Miss Smith, turning to me.

Of course I acquiesced, with many blessings upon Jemmy Grant for scattering the Congressmen.

Introducing my friend to the Chief Magistrate, I gave my arm to the lady, and we took our leave.

When we were seated in the carriage, she exclaimed pressing the parchment she held to her heart, 'At length I have succeeded! An explanation is due to you; for you were one of the few who have respected my secret, and evinced no idle curiosity. Do not look as if I were on the eve of revealing some great mystery, for my story is a very simple one, and can be told in a very few words. I am from a very small and obscure village in the upper part of the State of New York, where I lived with my husband, a young lawyer; until he was visited by a pulmonary affection, which excited my constant anxiety. The physicians said there was safety in flight to tropical clime. Our means were too limited to allow of such a removal. At my suggestion, my husband visited Washington, and made strenuous exertions to procure a small post under Government in the West Indies. He failed; for he had never been a politician; and no political capital would accrue to the administration by his appointment. I had read in universal history, as well as in that of the present dynasty, of the influence of woman in affairs of state. I persuaded my husband to dispose of our little farm, and accompany me to Washington. We came. From the circumstance of his illness, I could not appear well in society otherwise than I did—as a single lady. I acquainted myself with the most prominent members of Congress—made them sharers of my confidence—interested them in my behalf, and this day succeeded in procuring my poor husband's appointment to an excellent post in South America. He is now in Georgetown and has no hopes of my success. Come and be a partner of our happiness.

Her eyes flashed with her elated feelings. An expression full of triumph and hope beamed from every feature. Never had she seemed half so beautiful.

The carriage stopped, and we alighted. A physician's chaise was at the door. My companion did not seem to notice it, but ran up the steps in front of the house, and eagerly rang the bell. Never shall I forget her face and figure, as she turned to me, while impatiently waiting for an answer to her summons, and exultingly shook in her extended hand the parchment commission. The door was opened. What an expression of grief and commiseration is in that face! It is Mrs. Bothwell. My companion paused suddenly, and gazed several moments, without speaking, in her eyes. Too well she reads their story. The parchment drops from her hands; and with the moan of a breaking heart, she sinks back insensible in my arms.

The commission had come too late! The subject of it had been appointed to a higher post than any which human power could have established.

But what became of the 'unknown belle'? Alas! never again was the bright salon made brighter by her presence! Never again were her sylph-like feet seen to twinkle in the wazy dance! Never again did that beautiful form (more beautiful than young sculptors picture in their dreams) attract the admiring eyes of a festive assembly! Such was her devoted affection, that she soon followed its departed object to that happier land, where pure souls find their lasting reward.—Fashion missed her, and asked, 'Where is she?'—but forgot the question ere it was answered.

REPORT.

To the General Convention of Universalists for the United States, convened at Akron, Ohio.

DEAR BRETHREN,—The Committee appointed at the last session of this body, to examine its code of By-laws, and, if necessary, revise and enlarge the same, beg leave to present, for the consideration of the Convention, the following Report, together with the annexed form or draft of RULES AND ORDERS:

Having attended to the duties of their appointment as far as circumstances would permit, the Committee have seen occasion to make considerable additions to the By-laws now in force. The experience of past ages has fully shown the importance of definite regulations, extending even to minute particulars, for the government of all deliberative bodies. Our own denomination has long felt the want of such rules in conducting the business of its public councils. Until very recently our Conventions and Associations have paid but little attention to this subject, and their business has been conducted as chance or the experience of the presiding officer might direct. The meagre rules, or 'code of By-laws,' adopted some years ago, by this body, have proved insufficient to bring its business into a very orderly and systematic course. This state of things has not, indeed, disturbed the harmony of feeling and mutual good will among the brethren; but it has occasioned much confusion, delay and unnecessary waste of time.

These considerations have suggested to the Committee the propriety of extending their revised draft of Rules, so as to meet all cases that may ordinarily occur. And they venture to hope that those acquainted with the growing wants of the order and the common modes of parliamentary proceedings, will not consider their proposed Rules unnecessarily prolix and minute in detail, and especially as they are designed 'as a basis' for the 'convenience' of othersimilar bodies. In drawing them up the Committee have consulted various authorities—the rules of Legislative, Ecclesiastical, and other public bodies—to all which they acknowledge themselves indebted for many valuable suggestions. They have taken as their basis, what the wisdom of many ages of legislation has proved to be necessary.—Variations and additions have been made chiefly to adapt the established rules of other bodies to the circumstances of our denomination. They do not presume, however, that they have constructed a perfect code, or one that will meet with universal favor. To attain such a desirable end, the Committee respectfully submit whether it might not be advisable to defer action on this Report until the next session of this body; meantime let the draft of Rules herewith presented, be published with the Minutes for the general examination, and authorize the same Committee, or appoint another, to take advantage of any suggestions thus offered in order to improve the Rules. Such a course might develop and correct imperfections, and would, at least, give the members of the Council a better opportunity to examine the whole subject, than they can possibly have in the space of two days, the usual length of the sessions.

The Committee would also respectfully suggest the propriety of permitting each annual Council, as unquestionably it is competent, to adopt its own Rules. Such is the course pursued by Legislatures and the higher grades of Ecclesiastical bodies, so far as the Committee have been able to ascertain. The Rules adopted at our session might continue in force until the Council is organized at the next annual session.

The Committee have not deemed it proper to insert a rule authorizing the Standing Clerk, in certain cases, to change the place of adjournment—a subject which was committed to them at the last session. It did not seem to come within the compass of their duties, and is, therefore, respectfully referred again to the Convention.

It is not possible, without extending this report to an improper length, to give the reasons, which induced the Committee to insert many of the rules, that appear in this draft. Suffice it to say that in introducing each and all, they have been influenced by what appeared to them good and sufficient reasons. And with this assurance they must submit them to the wisdom and discretion of the Convention—designing them as a substitute for those now in force. The whole subject is, therefore, respectfully submitted. R. O. WILLIAMS, Chairman.

RULES AND ORDERS

For conducting the business in the Council of the General Convention of Universalists for the U. States.

ORGANIZATION.

1. On each Annual Meeting of the Convention, when a quorum of delegates shall have convened at the time and place appointed, the Moderator of the preceding meeting shall call to order and preside until another is chosen; in case of his absence, this duty shall be performed by the Standing Clerk, and if neither be present, any one of the delegates may call to order and preside until a Moderator is chosen.

2. After uniting in prayer, the first business of the Convention shall be to receive the certificates of delegates and make out a roll of members—fifteen of whom shall constitute a quorum for doing business, but a less number may adjourn from time to time.

3. The election of delegates shall be duly attested by certificates from some authorized officer of the respective Conventions; but in the absence of such certificates, they shall not be deprived of their seats at the organization of the Council, provided the Standing Clerk is satisfied from other evidence that they were duly elected to this body.

4. Proxies who present certificates from their principals, or otherwise satisfy the Standing Clerk of their previous appointment, shall be entitled to seats at the organization of the Council but not otherwise.

5. No layman shall be received as proxy for a clerical delegate, nor shall a clergyman be received as proxy for a lay delegate.

6. The Moderator, Clerk, and Standing Clerk shall be chosen by ballot, taking precedence in the order here named; other elections may be made in such manner as shall be determined at the time.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

7. After the Council is organized, the following shall be the Order of Business, to wit: 1. The records of the preceding year, together with the Constitution and Rules, shall be read by the Clerk.—2. Necessary committees shall be appointed. 3. Memorials, resolutions, and other matters may be introduced and referred, if necessary. 4. Statistical reports received and read, or laid on the table for further action. 5. Reports from committees, if any, appointed at the last session to act during the year, and other unfinished business, received and attended to. 6. New business may be introduced and acted upon.

8. The Council shall be competent, at any time, by a vote of two-thirds, to change pro tem., the order above named, or postpone to another time, any branch of business coming first in order.

THE CHAIR.

9. The Moderator, or, in his absence, the Moderator pro tem., shall take the Chair precisely at the hour previously appointed and call the Council to order; and he shall cause the record of any preceding part of the session to be read and corrected.

10. He shall preserve order and decorum, speak to points of order in preference to other members, and decide questions of order without debate, unless, entertaining doubts, he invite it; which decision shall be subject to an appeal to the Council, but on such appeal no member shall speak more than once without leave.

11. He shall distinctly state every question, and before putting it, shall ask, "Is the Council ready for the question?" when, should no one indicate a wish to speak, he shall rise and take the vote—requiring the members to signify their assent or dissent by answering "Aye" or "No."

12. Should he entertain doubts respecting the result, or a division be called for, he shall divide the Council—those in the affirmative shall rise first, and afterwards those in the negative; and he may, if he choose, and shall if required, appoint two members, one from each side, to count, separately, the affirmative and negative votes, and report the number of each; whereupon he shall announce the decision.

13. The Moderator vacating the Chair may appoint a Chairman pro tempore; but such appointment shall not extend beyond an adjournment of the Council.

14. The appointment of all committees shall devolve on the Chair unless otherwise ordered at the time.

15. At the close of each sitting, the Moderator shall announce the hour and place of the next sitting; and at the close of the session, he shall announce the time and place for the next meeting of the Convention.

16. The Moderator shall have the right of voting, in all cases, as any other member.

DECORUM AND DEBATE.

17. During the sittings of the Council, each member shall observe silence and decorum, and shall not, by reading papers, entertaining conversation, walking about, or otherwise, interrupt its business, or any member while speaking in debate, except to call him to order.

18. No member shall absent himself from the services of the Council without leave of the Moderator, nor, if objection is made, shall leave be granted, unless by a vote of the Council.

19. When a member is about to speak in debate or deliver any matter to the Council, he shall rise from his seat, respectfully address himself to the Chair; and, avoiding personality, he shall confine himself to the question under debate, and when he has finished he shall sit down.

20. If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the Rules of the Council, the Moderator shall, or any member may, call him to order; in which case he shall take his seat, unless permitted to explain or proceed; but he may appeal from the decision of the Moderator, which appeal shall be decided without debate. If the Chair be sustained he can not proceed, except by permission of the Council.

21. If a member is called to order by another member, the exceptionable words or conduct shall be distinctly stated, and, if demanded, shall be reduced to writing and handed to the Moderator for his decision.

22. When two or more members rise to speak at the same time, the Moderator shall designate the person entitled to the floor;—but in all cases, the member first rising and addressing the Chair shall be entitled to speak first.

23. No member shall speak more than twice to the same question, without leave of the Council.

24. No debate shall be allowed on any subject, when no motion, or other proposition, is before the Council.

25. No motion shall be entertained or debated, until the same is seconded; and, if requested by the Moderator, or any member, every motion shall be reduced to writing and delivered to the Chair before it can be debated.

26. When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received except to adjourn, to lay on the table, for the previous question, to postpone, to commit, or to amend; and these shall have precedence in the order in which they are here named; the first three of which shall be decided without debate; but in all other cases, the motion first made and seconded, shall be put first, except that in filling blanks, the largest sum and longest time shall be first proposed.

27. The previous question when called for by two members, shall be put thus: The Moderator shall rise and say, "Shall the main question be now put?" If carried in the affirmative, the pending debate is precluded and the main question shall be put immediately; but, if carried in the negative, the whole question shall remain as it was before, except that the previous question can not be moved again on that subject during that sitting of the Council.

28. If a question in debate contain several points, any member may have the same divided and put separately.

29. When a motion is made and seconded, being stated by the Chair, it shall be deemed in possession of the Council, but may be withdrawn at any time before decision or amendment, but not afterwards.

30. A majority shall decide all questions, except such as are otherwise ordered by these Rules, or by the Constitution.

31. No member shall be permitted to vote on any question in the event of which he is immediately or personally interested; nor in any case where he was absent when the question was put, except by consent of the Council.

32. After a question has been once decided, it shall be in order for any member voting in the majority, to move for a reconsideration thereof at any time during that annual session; and such motion shall have precedence of all other questions except the motion to adjourn.

33. When the reading of a paper is called for and objected to, the question shall be decided by a vote of the Council without debate.

34. When the report of a committee is offered, if during the pendency of any other question, it shall be laid on the table until the previous business is disposed of, but otherwise the motions in order shall be to recommit or accept, which motions shall be fully debatable. After a report has been accepted, the following motions shall be next in order,—to lay on the table, to postpone, to amend, or to adopt.

35. Every member present when a question is taken, shall be required to vote for or against the same, unless specially excused, or personally interested; those who refuse must be considered as voting with the majority.

36. Before any memorial, letter, or other document, addressed to the Convention, shall be received and read, a brief statement of its contents shall be made by the introducer, if demanded by any two members.

MISCELLANEOUS MATTERS.

37. The members of any committee appointed for any purpose and required to act during the year and report at the next annual session of the Convention thereafter, shall be held as honorary members of the Council at the said next annual session, entitled to participate in its deliberations, but not to vote.

38. Committees shall be competent to appoint their own Chairman, whose duty it shall be to convene the Committee, preside at its meetings, and report its doings.

39. The Clerk shall keep a journal of all the proceedings in the order in which they occur, and transmit the same to the Standing Clerk to be recorded at length in the book of records.

40. The journal may be published entire if the Council desire it; but otherwise, Minutes of the actual decisions, resolutions, reports, &c. shall be published by the Standing Clerk, or some person duly authorized for that purpose.

41. The Occasional Sermon, and all other documents authorized by the Convention, shall be held as belonging to its proceedings, and disposed of as the Council may direct.

42. No standing rule or order of this Convention shall be rescinded, suspended, or altered, except by a vote of two-thirds of the members present.

Voted, That the thanks of the Convention be tendered to Br. J. A. Gurley, for his able Occasional Sermon, and that he be requested to publish it in the "Star in the West."

Adjourned, to meet at 9 o'clock Thursday morning, THURSDAY A. M.—Met at the hour appointed.

Br. Ashton, in obedience to the instructions of the Pennsylvania Convention, moved to rescind the vote passed last session, declaring that, in the opinion of this body, it is improper for persons who manufacture, vend, or use as a beverage, intoxicating liquors, to hold a seat as delegates in our ecclesiastical bodies. After some debate, the whole subject was referred to a committee, who subsequently reported the following resolutions, which were adopted with great unanimity.

Resolved, That we feel a deep sympathy in the cause of Total Abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, and we recommend all men to sustain that cause by their precepts and example.

Resolved, That this Convention does not recognize, but disapproves any test of fellowship in our denomination, or of fitness for a seat in our councils, other than those founded on Christian faith and character, and established by Christ and his apostles.

Voted, That Rev. John Boyden jr., of Rhode Island, be appointed to preach the next Occasional Sermon before this body, and that he have power to appoint a substitute.

Voted, That the Rev. A. G. Laurie, of Canada, be invited to take a seat in this Council.

Adjourned, to meet at 4 1-2 o'clock, P. M.

Met at the hour appointed. Heard a memorial from Br. A. Peck, of New York, in relation to the establishment of a denominational paper. Submitted to a committee, consisting of Brs. A. Peck, T. Whitemore, and O. A. Skinner, to report at the next session of this body.

On motion of Br. T. J. Sawyer, of New York, the following resolutions on the subject of Slavery, after an amicable discussion, were passed with but one dissenting voice.

Resolved, That we rejoice in the knowledge of the truth that the doctrines of Christ have for their end the holiness and happiness of all mankind; and that the faithful inculcation and acceptance of those doctrines must lead to the overthrow and extinction of all institutions, observances and relations, however ancient or firmly fortified, which are contrary to righteousness, to human well-being, and thus hindrances to the full establishment of the true and glorious kingdom of God on earth.

Resolved, That in the light of this truth we feel constrained to bear testimony against the slavery of the African race, now maintained in a portion of our country, as contrary to that gospel which is destined to break every yoke and lead captivity captive; as especially subversive of that golden rule which teaches us to do unto others as we would that they should do unto us; as contrary to the plainest dictates of natural justice and Christian love; and as every way pernicious alike to the enslaver and enslaved.

Resolved, That, regarding the whole human family as in the largest sense our brethren, joint heirs with us of our Father's love and the immortality of blessedness revealed through our Saviour, we are constrained both by duty and inclination to regard with peculiar sympathy and affection the oppressed, the benighted, the downtrodden, of our own and other lands, and to labor for their restoration to the rights and blessings of Freedom, Light and Truth.

Resolved, That, while we regard the holding in bondage of our brethren for whom Christ died, or the treatment of any human being with obloquy, harshness, or any indignity on account of his color or race, as contrary to righteousness, inconsistent with Christianity, and especially with that doctrine of Universal Grace and Love which we cherish as the most important of revealed truth, we are well aware that many worthy and upright Christians have sustained the relation of slave-holder in ignorance of its true character or from inability to relieve themselves therefrom; and while we earnestly entreat all Christian and especially Universalists slave-holders to consider prayerfully the nature and tendencies of the relation they sustain, we recommend or countenance no measures of indiscriminate denunciation or proscription, but, appealing to the Gospel, to humanity, and to their own conscience, we await in implicit confidence the perfect working of the principles of divine and Universal Love.

Voted, That Br. T. J. Sawyer be a committee to draft a plan of organization for the Universalist denomination, and to report at the next session of the Convention.

Voted, That the thanks of this Convention be tendered to the Universalist Society in Akron, and all others who have offered so abundant entertainment for visiting friends, on this occasion.

Voted, That the Clerk prepare the Minutes for publication in our periodicals.

Amendments to the Constitution proposed—to lie over one year, as follows:

Art. I. To be amended so as to read—This Convention shall be denominated the General Convention of Universalists in North America.

Art. II. So as to read—this Convention shall be constituted of four clerical and six lay delegates from each State or Provincial Convention now existing, or hereafter to be organized within the United States or British Provinces, which shall approve of this Constitution, and signify the same to this body.

CIRCULAR.

By a reference to the Minutes it will be seen that there were three subjects of great interest, brought before the Convention, viz: Temperance, Slavery, and denominational organization. On the first two, resolutions of a distinct character were passed, which it is believed will exert a highly beneficial influence. Both of these resolutions were discussed in a spirit of candor, and adopted with great unanimity. There was no difference of opinion in regard to the duty of doing what we can to aid the cause of temperance and humanity; and but little difference of opinion in regard to the way in which they can be most effectually advanced. We know of no body composed of persons from different parts of our widely extended country, where subjects of such vast moment, and so exciting in their character, have been acted upon with so much unanimity and kind feeling. Where the desire to do good, and where the rights and opinions of all are duly respected, there is but little difficulty in having harmony of action.

As there was no plan for a general system of government presented by the Committee appointed last year, no action was had on that subject. Br. T. J. Sawyer was appointed a Committee to present a plan at the next session of this body. No person could have been selected better qualified for the discharge of this duty than Br. Sawyer; and we trust that he will find time to give the subject that thought which its importance demands. We need, and should have a better system of organization. We want uniformity throughout the Order. We wish for no arbitrary rules, and none which will interfere with individual rights: but we wish those which will tend to produce united action, and bind together our whole people.

The religious exercises held during the session of the Convention, were numerously attended. The preaching was bold, manly, and eminently calculated to do good.

The friends at Akron deserve the thanks of the denomination, for the kind manner in which they provided for the wants of the Convention. Their houses were open to receive us; and all their attentions seemed dictated by true generosity and Christian affection.

Per Order, O. A. SKINNER, Clerk.

FROM HOME AGAIN.—By the time this paper reaches our readers generally, the Editor will be absent from his post, to remain about three weeks. All business that can be done by deputy, and by an Editor pro tem., will be promptly performed as usual. That requiring my personal attendance, will have to wait my return, or be sent by my family after me to Boston. A. B. G.

THE CHRISTIAN TEACHER, volume 3, number 1, comes to us enlarged to a medium quarto, and will appear hereafter, semi-monthly. It is a good Universalist paper, published and Edited by Brs. Rev. E. Manford, Rev. J. G. Burt (formerly of Mass.), and J. H. Jordan, in Terre Haute, Indiana. Brs. W. S. Clark and B. F. Foster (ministers) are Corresponding or Contributing Editors. The number before us is neatly printed, and well filled. Past numbers of the Teacher have always evinced much talent and industry. Terms, One dollar per annum, payable in advance. A. B. G.

NOTICE.

We are now about sending out our bills for collection.—The more than usual backwardness of our subscribers in paying their subscriptions during the past year, has made it very difficult, in many instances, for us to meet our engagements. We have been obliged, in fact, to put off our creditors and agree to pay interest, to induce them to wait until our remittances came in this fall. We hope our patrons, one and all, will see the justice of making immediate payment. We are offering to receive three dollars in full for this year and next; five dollars for 1842, '43 and '44, and seven dollars for 1841, '42, '43 and '44, if remitted free of postage; thus saving the subscriber from fifty cents to one dollar. We trust our agents will take some pains to make collections, and what is of vital importance, forward the money as soon as possible. We know of some agents who have collected money some months since, and yet retain it in their hands. This is doing injustice both to us and to the subscriber, and the fewer we have of such agents the better.

We shall soon issue our prospectus for the next volume, and we expect the assistance of some of the oldest as well as ablest of our ministering brethren in the Editorial department of our paper, among whom may be named, Brs. STEPHEN R. SMITH, DOLPHUS SKINNER, A. B. GROSH, as well as the correspondence of many others who are well and favorably known as writers, to the Universalist public. With these and other inducements which we hope to be able to give, we trust our friends and agents will use all laudable means and exertions, to obtain (paying) subscribers, and increase the circulation of the paper. In a word, we need such assistance. PUBL.

Br. LOCKE.—The money was received in due season, and the Registers, with the numbers of the Library, sent for, were put up immediately. A few days since Mr. Wood called, gave his receipt, and took the package.

RURAL REPOSITORY.—This truly neat semi monthly, devoted to Polite Literature, (the full prospectus for the twentieth volume of which, we copied a few weeks since,) is one of the most beautiful, entertaining and instructive sheets of the kind that we know of. It is published in the quarto form, each number embellished with one or more fine engravings, and is printed in handsome style, on superior medium paper. It will make a really tasteful volume when bound at the end of the year, and is well adapted to grace the drawing room table, and particularly interest the ladies. Its having attained to the twentieth volume, is proof positive of its excellence and popularity. Terms—One dollar, invariably in advance. Four copies for $3.00, seven copies for $5.00, ten copies for $7.00 or fifteen copies for $10.00. Address (postage free) Wm. B. Stoddard, Hudson, Columbia county, N. Y.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

Br. D. SKINNER will preach at German Flats on the first Sunday in November, and at Sullivan, on the second Sunday in November.

In behalf of the Universalists of Ithaca, we would inform our friends generally, that a Conference will be held at the Court House in Ithaca, Tompkins county, on the first and second days of November next. The friends have raised the "Macedonian cry," and we hope it will be listened to—let all that can attend, be there on those days.

Preachers in this Association, and as many others as can make it convenient, are earnestly invited to attend. "Come one, come all." A. G. CLARK.

POEMS.

BY MRS. JULIA H. SCOTT, AND A MEMOIR OF THE AUTHOR.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

WITH A PORTRAIT.

The subscriber proposes to issue during the month of October, a collection of the Poems of Mrs. SCOTT, to be accompanied by a brief Memoir, and embellished with a fine mezzotint likeness.—These Poems are so highly appreciated by the Universalist denomination, that it is believed this volume will meet with a cordial welcome; and from the circumstances attending its publication, as well as from the real excellence of its contents, it is hoped there will be a warm and general interest felt in its circulation.

The Publisher would state, therefore, that upon every copy sold a certain per centage will be devoted to the surviving child of Mrs. Scott, to be expended in her education; and this in fulfillment of her dying wishes. The Publisher, therefore, confidently appeals to the liberality of the Public; and there is a stronger appeal from a voice now silent, which should strike home to their holiest sympathies.

This collection has been long and repeatedly called for—promises of patronage have been liberally given; let those promises now be nobly redeemed, both as a tribute of respect and affection to the lamented Author, and as an evidence of honorable consideration for the literature of our denomination.

The work will contain 216 pages, well printed and neatly bound, with a splendid mezzotint likeness of Mrs. Scott by Sartain, single copies 63 cents, 6 copies for $3.

If more convenient the work can be obtained wholesale or retail, of Rev. A. R. Gardner, Iowa City, I. T.; Rev. W. E. Manley, Chicago, Ill.; Rev. J. A. Gurley, Cincinnati, O.; Rev. A. Case, Charleston, S. C.; R. T. Wicker, Richmond, Va.; C. L. Stickney, New York City; Grosh & Walker, Utica, N. Y.; Rev. S. R. Smith, Buffalo, N. Y.; H. Barrett, Rochester, N. Y.; Rev. Eli Ballou, Montpelier, Vt.; Rev. J. E. Palmer, Barre, Vt.; Powers & Bagley, Lowell, Mass.; T. Whittemore, Boston, or of the Publisher.

OCTOBER.

BY THE LATE WILLIS GAYLORD CLARK.

Solemn, yet beautiful to view,
 Month of my heart! Thou dawnest here,
 With sad and faded leaves to strew
 The summer's melancholy bier.
 The moaning of thy winds I hear,
 As the red sunset dies afar,
 And bars of purple clouds appear,
 Obscuring every western star.

Thou solemn month! I hear thy voice—
 It tells my soul of other days.
 When but to live was to rejoice—
 When earth was lovely to my gaze;
 Oh, visions bright—oh, blessed hours,
 Where are thy living raptures now?—
 I ask my spirit's wearied powers—
 I ask my pale and fevered brow!

I look to nature, and behold
 My life's dim emblems rustling round,
 In hues of crimson and of gold—
 The year's dead honors on the ground;
 And sighing with the winds, I feel,
 While their low pinions murmur by,
 How much their sweeping tones reveal
 Of life and human destiny.

When Spring's delightful moments shone,
 They came in zephyrs from the west,
 They bore the wood-lark's melting tone,
 They stirred the blue lake's glassy breast;
 Through Summer, fainting in the heat,
 They lingered in the forest shade;
 But changed and strengthened now, they beat
 In storm, o'er mountain, glen and glade.

How like those transports of the breast,
 When life is fresh and joy is new—
 Soft as the halcyon's downy nest,
 And transient all as they are true!
 They stir the leaves in that bright month,
 Which Hope about her forehead twines,
 Till Grief's hot sighs around it breathe—
 Then Pleasure's lip its smiles resigns.

Alas for Time, and Death, and Care—
 What gloom about our way they fling!
 Like clouds in Autumn's gusty air,
 The burial pageant of the Spring,
 The dreams that each successive year
 Seemed bathed in hues of brighter pride,
 At last like withered leaves appear,
 And sleep in darkness, side by side.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A REMINISCENCE.

It was in the afternoon of a pleasant summer day in 184—, that I in company with other youthful friends, sallied forth to inhale the pure and gentle zephyr, that gives such buoyancy to the mind, as well as the weary and fatigued body. The sun was fast receding in the western sky, and clothed in beautiful purple habiliments, reflected its light over the whole heavens. The western horizon, tinged with a bright red, contrasted beautifully with the glorious orb of day.

It is at such a time that the ardent lover of nature delights to walk forth, and contemplate the admirable character of the great Architect of nature. How conspicuous do his unbounded goodness, his almighty power, and infinite wisdom manifest themselves to the beholding eye! With what reverence do we then acknowledge the unchanging love of the Author of our existence, for providing such bountiful means for the felicity and enjoyment of his children, from the least unto the greatest.

Notwithstanding all the numerous demonstrations of the goodness of God written upon nature's ample page, how many there are that would have us believe, that inspiration has taught principles in direct contrariety to the teachings of the volume of nature—that God is aught but a God of wisdom, power, and unbounded goodness! Believe this who can, God be praised, I can not consent thus to traduce his amiable and glorious character.

We had not advanced far before we arrived at a beautiful grave yard, towards which our steps were directed. We entered into this receptacle of the dead with feelings of awe and veneration; and strongly impressed with the short and transitory state of man's existence. To-day health may sit blooming upon our countenance; and at the morrow's dawn we may be entombed in the cold and silent grave; to-day we may be sprightly and gay, elated with the pleasures of youth and beauty; to-morrow at the gate of yonder grave yard. Thus transitory is man's existence! Change, change, is written upon the face of all creation.

Can this be the end of man, thought I—do these moss-covered graves, so thickly strown about me, contain all that is left of man? Is this the end of all that is near and dear to us? No! answered the small and silent voice within—No! is written in flaming characters on the record of nature, and No! No! re-echoes in the volume of inspiration, that blessed chart of man's pilgrimage here below. Man is not destined to set forever in endless night, but like yonder receding luminary, goes down only to arise again in greater splendor, in a world where we shall not be subject to disease, sickness, and death; but made free from these contaminations, we shall live on, in the beatified presence of the great I AM.

What a calm and holy privilege it is to spend a few hours among the graves of those departed from the shores of time. A marble slab is all that remains to tell the name of the passing traveller. How it calms the ruffled feelings, melts the stubborn heart, and eases the troubled breast, when away from the noise and bustle of the world, we retire and hold sweet converse, as it were, with the spirits of the departed. Here we behold none of those distinctions that mar the face of society to so great an extent, but all are equal; the high and the low, the rich and poor, are brought to the same level, for "the dust shall return to earth as it was, and the spirit to God who gave it."—Here we become impressed with the shortness of life, and our minds in a measure become reconciled to the approach of death, the king of terrors, to too many of our race. Mankind ought more frequently direct their steps to the grave-yard and become more familiar with its scenes—it will afford them many hours of rich consolation. Death will not then appear as an enemy; but in the garb of a friend that comes to rid us of our load of trials and sorrows, and ushers us into a world where sorrow and sickness can never come to mar our happiness and joy.

The sable curtains of darkness admonished us to return to our homes again, where we arrived refreshed in body and in mind, and much pleased with the happy train of reflections we were led into by our excursion.

PHILOM.

CHRIST A PHANTOM.

Mr. Taylor, in his Diagesis, endeavoring to show that no such personage as Jesus Christ of Nazareth ever existed, lays much stress on the manner in which the early Christians were wont to speak of him. He would have us believe that the early Christians pretended to nothing more than an eclecticism in philosophy, and that Jesus Christ was but their impersonation of the perfect man. That, in fact, he never had an existence, and that the accounts we have of him are but fiction and romance. All this is alleged on the ground that early Christians contended that Christ had no real existence in the flesh.

Now here is both truth and error. And a person unacquainted with the metaphysical discussions of some of the earlier Christian sects, would be led very much to wonder at the idea that there should have been Christians who contended that Jesus Christ never really came in the flesh. And one may feel, on learning such a truth, that he would be quite justified in giving loose reins to his own skepticism, and reject both the existence of Christ and the truth of Christianity itself. On learning more of this matter, however, it will be seen that the spirit of Mr. Taylor's objection is wholly unwarranted.

The truth of the matter is this. The Gnostic Christians of the 2nd century, though divided among themselves on a variety of points, were tinged, in very many of their opinions, with the speculations of the oriental philosophy. This philosophy, in attempting to account for the origin of evil, supposed all matter to be necessarily and essentially malignant. That the primal Deity had nothing to do in creating matter, but that from him all spiritual beings emanated, and becoming entangled in malignant matter, they themselves became in some degree depraved.

To the minds of the Gnostics, who undertook to harmonize Christianity with this item of the oriental philosophy, the Gospel histories would present an almost insurmountable difficulty, in the fact of Christ's perfect innocence, notwithstanding his existence in the flesh. And the shifts to which they were driven show that they were not insensible to this difficulty. Some of them maintained that the real Christ did not dwell in the man Jesus, until his baptism by John, and that the connection ceased before the crucifixion of the Jesus. Others maintained that the Christ did not die, but by some miraculous illusion, he stood aside in the person, perhaps, of some disciple, while that disciple died in the apparent person of Jesus.

Although these most singular shifts obviated the supposed difficulty of Christ's death, they did not obviate the difficulty supposed to grow out of the dwelling of the real Christ in the material body of the man, Jesus. Others, therefore, pushed the matter to an extremity at once. They maintained that Christ never dwelt in a material body. That the apparent body of Christ was not really a material body, but was an illusion upon the senses of men. The apparent Christ, they contended, was a phantom.

Such is the foundation of Mr. Taylor's statement, that the early Christians contended that no such person as Christ ever really existed. In the first place, this opinion did not prevail extensively, until the 2nd century,† and then only among those who were about as essentially pagan as Christian, in their opinions. Moreover, they did not deny the fact of Christ's existence, but denied that he existed in unison with matter. Though he appeared thus to exist, such appearance was a mere phantom. If Mr. Taylor is really disposed to join issue with Christianity on the ground of the oriental philosophy, let him explain the cause of the illusion, if Christ's existence in the flesh be one, and also the nature of the works he apparently performed, and the death he apparently died.

Such facts as these teach two important lessons. First, they show what wild speculations men may receive as truth, and how they may succeed in convincing themselves that those speculations make part of Christianity. And secondly, they show what a stout objection to Christianity a determined opposer can manufacture out of very slight materials. Let us learn humility.—Star of Bethlehem.

The best philosopher is to be resigned and reconciled to whatever our heavenly Father has wisely and prudently kept under his own control, while we cheerfully exert ourselves to remedy those ills which are within the reach of human agency, and which, therefore, our heavenly Father designed we should suffer, or by our physical and mental abilities, overcome and remove.—Primitive Expounder.

CONVERSION TO UNIVERSALISM.

In consequence of the fact that many reports of a conflicting, and in some instances untrue character, with regard to his religious views, and course of conduct in their maintenance, have crept into circulation; the writer deems it a duty which he owes to religion, to his friends, and to himself, to make public a brief statement of the circumstances that attended his conversion from Partialism to the doctrine of free, impartial, universal grace; and of the events which transpired between himself and his former religious associates on making known his change of views.

I was for several years a member of the Bethel Baptist Church in this city, during the latter portion of which time I had been engaged in the prosecution of studies with the view of entering the ministry. During the past year I had been providentially placed in circumstances which led me to become somewhat familiar with the effect of Universalist sentiments upon the heart and life; and saw with surprise that the people whom I had ever been taught to consider as semi-infidels in belief, and of lax morality, were not only virtuous in personal character, but carried out in action the holy, forgiving and benevolent precepts of the great Teacher.

In compliance alike with my own feelings and the counsel of esteemed religious friends, I intended to commence my public labors as a licentiate in the Baptist denomination during the present or ensuing year; yet anxious to become perfectly familiar with the doctrines I might be called upon to maintain, I decided upon a thorough and careful examination of all the premises upon which the system of nominal orthodoxy was founded, and for this end submitted every item of belief to a comparison with divine Revelation, "searching diligently if these things were so."

I had been engaged but a short time in this pursuit, when I began to suspect that many articles of belief to which I had given assent, were not in accordance with the word of God; and imploring Divine aid I pursued my investigations until the subtleties of the schools were all swept away, and I became a happy believer in the doctrine of the unity of God, and the ultimate, full and complete salvation of the entire redeemed and glorified family of man: becoming firmly established in this glorious and heart-cheering faith from the Bible, and from the Bible alone—never having perused any other defence or exposition of the doctrines of Universalism, or listened to a sermon from a minister of the reconciliation.

Having thus been led to embrace the Gospel in all its fulness and purity, a sense of moral obligation induced me to make known my change of sentiment to the church of which I was a member, and I accordingly did so by letter, of which the following is a copy:

"To the Bethel Baptist Church.

"After an earnest and prayerful examination of the Scriptures, I have been led to the conclusion that many of the doctrines held by the Bethel church are not in accordance with the truth as revealed in the word of God. I therefore respectfully beg leave to withdraw from its membership, since I no longer can consistently with my views of duty hold fellowship with what I conceive to be its errors.

"In thus withdrawing, I believe it to be an act of Christian courtesy to briefly state my views on a few important points, in order that my position may be fully understood.

"I believe in the existence of one God, the Father of all spirits, in whom we live, and move and have our being; and whose tender mercies are over all his works. One Lord Jesus Christ, the Mediator between God and man, who tasted death for every man, and came hither to reconcile the world unto himself—that he shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied; that he shall reign till death, the last enemy, is destroyed; and that he shall then present the reconciled universe, free from sin, to his Father, that God may be all in all.

"I believe that sin is finite in its nature and consequences—that God is Love, that He changes not, and therefore we are not consumed—that the Lord is not always wrath, else would the spirits fail before him which he has made; that though no punishment seemeth for the present joyous, but rather grievous, yet afterward it worketh the peaceable fruits of righteousness on those who are exercised thereby.

"As my stay here may be short, you will confer a favor by acting upon this communication immediately. I wish a letter stating the reasons for which I have left, and also the character I have borne while among you.

"In leaving you, I rend asunder many ties of a strong and enduring nature; yet believing my feet to be in the path of duty, I do it with an unwavering mind. I do, and shall continue to, esteem in the highest manner your minister and officers. I tender to them as well as to the individual members, for each and every act of kindness, my sincere and hearty thanks: and praying God to hold you in his protecting care, imploring for you the richest blessings of life, and hoping that you may speedily become acquainted with the certainty and fulness of the grace of God, I bid you an affectionate farewell. THOMAS L. HARRIS."

I have been informed by members of the church, that this communication was read at the regular meeting, and on motion it was laid on the table; it being stated by several of the more prominent members, that they had no reason to doubt the writer's Christianity—that he was laboring under a delusion; and that he might, and in all probability would, renounce his errors and return to the bosom of the church.

Accordingly I was waited upon, and had repeated interviews, with the officers and elder individuals belonging to the body, and perhaps more than the usual routine of operation, entreaty, prayer, tears, expostulation, and, in the last instance, denunciation, was resorted to, to lead me to a renunciation of my sentiments. I was however enabled to stand fast in the faith, speaking whenever called upon, a strong and earnest word in defence of my views of truth.

It grieves me to be obliged to state, that in proportion as their hopes of my return began to fail, the feelings of some began to change; until hints, insinuations and reports came thick and fast, wounding my feelings in the most cruel and uncalled for manner—aspersing not only my religion, but my motives in embracing it; and more than this, endeavoring to injure my pecuniary circumstances, and my standing in community. I mention this more in sorrow than in anger, feeling to implore, with our great Exemplar, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!"

Three weeks after this letter, had been received by the church, the minister of that body, with whom I had been upon the most friendly and even intimate terms, called upon me, and finding me absent, expressed his sorrow at not seeing me, and his desire for an interview. I accordingly called upon the reverend gentleman, and while his guest, was dealt with in any thing but a pleasant manner.—Over this interview I would fain draw the veil of oblivion; saying only, that no arguments were adduced which I was not able fully and effectually to overthrow.

On the evening ensuing, the church assembled, and my case being brought up, the deacons stated that they had conversed with me, and found that I was fully established in my sentiments. This statement was corroborated by their minister, who stated that he had endeavored to shake my belief, but without the slightest success. The church then excommunicated me for heresy; no notice being taken of my letter whatever; and I have since received no official communication from that body notifying me of my exclusion.

During the following day it was stated publicly, that the Rev. Mr. Corey had in an interview, two evenings previous, entirely vanquished me in discussion; and this assertion was given on the Reverend gentleman's (?) own authority. On being made acquainted with this unfounded report, I immediately transmitted to my opponent the communication which follows:

"Utica, Oct. 5th, 1843.

"Rev. Sir—With unmingled pain and surprise I have heard that you have circulated among your friends the report, that in a brief conversation which we held a few evenings since, upon the "Scriptural evidences of Universalism," you overthrew the argument's which I advanced in defence of that heaven-descended truth.

"It affords pain to use language of a severe character to one who has been, for a long time, not only a religious teacher, but also a friend esteemed and beloved; and yet as a believer of the glorious doctrine that "God will have all men to be saved," I must say, that this statement is totally unfounded in fact; and in so saying, I am confident that the unbiased view of your own conscience will sustain me.

"Since you have repeatedly made to me the unqualified assertion, that "the doctrine of universal salvation is not found in the Bible"—that it is "in its tendency demoralizing, and licentious in the extreme," and that "the consequence of its being believed is the irretrievable ruin of the soul," I call upon you, a professed minister of the Gospel, to make good these assertions. And as the question, "Is the final destruction of sin and misery, and the consequent holiness and happiness of all mankind, taught in the Scriptures?" will embrace the entire subject matter in dispute, I beg you to consider this communication a respectful yet most earnest invitation to a discussion upon its truth, in writing, with myself.

"As intellectual and moral beings, we can find no higher employment than the investigation of this all-important topic. Anxious to receive nothing which is without foundation in the Scriptures as a matter of religious belief, I am willing, nay, most desirous of subjecting my opinions upon this subject, to the searching and rigid scrutiny which a thorough and candid discussion can not fail to give. Permit me to put the interrogation, does the position which you hold in community, as a professed herald of truth, demand less at your hands?

"May I beg an answer at your earliest convenience, informing me with regard to your acceptance of my proposition. As the minds of many of our friends are exercised upon the doctrine which will be advocated on our respective parts, I would suggest the propriety of giving publicity to the discussion, in the event of its taking place.

"Trusting that you may receive and answer this letter in the kind and Christian spirit in which I have endeavored to write. With sentiments of respect and esteem, I remain yours in the truth.

"REV. D. G. COREY." "T. L. HARRIS."

The writer left this letter, personally, at the residence of Mr. C., and anxiously waited an answer. None has, however, been given, although nearly a month has elapsed since it was written. And so far from the bitter feelings of my opposers becoming modified by time, each day seems to give them new virulence.

In conclusion, the writer would express his heartfelt gratitude to, and undiminished affection for the dear friends, who, though differing in sentiment, have so nobly, and unsolicited, defended his motives and character from the false insinuations of his opposers. To them, and to those, especially of my Baptist brethren and sisters with whom I was once connected in church fellowship, who so attentively gave ear to my first public proclamation of the Gospel of "glad tidings which shall be unto all people," and who at its conclusion extended the warm, fraternal hand, I would give the assurance that their kindness has left an impression upon my heart, that time and change may strive in vain to efface. That God may bless them with his most precious gifts, and enable them to receive in belief that glorious Gospel of free, impartial, universal love, which they have manifested in action, is my sincere and trusting prayer. And though in the providence of God I may be placed in circumstances which will prevent the mingling of my thoughts and prayers with theirs during this transitory mortal state, I anticipate with a thrill of rapture, the happy period when, in common with the whole moral, intellectual creation, I shall meet them, changed, hallowed and glorified, in the "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

Whereas, there are in our denomination persons desirous of entering the ministry, and also many coming from other denominations wishing to engage in the clerical profession among us. Some of whom prove to be imposters, or destitute of the vital principles and knowledge of our faith and whose influence is sickly and deleterious to our prosperity, Therefore,

Ministers present.—G. S. Ames, T. L. Clark, W. M. DeLong, J. Finn, J. T. Goodrich, E. E. Guild, J. S. Haynes, O. G. Hempsted, L. P. Hollister, L. Hyatt, J. R. Mack, A. Peck, A. O. Warren, W. Wells, and H. E. Whitney—15.

REMARKS. It scarcely need be added, that we had a joyful and interesting meeting, upon this occasion. The weather, though cold, was not uncomfortable, or unpleasant, and our friends in Brooklyn, rendered our stay one of uncommon interest and delight; as well by their kindness and hospitality—which will ever hold us debtors to gratitude and love—as by their "feast of fat things" to which we were directed in the excellent services of the sanctuary. Our congregation was unusually large—larger, probably than was ever witnessed since the existence of this Association. The house—not of inferior size—was soon crowded with ardent listeners; many were unable to procure seats, and many more to obtain a shelter from the rays of the "majestic Orient." Sermons were preached by Brs. Mack, (occasional) Whitney, Warren, DeLong, Guild, Goodrich and Peck.—Addresses by Br. Peck.

May the seed that was there scattered have its due influence upon the hearts of all who listened to the ministrations of the word; and the ball of truth continue to roll onward with accelerated speed, till the gloomy deserts of error, darkness, and superstition, shall bud and blossom, as the tinselled rose; till God's deathless love shall melt the obduracy of each stubborn heart; till it shall brighten and elevate the hopes, purify and refine the affections of a mourning and dejected race, and cause their error-bound spirits to look upward with an eye of faith to that all-glorious and universal association above, where the pure electible joys of an immortal world shall swell the pæan of unceasing and transcending praise to God and the Lamb forever and ever. Amen.

O. G. HEMPSTED, Clerk.

THE TEMPERANCE-TEST RESOLUTION.

Many of our readers will doubtless remember that last year the U. S. Convention of Universalists by a small majority passed a resolution virtually declaring that our Societies, and Associations, and State Conventions should no longer select for delegates any person who used any intoxicating liquors, or made or sold the same. The resolution was felt by many to be un-washingtonian, uncalled for, injudicious, and an intermeddling with the societies, Associations and Conventions which are capable of selecting their own delegates. Some of our public bodies even went so far as to pass resolutions demanding its repeal—though it was virtually a dead letter as soon as passed; for several who voted for it, only did so, lest it might be supposed they were unfriendly to the temperance cause, or favored the appointment of intemperate men as delegates to our ecclesiastical councils. So, for fear of being misunderstood, they voted in favor of a resolution to which they were in fact opposed. Truly, "the fear of man bringeth a snare."

But the object we now have in view is, to state that at the late session of the U. S. Convention that subject was brought up again. One year's sober reflection had brought the brethren together once more, and prudence was consulted. But lest a repeat of the offensive resolution—the anti-temperance resolution, in fact; for its tendency was to injure rather than benefit the cause—should be misunderstood by the world, a counter resolution merely was passed, declaring that the only test of qualifications for a delegate should be that laid down by Jesus and his apostles—and that counter-resolution was further carefully guarded from misconstruction by one in favor of the temperance cause. This was as it should be.

The following statement by Br. G. W. Lawrence, of Illinois, who was present at the Convention, will probably give a clear idea of the feeling that prevailed in the Council—of which I believe he was a member. We copy from the Better Covenant, of Chicago, and only remark, further, that all our brethren who were present, and whom we have heard speak on the subject, seem to understand the vote as does Br. Lawrence. A. B. G.

"Considerable business was done by the Council; of this it is not necessary that I write, inasmuch as the proceedings in an official form will soon be published, and our numerous periodicals are requested to copy; of course you will let them appear in our hebdomadal. In relation however, to the business of the Council, or rather to an item or two of the same, I will here say a few words. You will recollect that at the last session of this body, a resolution in relation to the subject of Temperance was passed which has since been deemed somewhat denunciatory in its nature, and hence not in accordance with the pure principles of Washingtonianism or the spirit of Universalism. Some discussion was elicited on the motion to rescind this resolution; yet as it was thought our denomination might be placed in an improper light on the great subject of Temperance, should an expunging resolution merely, be passed, it was thought proper to pursue a different course. Resolutions were therefore adopted, which, while they express fully our attachment to this holy cause, are at the same time free from denunciatory language or any thing of an unchristian spirit. I was indeed much gratified to hear an expression from our brethren decidedly favorable to this glorious enterprise which has for its object the restoration of the poor inebriate from his miserable condition. Yet they are satisfied there is a right and wrong way to proceed in this business. Heaven grant our efforts may be properly directed."

FATHER BALLOU.

It has been interesting and refreshing to read the gratification expressed by our Western brethren generally, at the visit of Father Ballou to the Convention in Akron this fall—so much so, that I have thought our readers might be pleased to read them also, especially as they will not occupy much room in our columns.

Br. Lawrence, of Illinois, thus writes his impressions to the Better Covenant, published in Chicago.

On the forenoon of the second day the vast concourse of people was addressed by that worthy veteran in the cause of impartial grace, Father Hosea Ballou, of Boston. He preached from these words: "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God and there is none else." Isa. xlv: 22. The discourse was listened to with much attention and I have no doubt will long be remembered by those who heard it. It was with peculiar pleasure that I gazed upon the toil-worn features of his face, and heard him raise his voice in defence of the great salvation. He gave the assembled multitude to understand that the subject of human salvation was a great and highly important subject—that it was a subject which concerned all mankind, even all the ends of the earth—that the family of man universally were in a condition in which they needed salvation—that there is no salvation but in God—and that there is in Him salvation for all men. He also proved conclusively that no tribute of God was opposed to the ultimate salvation of all men, but that on the contrary they were all favorable to the accomplishment of this glorious work. But I have not room to say more in reference to his sermon. Father Ballou has well nigh performed the work allotted to him on the earth. For about half a century he has labored in the Gospel field, and now his locks are whitened with the frosts of more than three score and ten years. May he go down to his grave in peace, cheered by the prospect of that glorious hope afforded by the doctrine which to a good old age he has ably advocated.

But the fullest and most animated description is given by Br. Gurley, Editor of the Star in the West, of Cincinnati. Br. Gurley is originally of Massachusetts, where, some 8 or 10 years ago, he probably frequently heard Mr. Ballou preach. He thus describes the anxiety of the people, and the overflowing of their long excited feelings as they become gratified at hearing the old veteran.

"UNITED STATES CONVENTION.—Our last letter brought us to Akron, the place appointed for the United States Convention of Universalists.—We arrived in town before sun-down, and found the people pouring in from all quarters—the East and the West, the North and the South. Luckily, we found comfortable and pleasant quarters with an excellent family near the village, with whom we are now staying. By dark the streets and vacant places near the public house where the committee of distribution was stationed, were thronged and by nine o'clock in the evening, the houses of our brethren and friends seemed to be crowded.—Many went several miles into the country to find lodgings. Everything was done that could be to provide places of entertainment; and great praise is due the Society for their great exertion to make all comfortable. Very late in the evening there came from Cleveland a large company from the East, and among them Father Ballou, and Brs. Whittemore and O. A. Skinner. A large number came in canal boats and made them their dwelling places while they stayed. In the morning, (Wednesday) the town was alive with people; and at the usual hour of service they repaired to the meeting house. Our brethren had taken the precaution to stretch a very large awning upon one side of the house, had taken out one of the windows and in the vacancy erected a stand so that the speakers could address those within and without at the same time. The house was filled to excess; and many more, probably three times the number, seated themselves under the broad-spread awning. Half-past ten o'clock came, and the services commenced. Br. O. A. Skinner read the Scriptures and a hymn, and after the singing Father Ballou offered up a most fervent and affecting prayer. All had been eager to see him—all eyes were strained to catch a glimpse of his person; and it may well be supposed that his prayer was heard with almost breathless attention. Many an eye was wet with tears when he took his seat. A hymn followed and then the occasional sermon by the writer.

In the afternoon Br. Balch from New York city preached an excellent sermon; in the evening Br. O. A. Skinner the same. At the close of the service notice was given that Father Ballou would preach the next day at 10 o'clock. The people seemed impatient for the morning. A deep anxiety pervaded all minds to hear this man of God—this Patriarch of Israel; and at the appointed time, all assembled to listen to him. He took for his text Isaiah xlv: 22. "Look unto me, and by ye saved, all the ends of the earth: for I am God, and there is none else." We never heard him speak better, or with more spirit. Every body was pleased and delighted—unless it might have been a very few bigoted and narrow-minded Partialists: and we doubt if they could find any fault. It was worth a journey from Cincinnati to Akron to hear that one sermon. He had the entire attention and control of his audience. His peculiar manner, his apt and clear illustrations, and his great strength of reasoning chained the attention of all who heard; and we verily believe that few if any would have gone away if had preached all day.

This venerable father in our Israel is undoubtedly one of the most remarkable men of this age.—We do not believe the world contains a superior mind. In strength and solidity of intellect, we should not know where to look for his equal; and that he is one of the most successful reformers that has appeared for centuries is certain. He was seventy-two years of age last April; and for more than sixty years* he has been steadily engaged in the proclamation of the Gospel of universal salvation. He has encountered the fiercest and most obstinate opposition and persecution, but never for a moment has he been found faltering or unfaithful. Like a good soldier of the cross he has fought the good fight with a heavenly power and energy that have been found irresistible. He has stood up in the defence of God, and Christ and divine truth from his youth; and now, as he approaches the close of his ministry he looks about him and sees on every hand the fruits of his labor, and can rejoice with an exceeding great joy. When he commenced he was almost alone—now he is surrounded with hundreds of preachers and thousands and tens of thousands, of believers, who pronounce his name with deep affection and gratitude. All rise up and call him blessed for his work's sake; and the honor he now receives is preferable to that conferred upon Emperors, 'Kings or Princes.' And when he is gone, the memory of millions will cherish his deeds and virtues as long as the lamp of life continues to burn. His body may perish, but his name—never.

* Br. Gurley is a little too fast—this would take Father Ballou into a pulpit to preach Universalism at the age of twelve years; whereas he was about twenty one years old when he commenced. Br. Gurley meant, undoubtedly, if he did not write "fifty years."—A. B. G.

"UNITED STATES FISCAL NOTES.—We have made arrangements to publish a wood-cut facsimile of the United States Fiscal notes as they are issued from the Treasury Department, at Washington. In this a true knowledge of the new Government currency will be conveyed to the people. We look upon this as a very important movement, and it is desirable that the people know its character, and canvass its merits, before Congress convenes in December. For the present, Fifty Dollar notes only will be issued, and these can be disbursed only as fast as the amount of old Treasury notes outstanding, shall be reduced below five millions."

The above we copy from J. Thompson's "Bank Note Reporter," which, by the way, we esteem the best, most correct and faithful Bank note list and Counterfeit Detector in the United States, and should be taken by every merchant and business man, who is in the habit of receiving and handling much money. We would have it understood, that this last remark does not apply to us; and what is worse, our patrons seem determined that we shall not take such "flattering unctious" to our souls. But the terms of the Reporter, of which we were speaking, are—monthly, $1.00; semi-monthly, $2.00; weekly, $3.00; semi-weekly, $5.00.

Address, J. Thompson, 52 Wall st., New York.

NOTICE.

We are now about sending out our bills for collection.—The more than usual backwardness of our subscribers in paying their subscriptions during the past year, has made it very difficult, in many instances, for us to meet our engagements. We have been obliged, in fact, to put off our creditors and agree to pay interest, to induce them to wait until our remittances came in this fall. We hope our patrons, one and all, will see the justice of making immediate payment. We are offering to receive three dollars in full for this year, and next; five dollars for 1842, '43 and '44, and seven dollars for 1841, '42, '43 and '44, if remitted free of postage: thus saving the subscriber from fifty cents to one dollar. We trust our agents will take some pains to make collections, and what is of vital importance, forward the money as soon as possible. We know of some agents who have collected money some months since, and yet retain it in their hands. This is doing injustice both to us and to the subscriber, and the fewer we have of such agents the better.

The correspondent of the National Intelligencer thus describes Ex-President Boyer and family:

"Ex-President Boyer and family arrived here by the railroad from Rouen, on Monday. They travel in so plain a way, that the journals can not reconcile it with the accounts of his immense wealth. A Rouen editor, who visited the party, reports him a dark mulatto, a man of sensible conversation and good breeding, apparently about 65 or 68 years of age, under a double affliction, the loss of power and country, and the recent death of his wife. His mother, who is with him, is a negress, very tall, above 80 years of age, dressed in an odd fashion, wearing a great felt hat. The wife of the colonel, his nephew and aid, who is a bright mulatress, possesses rare beauty, and has four children. This morning, in passing the hotel near the church of the Madeleine, in which they are lodged on the first floor, I saw the aged dame and an equally black nurse with one of the children in her arms at the window."

STEAMBOAT EXPLOSION.—The steamboat Rushlight, while passing one of the wharves at Brooklyn yesterday afternoon, burst her boiler, by which the Captain and one of the hands were severely, though not dangerously injured. A boy that was on board previous to starting, is missing, and it is feared he was drowned. The Rushlight is a very old boat, and was used for towing. —[Tribune.]

TROUBLE ON THE ERIE AND KALAMAZOO RAILROAD.—We learn from the Toledo (O.) Register, that a portion of the Erie and Kalamazoo Railroad was torn up for the third time, on the 13th ult. The track was torn up on an embankment near Sylvania, where the cars would have been precipitated to the bottom, with all those on board, but for the sinking of the locomotive in the sand. Another depredation, but not of so heinous a character, was committed on the 15th. These outrages are supposed to have been committed by the laborers on the road in consequence of non-payment of their dues.

A farmer in the neighborhood of Little Fort, twelve miles from Southport, Wisconsin, harvested 102 bushels of winter wheat, of very superior quality, from two and a half acres of land, by actual measurement.

REPORTED LOSS OF THE STEAMER SARAH BARNES.—The schooner Caroline arrived at the New Basin yesterday, 30 days from Vera Cruz, via the mouth of the Sabine river, where she put in on account of the weather. While she was there, another schooner put in; and the latter informed that the packet steamer Sarah Barnes, on her passage from Galveston for New Orleans, had been wrecked—that her boiler burst, and that several of her passengers and crew had perished; and that the vessel and cargo were a total loss. This is the substance of the account given by the mate—Capt. Arent being absent. There may foundation for the statement, but we hope it is a mistaken rumor.—N. O. Com. Bulletin, 16th.

FREE PERSONS OF COLOR IN LOUISIANA.—A decision deeply affecting the interests of free people of color in New Orleans has just been made in New Orleans. By the laws of the State, all free persons of color who have made it their residence, commencing at any period between the years 1825 and 1835, are only permitted to remain there by special license from the authorities. Those of them who have received such license, and have gone to reside in any free State, are by the law regarded as residents of such State, and expelled from Louisiana.

CORRESPONDENCE.

BR. GROSH—The following letter from Doctor J. L. C. Griffin, though a private one to me, (yet containing a fraternal greeting for you,) and not designed for publication, I have ventured to take the liberty of sending to you with the annexed answer, for publication in the Magazine and Advocate, (if you deem them worthy,) on the ground that some of your readers may feel an interest and gratification in the perusal of the same.

LETTER TO BR. D. SKINNER.

Williamsburg, Virginia, Oct. 1st, 1843.

Rev. and Dear Sir.—A favorable opportunity occurring, in the departure of a friend for Utica, I have availed myself of it, to address a fraternal greeting, both to yourself and to Br. Grosh. I almost know you will kindly receive my epistle, flowing, as it does, from an affectionate spirit of fraternal love to you, whose zeal and labors abundant in behalf of Universalism I do heartily appreciate. But I will make this poor scrawl, more particularly the vehicle of my warm acknowledgment to you, of the great satisfaction which I have derived from your unanswerable defence of Universalism, in the controversy with Elder A. Campbell of Bethany! I am delighted to express to you my full conviction of the glorious triumph of truth over error presented in that controversy. Would that every "Campbellite" Baptist, and "old side" Baptist, and every Partialist in the land would carefully peruse all the letters of that publication.—My faith, as a firm believer in the heavenly doctrine of universal salvation, has received, I am sure, no diminution by a perusal of said letters, both pro and con, although I have to regret the asperity which was introduced into the discussion—not of your seeking, as I do believe—in the same way that I am pained to behold the same personal severity, in most of the controversies which I read. However, Rev. Mr. Campbell's vituperation I am not wholly unacquainted with, and thus, I am delighted to reflect on the gentlemanly dignity, and, as I view the matter, the suitable severity, for the most part, with which, Mr. C.'s ungentelemanly and unchristian personalities were met! A stranger to you in the flesh, I am not so in the spirit, viewing as I do, your past devotion to the cause of truth, with the heartiest satisfaction. May every blessing rest upon you—I shall ever rejoice at your prosperity both spiritual and temporal!

If Br. S., you can conveniently do so, will you send an article occasionally, to the Christian Warrior, which journal I read, for I shall be truly glad to read some of your contributions! Richmond, in which place the Warrior is published, is a field of your former pastoral labors, and I doubt not, all the members of the Universalist Society there would be glad to hear from their former pastor. Favor me, my excellent brother in the Gospel, with an epistle acknowledging the receipt of this; then shall I know that I have not violated the high-minded influences, and independent bearings of gentlemanly and Christian courtesy, by intruding (?) my poor production upon your hands. If I have thus sinned, please permit me to add the extenuating suggestion that I have written from the honest, though ardent impulse of a cherished fraternal affection. If I may never see thy face in the flesh, I rejoice to believe that I shall meet thee, dear brother, in the immortal world of boliness and happiness, where, with ALL OUR RACE we shall be endlessly blessed. "Grace, mercy and peace" ever abide with thee and thine.

Affectionately thy brother,

JAMES L. C. GRIFFIN, M. D.

REV. D. SKINNER.

I shall be happy by an early post, to receive a letter from you. J. L. C. G.

ANSWER TO THE FOREGOING.

To J. L. C. Griffin, M. D.—Dear Sir, and Br. Your very kind and fraternal epistle of the 1st inst., came duly to hand. It needs not the apology you offer on its behalf; for I assure you it is very far from being regarded as a sinful intrusion upon my notice. Nay, it is cordially welcomed as a tribute of fraternal regard, grateful to every Christian bosom, and encouraging to every soldier of the cross. You will, I doubt not, pardon the liberty I have taken in giving it publicity, together with this my answer, for the reason that the topics touched upon are not altogether of a private character, but may interest some portion of the public, and especially my friends in Richmond, many of whom (God bless their warm hearts and dear souls!) I still regard as my spiritual children, and rejoice exceedingly in all their prosperity.

In regard to your warm acknowledgments for, and high encomiums on, my defence of Universalism in my Discussion with Rev. A. Campbell, I remark that such encomiums are to most men (especially those susceptible of vanity) both very acceptable and gratifying; and more particularly so when coming from those as well qualified to judge as yourself, who have long and thoroughly examined the subject, and whose professional pursuits and intercourse with mankind enable them to know the tendency and bearing of different systems, and to see the divine efficacy and all-sustaining power of truth in the day of sickness and the hour of death. But in this case, so far as I am personally concerned, I think your encomiums entirely undeserved; and for this reason: That although the victory is decidedly and triumphantly in favor of Universalism, and so conceded I believe by the public and by Mr. Campbell, (if not in word, at least by his conduct,) yet the victory I regard not as the result of any extraordinary talent, or learning, or controversial powers, on my part, but as the triumph of that omnipotent truth which it was my good fortune to defend. And so also Mr. C.'s signal defeat was owing, not to his want of talents, or learning, or controversial powers, (for they are acknowledgedly great,) but to the desperate and miserable system he had to defend. Indeed, how could he succeed, or what could he do, when reason, common sense, the Bible, and even his own Notes and comments on the New Testament were all arrayed against him? And how could I fail of victory when all these were so decidedly in my favor? It is true I deeply regretted that he so entirely lost his temper and self-control and indulged in the low and vulgar abuse and scandal which disfigure almost all his letters. But then what could the poor man do? How could he keep his temper, in such a desperate case, where he saw himself perfectly wrecked and his own authority laughing him in the face? That I kept my temper and possessed my soul in patience, is true. And why should I not? What was there to disturb me? He manifested quite anger enough for both of us, and the more I saw of his abuse and indignation the more certain I was of the victory. True, I occasionally "rebuked the madness of the prophet" and turned the tables on him that he might see himself in the mirror; but this only made him the more desperate; so I let him have his own way, gave him rope enough, and he quickly hung himself. I pitied him for his untoward fate; but my sympathy was as unwelcome to him as my rebuke.

In regard to your request that I should occasionally write for the Christian Warrior, I remark, it would give me, I doubt not, quite as much pleasure to do so as it would the readers of that spirited paper to peruse anything from my pen. But for some months past, owing to unforeseen events, and circumstances over which I had no control, I have had a great and embarrassing amount of secular matters and business to attend to, inasmuch that I have scarcely found time to write to my nearest and dearest friends. Add to this that I have been, for the last eighteen months engaged in preaching nearly every Sabbath from ten to forty miles distant from my home, and you may readily suppose I have found but little time, however strong my inclination to correspond for any of our excellent periodicals. If, however, I should, in future, be so fortunate as to have occasionally a leisure hour, I should most cheerfully so employ it as to comply with your request.

The "Christian Warrior" is a spiritedly and ably conducted paper, and I rejoice that the Old Dominion can boast of such a champion. I often recognize with pleasure your own initials in its columns, and presume there is no want of correspondents or of editorial talent in its behalf. I rejoice exceedingly in the zeal and engagedness and prosperity with which our brethren in Richmond appear to be moving forward. May they still go on conquering and to conquer, till all their enemies and the enemies of the doctrine of a world's salvation shall bow to all-conquering Truth, and to the scepter of Jesus and own him Lord to the glory of God the Father. Affectionately thy brother,

D. SKINNER.

A NEW HEART.

There is a great deal said in these days of excitement, about the new heart; and we think it would be uncharitable to suppose that all who profess to have had a change of heart, intend to deceive others; but we think that they are themselves deceived by those who undertake to be their teachers in matters of religion. There certainly must be something, some change, which is mistaken for a change of heart. And now let us see if we can find what that is.

With deference to the opinions of others, I must be permitted to express my firm conviction, that it is the effect of error, arising from a false education. A child is taught to believe that if he has a change of heart, and joins some church, he will be saved; and if not, he will certainly be lost in a future state. When he gets old enough to reflect on these matters and finds he has not had this change of heart, it gives him a great deal of uneasiness; for he feels very unsafe—believing, as he has been taught, that if he should die before he had time to repent, endless misery would certainly be his doom. These things he drives from his mind as much as possible; still they will return and embitter every hour of his life—hanging like an insupportable load upon his mind. But there is a protracted meeting started—an excitement got up in the neighborhood. He goes to meeting, and the revival preacher tells him that he is "a poor, miserable sinner—that he is hanging over hell, suspended by a single thread, and perhaps the destroying angel is now about to cut the thread, and let him down among screaming devils who will torment him to all eternity." His old fears now rush into his mind like a torrent over which he can have no control; and at this crisis, reason has often been driven from its throne, and the miserable victim has dragged out a life of insanity, or ended it by committing suicide. But if reason holds its place, he feels sure that he can not live in the situation he now is, and cries out in the anguish and bitterness of his heart, "what shall I do?" "Here, sit down on this anxious seat, and we will pray for you," is the preacher's reply. He does so, and he is then asked if he feels any better, and he tells the truth when he says he does; for he feels that he has taken one step the right way. He is then told that he must pray himself; he prays, and feels still better. He is then told that he is hopelessly converted; he believes it and feels entirely relieved from those harassing and distressing doubts and fears which have hung so long upon his mind. Now this he calls the new birth—a change of heart—because he feels so much easier in his mind than he did before. He thinks a load of sin has been removed from him, when in fact a load of fear is all that has been removed from his mind.

But a protracted meeting can not last forever.—The meeting breaks up, he goes home and mingles with the world again, and he finds within him a propensity to return to the error of his ways again. This makes him doubt whether he has been born again—whether he has had a change of heart—in fact whether he is a Christian, or not. He does not quite feel as he thinks a Christian ought to feel. When next he comes forward among his brethren to renew his covenant, he says he doubts whether he is a Christian. He is told, that is a good sign and that all good Christians have those doubts; so, before covenant meeting is over he gets pretty well assured that he is a Christian. Now in the whole of this man's life, he is subject to perplexing doubts and fears—and why? Because he depends on his own works for salvation in a future state, instead of the free grace of his heavenly Father; and he never can feel assured that he has done enough. He does not enter into rest. He has nothing that is like an anchor to the soul both sure and steadfast; because he is wandering on the barren and sterile mountains of sin and unbelief.

There is nothing in the universe but a firm reliance on the impartial grace of our heavenly Father, upon which man can rest; there is no other way of entering into rest.

CONFERENCE AT SOUTHVILLE.

The first Conference of the Otsego Association of Universalists was held in the Baptist meetinghouse, town of Stark, on Wednesday and Thursday the 11th and 12th ult., and a meeting better calculated for advancing the interests of our Zion, has not before been held in this part of our great Master's vineyard. Our brethren and sisters collected from this and the region round about, ere the Winter should set in, to hold sweet converse together, and to listen to some of the "gracious words," once spoken by Prince Immanuel, "which give life to the world." Nor were they disappointed; for the presence of God was there. Peace, joy, and happiness, was there, and love, kindness, and benevolence. The day-spring from on high visited us; and the light of the Sun of truth and righteousness shined in our hearts. We believe that many said on that occasion, "it is good for us to be here;" and with the Psalmist, "Whom have I in heaven but thee, and there is none upon the earth that I desire beside thee." It did our heart good as we listened to our brethren delineating the nature, character, and perfections of the Almighty; the life, love, actions, and forbearance of his Son; and the duties incumbent on all those who believe in God's impartial grace. It is but justice to say that the respective speakers afterwards, in the order in which they are set down acquitted themselves "as workmen that needed not to be ashamed;" and no doubt some of our Partialist friends had reason to acknowledge this truth, as the following amusing incident more fully explains.

Br. Woolley, on taking his seat in the pulpit to preach in the afternoon of the first day, observed written, on the right hand side of the desk, with a pencil, in a legible hand, (conjectured to have been done by a prominent Partialist in the village,) these words from Paul's First Epistle to Timothy, 4th chapter, last verse, "Take heed unto thyself, and unto the doctrine." He then called upon the writer of this and whisperingly remarked, whether he might not take the sentiment before him as a text; which I advised. Some of our opposing brethren heard his application of it, and felt it, no doubt, and we trust that when they reflect on it, it will cause them emphatically "to take heed" to their doctrine. It was a masterly affair, take my word for it.

Sermons were preached by all the ministering brethren present—Brs. Barry, Whiston, Woolley, Tuttle, Cheney, Hathaway, and C. S. Brown; last discourse and concluding addresses by Br. Woolley. Our brethren at Southville are deserving of all praise for the way they got up, and carried through this glorious meeting. We leave it to those present if the singing was not excellent; and the arrangements complete. May it awaken a like spirit in other places—a spirit of new zeal, and new efforts in our common cause;—the cause of God—the cause of Christ, and the cause of man. May our united prayers ascend to heaven for a blessing, like smoke from the accepted sacrifice, on the whole universal church, in the words of Solomon's song,

"Awake, O north wind, and come thou south, blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out."

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

EDITED BY

Revs. A. B. Grosh, G. W. Montgomery and A. C. Barry.

UTICA, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1843.

PLAIN TALK FOR PLAIN PEOPLE.

I wish to say a few words to the subscribers of this paper, and indeed to its friends generally—and wish to address them in as plain and familiar a way as possible; for I feel as if, by this time we were well acquainted, and am sure we have many feelings and interests in common with each other. The subject on which I desire to address them, is the paper itself—a subject in which I have, for some years, had no pecuniary share or interest, but for which I, as well as many of them, certainly feel a great regard. To our plain talk, then.

In a few more months, I shall cease to be principal Editor, and will be only a Corresponding Editor of the Magazine and Advocate. The arduous cares and labors, the responsibilities and perplexities of my present station, will devolve on others—indeed, for a few years past—since I ceased to be a proprietor, they have been light compared with what they were before that—and mine will be the comparatively light and easy task of merely furnishing and preparing my own articles for its columns, and bearing responsibility for them alone. Those who have taken an interest in my writings, will still have the same interest to bind them to the support of the paper—for at least one year, wherever my lot may be cast, I will continue to write for these columns, if not as much in quantity, I would fain hope at least as good in quality. But my desire is principally to notice another contemplated change in the paper. As a new Editor is to take the helm instead of the old, worn out one now at it; and as some additions of acknowledged value are to be made to the Corresponding Editors, I can not flatter myself, or fear for the paper, that the change to be made by transferring me from one department to another, can in any wise materially affect your regard for and support of the Magazine and Advocate. I pass, then, to notice the other change.

In a few weeks more the proprietors intend to publish this paper only on the advance pay system—the CASH system. They do not despise the credit system in certain cases—but are well satisfied that it is not the best system for newspaper publishers, and paying subscribers, however non-paying subscribers may profit by it. A few remarks will set this matter in a clear light to every candid and common-sense mind. Since 1835 a sum of nearly $20,000 of outstanding subscriptions has accumulated. Of the $12,000 due to Grosh and Hutchinson, probably not $1,200 (clear of expenses) will be collected—and of the balance, probably $5000, including costs of collections, will be lost—making a loss somewhere of nearly $2,000 per annum, by non-paying subscribers. Who suffers that loss? Not the publishers alone—for a part of it is made up by the enhanced price collected of subscribers. I say a part, for it is a fact that, high as the enhanced price is deemed by those who pay it, it does not pay all that is lost by crediting. The balance, then, falls on the Publishers, or those who work for them, or supply them with capital or materials. It is $2,000 per annum lost, and somebody must lose it. If it falls on the publisher, the system is bad for him; if it falls on the paying subscribers, it is bad for them. We say it falls on both, and that the system of publishing a newspaper on credit is bad for publishers and subscribers.

Reader, are you a merchant? You have articles in your store worth just $1.50 cents each, cash. Would you trust out say 3000 such articles, to unknown customers living all over this and the surrounding States, on the terms at which this paper is furnished? Not you!—you do not go the credit system quite as strong as that. Farmers—suppose wheat was worth just $1.50 per bushel—would you trust out 2000 or 3000, or 4000 bushels each year, to persons living in every direction, and at various distances under 1500 or 2000 miles off, on the terms of our paper? You would deem any man crazy who should propose such a scheme of money making to you! Mechanics would prefer doing a less and safer business, to trusting out the products of their skill and labor after such a fashion! And, indeed, none but newspaper publishers and newspaper subscribers ever thought of such a wasteful and extravagant mode of selling and buying.

"Why not change it, then?"—That question is easily asked; but the thing itself is not so easily done. There are all the subscribers to be consulted; and unless we can gain the hearty consent and co-operation of all the paying portion, to make the change would be to ruin the paper. It don't depend on the publishers to carry the change into effect;—it depends wholly on the paying subscribers. Now, what do they say? Will they consent to a change which will give them a better paper at its lowest price, and forever free them from the annoyance of being dunned, the disgust of reading printer's duns of others, and the heavy tax of paying for the paper of some shiftless, slack, or dishonest subscriber beside their own? Will they uncomplainingly do their share in effecting this change so desirable to subscriber and publisher; and will they heartily second the effort to keep the ball a rolling on this better way? If they will, the thing can be done—yes, it will be done; for the publishers are determined to try it, sink or swim—live or die.

Now the difficulty in getting the subscribers to agree to, and enter into the plan of advance payments, rests, not in their want of perception to see that the plan is a good one, but in each one's seeing the necessity of his promptly paying his own subscription early enough.—There is the great trouble—and this great trouble occurs most frequently with the wealthy, rather than among the poor. Cases like the following will be very apt to occur at the close of the year.

CASE I.—A wealthy farmer sends to the Post Office, but gets no paper the first week in January next.—"What can be the reason?" Some one suggests that he has not paid in advance, and the publishers have ceased to give credit. In a moment the good man's dander is up. "What, refuse to trust me for paltry twelve shillings! I, who own a farm of 200 acres, and am free of debt, and have money at interest! I, who have never been refused credit before, in my life!!! I, who have always paid for my paper within the three months—now to be refused a credit of a few weeks, for only 12 shillings, by these pretended Universalists—it is too bad, so it is! Well—let them keep their paper, I can do without it, and save my money." Yet, probably, that man is in favor of the cash system—he is perfectly satisfied that it is the best system, both for publishers and subscribers. He does not realize that in the cash system there can be no credits—no exceptions;—that to have it succeed at all, it must treat all alike, and be treated alike by all its friends.

CASE II. December is rapidly drawing to a close. A forehanded mechanic, farmer or merchant, is seated in his evening circle, reading the Magazine and Advocate. "My dear," says his wife—for, after all, the women are better in real business matters than we men—"have you sent on the pay for the paper?" "Oh, no; it is time enough yet." The year goes round—January comes—the money is not sent—the publishers drop his name, count one less on their list, and send him no paper. If one half of the subscribers thus delay sending until after New Year, how can the paper go on its way rejoicing? It may have to stop altogether. But even if it does not, when the dilatory subscriber sends in his payment, several weeks will have elapsed, and he loses the back numbers, while the publishers lose the pay they should have had for those weeks, to support them.

But why multiply cases? Every one can see—I had almost said every one must see, that for the cash system to be successful, all the paying subscribers must unite in its support, and send in their payments in season to enable the publishers to count on them before he prints his first number. And then, as their payments for the paper run out—before they run out—the subscribers must get the Agent or Post Master, to send another dollar, so as to keep the Publisher aware, in time, that that subscriber means not to lose any numbers of the paper. Let this be done by every one, and all will be well.

The time and labor (to say nothing of the care and vexation) expended in keeping the accounts of several thousands of subscribers—in making out their bills, and sending them dunning letters, year by year—the cost of materials and postage—all these will be saved by the cash system, when once fully established; and can be directed to the paper itself, to improve it, and render it more worthy of support. And the absence of dues, and complaints, and appeals to the generosity of those delinquents who appear to have lost their sense of honesty and justice—the absence of these from a paper established in the “better way” must surely render a paper better in every sense than it now can be to right minded subscribers. Other advantages might be pointed out—but we believe all must be satisfied that the cash system is the only, really good newspaper system; and, that the only way in which it can be attained, is, for each subscriber to keep his payments ALWAYS IN ADVANCE. And this is easily done. Those who can not conveniently pay an agent, or send to the publishers, one dollar and a half before the beginning of the year, (we say before, for the pay must be in advance—must be on hand before the paper is sent,) can, at least, get their Post Master to send a one dollar bill in a letter, free. Let them send one dollar in December. That will pay up to the 1st of September, 1844. Therefore, in August next, let them be sure and send another dollar in the same way. That will pay up to May 1st, 1845. Then in April, preceding that 1st of May, by sending another dollar, they will pay to the close of the volume. In this way the most distant subscriber can always keep his payments in advance, and be sure of the paper continuously. In this way, too, he does never lay out of any amount of money worth counting the interest, nor for more than eight months at a time.

One word more, and I close. I have spoken of the changes in the Editorial department. They are not yet definitely agreed upon and settled, so that it might not be proper for me to name them now. But two things may be relied upon. The responsibilities of the Editorial department will be vested in trusty and capable hands—in one, or more, whose prudence and love of the cause will always lead to exertions to keep unpleasant and distracting controversies and subjects out of the paper. And the other is—that sufficient talent will always be secured to fill the Editorial department with useful and interesting articles, from various pens. Some persons have entertained needless fears in regard to the withdrawal of the writer as principal Editor. The labor I cease to perform, can, nearly all, be as well performed by any man of ordinary education, common-sense talent, and a little practice in preparing articles for the press. The remainder—that of judging of the propriety of articles and subjects for the paper—seldom occurs, and can easily be settled by any experienced, well informed Universalist. And there need be no fears on that score—Br. Skinner, and others, are always at hand to consult and advise with in cases of difficulty or doubt. But, the truth is, there will always be an Editor capable of doing all I have done, with such aid as will be provided for him. If the public will only give the new arrangements a fair trial—continue to the publishers their support and confidence long enough to test fairly what they are about to do—I am persuaded they will be satisfied that such fears of changes, are vain—without any real foundation. Let, then, each subscriber prepare to pay in advance—and pay in time—and all will be well. The rest will follow in due time. A. B. G.

BR. T. L. HARRIS.—This young brother, well known to the readers of some of our periodicals for his poetic talents, gave the reasons for the recent enlargement of his Christian faith, and for leaving the Baptist church, (of which he has been a member in good standing up to the time of his withdrawal,) on Sunday evening, October 22d, in our church in this city. Notwithstanding the bad weather and walking, and a dark night, the audience was large. The discourse was a good one—plain narrative mingling with sound argument and pertinent, forcible application of Scripture, and suitable reflections and comments. Being well delivered, we trust it produced a good and permanent impression on those who heard it. Br. Harris has furnished us with a statement from his own pen, to which we refer our readers. It will be found in this paper.

To enter the ministry, was the aim of Br. Harris while a member of the Baptist church. That aim he has not abandoned, only changing his purpose from the ministry that breathed endless condemnation to the greater portion of our race, to the ministry of reconciliation for all. We believe he will be eminently successful in the performance of its high and arduous labors. May God grant it. A. B. G.

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

REMOVALS.—Br. J. French has removed from La Fargeville to Champion; and wishes to be addressed accordingly. Br. F. W. Baxter from Thomaston to Union, Me. Br. J. P. Fuller from Troy, Mo., to Galesburg, Ills. Br. H. Gifford from Oxford, Ohio, to Erie, Pa.

NEW SOCIETIES AND CHURCHES.—A Universalist society has recently been organized in Henderson county, Ills. Another in Pontiac, Va. A church was formed last month, at the close of a public discussion between Br. E. Mansford and Rev. James Scott, Methodist, in Martinsville, Ind. May the seed sown in the storm, grow in sunshine and shower, until it yield an abundant harvest! The church recently organized at Center Harbor, N. H., was formally recognized on September 20th. Br. E. W. Coffin is the pastor—a grave and a “reverend” name, according to Br. Witherell’s understanding of the title! The church in Rome, O., was lately received into fellowship.

DEDICATIONS.—The new Universalist meeting house in Foxboro, Mass., was dedicated on October 4th; and Br. C. W. Mellen installed as pastor of the society. The house is one of the neatest in that section, all carpeted and furnished, and paid for. The meeting house in Lewiston, erected by our friends several years ago, has lately been finished and dedicated. Sermon by Br. S. R. Smith, of Buffalo. Our new house in Harvard Mass., was dedicated on the 18th October.

ORDINATIONS.—Br. W. H. Ryder, late of this city, was ordained and installed pastor of the society in Concord, the capitol of N. H., on October 11th. Sermon by Br. L. C. Browne, of Nashua. Br. Varnum Lincoln was ordained in Billerica, Mass., September 6th. Br. E. C. Rogers, a converted Congregational clergyman, was ordained in Poquonock, Conn., on September 20th. Br. Jonathan Phelps was ordained as pastor of the society in Enfield, N. H. on the 15th inst.

WITHDRAWALS.—B. Joel Tuttle lately resigned his letters of fellowship and ordination to the Washington Association of Universalists, in Ohio. Br. Asher Moor, of Anson, Me., has also withdrawn from the ministry—to engage in secular pursuits, we believe—at least, he professes no change of sentiment.

A NEW BOOK.—Br. Thayer says a very pretty book is about being published by Bagley and Powers, of Lowell, called “The Flower Vase,” designed as an interpreter of the language and sentiment of flowers. It will be found well written, for it is by one who loves and has deeply studied flowers—Miss S. C. Edgarton. It is needless to wish it success—that is certain.

THANKS.

During a ministry of over twelve years in the state of New York, I became intimately acquainted with a large number of preachers and laymen, with whom I enjoyed a friendship whose recollections are dear to me. Those preachers and those laymen, as a body, are possessed of such kindly feelings and purity of character, as command my highest respect. And in leaving the State, I can not refrain from returning them my thanks publicly, for all their kindness to me while I remained among them.

During a settlement of ten years in Auburn, I became warmly attached to the brethren there. Good and noble souls are they—full of friendship and kindness. For their constant endeavors to make us happy, I can never repay them. Right pleasant were the years of our communion, never to be forgotten by me. I return them my hearty thanks for their unwearied attention to my family and self.

May the God of grace and mercy smile upon the brethren in Auburn and throughout the State. May they increase in strength of faith and every needed blessing. G. W. MONTGOMERY.

THE ANGELS.

There is not, perhaps, a more beautiful and affecting thought than this—that ministering spirits continually hover over this earthly dwelling place of man, employed on errands of mercy, and who delight to pour out of their joyous spirit on this world of sin. That there are spiritual and holy beings who take an interest in the affairs of men—whose feelings and sympathies are enlisted in behalf of lost humanity, we learn from many passages in the divine record. “There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth,” is the touching language of the Saviour. And we are told that, when the birth of the Son of Mary was announced to the shepherds on the plains of Judea, there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host, who sang their anthem of joy.

There is something in this truth—in the truth that the angels are looking down upon him in love and desiring his return to the better way—that is calculated to strike home with power to the soul of the sinner. The bare thought that, though cast off and despised by men—denied the fellowship of his kind, and the kindly offices of affection, he shares in the sympathies of the pure beings who minister before the throne of God, among whom there is joy when the prodigal child comes back in penitence—I say the bare thought that it is so, will make his heart yearn, if it be hard as adamant; and will make him feel a better man. #### UNIVERSAL SALVATION.

A few days since we noticed and replied to a letter from G. W. B., drawn out, as he stated, by an article published in the Universalist Companion and Register for 1844. At the time of replying to G. W. B. we did not think particularly whether, or not, its intimated arguments were directed against what was published in the Companion, and therefore said nothing about their relevancy or irrelevancy. But since then it has entered our mind to compare the two, and find that G. W. B. has entirely evaded the position assumed in my article; and by intimation at least, has put the controversy on entirely different grounds, from those there laid down. Be it understood, I have no objection to meet G. W. B., or his spiritual teacher or teachers, on the grounds he presented in the letter, and the mode pointed out in my reply to the same. I do not therefore complain that the ground which I advanced has been changed in his reply. By no means—but I do wish to ask, why did he change it?

That the reader may have a fair and full view of the subject, I here present that article from the Universalist Companion and Register, which elicited G. W. B.’s letter, and follow it with the letter which purports to be an answer to, or rebuttal of, said article.

WHO OBJECTS to universal salvation—to rendering all men holy and happy, and the utter annihilation of sin and suffering? Can any one object to it? Does God, feel averse, to such an amount of holiness and bliss existing in his universe—is he opposed to the destruction of all evil and misery? Certainly not. Does Jesus object to all men’s becoming sinless and blessed—to the destruction of the devil and all his works? By no means! Well, can angels, or saints in heaven object to save all men from sin? Surely not; for they desire it—all saints pray for it. None but the worst of men, (if any), and spirits damned, (if there are any,) can object to universal holiness and happiness. What, then, will prevent it from taking place? God, Jesus, angels and saints will not—devils and bad men can not, unless they have more power than God and his hosts. Have they? If not, why will Universalism not prove true?

Utica, Sept. 16th, 1843.

Mr. A. B. Grosh.—Sir, I saw a piece in your Almanac of 1844, headed Universal Salvation. You ask, does God feel averse to such an amount of holiness and bliss existing in his universe—is he opposed to the destruction of all evil and misery?—You say certainly not; so say I, but I would say to you, that Christ wept over Jerusalem, and said how oft would I have gathered you as a hen gathereth her chickens, but you would not. And for farther particulars I would refer you to Matthew x: 15, 28; vii: 13 and 14; viii: 12; xviii: 3 and 8; xxiii: 37; xxv: 41 and 46; John v: 28. 2 Thessalonians i: 7, 8 and 9; Hebrews ix: 27; and Revelation xx: 11 and 15.

Now, then, since these passages are so plain that a wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err, how important it is, that we try to persuade mankind to repentance, and tell them that unless their righteousness exceed that of the Scribes and Pharisees, they shall all likewise perish ; or, in other words, they shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven. Yours respectfully, G. W. B.

Now, what is the point of argument implied by the article in the Companion? Clearly this:—God is not opposed to, but is really in favor of, universal salvation from sin and death—Jesus the same—the angels of God in heaven the same—saints and all good beings, the same. Consequently, if there are any beings in the universe who are opposed to such a glorious event, or desirous of the endless continuance of sin and suffering, it must be devils and wicked men—i. e., if there are any other personal devils than wicked men. What, then, can prevent the final accomplishment of universal salvation? God will not—Jesus, angels, saints and good men will not—and, unless they have more power than God, and Jesus, &c., devils and wicked men can not. What, then, can prevent the accomplishment of Universalism?

Well—now how does G. W. B. answer these questions? By referring me to several passages of Scripture which contain no answer to them—many of which do not even refer to the subject—and some of which go even toward proving my views of man's final destiny, when rightly interpreted—as, for instance, the word kolasin, rendered punishment, in Matt. xxv: 46; the word meaning correction, amendment? How did he mean that reference to be understood? Evidently that some bad men would prevent the will and desire of God, Jesus, angels, saints and all good men from being accomplished!—that in despite of the omnipotence, moral and physical, of Jehovah; and of all the power in heaven and in earth, given to Jesus; and of the efficacy of the prayers and desires of all good beings, some bad men would have power to defeat all the exertions of Heaven and its hosts to overcome evil with good!—Does G. W. B.—does any man in his senses, and a believer in God and Revelation—really believe that the evil of a few bad men can successfully and endlessly resist all the goodness of God, and Jesus, and their hosts in heaven and earth—that the evil of men can not be overcome of good—of infinite good? I can hardly believe it—and yet that is the only answer that can be given, so far as I can imagine, in reply to the question—If God, Jesus, angels, saints, and all good beings are in favor of universal salvation from sin, (as G. W. B. admits,) and nothing but a few bad men and devils are opposed to it—what can prevent universal and endless holiness and happiness from ultimately and endlessly filling the universe of God? A. B. G.

THAT PLAIN TALK.—I have very special reasons for desiring, and therefore requesting, the reader to read that "plain talk for plain people" in to-day's paper. I do not pride myself on it as a specimen of fine, or even good writing; but there are some subjects discussed in it, which I do most earnestly wish every subscriber to read. I want the article read clean through, from beginning to end; for I believe there are many who do not, perhaps, look at those subjects in the right light—or, at least, what I think is the right light. I meant the article to be very frank, friendly and respectful to the reader. But if I have spoken too frankly and freely, and not put in enough of the friendly and respectful, I hope every one will believe I meant to hurt no one's feelings—to treat no one uncourteously, or even unkindly in my plain talk.

THE MYSTERIES OF PARIS.—A novel in course of publication at the New World office, 30 Ann street, N. Y. It is a correct and full translation from the French of that beautiful writer EUGENE SUE. It is to be completed in about ten numbers, at 12 1-2 cents each. We have received and read the first three numbers, and can truly say that we never met with any thing of the novel kind of that description, more interesting, such graphic descriptions of refined wickedness; carried on among the members of court life, and the higher circles, where the scenes are laid, (Paris and its environs) and carried out in full by those of a lower grade, employed for the purpose we never before read. In beauty of language and fullness of delineation, we think it beats even Charles Dickens.

MARRIAGES.

In Auburn, Sept. 21st, by Rev. H. L. Hayward, Mr. GEO. TINKHAM to Miss MARY MULLIGAN, both of Marcellus Falls.

In Fleming, Sept. 27th, by the same, Mr. JAMES HENRY WARN, of Sennett, to Miss RACHEL EUGENIA PAUL, of the former place.

In Aurelius, Oct. 4th, by the same, Mr. CHESTER A. HOSKINS, of Springport, to Miss HARRIET L. RAMSAY, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In August, October 13th, Mr. BRYAN WILCOX, aged 42 years. Punctual in his engagements, and honest in his dealings, so far as our knowledge of him extends, he thus honored the faith he professed; and died lamented by his friends. G.

In Scipio, Sept. 19th, after an illness of about four weeks, Mrs. AMANDA S., wife of Mr. Elisha Marsh, aged 27 years and 4 months. Sister Marsh was one of those amiable and good beings, whose kind, affectionate, and Christian deportment, endeared her to all her numerous acquaintances.— Few there are, whose lives have furnished a brighter illustration of the Christian graces, or whose deaths have exhibited a more perfect resignation to the divine will, and unflinching trust in God as the Saviour of all men. In all her conversation with opposers of Universalism during her illness, if doctrinal topics were introduced, she "contended earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints;" and gave her reasons for believing in the salvation of the world, with a clearness and candor which admitted not of being gained.

When it became evident that she could not recover, she gave directions about her funeral with as much calmness and composure, as if she were only making preparations for a short journey. After requesting that the writer should be called to attend her funeral, she called her father into her room, (an opposer of Universalism,) informed him what arrangements she had made for her funeral sermon, and inquired if such arrangement would be congenial to his feelings and meet his approbation. He expressed himself perfectly satisfied with any plan which she thought proper to suggest, although he professed to have no fellowship for the doctrine in the belief of which she died. She died as she had lived, calm and peaceful as a bright summer's morn'; leaving a kind and devoted husband, and a large circle of relatives and friends, to mourn her early departure from the shores of time. We commend them all to God, praying that this truly afflictive dispensation may be sanctified to the spiritual good of all concerned, so that they may be able to say with a pious man of ancient times, "before I was afflicted I went astray, but now have I kept thy word." Her funeral was attended on the 21st, and words of gospel comfort were spoken to the mourning group, by H. L. H.

In Auburn, Oct. 25th, of scarlet fever, after an illness of only three days, CORNELIA A., eldest child of Thomas and Sarah Egan, aged 3 years and 4 months. Cornelia was a beautiful and lovely child, the pride and joy of her parents—and her sudden and unexpected departure has cast a gloom over their little family circle, and caused them to mourn. But their faith teaches them, that this sweet and delicate flower has been transplanted to a more genial clime, where it will bloom and flourish to all eternity, under the immediate watch care of him who said, "suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." Funeral services were performed by the writer on the 26th. H. L. HAYWARD.

A FRAGMENT FOUND IN A SKELETON CASE.

Behold this ruin! 'Twas a skull
Once of ethereal spirit full!
This narrow cell was life's retreat;
This space was thought's mysterious seat!
What beauteous pictures fill'd this spot!
What dreams of pleasure long forgot!
Nor love, nor joy, nor hope, nor fear,
Has left one trace of record here.

Beneath this mouldering canopy
Once shown the bright and busy eye—
But start not at the dismal void!—
If pious love that eye employ'd,
If with no lawless fire it gleam'd,
But through the dew of kindness beam'd,
That soul shall be forever bright,
When stars and suns have lost their light!

Here, in the silent cavern, hung
The ready, swift, and tuneful tongue!
If falsehood's honey it disdain'd,
And where it could not praise, was chained;
If bold in virtue's cause it spoke,
Yet gentle concord never broke;
That tuneful tongue shall sing with thee,
When death unveils eternity!

Say, did these fingers delve the mine,
Or with its envied rubies shine?—
To hew the rock or wear the gem
Can nothing now await to them;
But if the page of truth they sought,
Or comfort to the mourner brought,
That soul a richer meed shall claim,
Than all that waits on wealth or fame.

Avails it whether bare or shod
These feet the path of duty trod?
If from the bowers of joy they fled,
To sooth affliction's humble bed—
If grandeur's guilty bribe they spurn'd,
And home to virtue's lap return'd;
That soul with angels thou shalt vie,
And tread the palace of the sky. ANONYMOUS.

ADVICE TO A YOUNG LADY AFTER HER MARRIAGE.

BY JUDGE BERTTELL, OF NEW YORK.

The following letter "to a young lady," originally appeared several years ago, in the Evening Journal. It is written in a style unusually agreeable, and breathes, throughout, a spirit of gentleness and excellent sense, which no young person can read without pleasure and instruction. Numerous solicitations have been made for its republication in the Mirror, and we are happy to gratify our correspondents, and also pay a merited compliment to the esteemed author.—[Eds. N. Y. Mirror.

"You are now married, and as is usual on such occasions, your friends and acquaintances will profess to wish you joy. Many will do so as an act of common civility, feeling little or nothing of the sentiments which the words import. When, however, I express a solicitude for your welfare, I think I am entitled to the credit of meaning something more than the performance of an empty ceremony. But when congratulating you, I know no better way of proving the sincerity of my professions, than by tendering you my advice as to some of the means I deem necessary to be pursued in order to render your new situation a matter of real felicitation.

"Young people are very apt to think, if they think at all on the subject, that when they get married their cares are all scattered to the winds, and that their happiness is secured for life. So far from the truth is such a thought, that when reality awakens them from the dream of uninterrupted bliss, they find their sorrows certainly doubled, and whether their joys are to be increased or not, depends mostly on themselves, and they will still find causes enough to interrupt their happiness though each should do their best to prevent or counteract them. One thing is certain, that the married state may be made more happy than the single life, or it may become a state of perfect wretchedness; and whether your present situation is to be better than that you exchanged for it depends much or mostly on yourself.—It is therefore a matter first in order, as well as the first in importance to you, that you should endeavor to ascertain the means best calculated to secure a continuance of that happiness which doubtless you expect to experience in the wedded life. On this subject I will endeavor to assist you.

"That you were happy during the period spent in courtship, you will not deny. That you were so, arose from the consciousness that you loved and were loved in return; and from the pleasing hope or moral certainty that you would attain the object of your affections.—This hope is realized, and that you are now happy, you need no one to tell you. If it be the reciprocated affections of your husband which makes you happy, it is yours which makes him so; hence, mutual affections constitute the source of conjugal bliss; and it is equally true that the infelicity of the married state, follows the loss of those affections. On the continuance of the affections, then, no less than on the choice of a husband, depends your happiness in the wedded life. The means to ensure a continuance of those affections, is the subject next in course for your consideration.

"So numerous are the instances in which married people have lost their affections for each other, that the unreflecting have hastily concluded that it is easier to acquire than retain them. If this be true, it goes to prove that you should be more assiduous to retain the affections of your husband, than you were to gain them. But it is not true to the extent which many believe. It is very unphilosophical to argue, that like causes will not produce like effects—or that the effect will cease, though the cause be continued. The truth most probably is, that when the affections of married people become extinct, it is owing to their neglect to continue the causes by which those affections were first elicited. What man in his sense, if he knew the disposition of the lady he addressed, would fall in love with a sour, sulky, brawling, ill-natured woman? It is the opposite qualities which he sees, or thinks he sees, in the lady of his choice, of which he becomes enamored. It is a countenance illuminated with smiles, eyes beaming with intelligence, a mouth flowing with sweetness and good-nature—in short, a deportment indicative of modesty, mildness and benignity, to which he pays the homage of his heart. If such were the causes by which were quickened the tenderness of the lover, rely on it, that nothing short of those will ensure the affections of the husband; for when the causes subside, the effects must necessarily cease, and then, misery and wretchedness will become the inmates of your household.

"More of the happiness of married people is involved in their conduct during the first year than in any succeeding period, of their conjugal association. There are probably but few instances where persons newly married do not discover, and that, too, in an early period of their matrimonial relation, each in the other, some trait of character which had before escaped their observation—and much, very much, of the felicity of their lives, depends on the course they may pursue on those occasions. Should the newly discovered faults or follies of the husband appear to be such as to preclude the hope of their being corrected, however unpleasant the task, the wife's easiest course will be to endeavor to accommodate herself to them. If she can not bring her circumstances to her mind, the alternative is to try to bring her mind to her circumstances. Custom and habit tend to lessen the effects of evil which can not be destroyed; and common prudence will induce her to conceal from her husband her knowledge of those faults of his which she can not expect to obviate, because it will not increase his affections for her, should he think that hers for him are in the wane. If a woman would correct the faults or follies of her husband, she should reflect that she can only do it by means of her influence over him—that she has, in general, no other influence than what arises from his affections to her—that the continuance of these depends on the continuance of the causes by which they first were kindled:—and you may rest assured, that whatever female patience, mildness, good-humor and tender affection can not accomplish with a husband, frowns, sulks, sharp reproofs; and ill-natured reproaches never can achieve. By the former he may be soothed and softened into complaisance, and willingly led to abandon a foible or a fault; but the latter will inevitably tend to sour his mind, to curdle all the milk of human kindness in his bosom, warm his resentment, excite his opposition, and confirm him in error.

"My acquaintance with your husband, has induced me to believe, that his whole heart and soul accompany his affections and aversions; and that it depends much, or mostly, on the exercise of your prudence and discretion whether he will be to you a kind and tender husband, or an unpleasant and uninteresting associate. Perhaps you are about to ask, if the wife must make all and the husband no sacrifice to promote conjugal concord and domestic peace? I mean no such thing—on the contrary, so much depends on your mutual endeavors, that without the husband's the wife's can not succeed. But the path I have pointed out for you to take, is the surest, nay, the only one to be pursued to produce or continue in him the disposition to a corresponding course of measures. Can that be called a sacrifice which promotes domestic bliss? As well may he be said to sacrifice his money who gives it for a larger sum.

"You will be disappointed if you expect your husband's face always to be the sporting place of smiles and graces, or his mind at all times attuned to the soft melody of harmonious strains—

"As well expect eternal sunshine, cloudless skies,
As men forever temperate, calm and wise."

Sickness, disappointment, and perplexity in business and a thousand nameless causes, can not but sometimes operate to disturb his mind, depress his spirits, and becloud his visage; producing perhaps unusual taciturnity, or a strain of language not remarkable for its mellifluous cadence. This is not the occasion on which he is to be met with a corresponding deportment on the part of his wife. It is rather the time when the exercise of all her philosophy is indispensable—a time when her temper is to be tried, her heart probed, and her affections put to the test; the time when by her kind, soft, sympathizing language and a countenance and conduct bearing testimony to its sincerity, that he is to be comforted at least with the reflection, that he has a friend in adversity as well as in prosperity, a partner in his sorrows as in his joys. I may possibly be singular in the opinion, but I could never entertain the fullest confidence even in the virtue of that female, whose sympathies could not be excited by the sorrows of others; and surely a wife can never appear so interesting and amiable in the eyes of her husband, as when he sees her melting with kindness, to him, and sorrowing for his sorrows. In short, it would be the object of your unremitting attention, to make him feel that his home is a place of refuge from his cares, a sanctuary from the frowns of adverse fortune, and he will seek it as naturally as he would desire his own felicity. But when a husband ceases to regard home as the happiest place on earth, he will shun it as he would fly his troubles; and, as it often happens, will take the road to ruin, and will seek at the ale-house, the gaming-table, or more indecent places, a refuge from domestic broils, the consequences of which, though often seen, are too disgusting for detail.

"To conclude—I have voluntarily, and, perhaps, officiously offered you my counsel, and the best my judgment can afford. My motive is your good; but it depends on yourself whether or not it will be useful to you. But keep this letter by you, and if at the end of three or four years, you shall think yourself not benefited by its contents, you have my assent to burn it.

"That the blessings of health, peace and prosperity may attend you through life, is the sincere wish and earnest hope of your friend."

THE CROSS OF CHRIST.

BY REV. E. H. CHAPIN.

Whatever may be the speculative views of different Christians respecting the death of our Saviour, to all there is a mighty interest and a pervading sanctity, in the scene of his crucifixion and the hour of his last agony. Around that once accursed wood, all radiant with a glorious transformation, cling associations, original, affecting and sublime; that give to its representation at the altar, by the way-side, towering from the church top, gleaming from the banner fold, and worn on the bosom, an influence of deep emotion and holiness, and make it the comprehensive symbol of the Christian religion. Let us then, at this time, consider some of the causes of its peculiar prominence and attractiveness.

And we deem that it may assume prominence and attractiveness, even to those who do not see there the manifestation of God's wrath, or the exhibition of vicarious sacrifice. We deem that there still lingers around that death-scene enough to melt and win the heart. There is a consistency in that prayer of forgiveness, a serenity in that dying—"It is finished," a pathos in that struggling humanity, a sublimity in that triumphant divinity, an eloquence in that great self-sacrifice, a power in that all-pervading love, that make the cross of the Redeemer radiant and holy—that impart to it a peculiarity and an importance, that every mind must acknowledge, and every heart feel. "Truly," said even the Roman centurion, in all the darkness of his paganism, and all the prejudice of his unbelief—"Truly, this is the Son of a God." What must the Christian, with a deeper insight into the purposes of his Saviour's mission and with a closer study of his character, what must the Christian say?

As another has remarked, the cross of Christ is not to be viewed merely as an exhibition of physical suffering. This may cause a strong sympathy, and powerfully excite the feelings, but there are other facts of a deeper and more spiritual import, calculated to sink into the heart and affect it more permanently. To some of the great truths, exhibited on the cross of Christ, let us now direct our attention.

The Cross of Christ! We see there a manifestation of an unflinching adherence to duty. We say, an unflinching adherence. If Jesus shrank from the bitterness of the last hour, if he prayed in intense agony that the dread cup might pass from him, he did not shrink from duty—it was not from duty he petitioned to be free. If the duty might be performed without that poignant suffering—if the great mission might be accomplished without the thorns, the scourging, and the cross—he would have it so; but if not, "the Father's will be done!" And, calmly strengthened, he rose from that hour of anguish and went forward through it all, to the end. The rough palms could not daunt him, nor the fierce mockery. All that Pilate and all that man could do, could not force him to renounce his claims, or to desist from the completion of his work. Once, perhaps, the thought rushed over him that he was forsaken of God, and then, indeed, there was a thrill of agony. Man might forsake, man might persecute and torture, but let not God desert. The sense of divine presence and favor, is the sustaining strength of the virtuous. Nature itself would reel, and all things be shaken, were that denied. But the thought remained only a moment, and in victorious confidence he commended his spirit to his Father. His duty was done, performed even through sweat and blood, and that pale, bleeding face, bore the impress of his lofty triumph.

Here then was an unshrinking adherence to duty—here was an allotted work performed, despite all toil and pain—despite of death itself. This is one lesson that we learn from the cross of Christ. Let it have its influence upon us. Let us remember that duty is always to be performed. To this we must cling, let all else fail, or threaten. And we shall triumph at last. The dutiful spirit is ever the victorious spirit. The disobedient, the time-server, the moral coward, is always, in the end, the loser. But the dutiful man, we repeat, always smiles triumphant at the last. The light of God's approval converts the crown of thorns to a diadem of glory, and the scenes were he suffered become teachers of wisdom, and consolation, and strength to others.

The Cross of Christ! We see there an exhibition of self-sacrifice. Not for himself droops yonder sufferer. Not for himself he wears that bleeding brow. Not for himself he meets that wounding spear, and drinks the bitter gall, and groans and dies. We do not hold that Christ died "for the guilty," in the sense of bearing the punishment of their guilt. He died for the guilty, not as, not in the place of the guilty. He died for their everlasting good. He died that man might live—died temporarily, died in shame and physical agony, that man might have eternal life, might be won to know and to love God. And for these great ends he also lived. It so laid in the course of his mission, that if he would teach men—would open the way, and the truth, and the life, he must die, he must come in collision with pride, and hate, and ignorance, and fear, and be crucified. Yet, he went forward with that mission. He turned not from it, he hesitated not. His life was necessary to man—his death was necessary. We do not stop now to examine in what respects that death was necessary, but it was for man's welfare, and therefore in meeting it Christ died for man. He sacrificed self for the good of the world. And as we look upon those outstretched hands, the flesh all gashed and quivering now—as we gaze upon these cold, pale lips, upon which lingers even yet the sanctity of prayer—that face where trust and holy triumph have softened the lineaments of anguish; let us realize that that blood was shed for us, was poured freely for the race—that flesh was marred and wounded, that man might be better and happier. And let us learn therefrom the duty of self-sacrifice. How little of Christ's spirit is there in the world! We can endure but very moderate suffering, even for ourselves, much less for others. We too often mourn if all our schemes do not gratify self—not expanding self until it becomes identified with our race. We do not all labor, and spare, and give, and strive, that others may be blest. Believe it, whenever we do sacrifice self, we shall exhibit a portion of that beauty, holy and sublime, that sheds celestial radiance around the cross of Christ.

The Cross of Christ! We behold there a holy submission, and a triumphant confidence. There may be a physical shrinking from the keen sensation of pain—there may be a momentary cry of anguish at a thought of horror. But these are only transient interruptions. The great whole of that scene is full of trust and submission. Yet submission, manifest through tests of shame and pain—confidence wrung from dying agony. "Mother, behold thy son." What a flood-gate of human affections is opened here!—here, upon the cross—here, amid all the roar and insult of the multitude—here, amid the clanging spears, tramp of iron feet, the hoarse mockery of wounding, torturing blows! "Mother! behold thy son." How plaintive, how anxious, how tender these words, as they drop from the sufferer's lips! Was there not a gentle, loving spirit there, in one who could speak thus, even amid the pangs of his crucifixion? Was it not keen thirst that wrung an exclamation from his parched lips! Was it not a sense of sharp endurance, that drew forth that beautiful, sublime prayer? Oh! do not elevate the cross above the sympathies of human nature. There was suffering there, heavy endurance of sorrow, affliction of body and soul. And yet, behold what submission!—"Thy will be done not mine." He did not once shrink from that pious sentiment. He did not rebel—and then, like living sunlight, gleaned over his dying moments that confidence—"Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." The victory was won. The pain of the body—the sorrow of the mind—could not overcome the faith and trust of the soul. So let us learn to be submissive and trustful. Let not sorrow overwhelm us with despair—let no burden urge us from submission to the will of God. Remember Jesus, and his dying moments. Let his faith and trust be ours. There is nothing so beautiful this side the grave. Methinks even amid the darkness of that sixth hour, they lingered with holy light around the cross of Christ.

The Cross of Christ! There we survey universal and omnipotent love. This is the great attraction of that cross. That crucifixion-scene is an exhibition of love, not of wrath. No thunders break above that drooping head. No voice of terror speaks to guilty man. All seek to melt, to win him, to draw out the sympathies of his nature for goodness and for truth. Amid the sacred sorrow of the scene, breathes the same benediction, that a little while ago worded from angel-tongues, "Peace on earth, good-will to men." "Peace and good-will!"—God speaks it in the marred image of his beloved Son—it is reiterated even from the lips of bleeding sacrifice. Wisdom may limit its expedients, and power may disdain to condescend, but love knows no bounds to its efforts. Mightiest when it humiliates itself the most, and dying but to triumph, it can not be quenched, it can not be repelled. With outstretched arms it rushes from the throne of God to the darkest degradation of man; and Deity speaks not in awful serenity, but pleads with bleeding side, and crown of thorns.—Love—this is the power that breathes from the cross—this is the power that attends us there.—Love, victorious over sorrow, and shame, and pain. Love, seeking not its own welfare, but the welfare of a world. Love, breaking out in prayers of forgiveness, and appealing in sublime silence to the testimony of its deeds. The cross of Christ is the exhibition of God's love to man. From the cross that love shall triumph!

The cross of Christ! It stands there. The body of the Redeemer has been removed, and the crowd have departed to their homes. The setting sun gilds it, and the stars shed over it their holy lustre, and through the quiet night it stands there, an instrument of shame and death—and when the morning dawns upon it, the people point to the spot where the impostor and the malefactor hung. But it is an instrument of ignominy no longer. From the hour when he gave his expiring breath, it became a glorious emblem, a weapon of victory.—Through the ages it stands, the guide of the sin-driven wanderer, the hope of the doubting and the weary. Through ages it stands, and many suns shine upon it, and the night-like generations roll their starry lustre over it, and changes go on around it—but there it stands—the great proclaimer of truth, and love, and goodness—the point of At-one-ment, where men may draw nigh to God.—

The cross of Christ! The forces of human power, the hosts of steel, the strength of warriors, shall roll back and be broken forever; but here is a power that can not be shaken—an influence that reaches the heart, that exalts even while it binds the soul. Reader, cling to the once-despised, the now-glorious cross. Let it be to you more than a symbol.—Let its spirit reign in you. Let him who hung upon it dwell within your soul. Cling to the cross of Christ! the banner of the world's salvation—the instrument that reconciles man to God.

RELYING UPON THE OPINIONS OF OTHERS.

BY REV. W. N. BARBER.

Many people when searching for truth, rely too much upon the opinions of others. They never trouble themselves to examine those opinions, to see whether they are sound or defective. Some great, erudite man, has led the way in adopting them, and they close their eyes and follow after. Now, I do not wish to say that men should not consult each other's views relative to difficult matters; but to suffer ourselves to be led by learned men, without ever thinking one whit for ourselves, is very unsafe.

First,—great scholars are not immaculate. The history of the past fully proves that it is one of the easiest things in the world, for great men to be mistaken. They sometimes get bewildered and "lost in the darkness of their own wisdom," and whosoever follows them is liable to get led into the ditch.

Secondly,—great, learned men are not always honest. They have been known to lead their followers wrong intentionally. Such is the wickedness of man, that many have been known to make great pretensions to piety, to profess minds spiritually illuminated, and afterwards proved themselves crafty, designing men, destitute of common morality.

Think of these things, reader, before "pinning your faith to the sleeves of others." Great men may lead you wrong innocently, or deceive you intentionally.

REMARKS.—The weather, especially on Thursday was very unpleasant, raining with scarce an intermission from morning till evening, yet our meeting house was well filled with attentive listeners eager to feast upon the joy inspiring truths of Redeeming love. Eleven preachers were present, (viz.) Edson Beals, Linus Payne, Levi Harris, J. M. Day, Nelson Adams, Francis Alvord, C. L. Shipman, Elisha Dayton, O. D. Wade, Simeon Park, and B. On Thursday morning, the beautiful house which our friends, with a truly commendable zeal have erected; was dedicated to the service of the one living and true God. Sermon by Br. Payne. In the afternoon funeral service was performed on the occasion of the death of a child of Br. O. D. Wade, a sermon was preached and the consolations of the Gospel tendered to the bereaved parents, and mourning friends by Br. Adams assisted in the services by Br. Beals. Our meeting on the whole was one of much interest and we trust will result in the up-building of the cause of truth and righteousness.

By order of the council,

DEATH IN MAN AND ANIMALS.

Pain seems in all cases to precede the mutilation or destruction of those organs which are essential to vitality, and for the end of preserving them; but the mere process of dying seems to be falling into a deep slumber; and in animals, who have no fear of death dependent upon imagination, it can hardly be accompanied with very intense suffering. In the human being, moral and intellectual motives are constantly operative in enhancing the fear of death, which without these motives, in a reasoning being, would probably become dull, and the love of life be lost upon every slight occasion of pain or disgust; but imagination is creative with respect to both these passions, which if they exist in animals, exist independent of reason, or as instincts. Pain seems intended to prevent the dissolution of organs, and can not follow their destruction. I know several instances in which the process of death has been observed, even to its termination, by good philosophers; and the instances are worth repeating. Dr. Cullen, when dying, is said to have faintly articulated to one of his intimates, "I wish I had the power of writing or speaking, for then I would describe to you how pleasant a thing it is to die." Dr. Black, worn out by age and a disposition to pulmonary hæmorrhage, which obliged him to live very low, whilst eating his customary meal of bread and milk, fell asleep and died in so tranquil a manner, that he did not spill the contents of the spoon which he held in his hand. And the late Sir Charles Magden, whilst at a social meal with his friends, Mon. and Mad. Bertholler and Gay Lussac, died in his chair so quietly, that not a drop of the coffee in the cup which he held in his hand was spilled.—Sir Humphrey Davy.

A NEW BOOK.

"HE PASA ECCLESIA, or the whole Church in the United States, containing entirely original, doctrinal and statistical sketches of all the Religious Denominations which exist at the present day in the United States, being authentic accounts of their Rise, Doctrine, and Progress. The sketches are expressly written for He Pasa Ecclesia, by eminent theological professors, ministers and lay members of the respective denominations.—Harrisburg, Pa., Published by Clyde, Williams & Co. 1843."

Such is the title in full, given in a prospectus which we sometime since received from the Editor of the above work. Of the work itself, the plan, and the writers engaged to carry out that plan, he says:—

"To discuss the advantages, which must at once strike every one on a moments reflection, that this publication possesses over every thing of the kind that has appeared, is deemed quite unnecessary. The truth of the matter is, that no similar work, prepared as this has been, exists, to meet the wants of the enquirer after truth. No religious denomination, so far as the publishers have the means to decide, has been misrepresented. The writers of the several articles could have no motive to misrepresent the doctrines they maintain; and the method adopted by the publishers, in getting up the work, by having every article written by some prominent member of the denomination whose views it professes to represent, must certainly meet the approbation of every unbiassed lover of truth; and it is believed, it is the only course that could be pursued, to present an authentic book to the public.

In this work every denomination has, through one or more of its leading members, its own claims, history, creed and progress presented for the investigation of the unbiassed, and from which the impartial investigator is enabled to form his own conclusions from authentic data. With the aid of the Book of books, truth will thus have nothing to fear.

This course has met the decided approbation of several of the most distinguished members of various denominations, many of whom have contributed articles. Among these are the following

Depending entirely on the intrinsic merits of the work, and its great utility, in diffusing a correct knowledge of the religious views of all classes, among the enquiring community, the publishers have incurred great expense, and spared no efforts; they now rely on the enlightened and liberal for encouragement to enable them to publish a work that has hitherto been a desideratum in this country."

The work, when completed will make about 700 royal octavo pages, printed on pica type. It will be durably bound in leather, at $3.00 per copy—in muslin $2.75 per copy, payable on delivery if the work equals the description of its prospectus—not otherwise.

There can be no doubt, if the plan is thoroughly carried out and well executed, that the work will be very interesting, useful, and withal a very curious one in many of its parts. He has selected the ablest men, so far as my knowledge serves me to judge, to give the views of the many almost unknown sects among the Germans in Maryland, Virginia, Pennsylvania, Ohio, &c. The sketches, if executed as their writers can do it, and probably will, will be very interesting and curious to readers in other States where those sects are scarcely known, even by name. Even to many living near those sects, those sketches will give much new information. For one, I await the coming out of the work with considerable desire. I have furnished an article containing (very briefly, of course, for I had but about the space of two sermons to put it in,) I. The history of the doctrine of Universalism, from its first revelation by God, in the garden of Eden, to the present day. II. The history of the denomination, from its rise under Kelly, in England and in this country under Murray, down to this year together with the present statistics of the denomination.

THE BARREN FIG TREE.

"A certain man had a fig tree planted in his vineyard; and he came and sought fruit thereon, and found none. Then said he unto the dresser of the vineyard, Behold these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig tree, and find none: cut it down: why cumbereth it the ground? And he, answering, said unto him, Lord, let it alone this year also, till I shall dig around it, and dung it. And if it bear fruit, well; and if not, then after that thou shalt cut it down." Luke xiii: 7-9.

This parable has long been used as an engine to frighten the weak, and timid, and ignorant. The sinner has been told that he is a barren fig tree cumbering the ground, and that God stands ready to cut him down, and consign him to the regions of interminable woe. He is assured that God would have cut him down and dealt with him thus long ago, had not the Saviour earnestly interceded for him, and plead for his reprieve that he might be spared a little longer, that the day of probation might be extended a little farther. And he is warned on this authority to rouse from his lethargy, and fly for safety ere the Lord of the vineyard, refusing to wait longer, shall hew him down, and in judgment and vengeance give him over to endless agonies!

Such is the use that has been made of this parable for ages past, by high and low, learned and unlearned. Now we hesitate not to say that this use of it is unjustifiable, that Christ intended no such thing by it, and that such an interpretation is stretching it far beyond its legitimate bounds. We are not alone in this opinion. Hear what Dr. Clarke says: "Many meanings are given to this parable, and divines may abound in them; the sense which our Lord designed to convey by it, appears to be the following: 1st. A person—God Almighty. 2. Had a fig tree, the Jewish church. 3. Planted in his vineyard, established in the land of Judea. 4. He came seeking fruit, he required that the Jewish people should walk in righteousness according to the spiritual culture he had bestowed upon them. 5. The vine dresser, the Lord Jesus. 6. Cut it down, let the Roman sword be unsheathed against it."

Here we have the exposition of the great Methodist Commentator; and no one, we presume, will think him biased in favor of our views. That this is the correct interpretation of the particulars of the parable, that this was the design of the Saviour will appear evident from the consideration of the preceding context.

He had been speaking to the multitude of the Galileans whom Pilate had slain, and of the destruction of the eighteen upon whom the tower of Siloam fell. The people it seems regarded these events, more especially the last, as signal judgment sent upon these individuals in consequence of some great wickedness. Jesus warns them against this proneness to think others worse than themselves, and assures them that these individuals were not sinners above all men at Jerusalem, but that unless they should repent and turn from their evil ways, they would also perish in like manner by the judgments of God. "This prediction of Jesus," as Dr. Clarke says, "was literally fulfilled;" for when the city was taken, by the Romans, he continues, "multitudes of the priests, &c., who were going on with their sacrifices, were slain," as were the Galileans, "and their blood mingled with the blood of their victims; and multitudes," as they of the tower of Siloam, "were buried in the ruins of walls, houses, and temples."

To signify to them that this would be the case, and convince them that they were no better than these Galileans and the eighteen of Siloam, and were therefore as likely to perish as they, he speaks to them the parable in question. By it he would show them that they were as a barren fig tree, of which the owner came seeking fruit, but finding none, resolved to cut it down, but at the intercession of the vine dresser, he caused it to be dug about and dunged, sparing it another year, at the end of which if it bore no fruit it was to be cut down. So then they were a fig tree planted in the Lord's vineyard, they had been barren and unfruitful for many years, they would be spared a season longer, and they would be favored in that time with the teachings of Christ and his followers; care would be bestowed them as upon the barren tree. If in that time they did not repent and bring forth fruits meet for repentance, if they did not forsake their iniquities and turn unto God, they would be cut down as cumberers of the ground. Even so it was; they repented not, they brought forth no fruit, and at the appointed time they were hewn down by the Roman axe, and the prediction of the Saviour, already alluded to, and the prophecy of the parable, were fulfilled together.

Such is the plain and evident meaning of the parable, and every one who will examine for himself, aside from all prejudice and tradition will, we think, come to the same conclusion. When therefore, reader, you hear this parable carried in its application into another world, you may be assured that it is overstrained and perverted, and that he who so interprets it has no authority from the parable itself, or from the connexion, and is therefore to be credited only on the score of fancy and imagination. In conclusion, we desire every one to search for himself, and see if these things be so.

HISTORY OF UNIVERSALISM OF OHIO.

At the late session of the Washington Convention in Ohio, the following report was made.

The committee appointed to report upon the rise, progress, and present state of Universalism in this section of the state submitted the following which was accepted.

REPORT.

In obedience to a resolution of this body to the above effect I have endeavored to fulfil the task imposed upon me. For a long time—say ten or fifteen years: before there was any society organized in Belpre, we often convened together, to make enquiries and express our thoughts and feelings, on the subject of man's final destiny. About half a dozen of us became satisfied that the doctrine of endless misery is not revealed in the word of eternal truth. We think we have received more light since that early period. I believe we were all of us, at that time, on what I have often heard a friend call "Winchester's bar." Since then the waters have risen and become "waters to swim in."

We had a strong desire to convince our neighbors of so blessed a truth; but our efforts to do so, were, for a long time, attended with very little success. We were soon denounced as enemies to all religion and morality, and emissaries of satan.

Nothing terrified by our adversaries, in May 1823, a number of believers held a meeting, and resolved to form a society. A committee was appointed to draft articles of association, and the meetings adjourned to meet on a subsequent day, but owing to the sickness and death of the chairman of said committee, Mr. Daniel Loring, nothing further was done until January 19th, 1824, when a society was organized, consisting of nine male members; and the usual officers were appointed. At a subsequent meeting, it was resolved to hold reading meetings on the Sabbath, which meetings have been kept up to the present time when preaching has not been enjoyed. From this small root, we believe, has sprung up a vine that is spreading its branches in all the region about us.

On the 11th of March, A. D. 1827, under the guidance of Br. Eliphalet Case, Jr., then of New Hampshire, a church was organized, consisting of twenty members, ten of whom were members of the society, and ten were new members. Three of the members were females.

From the organization of the church in 1825, ninety members have been added. Two of these have renounced. They went out from us because they were not of us. According to the acknowledgment of one of them he denied a faith which he never attained. He returned unto his own, and his own received him gladly, as proof of the falsehood of a doctrine he never believed.

There have been several removals and deaths. Some of the members have gone to the Western States, and others to sister churches around us.

The church, at this time, numbers sixty-one members. We are united and harmonious at this time, and always have been. So far as I know, no complaint has ever been made against any of our members for improper conduct. We hope by the blessing of our heavenly Father to continue in well doing, until we are all gathered home, with a ransomed world, to sing praises unending in a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

Belpre, Washington Co. C. R. LORING,
Aug., A. D., 1843. Committee.

To this Br. M. L. Edwards appends the following additional items of information. We copy from the Star in the West.

With the concurrence of Br. Loring, whose report is not so full as could be wished, I desire in the first place, to state some further particulars respecting the rise, progress, and present state of our cause, within the bounds of Washington Association.

Major A. Waldo Putnam, Wm. Pitt Putnam his son, (lineal descendants of Gen. Israel Putnam, of Pomfret, Conn. of Revolutionary and wolf-adventure memory) Col. N. Cushing, Tho's. Cushing his son, Daniel Loring, Oliver R. Loring, and Jesse Loring his sons, Bial Steadman, Andrew Fisher, Jno. Berkinsha, Dr. Wm. Bebee, and Sylvester Haynes, were among the earliest believers in God's impartial grace in Belpre. They were also among the earliest settlers in Ohio. Some of them brought their faith with them from New England. Col. Cushing stood by the venerable Murray, in Boston, that city of the "cradle of Liberty"—where his enemies met him with those "hard arguments" sometimes vulgarly called stones.

A. Stearns, Abel Sergeant, Jno. Cates, — Croy, and Daniel Parker, were the earliest preachers of the restitution in this region. Probably but one or two of them (if either) were ever formally connected with our denomination. After them followed Br. E. Case, Jr., A. Sweet, A. Hull, R. Smith, F. H. Johnson, — Hoag, A. Wadsworth, L. L. Sadler, Wm. H. Jolly, T. J. Crow, H. P. Sage, and M. L. Edwards—together with Brs. Geo. N. Cox, Joel Tuttle, and J. Clark, who have labored, for the most part, on the East side of the Muskingum.

Dates. The Society in Belpre was formed A. D. 1824. It has therefore been in existence nearly twenty years, and is probably the oldest Universalist society in Ohio. This society erected for themselves a house of worship in 1835, which house is probably the oldest Universalist Meetinghouse erected expressly as such—within the State. The earliest records of "Washington Association" are lost. Br. Putnam informs me that it was organized in the year 1833, at a meeting called for the purpose, and held in an old mill belonging to himself then standing a few rods from the place where the Belpre meetinghouse now stands. This meeting was held on the first Saturday and Sunday in June. Whether this is the oldest Association in the State, I know not. I am informed that there was probably one then in existence, somewhere in Northern Ohio.

Since writing the above, I have had an opportunity of looking over the records of the Society in Marietta. From these I learn that a society was formed in this place, on the 24th of December 1816, called "the first Universalist Religious Society in Marietta." This society was organized for the purpose of promoting the cause of morality and religion, by setting on foot a Library to be procured and sustained by the funds arising from section No. 29 of said township, devoted to ministerial purposes. March 1st 1824, the society passed a vote to sustain preaching one-fourth of the time. In September 1828, a vote was passed to employ Br. Alpheus Sweet, to preach one half of the time on the Sabbath. In 1822 an act of incorporation was obtained, and a library society was organized in connection with the other, so that the officers of one acted as the officers of the other. About a year since Sept. 1842 the religious society was somewhat remodeled, and a church was partially organized, a constitution therefore being adopted, and a number of names handed in for membership. I will simply add here that, in a religious point of view, the society is probably in a more prosperous condition than at any former period. A neat and commodious meetinghouse, 60 by 40 feet—has been erected the past year, and is now nearly completed.

There are now within the bounds of this Association some twelve or fifteen societies and churches, comprising in all probably, six hundred members. Most these have been formed since the organization of the Association. Some of them have not, as yet, been received into fellowship. Besides the above, there are numbers of believers, scattered throughout the bounds of the Association, where no societies exist.

To those who believe that Universalism is of immoral tendency, we would say, reflect on the fact stated in the report of Br. Loring above, that no complaint has ever been made against any of the members of the Universalist church in Belpre for improper conduct. Let it be remembered that the Society in Belpre has been in existence nearly twenty years—the church in connection therewith nearly as long, and composed, at different times, of some ninety members; and let those who declaim on the pernicious tendency of our sentiments, ask themselves whether as favorable a report can be made of the character of the churches to which they respectively belong.

That was in 1816—1824. Ohio now has 1 Convention, 11 Associations (3 of which are new), 2 periodicals, about 98 societies, some of which have churches organized in or with them; 44 meeting-houses, and 64 preachers. No small gain certainly. But thus it is that "Universalism is running down." A. B. G.

AN INQUIRY IN RELATION TO SUICIDES.—The ecclesiastical historian, Eusebius, in his history of the Church, relates the following, in Book VIII. chap. xii., and speaks of other similar cases in the same connection: During the tenth persecution, so called, a "holy and admirable female, with her daughters, knowing what dreadful outrages they would suffer from the men, represented their situation to them, [her daughters,] and, above all, threatened violation of their chastity, an evil more to be dreaded than any other, to which neither she nor they should even listen for a moment. At the same time declaring that to surrender their souls to the slavery of demons was worse than death and destruction. From all these, she suggested there was only one way to be delivered, to betake themselves to the aid of Christ. After this, all agreed to the same thing; and having requested the guards a little time to retire on the way, they decently adjusted their garments, and cast themselves into the flowing river. These, then, destroyed themselves."

Now the question I wish to ask the Partialist, is here: What became of these holy suicides? Here were three individuals, Christians—and there were more who did the same—who, in order to save themselves from death at the hands of their persecutors, and outrages worse than death, destroyed their own lives by drowning. Whither went they is the question for the Partialist to answer; especially as they committed this act for the sake of the name of Christ and his Religion. Was this step thus taken by them, only a step into the pit of eternal perdition; for it is a principle in Orthodoxy that no one can ever be saved, who takes his own life. Who will solve this difficult problem?—Star in the West.

EUSEBIUS PAMPHILIUS.—The Author of the Ancient History of Universalism very properly expresses himself in doubt whether Eusebius, a celebrated ecclesiastical writer of the fourth century, believed in endless misery or not. There is nothing known probably, by which this question can be decided with any certainty. He has not expressed his views on that subject, in his own works now extant; so that it can not be asserted, positively, whether he was a Universalist or a Partialist.

It has been conjectured, however, that he was a Universalist, and not a Partialist, first, because he was a great admirer of Origen, a celebrated Universalist, of the third century, and secondly—and this is the reason I wish to mention particularly now—because in his ecclesiastical history, while describing the early persecutions which the Christian church endured, and the character and fate of the persecutors, he never once speaks of them as destined to suffer hereafter, or at least endlessly for their wickedness; and this would have been a good opportunity for referring to such future perdition, with which to taunt them and comfort the Christians. If Eusebius had possessed the faith and spirit of Tertullian, he would often have spoken of this, and gloated over perspective endless torturing of those who now tortured the Christians.

But he did it not, and hence it produces a strong presumption in my mind that he did not believe in such future torments; and more especially, as he almost uniformly, represents these wicked tyrants and persecuting enemies of the Christians as receiving, in this life, before death or in death, a just and merited punishment for their wickedness, and that too at the hands of an overruling and avenging God—without the least intimation that they were to suffer hereafter, or endlessly. No Partialist would have neglected to avail himself of such an opportunity of dwelling, frequently, fully, and exultingly, on the vengeance to overthrow them in the eternal world.—Star in the West.

RELIGIOUS OPINIONS OF PRISONERS.—"It has been very often said that the convicts of state prisons are either Atheists, Deists, or Universalists, than which, however, nothing can be farther from the truth. I have known as many as five hundred while they were in confinement, and I have always made it a practice to learn the religious opinions of all with whom I have conversed, and what I am going to write may be depended on as the actual result of my personal inquiries.

Those whom I have known, have been educated in the doctrines of the endless punishment school, and but few have departed from these doctrines. I have found only two Atheists, not one Deist, and but one Universalist. The doctrine of endless punishment is, strongly and broadly speaking, the orthodoxy of state prisoners. I am confident of the truth of this statement, and I make it not by way of slur, or insinuation, against any sect of Christians, but as a fact which all denominations may use as they may have occasion. Very many of the convicts have been members of churches, and a few of them have been preachers. This is a subject of painful reflection; it shows how extremely liable the best of men are to be overcome by temptation, and says to those who glory in their own strength, 'let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.' It is no argument against religion that some of its votaries disgrace it. There are faithful soldiers in an army which many desert; and Christianity is from heaven, though many of her avowed friends appear to have come from beneath."—History of Windsor Prison, Vt.

UTICA, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1843.

WHY DO YOU DOUBT?

The question is not unfrequently asked, "why do you doubt the doctrine of endless misery?" That question can be readily answered. And if the whole ground of the doubt were to be presented, it would fill the soul with horror. But my allotted space will not permit such an extensive work. It will be sufficiently glanced at, however, to show the reader why doubt is cherished concerning a doctrine for whose fulfilment no true Christian ever entertained a hope or uttered a prayer.

God is omniscient. Long before a single human being was created, God formed the plan of human life, and decreed the existence of the myriads of the human race. When the doctrine which we doubt, presents us its Calvinistic face, it tells us that the fate of these myriads was irrevocably fixed before the foundation of the world—that "without foresight of faith or good works," one portion was ordained to endless happiness; while the other portion was consigned to endless wo—and that the number of each portion is so certain and definite, that it can neither be added to nor diminished. Hence, the non-elect, however holy, can not become the elect; nor can the elect, however vicious, become the non-elect. But when this doctrine presents us its Arminian face, while it tells us that God did not decree the fate of each person, it virtually affirms that he deliberately established a law with an endless penalty attached to it, and then created human beings with the positive knowledge that myriads of them would endure this endless penalty.—Hence, while with the eye of his omniscience, he saw the conduct of his children, and the motives which would influence them in the pilgrimage of life, yet he formed them, and suffers them to drop into the dreadful doom of ceaseless wo, and by the chains of irreversible fate, shuts them out from every hope of mercy. Now the Bible declares that "the Lord will not cast off forever;" that "his tender mercies are over all his works;" and that he "commendeth his love toward us" in the sacrifice of Christ for "every man." Which doctrine shall we believe?—That God absolutely loves all, and will cause every person to ultimately enjoy unmixed happiness?—or, that he created millions on purpose for endless ruin, and yet sent his Son to command them to repent, when he knew that fate prevented them from repenting; or, if this view be not admitted, yet that he created the place of endless wo, and then gave such constitutions to his children as he knew would infallibly ruin them? Which shall we believe? I, for one, must be permitted to reject ereeds, and to cling to that sublime revelation which is the source of all Christian truth.

I have strong doubts of it, because, if it is true, either all persons must be miserable, or else the saints must be divested of every particle of affection. One illustration will be offered to show the intent of this statement.—Can any thing be more admirable than the love of the mother for her child? If it is sick, she mourns over it—if in pain, she strives to alleviate it—if it dies, she mourns like Rachel of old. She did not create her affection—it was given her by him whose name is Love, as a guardian angel to watch over her child, who, were it not for that affection, would perish like a premature flower in the frosts of early spring.

Now, according to common notions, that mother and child may be forever separated. The mother may enter the abodes of the blessed—her child may be endlessly miserable. Will that mother be happy in view of the misery of her child? She will, according to common ereeds. In the following extract, speaking of the conduct of the righteous in heaven, in reference to the sufferings of the lost, it is said:—"Then 'he shall rejoice when he seeth the vengeance, when he shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked.' No pity shall then be shown to them from their nearest relations. The godly wife shall applaud the justice of the Judge, in the condemnation of her ungodly husband. The godly husband shall say Amen to the damnation of her who lay in his bosom. The godly parents shall say Hallelujah, at the passing of the sentence against their ungodly child, and the godly child shall from his heart approve the damnation of his wicked parents, the father who begat him and the mother who bore him." Boston's Fourfold State, state 4, head 4, section 9. There is no mistake, then, when we affirm, that, according to Partialist views, parents are to rejoice over the sufferings of their children. Take the case of the mother already alluded to, and one of two positions must be admitted.—1. Her affection must be enhanced to infinite purity; in which condition, the misery of her child in hell must make her miserable in heaven;—or, 2, if it does not make her miserable; if she can rejoice over its endless destruction; then her affection must be entirely eradicated; and if her affection be eradicated, then she is as much worse in heaven than she was on earth, as revenge is worse than hate. On earth, she was a kind and tender mother—in heaven, she is—what shall I call her? Let each reader answer for himself. The conclusion is obvious, either that the miseries of the lost make the saints miserable; or else they have no kindly feelings, and are infinitely selfish. I need not say that the Bible condemns both positions.

In addition to these considerations, I have searched the Bible for proof of the doctrine of endless wo, and I have searched it in vain. When, therefore, it is said to me, "why do you doubt it?" let the query be altered; for I not only have doubts on the subject, but I am firmly convinced that the doctrine has not real proof—neither in Scripture, nature, reason, nor philosophy.

THE CHRISTIAN TEST.

The Son of God when on earth, mingled with the poor and despised of this world—he ate and drank with publicans and sinners, and the warmest love of his great heart was drawn out toward them. And when he came to leave the scene of his labors and sufferings, he laid down a test of discipleship so simple and plain, that none can mistake it. "By this," said he, "shall all men know that ye are my disciples." And what was it? One would judge from the actions of his professed followers, that it was to hate all who do not believe as we believe, and who are not good as we are. But this was not the test. What, then, was it? Was it, if you join this church or that church, and are punctual in the observance of certain forms and ceremonies? No, this was not it. "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one toward another." Here we have the test. It is not, If you be a Universalist, a Methodist, or a Presbyterian, and hate all who are not of your communion; but "if ye have love one toward another." The apostle Paul has introduced this test in the following language: "Now, if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his." And what was this spirit of universal love? The lowest and most degraded creature that crawled in the gutters of vice, was not beneath his notice and kind regard, and sinners of the deepest dye found in him a friend.

UNION CONFERENCE MEETINGS.—A few lines of incidental remark on these, published by me in this paper, has drawn forth a whole column (and more) of the Evangelist, in reply (?), from Br. Austin. First he sneers, and jeers, and ridicules the idea that there ever were any excesses perpetrated in those meetings, and says my notice will be news to all their friends, &c.—and intimates pretty plainly that my informants were liars, and I an easy, good natured, gullible fool to be duped by them.—Then he changes the tune to praise my "well known good sense," and pretends to suppose that I wrote only ironically, for the purpose of shaming our friends who misrepresent those meetings—so that it seem my remarks will not be news to all our friends.

Now I might reply to Br. Austin; that when he settles it in his own mind, whether I am most knave or fool—liar or dupe;—and the friends of our cause, and my friends, who gave me information, are honest men, or misrepresenters of facts—men of judgment and common sense, or silly persons incapable of describing what they see and hear—when he settles on one or the other of these points, I may answer his questions—but at present I have no inclination to answer a brother who can both abuse and soap a man at the same time. Thus I might reply and drop the subject. And thus I really wish to reply; but Br. A. might deem my neglect to reply further, uncourteous to him, and therefore I reply further, in all sincerity and good will.

My first distrust of those Union Conferences—of their effects on the minds and feelings of those who engaged in them—was created by Br. Austin's pertinaciously combative, uncourteous, unfriendly articles in reply to Br. Bacon and others who were afraid of the results of their excitement, and therefore published a few cautions to their friends on the subject. Those articles of Br. Austin, and the spirit they breathed toward good brethren and true, (but who could not bow down to Br. Austin's hobby-horse without first seeing whether it would go rough-shod over them,) led me painfully to doubt for the first time, whether they promoted as much charity, and brotherly kindness, and Christian unity, as was claimed for them by their friends. The present article of Br. A., so sneering in its tone—so contemptuous in its spirit toward my informants, who are men as good, as talented, as zealous, as devout and pious as himself—leads me renewedly to say, "If such are the fruits, the charity, the BROTHERLY LOVE generated by Union Conferences, Good Lord deliver us from them!" Br. Austin asks me, what particular injury they have inflicted? It is not pretended they have caused insanity or suicide—these are great evils, and I spoke only of "VERY LITTLE injury;"—but if they have caused the change which is manifested in his articles in their defence, and so greatly changed a good, amiable, courteous, fraternal, Christian brother, as his articles seem to denote, they have done us a very great injury, indeed—one that would detract much from the great good they have probably done—and we doubt not that the good would have been greater still, had they not driven some of their zealous friends into a state where they seem to me greatly to need converting over again, to their former spirit of congeniality with Universalism. ### MRS. SCOTT'S POEMS.

We have just received a copy of this beautiful work—new from the binder's hands, and one of the first lot—and before our readers see this, it will be for sale by Grosh and Walker, at this office. It is most beautifully executed—in paper, type, execution, binding it is worthy of its contents, and will be a beautiful ornament for the library, or the centre table—the study or the parlor.—The portrait is undoubtedly a very correct representation of our lamented sister at the time it was taken, and recalls the original most vividly to our mind. Miss Edgerton has prefaced the poems with a brief and interesting biography, which will be read with much pleasure, and the Poems will be found to embrace many not ever published in our religious periodicals.

We hope this beautiful little work, so full of interest and beauty, will meet with a ready sale and an extensive circulation. It will do good. The portrait, too, is worth the five shillings asked for the book, to every admirer of Mrs. Scott's character and writings. Call at this office and examine it. If you can not do this, just send in 63 cents and buy it.

GRAMMAR AGAIN.

We believe our readers love a little good-natured joking—at least, I do—especially if it incidentally involves a little instruction on some useful or interesting subject, or is calculated to promote a little improvement. Believing thus, induces me to occupy some considerable room with the following articles from the Gospel Banner and the Star of Bethlehem, and my reply to them. They are in notice of some corrective remarks I published a few weeks ago.

Br. Drew who, by virtue of his office as Corrector General, feels himself authorized to dip his fingers into any and every body's dish as it comes along—"just as other people sometimes do, though not Corrector Generals!" Br. Drew would say—) the other day groped into our Magazine and fished out the following ill-shaped bone to gnaw at and growl over. Does not Br. Drew remember that that sentence was written by a Dutchman—and does he not know that though "an Irishman has a right to speak twice" only, yet a Dutchman has a right to speak until he is understood? I claim my prescriptive right in all such cases made and provided—the more especially as I am neither Professor of Grammar, nor Corrector General—nor critic nor reviewer, even—but only and simply an editor by virtue of scissors and paste, and therefore authorized to "try my hand" at almost every thing that comes along, without being obliged to understand anything. Now, just consider all this, and then read what Br. Brew has published!

"Br. Grosh says that he shall have to cashier Prof. Thayer for saying 'system upon system go sweeping,' &c. At the same time he says the 'excesses perpetrated in the Union Conferences of our brethren in Boston, will learn us that even Universalists are not infallible.' We wish we could teach Br. G. to learn the use of better language."

There—that'll do. Thank you, Br. Drew; and if the note given below will not pass current with you, I must owe you one. But, hold! Didn't I weed your garden the other day of several huge, abominable weeds? Ah—I see you remember it. Well, I will give you credit for one; so pay away, you will find enough to pay with.

But what shall I say of Professor Thayer? To dignify his resistance to our humble claims, he dubs me "Dr.," (take care! I'll set the "Ambassador for Christ" on you, for using such vain, anti-Christian, anti-republican and awful prefixes to men's names!) and attempts to evade acknowledgment of the debt by special pleading based on a word of his own using. We give his whole article, prefaced as it is by ours which drew it forth, that the reader may have a fair, full view of the enormity of the whole transaction. Just remember that the one party is a "cute Yankee," and Professor of Grammar, as well as Possessor of the old Gospel Par- ringer; and that the other party is only an editor, and he a Dutchman!

GRAMMAR.

"We shall have to cashier Professor Thayer, or at least turn him over to Corrector General Drew, for rebuke and correction—unless he mends his business a wee bit better. The world will not, most certainly, tolerate such violations of the plainest rules of grammar as the following, which we find in the Rose of Sharon for 1844, beginning on page 67, and ending on page 68.

"System upon system go sweeping in solemn glory and beauty before him; while cluster after cluster, farther and farther on into the unknown, reveal themselves, till it would seem at last," etc.!

Why, sister Sarah! where were your spectacles, that blunder after blunder were thus passed by uncorrected, until they seem like blotch after blotch on the leaves of the Rose of Sharon?

Br. T. B. T., don't you owe me one?"

Pretty neatly done, Dr. Grosh, though I don't like to give it up, if I can possibly help it. So I'll try, and then if I must, I'll own that I "owe you one."

Grammarians give this rule: "The infinitive mood, or part of a sentence, is sometimes put as the nominative case to a verb."

Again, under the head of collective nouns or nouns of multitude, with plural verbs, it is said: "We ought to consider whether the term will immediately suggest the number it represents, or whether it exhibits to the mind the idea of the whole, as one thing. In the former case the verb ought to be plural, in the latter it ought to be singular."

Now, Dr. Grosh, put these two together, and I "reckon" my case is not so desperate "after all." The inquiry now is, whether the "system upon system," and "cluster after cluster," are not nominative sentences, and of a plural character? I think so. The sentences are manifestly collective, cumulative, and "immediately suggest" the plural number. The idea is, not that one system, but that "system upon system," i. e. several systems "go sweeping," etc.; not that one cluster, but "cluster after cluster," i. e. many clusters "reveal themselves," etc. Plainly, then, the sentence or "term," which is the nominative, "immediately suggests" the plural number; and therefore, according to the grammar-men, "the verb ought to be plural."

This cuts off the analysis and transposition—

* You can, good Brother, when you will care yourself of some Yankeeisms that sound as droll to me, as my Pennsylvaniaisms can sound to you. For instance, in your descriptions of Cushing's espaliers, in your paper of the 21st of October, you say—"to which various sorts of fruit trees are trimmed, and on the wall of which they lay flat, exposed to the sun." What do they lay flat?—or do you mean that the trees lie flat? Your Yankee mode of making men set and lay seems to me very much like using fool language! Amend that, and I will endeavor to learn to use teach when it should be used.

A. B. G.

"system go sweeping upon system," etc., which you probably had in view.

If the case is not made out by the above, I have more in reserve. As to the "blunder" and "blotch" part of it, and the attempts to plague the editor, I'll pay up that some day; if I don't—

T. B. T.

The rules are very good—to throw dust into people's eyes with; for they are not applicable to the cases in hand. The collective, cumulative idea is obtained only by considering the whole sentence, and resides not in the alleged, and still less in the real nominative; for had the alleged nominative been designed to convey a plural idea, a plural form of its respective nouns could and would have been used, as they are both alike and readily admit of being used in the plural form. But of this more ere we close.

In the matter of "system upon system," there is a plausibility of sound against me; but reduce that sound to the simple idea it was undoubtedly intended to convey, and the case is clearly in my favor. Br. T. has treated the systems very rudely—just as if each one was all a solid chunk that could be piled up, one on another, like cheeses, or bars of iron. But the fact is, that upon is used instead of after merely for the sake of varying the sound, and not the idea—the systems are to be regarded simply as the stars are set forth—each one is an individual thing, and there is an order of succession, by which one (and only one) is presented to the mind after another, (and only one other, or another.) In this manner each system goes sweeping (not strictly upon, but really) after system, just as a single cluster after cluster reveals itself—not "reveal themselves," as Br. T. has written it. The idea is, not that many clusters at one time reveal themselves, after many other clusters at another time, or Br. T. would have used the plural form, "clusters after clusters." The very words he has used following the phrase, shows this—"farther and farther on, into the unknown," carries the mind, step by step, from one (and only one) cluster to another cluster, in single succession—a new cluster appearing (or revealing itself) just as fast as the mind advances from the past one to the next in succession. (By-the-by, the sentence above—"farther and farther on, into the unknown"—as there used, is an instance of the manner in which a sentence becomes nominative case to a verb.) The case we gave in our first article, therefore, was a just and fair one. The idea of more than one is gradually and successively (not cumulatively) unfolded to the mind, just as if I were to say, "thus blunder after blunder, as you passed from line to line, page after page, was left uncorrected!"

As to plaguing the Editor, I most indignantly, and decidedly, and unqualifiedly deny the charge—it is your grammar-perversions and violations of all rules that have perplexed and plagued her. She relied too much on your reputation as Professor of Grammar, and so laid aside her spectacles when she came to look over your article, or she never would have allowed such gross blunders to have escaped the correction of her gentle goose quill!

There—you Grammar-man, down there among the spindles and spinsters—just mend that hole in your defence, will you; and mend it with "more in reserve" of a better quality than your first, or—confess like a man, that you owe me one.

Will our agents and friends, to whom bills are sent for collection, have the kindness to use some immediate exertions to collect and forward the money due? They may rest assured that we stand greatly in need of it. May we not ask of them too, to do all they consistently can to obtain cash paying subscribers to our next volume? Can not every subscriber spend a little leisure time, in endeavoring to persuade his neighbors to subscribe? Lethim get one, at least, so as, with his own subscription, to make a convenient sum to send ($3.), and get his post master to forward it for him. We are not able to offer splendid premiums, or great inducements, but are willing to do all we can, as far as our circumstances will permit.

FLUMMERY.

The following piece of—what shall we call it?—is going the rounds in our papers; and as it is undoubtedly incorrect, it may serve to delude some, and puzzle others; but generally, its erroneousness can be so easily demonstrated, that "Millerism" will grow fat on it.

MILLERISM.—I saw an article going the rounds in which Mr. Miller stated that he had never set any day or month when the Lord would come, but that he had uniformly contended that he would make his advent some time between the 21st of March 1843 and the 21st of March 1844. Now it so happens that March 1844 is already past, and hence the predicted coming of Christ as recognized by Millerites has proved incorrect.

In proof of March 1844 being past, I would state the fact, that no year is registered till it is finished. 1842 was completed on the 31st of December, and we then registered in our Almanacs 1843. We then proceeded to number January, February, March, April, &c., or first month, second month, third month, fourth month, &c., as so advanced on the year 1843. And on the 31st of December last, the year 1843 was finished and registered. We are now 9 months into the year 1844 and which will also be finished at the end of December next. So the last day of grace that can be allowed to the Millerites, as to the appointed fulfilment of the coming of Christ, is past. According to the admission of their leader it was past last March.

J. B. Dods.

For the sake of simplifying the whole question at issue—for I do most seriously deny the statement in the above article, and am astonished that a man of Br. Dods' clearness and strength of mind should have fallen into the blunder—but still more, that he should have remained in it long enough to write the above article, and send it off for publication—to simplify the question, then, let us suppose a man to be born on New Year's day, at the very commencement of the day. A record of his life is kept, and his own birth is made the era from which all things are dated. All that occurs in the first 24 hours is marked as occurring in or during the first day of his life—all that happens in January, is noted as occurring in the first month of his life—and all that happens during the first twelve months of his existence, is marked as occurring in the first year of his life. It follows, then, that those first twelve months constitute the year one; and not the second twelve months, as Br. Dods asserts. Is not this as plain as, that the first twelve months make the first year? And should not the first year be called the year one?

Br. Dods says a whole year must elapse before the year can be registered at all, so that we only begin to count off the year one, during the second year—so that the second year in reality, is counted as the first year in dating! Thus the year one having elapsed, (we suppose that in dating, on Br. Dods' plan it was called the year 0!) we then begin to date "A. D. 1, January 1st." But who does not see that common custom as well as fact reverses his process. We date, after one year has elapsed, "January 1st, A. D. 2"—that is, the 1st month, and 1st day, of the year 2.

We suppose the birth of any individual—suppose now, to make it clearer, that Jesus had been born on the 1st day of January. The civil year would then agree with the Christian era. An almanac is commenced as soon as Jesus is born, designed to keep up this era.—Would the first number of that Almanac be "for the year of our Lord 0"? Surely not—but for "the year 1"—just as we now call this the nineteenth century, though the century is not yet completed, only eighteen hundred and forty three years having (nearly) elapsed. So it will continue to be the 19th century with present time, until the century is completed, and then only will men begin to register the 20th century. As with centuries, so with years. It is the year 1 until twelve months have gone round, and then the year 2 commences, and January is the first month of the year 2. Hence until December closes, the year 1843 is only being completed—when December 31st has passed, then 1843 years since the birth of Christ will have (nominally) been completed.

ed; and then the first day and first month of 1844 will begin, and month succeed month, until after 12 months have gone round, when, and not sooner, 1844 will also be completed.

We have no special partiality for Millerism, of course; and we have a liking for the man Dods, withal—but when we see our Editors copying his errors, (like gudgeons gulping a bare hook,) and making us ridiculous, and the Millerites laugh, we can hold no longer. Hallo, there—just nail that counterfeit to the counter, will you!—or, send it back to its author, to be changed for some thing genuine! That'll do.

PROSPECTUS

For the Fifteenth Volume of the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate.

Rev. H. B. Soule, Editor;

Revs. A. B. Grosh, A. C. Barray, S. R. Smith, D. Skinner, Corresponding Editors.

THIS old and useful periodical will be continued as heretofore, with the above changes in its Editorial Department; and a change to the CASH, or ADVANCE-PAY system. The principal Editor by becoming Corresponding Editor, secures to our columns the regular and continued productions of his pen. The Editor engaged in his stead is as prudent and talented, if not experienced; and will serve while he remains in this city. Should he remove, another, as well qualified, and entitled to public confidence, will be secured. The other Editors are too well known to need our commendations; and the engagement of Mrs. Smith and Skinner will, we hope, be taken as an earnest that we mean to endeavor deserving what we ask—the support of a liberal public.

We intend to test the substantiality of our patronage, by placing the Magazine and Advocate on the CASH system. Every paper sent out after the present volume, must be paid for in advance—and will be sent only as long as it is thus paid for. This plan is best for both subscribers and publishers, if both will unite in it. To subscribers, who will save the enhanced price, which now goes toward making up the loss on bad subscribers—and to publishers, who can then purchase for cash, and of course at a cheaper rate; and who will no longer lose what even the enhanced price does not make up. To both it will save the necessity—the disgusting and painful necessity—of writing and reading duns, complaints, and coaxing entreaties to delinquents, &c., &c.; which, on the credit system must always lumber our columns to the injury of the paper's credit and usefulness. Will our subscribers, one and all—for there can be no exceptions—support us in this mutually advantageous system? If so, let every one pay for next year before January next—in time for us to receive the money and enter them on our list before the first number of the new volume is issued. Those who send by mail, can remit a one or two dollar bill, (the Post Master will frank it, of course, if properly requested,) and we will send papers till the money is exhausted.

Our principles are the same as ever—Universalism in word and in deed—in theory and in practice—in heart, and soul, and daily conversation—in life and in death—now and forever! And every rational and proper means to bring its believers to the full adoption of this sentiment—to build them up, and make them "a peculiar people, zealous of good works"—and to bring our opposers to a knowledge and practice of the truth; will be mildly, but earnestly and constantly advocated by this paper, so as to render it increasingly worthy of a liberal support from liberal Christians generally, and from true-hearted, devoted Universalists especially.

TERMS.

The Magazine and Advocate is published every Friday, on a royal sheet, quarto form, for binding, at $1.50 per annum, invariably in advance.

Agents or companies paying for EIGHT copies, will be allowed the NINTH copy gratis; and so in proportion to any number over three.

All communications to the Publishers or Editors, must be POST PAID or FREE. Postmasters will usually frank remittances.

Names of new subscribers should be returned by the first of January, 1844, or as soon thereafter as possible, to the Publishers.

Utica, N. Y., November, 1843.

While in the country, a few days since, I came across the following, which, for its quaintness and correct theology, I thought well intitled to be copied into our columns. I therefore begged permission to pocket it—and now give it to our readers.

MY PARTIALIST FRIEND.

'Twas Goodness proposed, it was Wisdom that planned—
The work was performed by an Almighty hand—
Three questions, then, drawn from the premises penned,
Are waiting thy answer; "my Partialist Friend."

If Goodness proposed the grand system we see,
And determined what was, and was not to be;
Then were not provisions, both ample and kind,
For each creature made, by an Eternal Mind?

If Wisdom sought means, and perfected that plan,
Which Goodness proposed when creation began,
Is it not, then, quite safe, philosophical friend,
To conclude that the means will suffice for the end?

And lastly, if Power, by Wisdom directed,
Carries out and effects, what Goodness projected;
Do you need the ken of a prophet, to tell,
When the end is accomplished, that "all will be well?"

THE OLD CHURCH.

A train passed through the old church door,
And stood within its nave;
The morning sun upon the floor,
Its light through shadows gave.
A mother brought her babe, new born,
For the holy man to bless;
To give it, in its young, fresh morn,
God's hallowed, high impress.
The babe looked up in the good priest's face,
And smiled as it took the sign of grace.
The train passed through the arch of stone,
And the old grey church was left alone.

The mid day sun beams on a crowd
That throngs this holy spot,
With merry shouts and laughter loud—
Their cares are all forgot!
A trusting maid and loving youth
Kneel at that good man's feet;
And after him their vows of truth,
Of faith, of love, repeat,
The lovers look in each other's eyes,
Will they live a life of smiles or sighs?
The crowd passed out of the arch of stone,
And the old grey church was left alone.

At eve, within that old church door,
A silent group appears;
The sun is set, their mirth is o'er—
Laughter is quenched in tears!
The coffin and the gloomy pall,
And breaking hearts are there;
The holy man, at sorrow's call,
Breathes out the mourner's prayer.
How full his heart! yet every day
He sees life bloom, sees it decay!
The group passed out of the arch of stone,
And the old grey church was left alone.

PROFESSOR OF SIGNS.

King James VI, on removing to London, was waited upon by the Spanish ambassador, a man of erudition, but who had a crotchet in his head that every country should have a professor of signs, to teach him and the like of him to understand one another. The ambassador was lamenting one day before the king this great desideratum throughout all Europe, when the king, who was a queerish sort of a man, said to him, "Why, I have a professor of signs in the northern-most college of my dominions, viz., at Aberdeen; but it is a great way off, perhaps six hundred miles." "Were it ten thousand leagues off, I shall see him," said the ambassador, "and am determined to set out in two or three days." The king saw that he had committed himself, and wrote, or caused to be written, to the university of Aberdeen, stating the case, and desiring the professors to put him off some way, or make the best of him. The ambassador arrives, is received with great solemnity; but soon begins to inquire which of them had the honor to be the professor of signs? and being told that the professor was absent in the Highlands, and would return, nobody could say when, the ambassador said, "I will wait his return, though it were twelve months." Seeing that this would not do, and that they had to entertain him at great expence all the while, they contrived a stratagem. There was one Geordy, a butcher, blind of an eye, a droll fellow, with much wit and roguery about him. He was told the story, and instructed to be a professor of signs; but not to speak on pain of death. Geordy undertakes it. The ambassador was now told that the professor of signs would be at home next day, at which he rejoiced greatly. Geordy is gowned, wigged, and placed in a chair of state in a room of the college, all the professors and the ambassador being in an adjoining room.

The ambassador is now shown into Geordy's room, and left to converse with him as well as he could, the other professors waiting the issue with fear and trembling. The ambassador holds up one of his fingers to Geordy; Geordy holds up two of his. The ambassador holds up three; Geordy clenches his fist and looks stern. The ambassador then takes an orange from his pocket, and holds it up; Geordy takes a piece of barley cake from his pocket, and holds that up. After which, the ambassador bows to him, and retires to the other professors, who anxiously inquired his opinion of their brother. "He is a perfect miracle," says the ambassador; "I would not give him for the wealth of the Indies!" "Well," say the professors, "to descend to particulars." "Why," said the ambassador "I first held up one finger, denoting that there is one God; he held up two, signifying that these are the Father and Son; I held up three, meaning the Father, Son and Holy Ghost; he clenched his fist, to say that these three are one. I then took out an orange, signifying the goodness of God, who gives his creatures not only the necessities but the luxuries of life; upon which this wonderful man presented a piece of bread, showing that that was the staff of life, and preferable to every luxury." The professors were glad that matters had turned out so well; so having got quit of the ambassador, they next got Geordy, to hear his version of the signs. "Well, Geordy, how have you come on, and what do you think of yon man?" "The rascal," said Geordy; "what did he first do, think ye? He held up one finger, as much as to say, you have only one eye! Then I held up two, meaning that my one eye was perhaps as good as both his. Then the fellow held up three of his fingers, to say that there were but three eyes between us—then I was so mad at the scoundrel that I steeked my neire, wishing to come a whack on the side of his head, and would have done it too, but for your sakes. Then the rascal did not stop with his provocation here; but, forsooth, takes out an orange, as much as to say, your poor, beggarly, cold country can not produce that! I showed him a thwang of a bear bannock, meaning that I dinna care a farthing for him nor his trash neither, as lang's I ha'e this! But, by a' that's guid," continued Geordy, "I'm angry yet that I dinna thrash the hide o' the scoundrel!"

DOMESTIC HAPPINESS.—Ah! what so refreshing, so soothing, so satisfying as the placid joys of home!

See the traveller—does duty call him for a season to leave his beloved circle! The image of his earthly happiness continues vivid in his remembrance, it quickens him to diligence, it makes him hail the hour which sees his purpose accomplished, and his face turned toward home; it communes with him as he journeys, and he hears the promise which causes him to hope, "Thou shalt know also, that the tabernacle shall be in peace, and thou shalt visit thy tabernacle, and not sin." O! the joyful reunion of a divided family—the pleasures of renewed interview and conversation after days of absence.

Behold the man of science—he drops the laborious and painful research—closes his volume—smoothes his wrinkled brow—leaves his study, and unbending himself, stoops to the capacities, yields to the wishes, and mingles with the diversions of his children.

"He will not blush that has a father's heart,
To take, in childish play, a childish part;
But bends his sturdy neck to play the toy,
That youth takes pleasure in, to please his boy."

Take the man of trade—what reconciles him to toil of business? What enables him to endure the fastidiousness and impertinence of customers? What rewards him for so many hours of tedious confinement? By and by the season of intercourse will behold the desire of his eyes and the children of his love, by whom he resigned his ease; and in their welfare and smiles he will find his recompense.

Yonder comes the laborer—he has borne the burden and heat of the day; the descending sun has released him of his toil; and he is hastening home to enjoy repose. Half way down the lane, by the side of which stands his cottage, his children run to meet him. One he carries and one he leads. The companion of his humble life is ready to furnish him with his plain repast. See his toil worn countenance assumes an air of cheerfulness!—his hardships are forgotten; fatigue vanishes; he eats and is satisfied. The evening fair, he walks with uncovered head, around his garden—enters again, and retires to rest! and, "the rest of a laboring man is sweet, whether he eats little or much." Inhabitant of this lowly dwelling! who can be indifferent to thy comfort? Peace be to this house!—[Rev. W. Jay.

ORIGIN OF SEVERAL FASHIONS.—Fashions have frequently originated in endeavors of the inventors to hide some deformity. Hoops, for instance, to conceal an ill shaped hip; ruffles, a scar on the neck, perhaps; large sleeves, history does not mention, and conjecture might not be acceptable. Patches were invented in the reign of Edward VI, by a lady, who in this manner covered a wen on her neck. Charles VII of France introduced long coats to hide a pair of crooked legs. Peaked shoes full two feet long, were invented by the duke of Anjou, to conceal a deformed foot. Francis I, was obliged, from a wound in his head, to wear short hair, and hence the fashion.

Isabella of Bavaria, was proud of her beauty, and introduced the custom of leaving the neck and shoulders uncovered. Charles V., by severe edicts, banished tight breeches; and during the reign of Elizabeth, enormous large breeches came into fashion. The beaux of that day stuffed their breeches with rags, feathers, wool and other light stuff, till they resembled high bales of cotton. To come up with them, the ladies invented large petticoats. It was said that two lovers could not come within seven feet of each other! At one time, square toes ran to such a width, that a proclamation was issued that no person should wear shoes more than six inches at the toes.

One of the most important female qualities is sweetness of temper. Heaven did not give to woman insinuations and persuasions in order to be imperious; it did not give them a sweet voice to be employed in scolding.

MANAGEMENT.—You will always observe one thing among inferior women. They will make more noise in endeavoring to keep their children quiet, than their children make themselves, and yet the little ones will be forever in an uproar; while a woman of intelligence not only keeps her family quiet, but herself also.

Euclid, the disciple of Socrates, having offended a brother, the brother cried out in a rage, "Let me die, if I am not avenged on you some time or other!" Euclid replied with a sweetness next to a Christian—"And let me die, if I do not soften you by my kindness, and make you love me as well as ever."

OCCASIONAL SERMON.

Delivered before the United States' Convention of Universalists, convened at Akron, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1843.

BY REV. JOHN A. GURLEY.

"Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage."—Gal. v: 1.

These words were spoken with a particular reference to the bondage engendered by Judaism, with its numerous rites and ceremonies. Many Christians were inclined to conform to some of the requirements of the law; and others, but partially instructed, were liable to renounce Christianity, and return to it altogether; and with it receive those traditions of the Pharisees and others, which were destitute of all divine authority, greatly increased the weight of moral slavery, and which also had received the pointed condemnation of the Saviour.

The apostle would have the believers stand firm and fixed in the principles of that Gospel, which alone secures good freedom. And this accounts for his frequent exhortation to earnestly contend for the faith, and gird on the whole armor of God.

But the words of the text lose none of their force when applied to Christians of all ages and countries. The disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ are never, in this world, entirely beyond the liability to become unfaithful and unbelieving. The history of the Christian church, from the age of the apostles to the present, fully authorizes this declaration.—And, if Paul were here to-day, and now stood in our midst, I believe that he would approve us in adopting his own word and saying to all professors, "Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage."

One of the leading objects embraced in the Messiah's mission was the freedom of the world. Hence, the prophet of ancient days represented him as saying, "The spirit of the Lord God is upon me; because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me to bind up the broken hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound." Isa. xli: 1. And when the Master was on earth, he declared to the Jews, "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."—Thus it appears, that the Gospel proclaims liberty to the children of men. It gives freedom from superstition, error, and all that bondage which results from a belief in theories, tyrannical and cruel in their character.

No freedom can compare with this importance. It far exceeds in value any civil liberty which any people ever enjoyed. And although the body may be enslaved, and the limbs placed in shackles of iron; still, the man, the mind may enjoy the sweetest freedom. Paul, when he stood before rulers, bound with a chain, enjoyed inconceivably more freedom than any among his persecutors; and almost infinitely happier was he than they.

Brethren, we who have assembled from different parts of the country, on this important and happy occasion, profess to enjoy the Gospel of Christ in its original simplicity,—to believe it, pure and holy as it came from the life of the sinless Saviour. The liberty of the Gospel which makes free indeed is ours. Not the liberty of sin and licentiousness—but of truth, and light, and life, and love—a liberty of heavenly origin—desirable too, as life, and sweeter to the moral taste than the honey-comb.

This freedom, and the religion which secures it we prize above things else. The Gospel of Universal Salvation we know and feel to be the pearl of great price; the treasure of all treasures, the durable and unsearchable riches. And feelingly can we say, as we think, that it is the bread of life—the bread of God—the water of everlasting life, clear as crystal—the feast of fat things, full of marrow, and wine on the lees well refined.

Before proceeding to consider the principal topic of this discourse, we will briefly glance at some of the blessings and privileges secured to us by the truth. The simple word "liberty," does not at once bring up before the mind all these. We often pronounce it with reference to our civil freedom, without realizing its full meaning. We should remember, that the independence which we enjoy as a nation, secures to us the peaceful possession of numerous blessings which a state of servitude would place out of our reach. So with the liberty of the Gospel: It secures to us those invaluable spiritual privileges and means unknown to a state of bondage. It at once establishes our right to the full and indisputed possession of the New Jerusalem—to the kingdom of God with its numberless enjoyments—to the tree of life—and the fruits of the spirit, love, joy, peace, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness and temperance. And here arises the great and exceeding value of our freedom as citizens of the heavenly kingdom.

"Stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free."

This solemn and decisive charge was given, in view of the fact, that the Gospel is infinitely worthy of the united support of all men; and that a firm adherence to, and zealous propagation of its principles, will best promote our own, and the greatest good of the whole family of man. And we might well ask, How can it be otherwise?—Since it must be acknowledged, by every man of a sane mind, that it is the only perfect system of religion in our world. Permit me to direct your attention to some of those prominent blessings connected with our religion; and which should be the strongest inducement to guard well our liberty.

Place before you if you please, the map of the globe; and then examine all nations and trifles of men; and view with care, and critical eye their various creeds and systems of religion. Now, from the whole of them, you can select only one that is perfect—lacking in nothing; only one which could not be improved by human skill and ingenuity, and made more desirable to an intelligent mind and feeling heart. That one is found under the name of UNIVERSAL SALVATION. It is a most remarkable truth, one worthy of serious consideration, that of all in the world, of this alone can each man say, placing his hand upon his heart, "There! my soul is fully satisfied; I ask nothing better."

All other systems too, are changing in some essential principles. The work of remodelling is constantly going on. The different sects are enlarging their faiths. (For this we return them our thanks.) The creeds of this day are found too small—too narrow for the growing spirit of Christian benevolence. They are the last patterning after the once despised, but now triumphing system, first proclaimed on the shores of America by the sainted Murray. And never, no, never will the world be fully satisfied, till they embrace in its fulness, the doctrine that secures the final happiness of every being, made in the image of Almighty God. And that the whole mass of mind in the religious world is fast tending towards this, is proved by the great and important changes that have taken place, and are constantly going on in the doctrines and creeds around us.

I will at this time, only point to one single fact often spoken of among us and published—that, whereas, formerly, it was preached as sound theology, that the great majority of the world will be lost—now it is proclaimed by the same class that nearly all will be saved. As now understood, the number finally placed in the dark prison house of despair, compared to the number in heaven, will well correspond with the number in our State prisons to the whole population around.

Who with his eyes open, can doubt for a moment, that this great change has been chiefly wrought by the Universalist pulpit and press? And is it not astonishing, that those engaged in theories thus imperfect, do not pause, and examine more fully the claims of a religion, alike desirable to good men, angels, Christ, and even God himself? That which leaves out one soul from the ark of eternal safety, is undeniably lacking in Christian perfection.

Being engaged then, in the promulgation of the only religion that is truly worthy of the handy work of the God from whom it came, we have the strongest encouragement to stand fast in the liberty of Christ. And how it nerves the faithful disciple on to renewed exertion, as he contemplates the divisions in the professed Christian world, the contentions and sharp controversies about doctrines that must perish with their using, and then turns to his own faith, and beholds in it all that is desirable, fair and lovely.

But its perfection is seen also in its superior moral tendency. By teaching us that sin is sure, to bring misery, that there is no escape, that moral laws are as inflexible as physical, it at once destroys all motive to break the laws of moral right. And he who is not influenced by higher considerations, finds here a check upon his career of vice. It makes war upon the system which promises pleasure in sin, and proclaims in a voice of warning, "God will by no means clear the guilty," but "reward every man according to his works." And when it is once fairly impressed upon the minds of the people, it will produce an entire, and most astonishing revolution in favor of purity and uprightness of life.

And the motives too, drawn from the love of God, as understood by us, when brought to bear upon the mind, are irresistible. To the same extent that God appears to mankind lovely, they love him; and they can only love him as he appears to them in this light; and the more they love the less they sin. We can no more sin against God if we love him as we may, and ought, than we can sin against an earthly friend whom we affectionately regard, to whom we are bound by tender ties of kindred. We can not know God without loving him; and hence it is declared, that to know him is "eternal life." Our faith therefore, must have a better moral influence than any other, inasmuch as it presents the Supreme Being to the world in the most lovely light conceivable.

The power of love to reform and subdue the sinner is omnipotent. When the fire, the faggot, the dungeon, the guillotine, and the clanking chain fail to accomplish the object, this is never tried in vain. It transforms him, in the spirit and temper of his mind, wakes up the dormant fire of love in his soul, and assimilates him to the character of him who was the express image of the Father. And if ever the prison-house is transformed into a dwelling of prayer and praise—the business of criminal courts taken away—fraud, lying, deceit, and every evil work banished from the world, and this earth made a spiritual paradise, it must all be the work of LOVE.

The wrong principle has been brought into requisition to reform mankind. They have been threatened with the imaginary terrors of fury, and had applied to them the engines of death and ruin to make them believe and become religious. As well might you attempt to restore the drowning man life, by taking him from the water, and hanging a mill-stone about his neck, and casting him into the sea. With better success might you pour upon your burning building the liquid and red lava of the furnace to extinguish its fires. You might sooner make a Universe than produce love to God by shaking a man over the pit of endless despair.

Such principles as are here involved can only produce feelings and emotions corresponding with their own nature. And the great wonder is, that wise divines should have so long overlooked the real power of the Gospel, and employed means best calculated to transform men into devils. Love is the main spring—the moving, living, all in all principle of Universalism. And we are willing to throw our banner forth to the gaze of heaven and earth, inscribed with the motto, "GOD CONQUERS AND REDEEMS THE WORLD BY LOVE." We wish no concealment here; and we say, that if the love of Him whose name is LOVE is not able to convert the vilest sinner, there is no hope for the human race. We claim for Universalism then, a superior moral tendency based on the fact, that it makes God appear so lovely that men can not see him without loving him with all the heart.

Finally, our holy religion furnishes us with a faith and hope, and presents bright and glowing prospects of a happy immortality which are valuable beyond the power of human intellect to describe; and it is doubtful if the eloquence of angels could do this subject justice.

The adherents of other systems may doubt and fear. To them the future may be veiled in dark obscurity. Indeed, they can not enjoy a settled and unvarying conviction that all will be well in the land of spirits. They feel that their own happiness is insecure. That although they be disciples of the Lord and Saviour, the chances and changes of one short hour may fix their fate for an infinity of agony. And they have no surety at any moment that the recording angel has not registered their names among those destined to become monuments of Almighty wrath.

Blessed be God! to us there is no such uncertainty. Our hopes are stayed upon the rock of eternal ages. And the eye of faith already sees captivity led captive, the tomb throwing open its doors, the slumbers of its millions broken—death destroyed—the world raised to newness of life, and Jesus, the Lion of the tribe of Judah, now the conqueror, standing upon hades, exclaiming, "I am the resurrection and the life!"

I have briefly, and very imperfectly alluded to some of the blessings and privileges secured to us by that freedom of which Christ is the author. The Gospel proclaims liberty to a captive world; and while it is every day breaking the shackles that hold men in slavery, it points with unerring certainty to a period, when the whole moral creation shall be "delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God." A final victory is achieved in prospect, over sin, the devil, and all his works, death and the grave.

And is there a man who has ever tasted of this freedom who is not ready to defend it to the day of his death? Is there one soul who can be moved from the liberty of Christ? Is there one who could turn traitor and sell himself to the enemy for the paltry considerations of this world? Is there a solitary Judas in the camp of the living God? Is there one who would again fasten the chains of slavery upon the tens of thousands who rejoice in the freedom of UNIVERSAL GRACE?

We trust not—we believe not; but let us hear the apostle once more.

"Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage."

The exhortation, "be not entangled again—stand fast!"—implies at least, a liability to return to the beggarly elements of error and sin. And my friends, does not the history of the church prove, that he knew well what was in man, and that he saw with prophetic eye? I need not, I will not stop to point out the corruptions of the early church, as they were introduced, one after another. It is sufficient for our present purpose to say, that three centuries had not passed away before alarming errors had found their way into it, and that the benevolent doctrine that distinguishes us as a denomination was called in question, and ultimately, in a darker age condemned. Time passes on and other grievous errors were voted to be truths of Heaven; and finally, gloomy darkness rested upon priests, bishops and people.

And then, indeed, the church fell into the wilderness, and only commenced to come out of it when the reformation broke forth through the appointed instruments of Providence, Luther and his associate brothers. Then the people began to read, think and decide for themselves; and since, divine light has been increasing, and old and false traditions have been removed from the temple of truth. And present indications seem to say, that Christianity in its purity, is again destined to enlighten and bless the world.

But, is there no danger that the truth may never again become obscured—and hidden in a mass of heathenish rubbish? that its pure light may never again feebly glimmer in the Christian temple? that its followers will never become unfaithful and corrupt? traitors to the cause of God and Jesus Christ? I confess that I do fondly cherish the hope, and almost the faith that the future will only be characterized by progress—new, higher, and more luminous developments of the same eternal truths; and clear exhibition of its influence in the moral conduct of men. But when I look back upon the past, and contemplate the degradation and misery of those even, who controlled the affairs of that church once elevated to heaven—changed, and cast down to hell; and when I think of the weakness and frailty of us poor mortals, the exclamation, "unclean! unclean!" receives new force.

And then again the earnest desire rises in my soul, to raise my voice so loud that all the earth might hear, and in tones of thunder cry, "Beware! beware of the rock which has wrecked the hopes and heavenly prospects of millions. Guard well, and with a vigilant eye, the glorious citadel of Gospel truth—Stand fast in the liberty of Christ."

With the experience and observation of past ages before us all, permit us to point out some of those influences and dangers which may tend again to entangle us in the "yoke of bondage."

The first which I would guard well against, is the introduction among us of any doctrines or practices not authorized by the letter or spirit of Christianity.

Although a precaution of this kind at the present period hardly seems called for, at first thought, considering the general harmony of feeling among us, still, that which has proved the ruin of others should not be disregarded by us. One of the chief causes of the corruption of the first church, was the introduction of theories and forms, designed to conciliate the heathen world, and secure their respect, and thus lead them to openly embrace Christianity.—So strong was the desire to proselyte the unbelieving multitudes, that many were willing to give up their strict adherence to truth, and that alone, and meet them half way, that their influence might be secured in their favor.

Coming into the church under these circumstances, with living prejudices in favor of heathenism on the one hand, and Judaism on the other, it is not strange that after a while, the pure light and glory of the Gospel were driven out from it by pagan superstitions, and extravagant pompous forms and ceremonies, calculated to captivate the feelings of the ignorant and superstitious. And in still later ages, the Roman Church, did, as is well known multiply its ceremonies to an astonishing extent, and adapt them to the passions of the people—their love of show and display, to bring them into its support.

We would that all men might embrace the joyful tidings of a world redeemed, but God forbid! that we should depart in the smallest degree from the simplicity of Christ to bring about the desired object. That will be a dark and dismal day indeed to Zion, when the Universalists descend from the high eminence of principle on which they now stand to pander to the prejudices and false opinions of their opposers, to swell their numbers and increase their influence. If the time shall ever arrive, when, influenced by such motives, they shall make a compromise with error in any form, then will God visit them in judgment; cause their prosperity to cease, and their strength to depart; and their glory will be extinguished in a night of darkness such as the world has seldom realized. If we would enjoy the smiles of Heaven—and of Christ and angels, and carry forward our cause to a glorious issue, we must proclaim the pure word of God with apostolic simplicity, unmixed with error.—We must never let any motive of any character, move us to preach what Heaven has never committed to our charge. We must plant ourselves upon the broad platform of eternal truth, and contend for the Gospel to the last, regardless of any thing on earth that would lead us from the discharge of that duty God requires of us. Every contaminating influence connected with the Gospel, is an additional obstacle to its permanent progress. Who so unwise as to think the truth needs the aid of falsehood to accelerate its onward march—or to make it appear more lovely or desirable. It is omnipotent of itself—fair as the sun, clear as the moon, and terrible as an army with banners. It alone can bring the world back to purity and happiness, and all human and artificial aids brought forth to improve and give it strength are but insults to Heaven.

This reminds me to say, 2d. That a neglect to preach faithfully the doctrine of the Gospel will tend rapidly and fearfully to a return to bondage.

We have only to read the New Testament to become satisfied, that every moral precept is founded in some principle of doctrine. The Saviour has left us an excellent lesson on this subject in these words: "Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute; that ye may be the children of your father which is in heaven: for he maketh the sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain upon the just and the unjust." Matt. v: 44, 45.

All the requirements here set forth are founded on those principles of doctrine that explain to us the character and disposition of God; and without a knowledge of them, the moral teaching falls upon the ear, with comparatively, no force. The character, plan and government of God, are the foundation of moral action in man. "Be ye followers of God as dear children," is an exhortation embracing the highest considerations relating to the conduct of men. It is the ground work and pillar of Christian character and action. But suppose his character is mistaken; suppose he is conceived to be vindictive, disposed to render evil for evil and cursing for cursing, what a fiendish practice must it lead to! If that doctrine were followed out, and a God thus clothed with the passions of human beings were imitated by all men, this world would be filled with violence and blood, and present a scene that the fabled spirits of hell's prison house might long to participate in.

The conclusion of my own mind therefore is, that the doctrine of the gospel should be clearly, faithfully, and fearlessly preached. The mere exhortation, "it is good to be good," will never reform this world. If such moral maxims had been sufficient to accomplish this object, it would have been accomplished long before the establishment of the Gospel ministry. It requires higher and stronger motives—motives drawn from God and heaven to bring the world into the obedience of the law of love, "We love God because he first loved us," is the great secret after all. But how are we to love him sincerely except we know him? And how are we to know him (which knowledge constitutes eternal life) except we study the great truths which develop his character and purposes.

Can we have a better guide in this respect than the apostles themselves? Paul commands Timothy, in one place, to charge the people that they teach no other doctrine. And in one particular charge he says, "take heed to thy doctrine." In alluding to different classes of sinners he sums up what he has to say as follows: "And if there be any other thing contrary to sound doctrine, according to the glorious Gospel of the blessed God which is committed to my trust." This language implies that the sins of men conflict with the doctrine as well as precepts of Christianity. To Titus he writes, "Speak thou the things which become sound doctrine."

Can it be expected that the unbelieving will be brought to a knowledge of the truth without a faithful and constant illustration and defence of our doctrine? Will it be said, that more opposed to us would attend upon our ministry if we were to keep our peculiar sentiments out of view? Suppose we admit this, (which we do not believe), and what follows? They would come and go away nearly as ignorant of our faith as when they came, and with as heavy a yoke of bondage upon their necks. Christ and his apostles could have easily kept out of view those peculiarities of his religion that offended the people and no fault would have been found with them. But if they had taken this course, where would Christianity have been now? On what people would the light of the glorious Gospel of the blessed God be now shining? Would it have gone forth to the ends of the earth, and in a few years taken hold of the throne of the Cæsars?

For one, I firmly believe, that we are engaged in the most important reformation that has been known since the days of Jesus Christ—one that is to gladden and bless the world in its onward march. And under present circumstances, with other lands in darkness, and our own in twilight—with unbelief on every hand, unless we do declare our real views faithfully, we are utterly ruined as a denomination. As the opposition which meets upon every hand has its foundation in ignorance, there seems to be an absolute necessity to acquaint the whole world with our faith.

"Does any one reply, 'Would it not tend very much to promote our popularity and ease as a denomination, and increase the number of its professors, to speak smooth things upon the current topics of the day, particularly upon literature, and such subjects as engage the attention of the fashionable world?' This question leads me to consider the most dangerous influence tending to bondage in the whole catalogue. Paul seems to have had something of this kind in view when he wrote, 'For the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears.' 2 Tim. iv: 2. 'Beware, lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ.' Col. ii: 8.

Men are not transformed in this world, into gods and made perfect beings by Christianity; and we find that some of the professed disciples of Christ are sometimes very fond of this ease—dislike toil and labor, and above all, persecution. There is something in human nature that invites us to that course of action that will enable us to glide smoothly along upon the current of popularity. But a man who is governed by such principles as we are now considering, is in my judgment, a traitor to the cause of Christ. God never sent his ministers forth to deliver smooth orations on subjects of common literature, or any thing else, that will hurt nobody's ears, to the exclusion of that Gospel which is above all price. Look at the example set by Paul, Peter, and other servants of God? Did they ever, in the course of their duty as disciples of Christ, step aside to court the applause of the multitude? Did they attempt to satisfy all who heard them by studiously avoiding subjects that did not feed the depraved appetite of the many?

God forbid! that we should dishonor their names and traduce their characters by an affirmative answer! No brethren, we all know, that they never attempted to act the part of men-pleasers, but they preached the truth with a boldness that did them everlasting honor. Regardless of frowns or threats they stood up in the synagogues and most public places and proclaimed the truth in tones that shook the very foundation of false opinions and errors; and because they did thus, it spread and mightily prevailed. We hear the apostle Paul on this occasion say, "I came not with excellency of speech, or of wisdom, declaring unto you the testimony of God. For I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ and him crucified." 1 Cor. ii: 1, 2.

There is no respect or popularity in this world worth possessing, that is not connected with a faithful discharge of duty. Seekers of popular favor who vacillate in their course to suit all parties, are every where, both in church in state, the most unpopular persons in the world. Policy Christians may succeed for a time, but they ultimately sink into insignificance and contempt. And I have yet to find the first society governed by motives of this kind, and a desire to be very popular, that is permanently prosperous, united and happy. There never was a more fallacious mistake than the one that a trimming policy will best advance the cause of truth, and secure ultimately the respect of the world. It is not in human nature, taken as a whole, bad as it is, to respect any thing inconsistent with manly, Christian independence. That Reformer never lived and finally succeeded who acted with the fear of man before his eyes. All whose names stand out conspicuously in church history for their uncommon success, were noted for their boldness in exposing error and proclaiming the truth. The triumph of such men engaged in a good cause is certain.

True, it is easy to preach general moral principles (in a very modest way) and expatiate upon subjects that gratify the fancy, and please almost every body. It is no very hard task I judge, to string together pretty words in a pretty way, about flowers and poetry; but the important question, does the man who thus acts purposely to avoid odium, and secure the good will of all, best promote the cause of Christ?

Let no one suppose from these remarks, that we underrate the value of human learning, or literature in general. Far be this from us. We regard the learning of the schools as a means not as an end. All acquirements of the minister are valuable to the world, only as they enable him speak the truth of the gospel with more clearness and effect—more intelligibly. But a society built up by the preaching of literature only, and general moral maxims, without regard to sound doctrine, would be a very easy prey to the first flaming revivalist who might come among them.

Finally an over anxious desire to know what others think of us; and any course pursued for the attraction of worldly applause, may be noticed as one sign of a return to bondage. What is more ruinous, or more disgusting to a pure minded man, than a fawning sycophancy towards other and larger sects to gain their favor, so that it may be said—"See! we are complacently smiled upon by the powerful and the popular!" It is better to have the frowns of every opposer of Universalism in this broad world, than their favor, except we can have it on those high, honorable christian principles such as that Master would approve who once said "Follow me."

When a plan is presented, having for its object the promotion of truth, the question should not be, will it be popular with our opposers? What think ye, will they say of it? will it excite their ill will towards us? But rather, is it scriptural? Will God approve? Will Christ? Is it consistent with the example of the apostles? If so, I would say, adopt it, ADOPT IT, although our enemies threaten to call down upon our heads fire from heaven for so doing; and leave the result with that Being whose arm is ever out-stretched to prosper and defend those who follow his instruction. And what matters it with us whether we are called Christians or infidels, if we are in the path of duty? Under some circumstances it is pleasant to be acknowledged as Christians; but who would seek to be called by that name by the concealment of one solitary principle of faith? If men call us hard names, we should remember that much better men than ourselves once counted it an honor to suffer reproach for the cause of Christ; and he must be a poor Christian indeed, and will have to be saved "so as by fire," who can be induced to conceal his faith because the world cry out against it. Are we better than Jesus Christ who was called a devil, a wine bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners? If as pure men as the first disciples could bear the reproach of being counted the off-scouring of the earth without a murmur, shall we who are less worthy, claim exemption from a similar accusation?

We have no need to seek the applause or popularity of the world, to enable us to carry forward our cause to a glorious triumph. If the "battle is of the Lord, (and who doubts it?) all the powers of darkness and hell combined can not prevail against us. Universalism is of heaven, it is eternal truth, and it can not be overthrown. He would be wise who should lay hold of the foundations of the mountains with his weak hands to remove them, compared to him who should attempt to overthrow the foundation of our religion. The various obstacles raised to impede its progress by human skill and ingenuity, are less than the reeds and rushes against the mighty, rushing torrent. It has no need to seek the aid of error, for it contains within itself, the elements of its own eternal existence. "It is a rock against which the waves of popular fury will beat in vain—a stone cut out of the mountain without hands, and which shall finally fill the whole earth." To suppose that it will sooner enlighten the world by being connected with what might be called harmless error, is to call in question the wisdom of God. And he who preaches in such a way as to purposely conceal its leading characteristics, and thus escape odium, is "unworthy of the kingdom." He brings upon it an injury that its enemies could never inflict. He opens the way for a return to that bondage which we are required to guard against with all our energies.

Thus far, our denomination has succeeded to an extent that astonishes its most sanguine friends. By what means has it been made thus to prosper? A worldly policy? a trimming to the popular breeze? a sycophantic conformity to the prejudices of the age? a tame style of writing and sermonizing, without any strong attempt to enlighten the mind, through fear of offending?

The very opposite of this is true; and although we have sometimes been guilty of unnecessary severity—as a whole, who can doubt that our course has been approved by the Master?—Let us not despise them, means that have given us the place we now occupy; nor disregard the danger connected with a departure from them. Our fathers in the ministry planted themselves upon the strong tower of truth, unfurled their colors, and nailed them to the standard of Christ; and they have fought the battles of the Lord with a success that has carried dismay and confusion into the enemy's camp. They have proved noble instruments in the hands of God, of giving us the liberty of Christ. His truth, preached by them, has set us free indeed. And now, it is for us to stand fast in the liberty, and guard well against the yoke of bondage.

Let us keep a watchful eye upon all those dangers that beset our pathway—sin, and unbelief, and love of popularity, of ease, and error in every form—and all those inviting charms of the deceiver, so liable to captivate the feelings.

It is now settled that the liberty of heaven itself hath visited earth. The chains of the oppressor have been broken by Christ. He hath become the Captain of our salvation, and he is now leading our spirits on to new and loftier heights of freedom. Thousands and tens of thousands have hailed the declaration of his independence with songs of joy and praise; and as the news of liberty is echoed, and re-echoed by the heralds of the cross through the land, the notes of praise rise still higher, and sound louder and louder, and earth is now becoming an altar of praise to Heaven. The angel that was seen flying in the midst of heaven having the everlasting Gospel to proclaim to the inhabitants of this earth, is winging his way here, and there, and everywhere; and from his bright and golden wings, are dropping blessings upon us without number.

O who, at such a time, would for one moment falter in his course of duty? Who would not plant his feet upon the rock of freedom, and swear eternal allegiance to heaven's king? Who is not ready to say, until death, I will maintain the freedom of Christ.

The great battle ground of his soldiers is this earth. Here he fought for the mastery over sin and unbelief, and death, and the grave, and triumphed most gloriously! Fellow soldiers of the cross! let us follow him on till the victory of immortality shall be ours. All heaven is looking on with interest to see the result. Angels and glorified spirits are looking down upon us with favor and joy; and when our present contest with error and all evil shall be crowned with full success, one burst of universal joy will rise from all intelligences to the high throne of the great Eternal. And we are looking with the steadfast eye of an unshaken faith to the period, when the whole creation, now groaning in bondage, will burst forth into the triumphant exclamation, we are free! WE ARE FREE!! FOREVER FREE!!

I have thus performed the task allotted to me by a former council of this Convention. I have spoken with no feeling or spirit of dictation; but have uttered my thoughts with that freedom which we all enjoy as ministers of the reconciliation; and if any thing has been said of any value, may we all profit thereby, and continue to grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

UNITARIANS ON THE RIGHT GROUND.

The Unitarians have become almost proverbial for the vagueness—the indefiniteness of their preaching. In this section we have but few preachers of that sect, yet it is a common complaint among their hearers that they can not find out what the preacher believes. Several times have I heard remarks like the following—"I went to hear him regularly for about a year, and could not tell for the life of me what he believed. Sometimes he preached like the orthodox—sometimes like Universalists—sometimes it was all mixture—sometimes all mist and fog, and so on, until I can not tell what he is, or what he believes, save that he don't believe in the trinity." And who has not read and been vexed with the celebrated Unitarian tract, written by Dr. Dewey, and published by their Tract Society, purposely (professedly, at least) to let the world know what Unitarians believe? On one page you are told that Unitarians do not believe in endless misery—that it is horrible—blasphemous to ascribe such views to God. And on the next page you are informed that Unitarians believe in a worse, a deeper, a severer, an infinitely greater and more terrible punishment than any ever yet preached by the Orthodox! And all this shuffling, and twisting, and hiding, and peeping out, by the sect generally in this country, is, to prevent the world from supposing they are Universalists, or have any leaning to or sympathy for Universalism! To avoid this horrible suspicion, they will attend trinitarian meetings three times a Sunday, and pray three deep to a triune God! At least, such is the case in this city of Utica, with our free-born American Unitarians! But it appears that at the East a change is coming over the spirit of this denomination. Though a small sect compared with others, yet it has great wealth, learning, talent, and fashion in its ranks—as much in some States as any denomination, even as those three times its superior in numbers. Yet with all these—with the greatest and wealthiest men in the land among its societies—the most eminent and learned men among its preachers—great wealth—it has advanced very slowly, if any, for the last twenty years. It has had no sympathy with and for the common mind. It has not answered to the great religious feelings and questionings of the human soul. It has not administered the waters and the bread of life to the fever-thirst and the craving appetite of mankind longing after a knowledge, not only of the destiny of here and there an individual, but of the destiny of our whole race. Consequently it has progressed but very slowly; and that mostly among the would-be refined and intellectual—the fashionable and wealthy. And when its professed believers leave Boston, or the cities where it is popular, and go elsewhere, they speedily change the name, retaining the cloak, and are Presbyterians, or Congregationalists, or Episcopalians, or any thing else that is considered very refined, genteel, and exclusive!

Unitarians feel this—and are beginning to look around to see how the defect can be remedied. The following, which we copy from some late numbers of the Trumpet, will show that their leaders are beginning to enter on the right path. They have resolved no longer to preach vague, indefinite moral essays, and literary disquisitions for sermons, but to preach sound doctrine, and to exhibit proofs, and to urge home its arguments, and apply it to the relations and business of life. That is the right ground. Sound doctrine the basis, precept the superstructure, and practical application the filling up and finishing and furnishing of the sermon. If they have the courage to follow out their resolution in every department, the world will learn what they believe—we shall know whether Unitarians are Partialists or Universalists—whether they believe in the final endless sinning and suffering of a part of mankind, or their annihilation, or the final salvation of all. Elective affinity will do its work, and those who would go backward, will be re-absorbed into the Orthodox, and those who would go forward, will be found pressing hard on the rear columns of the Universalists; whose doctrine embraces the unity as well as the universal benevolence of the Deity—right views of his mode of existence, as well as of his chaacter and whose preaching generally, is precisely of the character—doctrine and precept combined and applied—which these Unitarians have recommended.

UNITARIAN CONVENTION IN PROVIDENCE.

The Unitarian brethren have recently held a Convention, for the subject of mutual religious consultation, at Providence, R. I. The Convention met on Tuesday, Oct. 3, and a large number of the clergy and laity of that denomination were present. On that evening a sermon was preached by Dr. Dewey, of New York, on the life and services of Dr. Channing. Dr. Parkman, of this city, was chosen Moderator of the Convention, and Rev. Mr. Thompson, of Salem, Secretary. Rev. Messrs. Young, Hill, Briggs, Osgood, and L. G. Pray, Esq., were appointed a business committee. This committee subsequently reported a series of resolutions, of which the following received the principal share of the Convention's attention. "Resolved, That there is an imperious call upon our denomination for a clear and earnest statement of their distinctive doctrines, and an urgent application of them to practical life." The discussion took a wide range, and was continued with great and increasing interest through the day, and at last passed unanimously. We infer from this that there is a growing conviction among the Unitarians, that a more distinct, doctrinal and matter-of-fact kind of preaching is to be desired. It is on this point that hitherto there has been the principal difference between them and Universalists. Our habits of preaching have been doctrinal, and exegetical as well as practical. We have said, "know the truth" and then, "the truth shall make you free." First then preach Christian truth, and afterward enforce it by every proper means upon the life. We apprehend the Convention at Providence will produce no small effect upon the character of Unitarian preaching.

UNITARIAN CONVENTION AT PROVIDENCE, R. I.

We stated last week, that a Convention of Unitarian clergymen and laymen (principally the former,) had recently been held at Providence, R. I. It seems to have been a meeting of much interest. Dr. Dewey delivered a sermon upon the first evening; and Rev. Mr. Putnam, of Roxbury, upon the second. The principal subject of debate was a resolution drawn up by Rev. Mr. Osgood, of Providence, in the following words,

Resolved, That there is an imperious call upon our denomination for an explicit statement of our peculiar doctrines, and an earnest application of them to practical life.

Mr. Bellows defended the resolution. We would that we had room for his whole address.

"I understand it," said he, "to advocate the necessity of greater attention to our distinctive doctrines as a denomination. I think that this is very necessary. Many have grown up in our congregations, through the lack of care in this particular, ignorant of our distinctive doctrines. They often go from our midst into new places, and among strong opponents, and are unable to defend their own belief. It is true that some points of doctrine have gone by. But there are great points left that need elaboration and enforcement. The fact is, the distinction between us and the Orthodox is really greater than at the time of the secession there was any idea of. The whole power of our denomination lies in our distinctive doctrines."

Again, he said,

"Now I'm going home to speak of doctrines. I'm going to argue for the distinctive differences of our faith. We need to go over the matter again. We need to argue as if just breaking from our shell. We must begin anew. Let me call a moment's attention to the effect of our preaching in New York. People go in crowds to the 'Church of the Messiah,' for instance. They are deeply interested. They go away saying, 'We feel this: it takes hold of us. But it is not Scriptural. There are no doctrines. They avoid that. They are afraid to commit themselves on their peculiar doctrines.' The fact is, the controversy, to us has gone by. But it is not so with the Orthodox. We have been accustomed to say that differences are nothing. We have been accustomed to ask, why harp continually on doctrines? True toleration is based on the priceless worth of opinions. What are opinions? They are approximations to absolute truth. Mercantile opinions are considered valuable. They are treasured up and discussed and acted upon. And are religious opinions not valuable?"

Mr. Briggs, of Plymouth, said.

"We have not been sufficiently positive in presenting our own belief. Now in reference to the doctrines of conversion, for instance; we have dwelt most particularly on unbelief in sudden conversions; and thus have had no conception of the greatness and solemnity of the doctrine in the abstract. It is better to preach the doctrine as we do believe it—the doctrine of self consecration. We must preach positively—the positive faith as we do hold it. And of necessity, if there be truth in it, it will do its work and we shall draw together on the one great and true point held in common by all Christians."

Dr. Dewey said,

"There is time, enough for every thing in our pulpits. One half of the time might be given to subjects not usually treated of. As to the morning service, I would have that given to the elucidation of subjects especially connected with our spiritual vocation. I would have it a holy convocation. I would exclude every thing not consistent with the sacredness of devotion and worship. I would not have the question asked, in reference to it—'Who is to preach?' But in the evening, I think that much greater latitude may properly be exercised. There may be a series of discourses on some great moral or religious topic, such as Ecclesiastical History, Biography, or Doctrine. We have no need of any differences of opinion. Nor in our doctrinal discourses is there any necessity of being controversial."

Mr. Folsom, of Haverhill, defended the resolution. Mr. Waterston thought each should follow the promptings of his own conscience. Mr. Lathrop, of Boston, was in favor of the resolution. "I am decidedly in favor of it," said he, "I am in favor of a clear statement of our views." Mr. Putnam of Roxbury, said,

"I believe in the resolution, in the most positive terms. I believe, in plain doctrinal preaching. It need not take the whole time, but it ought to take a part of every minister's time. But every minister has got to do the whole work for his congregation. He must be able to make a show at least, of ability, to inform them in all respects. Whenever people begin to be awakened, they must have some system of theology. They want something to lean upon, whether it be creed or what not—some definite system of doctrines. And inasmuch as the religious phraseology current is connected with doctrines which we do not believe, there is need of some controversy. If we do not give ideas, our people, when we have awakened them, will go elsewhere. They need something to lean upon. And whenever a minister fails to give ideas, his people will desert him and get them from the neighboring ministers. They will then say, 'We have got something to lean upon. We have got what we want.' They won't have what they want, but they think they have because they have got something."

Mr. Pierpont, of Boston, maintained,

"That there is an imperious call to do something—a call from above—that we have no right to refuse. I feel it sounding in the deep places of my soul. I hear its echoes coming back to me from the surface of society. What is it? First, to make a clear statement of the distinctive truths of Unitarianism—questions touching God and his character."

Again, he said,

"God is our Father. The labor of the life of Channing was devoted to the exemplification of God in his paternal relation. Next to that is the filial relation of man to God. We are not children of God, because God is our Creator, but because he is a Father to us. And our mission is to reveal him as a Father. Consequent on that doctrine is this—the fraternity of man. All men are brethren.”

Mr. Osgood (the mover of the resolution) among many excellent remarks, submitted the following: “He would insist upon the importance of a more thorough study of Christian theology on the part of our clergy, a higher standard of sacred scholarship. There is reason to fear a decline of interest in this pursuit. Originally, Unitarians embodied within themselves most of the literature of New England both in secular and sacred studies. And now a large proportion of authors, lecturers and orators, throughout the land, belong to us. But are we not in danger of giving our studies too secular a turn—of abandoning Theology for Ethics, Divinity for the Humanities?”

Again.

“Mr. O. went on and urged the importance of defining our position alike for maintaining our own dignity and giving power to our views. A vacillating, apologetic position is always weak. The able general seldom allows himself to wait attacks passively. He presents an active front to the adversary. We have been too apologetic.”

Mr. G. G. Channing, of Boston, agreed to what had been said in regard to explicitness in teaching doctrine, but he would be above all things earnest and emphatic in teaching the doctrine of God’s LOVE.

Mr. Thompson, of Salem, said,

“He wished to say a word on one point, that seems to be contemplated by the resolution; the question, ‘Is it not the duty of Unitarians to attack errors of faith?’ I have more love for Unitarianism than my brother of Trenton seems to entertain. It seems to me to be the truth—the only truth. I believe other views to be not only erroneous, but bad. Our father, to whom allusion is so often made, deemed it his duty to oppose current errors. Is it not our duty, our solemn duty, also to labor against popular errors? They are current now as ever. I have longed for union as much as any one of my brethren. But I despair. The nearer I have come to the Orthodox, the farther I have been repelled. I believe the spirit of Orthodoxy to be anti-Christian. It does not bring men together. It sunders them. The Scripture shows us that error was attacked wherever it existed. It seems to me that we should do likewise. I would attack Orthodoxy, not in a controversial spirit. I would attack it as my duty. I would attack it as directed by the spirit of God. I would attack it as a disciple of my Master.”

Mr. Pierpont, of Boston, spoke again, as follows.

“I am glad to see that we are approaching an issue, at least in seeming. Some appear to feel that doctrinal preaching is called for; others that the cause of Christ will be better served by keeping all distinctions out of sight. Will you allow me, sir, to express my views once more? I agree with all those who would bring all into harmony of spirit—the bond of love. I believe that spirit is to be found in all denominations. I wish I knew that there is more of it among us than among other denominations. Therefore I am inclined to take the ground of Br. Thompson. We want to preach the distinctive doctrines that we hold to be the truth; and this can only be done by holding up others and our own, and contrasting them. The deformity of error is best shown by contrast with truth. In this there is no need of showing an unchristian spirit.”

Again, he said,

“Now, sir, I look back. I look at the apostles and I find that they went out aggressively. It was said of them, ‘Lo, here! are those men who turned the world upside down; they have come hither also. They did not go into the temple of Minerva or Diana, and say, Here we differ in doctrines, but in spirit it is all the same thing.’ No. They raised a commotion at Ephesus, because they said openly and boldly, ‘These are not gods that are made with hands.’ I find aggression in the Gospel doctrine, ‘Love your enemies.’ This was aggressive against the old doctrine of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. So, when a woman was in conversation with our Lord himself, he said plainly to her, ‘Ye worship ye know not what.—We know what we worship. I say likewise to the Trinitarians, ‘Ye worship ye know not what!’”

We have before remarked, that the resolution passed UNANIMOUSLY. This is a new movement among the Unitarians, and we have no doubt the effect of it will be felt.

DEDICATION AT BOSTON, N. Y.

Br. HAMMOND—At our dedication and conference on the 17th, 18th, and 19th of Oct., we had a happy and felicitous time, under the circumstances. The weather for some two or three weeks previous having been very rainy, the roads, in all directions, had become intolerably bad; and added to this, the morning of our dedication opened extremely unpropitious from a heavy snow storm; but notwithstanding, a goodly number of our friends, with warm hearts and their best affections enlisted in the good cause, were seen; as the time appointed arrived, wending their way to the house of prayer, intended to be consecrated to the God of heaven.

Br. Todd, of Ellicottville, who had been sojourning with us a few days, was the only minister on hand. The storm continued increasing, till about half-past eleven o’clock, A. M., the friends present determined to postpone the dedication till the next day, and requested Br. Todd to preach a short discourse. Our good brother, therefore, announced the determination of the friends, and addressed us from 1 Cor. iii: 21–23. Before he had concluded, Mrs. Flagler, Hunt and Gowdy, arrived, the former of whom also gave us a very interesting sermon, in the afternoon. Thus ended our services the first day.

On Tuesday evening, Br. Goss, of Lewiston, with our good lay brother Caryl, of Buffalo, arrived, announcing to us that Br. Smith, on account of the extreme inclemency of the weather, would not be with us.

On Wednesday morning, at the appointed hour, our house was well filled, and Br. Hunt preached the dedicatory sermon with great freedom, and with a blessed effect, on the latter clause of 1 John v: 4, “And this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith.” After paraphrasing the context, he showed the nature and effects of faith, and the victory every true believer obtained by faith. Then with a beautiful simile of the rising sun—“it rises, and continues to rise, whether we believe it or not,” and showed in masterly style the glorious purposes of God, our heavenly Father, as revealed to us in his word of the final subjugation of all intelligences. That all were encompassed in the covenant of grace, and enshrouded in the universal redemption, despite the unbelief of some—“shall the unbelief of some make the promise of God of no effect?—God forbid: yea, let God be true, but every man a liar.” And then with a power and pathos unsurpassed, exhorted us to aspire by faith to all the lengths, and breadths, and depths, and heights of the love of God, and the enjoyments of the present great salvation. It was a masterly production, purely extemporaneous, and with scarcely any preparation. Our friends, I believe, are unanimous in their wishes that our good brother will write it out for publication. On the afternoon of that day, Br. Goss gave us an excellent discourse from Revelations xxi: 4. Succeeded by Br. Gowdy from Acts ix: 6. In his exordium he related to us that a Rev. gentleman from Boston had been into his neighborhood, and reported the conversion of every Universalist, but two, in Boston, that it was then his purpose to exhort the two irrefragable to repentance; he gave us an excellent discourse. Br. Gowdy did not give us the name of the Rev. gentleman who exerts such mighty powers of conversion, but we at once concluded it to be the same Rev. gentleman that figured so conspicuously in Niagara county last Spring. Thus ended our second day’s services.

On Thursday morning, our old pastor, Br. Remington, gave us an excellent sermon from Rev. viii: 20, and on the afternoon of that day we had a powerful discourse from Br. Goss, from 1 John ii: 25. The very unfavorable state of the weather, and the badness of the roads, and dark nights, prevented us from having conference meetings in the evenings, and undoubtedly deprived some of their anticipated enjoyment—but, on the whole, we found it good to be there. We feel “to thank God and take courage.”

We have now a beautiful little Church, which will comfortably seat about 500 persons. And here I would beg to say, we are greatly indebted to our good Br. Cobb, who, with untiring zeal, has consecrated his best energies, his time, and a large amount of money to the promotion of our cause; and especially in the erection of our house. The earnest attention given by every worshipper present, to the truths so ably stated and enforced, must have a salutary and lasting effect, in leading the wandering sons of men, who are still sitting in the valley of the shadow of death, “to see the glorious rising of the sun of righteousness with healing in his wings.” Br. Havens, of the Methodist Episcopal church, with true Christian charity, sat in the desk with Br. Hunt, and made the opening prayer, breathing forth the true spirit of a Gospel minister.

I noticed, some time since, that you requested me to act as your agent for the Luminary. I hope to be able to increase the circulation of our papers another year, and shall use my best endeavors for that purpose—praying for the blessing of Almighty God on your endeavors to spread abroad his truth. I am, respectfully yours, WM. ANDRE.

UTICA, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1843.

OUR ELDER BRETHREN IN THE MINISTRY.

A few years ago, Partialism reigned supreme over all the Christian world, and along with it, a spirit of unfeeling and unrelenting persecution against all, who, by the study of the Bible or by any other means, became convinced that the prevailing doctrines were not true, and with a most commendable honesty of heart, came out with an open avowal of his convictions, and also of the doctrines he had embraced. The man who loved the truth well enough to lead him to take that public step, endangered his property, his character, and even his life itself; and they who carried on such persecutions, in most cases no doubt, thought as did Paul in his persecutions against the true believers, that they were doing God service. A day of horror was that, and fatal to the religious hopes of thousands of yearning spirits. The man who could not think just as the church generally thought, and see just such things as it saw,

Even though it wore, unconscious all,
Dark spectacles of leather made, was very complacently “damned to all the miseries of this life and the pains of hell forever;” no matter how many friends, near and dear, might have their feelings and happiness through life involved; this was no concern of the church, let those who were interested take care of that—it was the business of the church to damn the man and make him just as miserable as the civil law would allow it to do; and damned and persecuted therefore he must be, and was.

In the midst of such times it was,—times thus perilous to the dissenter from the prevailing religion, that our elder brethren in the ministry of the reconciliation, for the most part arose. Even in that fearful period there were a few minds so full of such stern integrity of heart and devotion to the will of God, as to enable them to follow their convictions of truth and duty, and to come out with an open and fearless declaration and defence of Universalism. It was a bold and manly step, and, in most cases, brought upon their heads the most unpleasant consequences, and was made the direct agent in the creation of a state of affairs the most antagonistic to their feelings and happiness; for everything dear in life was tortured on a species of modern inquisition; their religion misrepresented and denounced; their characters slandered by pious tongues; their persons scorned and avoided as though their very touch would leave the plague-spot of damning pollution, or else abused and maltreated in a most shameful manner; and sometimes even their lives threatened, as a deed "necessary to get the devil out of the place"—all this, and still those brethren were not discouraged from their field of Gospel labor.

But then this was not all; persecutions at the hands of religious opposers were not all the difficulties our elder brethren had to contend with; there were other and sometimes equally serious difficulties to encounter from other sources. The believers in the doctrine they taught, were few in number and scattered over a large extent of country; and were therefore not able to give a very comfortable support to those few heralds who were spending their lives in proclaiming the Gospel good-news. They were obliged to travel from place to place, and to be the far greater part of their time from home. Often would it happen that they were compelled to make a long journey, meeting every day with some disheartening circumstances, and perform along the road an almost incredible amount of mental labor, "without scrip or purse," and receive not enough to meet the actual expenses of the journey; and some of them, sometimes, with but little hope of finding enough to satisfy their wants when they reached home. Poorly clad frequently; poorly fed with everything save "the bread of God;" trusting Providence alone for the means necessary to meet their wants on the road when travelling; they went about from place to place, in the very face of every species of persecution except "bonds and death," to disseminate the spiritual blessings of the Gospel of love and peace. But they faltered not, nor turned back; they persevered, they conquered. The dark day was long and fearful, but the clouds that hid the sun, were swept away, and they found themselves walking in the splendor of his beams; friends multiplied; public opinion changed somewhat in its tone towards them; their ministry imposed on them less physical toil; there was a charm in the doctrine which fell from their lips which began to be seen and felt; and they had the joy of seeing thousands who ventured to listen to them, go away with hearts converted and rejoicing in the Lord as the Saviour of all men. What a change can be wrought in the religious opinions, feelings, tastes, habits and actions of a whole nation in the life-time of man, and as it were by "twelve all but unlettered fishermen" whose power lies in a persevering study of the Bible and a God-given independence of thought and energy of soul! One bold and independent thinker and fearless and consistent actor, will accomplish more towards revolutionizing the world than a whole generation of servile imitators, who think nothing but what their fathers did, and do nothing but what their fathers have done before them. And such, for the most part, were the men who established Universalism in the United States.

But those elder brethren in the great ministry of the Reconciliation of all men through Christ to God, who enlisted in the holy cause in its infancy in this country, have, many of them, passed away. Their life of labor, of privation, of trial, of spiritual warfare, of literal bodily sacrifice, has closed; and they have gone to join their Master and Exemplar whom they loved so devotedly, in that beautiful home,

"Where bright angels' plumes are folded o'er the peaceful brow and breast;

Where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest."

But some, a few of them, of those patient, laborious elder brethren, are still among us. Here and there we see an aged head whose locks have grown grey in their good Master's vineyard, bending with the weight of years and of toil, yet laboring on with almost youthful zeal, with voice and pen, in the cause of God and for the spiritual good of man. I revere them for their golden unbending integrity of soul, for their love of truth, for their willingness to endure privation and make sacrifices for the Gospel's sake and the religious interests of their fellow men. When I look back over the field of their labors and see what they have done, what achievements, under God, they have accomplished; and bring before my mind the severe ordeal they have passed, the sufferings they have endured, and yet witness their unwavering confidence in God, their unflinching perseverance in their mission of love to the world; I am ashamed of the scantiness and feebleness of the gratitude my heart has cherished towards them. Had they not lived and labored as they have done, I should now, in all human probability, be yet feeling my fearful way through the world amid the gloom and dread-inspiring woes of the old and rigid Partialism. The sun that I now see illuminating the whole moral universe, would have never risen on my mental vision; but all would have been dark and awful, and the dread future peopled with images of horror and vocal with the wailings of the damned; making life anything but a glorious boon for which we could lift up our hearts and thank God.

It is to the Gospel, I know, that I am to attribute my deliverance from error and sin; but the blessing the Gospel designed for me, was received through the instrumentality of these my elder brethren. Their hand tore away the veil that shut out from my mind the unutterable glories of the Gospel of unbounded love and universal salvation. Ought I not then highly to respect them? Would it become me to treat their labors lightly? to abuse their names because they had not the advantages of an education of just the same kind as myself?—or represent them as ungodly men because they can not, and therefore do not, adopt my individual notions respecting every passage that is found in the Bible?

And yet there is something not altogether unlike this, which I often meet with in some of our periodicals, or hear from the lips of some of our (comparatively speaking) young preachers, respecting the labors and religion of our elder brethren. And it pains me to know that it is thus; for I can not feel that they deserve such treatment at our hands. The interpretations of the Scriptures which we adopt and use, we have received mainly from them, the fruits of their labors. They have in this respect alone, laid us under a large debt of gratitude to them. They have—some of them—taught and published some things, which, perhaps, we can not now receive—but the great leading truths which as a denomination we all hold, and as preachers we all preach, were established by them, long before many of us had dreamed even that Universalism is taught in the Bible. Why then should we, because we deem that ourselves have been, in a few respects, more favored than they, indulge indiscriminate condemnation at their expense? Is it to reward them for the great amount of religious doctrinal matter they, by hard thinking and untiring industry, have got together for us to use, and which we do use? And are we sure, when we are doing all this that we have really less errors in our religious belief, and in our practice, too, than they had, or now have? Let him who thinks it, blush and hold his peace. I am speaking, let it not be forgotten, of our elder brethren who are yet among us; and I feel that I am speaking carefully and prudently when I say, I would heaven that all of us young preachers, who have become the proud and self-constituted judges of those long tried fathers in our Israel, were as heartily, as sincerely, as unreservedly devoted to the cause of our Master, as they have been and still are.

I am not disposed to have the old custom of apotheosis, or the later one of canonization, introduced for our elder brethren; no—I do not wish to laud them, even; but I would have them justly thought of, appreciated, and treated, by those who are so largely indebted to them for the glorious faith that they hold so dear and holy. While the spirit, on the other hand, which I have several times witnessed in expressions thrown out against the learning or religion of our elder brethren, by young men, has seemed to me to be a very bad spirit, and has caused me pain. I could not but feel that there is truth in the language of Addison: "It is a mean and beggarly spirit that does not reverence an old and good man, or that can be ungrateful towards a benefactor." And in the light of benefactors do I regard those elder brethren of whom I am speaking; and with pity and sorrow must I look upon those who can speak disrespectfully of them.

Besides, of all the young men who have shot up into critics and now sit in judgment on the faith and deeds of those men of a former generation, who yet remain among us; there can not be found one who is willing to sacrifice as much; to bear as much fatigue, as many privations, as much persecution; to perform as much mental labor amidst so much unceasing physical toil and discouragement, as have been done by our elder brethren. Nor do I believe, with all the aid which the labors of those brethren afford, that it will ever fall to the lot of any of those critical young preachers, to be the instrument of the conversion of one half as many souls from error to the truth, as it has been the pleasure of God to effect through any one of our elder brethren. Let, then, the young preacher who is sitting in judgment on his elder brethren, blush at the impudent folly of his presumption; and abandoning his unchristian conduct, go and learn from the wisdom of age, experience and thought, those lessons which will make him wise as a biblical student, devotional as a Christian, humble as a follower of Christ, and useful as a preacher of the Gospel.

I did design to give some examples of the conduct of which I have been speaking; but I could not well do so without being thought too personal perhaps; I have concluded therefore to let them pass, hoping that I may never again be pained by a repetition of them. We who are young, have nothing of which to boast, but have received much for which to be grateful. If we have been blessed with advantages which were denied to our elder brethren, let us be duly thankful for them and not make them the occasion of vain and foolish boasting, to our own shame and the unrighteous derogation of those brethren who entered the field of Gospel labor before us. We should remember, that it is not enough to be wise in our own eyes; and may Heaven give us grace to attain unto salvation, not only from sin, but also from the folly of presumption and the intoxicating vanity which a little learning gives.

H. B. S.

It will be seen by reference to our prospectus in today's paper, that we are offering some inducements to friends, agents or clubs. May we not hope that some exertions will be made to keep up our already much-impaired list? Will our editorial brethren, who do us the favor of copying our prospectus, have the kindness to notice the alteration in the conditions of the terms? We shall be happy to reciprocate the favor.

Br. Price—Send Nos. 37 and 46 of the Union, to Br J. M. Day, of Morganville, which he has not received and thereby oblige him.

Br. Tompkins—Br. L. Smith, of Buffalo, has not received "Memoir and Poems of Mrs. Scott." Will you please see to it and send them early?

THE SERMON.—The "Star in the West," (usually so regular,) containing the Occasional Sermon, failed to reach us; so were compelled to wait one week longer, and copy from our Eastern papers. This is our apology for the delay.

DEATHS.

In East Mendon, on Sept. 28th, Mr. SAMUEL A. STEVENS, aged 34 years. He had been gradually wasting away for nearly two years with that most flattering yet surely destructive disease, the consumption. During the whole time he manifested the true resignation of a confiding Christian. He had lived respected by all—lived and enjoyed the Christian faith, and died under the resigning power of a hope of a reunion of a renovated universe in heaven. The writer enjoyed an intimate acquaintance with the deceased for more than three years, and he can say that his many excellent virtues, and deeds of kindness and generosity will long be remembered in tears of sympathy and gratitude. I could drop a tear of sympathy for that bereaved, kind, and tender hearted widow, and all the relatives of the deceased, and pray that God of his infinite mercy would suitably bless them with the consolation of the Gospel, in this season of deep affliction. It was the particular request of the subject of this notice, that the writer should preach his funeral discourse, but being on a journey to the West at that time, he was prevented from complying. His funeral was attended in Mendon on the 30th, and a discourse delivered by a Methodist clergyman to a large and sympathizing audience.

PROSPECTUS

For the Fifteenth Volume of the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate.

Rev. H. B. Soule, Editor;

Revs. A. B. Grosh, A. C. Barry, S. R. Smith, D. Skinner, Corresponding Editors.

THIS old and useful periodical will be continued as here tofore, with the above changes in its Editorial Department; and a change to the CASH, or ADVANCE-PAY system. The principal Editor by becoming Corresponding Editor, secures to our columns the regular and continued productions of his pen. The Editor engaged in his stead is as prudent and talented, if not experienced; and will serve while he remains in this city. Should he remove, another, as well qualified, and entitled to public confidence, will be secured. The other Editors are too well known to need our commendations; and the engagement of Mrs. Smith and Skinner will, we hope, be taken as an earnest that we mean to endeavor deserving what we ask—the support of a liberal public.

We intend to test the substantiality of our patronage, by placing the Magazine and Advocate on the CASH system. Every paper sent out after the present volume, must be paid for in advance—and will be sent only as long as it is thus paid for. This plan is best for both subscribers and publishers, if both will unite in it. To subscribers, who will save the enhanced price, which now goes toward making up the loss on bad subscribers—and to publishers, who can then purchase for cash, and of course at a cheaper rate; and who will no longer lose what even the enhanced price does not make up. To both it will save the necessity—the disgusting and painful necessity—of writing and reading duns, complaints, and coaxing entreaties to delinquents, &c., &c.; which, on the credit system must always lumber our columns to the injury of the paper's credit and usefulness. Will our subscribers, one and all—for there can be no exceptions—support us in this mutually advantageous system? If so, let every one pay for next year before January next—in time for us to receive the money and enter them on our list before the first number of the new volume is issued. Those who send by mail, can remit a one or two dollar bill, (the Post Master will frank it, of course, if properly requested,) and we will send papers till the money is exhausted.

Our principles are the same as ever—Universalism in word and in deed—in theory and in practice—in heart, and soul, and daily conversation—in life and in death—now and forever! And every rational and proper means to bring its believers to the full adoption of this sentiment—to build them up, and make them “a peculiar people, zealous of good works”—and to bring our opposers to a knowledge and practice of the truth; will be mildly, but earnestly and constantly advocated by this paper, so as to render it increasingly worthy of a liberal support from liberal Christians generally, and from true-hearted, devoted Universalists especially.

TERMS.

The Magazine and Advocate is published every Friday, on a royal sheet, quarto form, for binding, at $1.50 per annum, invariably in advance.

Any person sending us the names of six subscribers, and paying for the same ($9.00), free of postage, shall receive a copy gratis. Eleven copies will be sent for fourteen dollars, and fifteen copies for twenty dollars.

All communications to the Publishers or Editors, must be POST PAID OR FREE. Postmasters will usually frank remittances.

Names of new subscribers should be returned by the first of January, 1844, or as soon thereafter as possible, to the Publishers. The names, with their post office, county, and State, should be written plainly and in full. Utica, N. Y., November, 1843.

NEW WORLD.

Every present subscriber to the New World, who will renew his subscription for the coming year, by the payment of $3 (free of postage) before the first of January ensuing, and every non-subscriber who will do the same, shall receive, gratis, the elegant and complete New World edition of the “Mysteries of Paris,” now in course of publication. This is beyond question the most remarkable romance of the age, and has caused an immense sensation. We hope our friends will avail themselves speedily of this offer.

The ensuing volume of the New World will be printed on entirely new type, and will contain many attractive novelties, which will be made known in a future paper.

Address, J. Winchester, 30 Ann street, N. Y.

POEMS.

BY MRS. JULIA H. SCOTT, AND A MEMOIR OF THE AUTHOR.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

WITH A PORTRAIT.

THE subscriber proposes to issue during the month of October, a collection of the Poems of Mrs. Scott, to be accompanied by a brief Memoir, and embellished with a fine mezzotint likeness—These Poems are so highly appreciated by the Universalist denomination, that it is believed this volume will meet with a cordial welcome; and from the circumstances attending its publication, as well as from the real excellence of its contents, it is hoped there will be a warm and general interest felt in its circulation.

The Publisher would state, therefore, that upon every copy sold a certain per centage will be devoted to the surviving child of Mrs. Scott, to be expended in her education; and this in fulfilment of her dying wishes. The Publisher, therefore, confidently appeals to the liberality of the Public; and there is a stronger appeal from a voice now silent, which should strike home to their holiest sympathies.

This collection has been long and repeatedly called for—promises of patronage have been liberally given; let those promises now be nobly redeemed, both as a tribute of respect and affection to the lamented Author, and as an evidence of honorable consideration for the literature of our denomination.

The work will contain 216 pages, well printed and neatly bound, with a splendid mezzotint likeness of Mrs. Scott by Sartain, single copies 63 cents, 6 copies for $3.

If more convenient the work can be obtained wholesale or retail, of Rev. A. R. Gardner, Iowa City, I. T.; Rev. W. E. Manley, Chicago, Ill.; Rev. J. A. Gurley, Cincinnati, O.; Rev. A. Case, Charleston, S. C.; R. T. Wicker, Richmond, Va.; C. L. Stickney, New-York City; Grosh & Walker, Utica, N. Y.; Rev. S. R. Smith, Buffalo, N. Y.; H. Barrett, Rochester, N. Y.; Rev. Eli Ballou, Montpelier, Vt.; Rev. J. E. Palmer, Barre, Vt.; Powers & Bagley, Lowell, Mass.; T. Whittemore, Boston, or of the Publisher, Boston, Sept. 25, 1843. A. TOMPKINS, 35 Cornhill.

THE WEDDING RING.

BY JOHN MILLS—author of “The Old English Gentleman.”

“For where thou art, there is the world itself,
With every several pleasure in the world;
And where thou art not, desolation.”

Harry Wington, an independent gentleman with the neat income of two thousand a year, had, a few months since, entered the holy bonds of connubial bliss.

In opposition to the general custom of grumbling humanity, he was on unobjectionable terms with his wife, himself, and the world. Notwithstanding the philosophy of others, he could not perceive any consolation to be derived from contemplating existence as a scene in which little else than acts of annoyance and misery were to cease, merely to make room for new ones; but, contrary to the illustrated examples of unsocial life, he regarded the present as the time to be enjoyed, the past with no regret, the future without fear.

An elegant cottage, as it was called, in the centre of Devonshire, with beautiful grounds attached, and no inquisitive neighbor nearer than the vicarage, quite half a mile distant, was the enviable spot selected for the earthly paradise of Mr. and Mrs. Wington.

It was the first of September, a day enthusiastically anticipated by sportsmen, when a loud, gruff voice, from under the window of Harry's dormitory thus saluted him—

“Now, sir, it's time to be stirring. Down, Ponto, you're a troublesome brute! Now then, sir, come to heel lass! come to heel, I say!”

Waking from his slumbers, Harry threw open the casement. Upon the green lawn, in a picturesque group, stood his gamekeeper, John Flap, and a brace of—as he would maintain—the best pointers in the whole country round. They'd find, back and drop, against any that ever were or ever would be.

“It's just four, sir,” said John, respectfully touching his hat to his master's emerged head. “To bag ten brace before breakfast you musn't be long in turning out.”

In a very limited period the shooting gear was arranged, and the impatient biped and quadrupeds were joined by their no less eager master—all equally desirous for the sport.

Not five minutes elapsed after Harry's departure, when Mrs. Wington's pleasant dream was rudely broken by the sharp crack of one of Manton's best. Quickly surmising the cause, she proceeded to the window, and saw her husband covered to his knees with the luxuriant green tops of turnips, caressing one of his favorite dogs.

With a fine, hearty laugh, which indicates no thoughts of duns, promissary notes, actions, or chancery suits, Harry kissed his hand to his smiling wife, and after holding up a partridge in triumph of his skill, he vanished behind a haystack followed by the gamekeeper and pointers.

Nature was waking from repose—the sun's rays were bursting upon the dewy verdure, like Hope's bright hue upon the clouded heart. The flowers unclasped their leaves to the cheerful light with cups charged to the brim with crystal drops. The air rang with the song of birds, and as Ida Wington continued to look upon the beautiful scene with smiles—

"Which went and came, and disappeared, Like glancing sunbeams on the dimpled water shaded by trees," she thought how delightful it was to have so handsome, good-tempered, and excellent a husband as she was possessed of. Hours passed with unconscious swiftness to Ida, so engaged was she with her no uncommon reverie, when a rap-a-tap at her chamber door occasioned her to start, and hastily ask who was there?

"Who is there, indeed!" repeated a voice from the outside. "It is past eight. Breakfast, breakfast, I say!"

"I'm coming, forsooth—I'm waiting for you!" rejoined the voice.

Before knowing the value of a parent's smile, Ida was an orphan, and left to the sole care of an only aunt. With a mother's tenderness she had reared her, petted, but not spoiled her niece, and deemed herself fully rewarded by seeing her favorite a beautiful, accomplished woman, and the wife of one whose study it was to render her happy. Upon Ida's marriage, Harry requested that the kind-hearted old lady would reside with them and form a member of his family circle. This was the acme of her wishes; and thus matters stood a short time after that eventful epoch in the lives of parties concerned, the wedding day.

The morning toilet completed, Ida hastened to the breakfast parlor, where she found her aunt impatiently waiting for the dejeune.

"My love, you look—a little too sweet, some more of the milk, thank you, child—pale this morning, I think," said the antiquated dame in her usual broken sentences.

"I am quite well, aunt," replied Mrs. Wington.

"I am glad to hear that you are, my child, but you certainly are—a piece of dry toast—somewhat languid. Where is the scapegrace Harry?"

"How forgetful you are, aunt! Why, this is the first of September," said Ida.

"Ah! shooting then, of course. Married men should not indulge often in such amusements. Frequently do we hear of guns bursting; and—a little of that tongue—exploding accidentally," rejoined the aunt.

A follower of the illustrious Arab, Mahomet, exclaims, when the shades of sorrow are cast upon his path, "Tis my destiny!" Whether this creed be founded on a semblance of truth, or the gravity of a bubble lighter than air, it shall form no argument for this page. All to be here stated is the simple fact, whether fate winged the shaft or not is immaterial, that, while Ida was dropping a piece of sugar into a cup of coffee, her wedding ring slipped from her taper finger into the saucer.

"Heaven preserve us—Heaven preserve us!" ejaculated the aunt. "It's a fearful circumstance. Direful—"

"What is the matter?" said Ida, springing from her chair.

"The ring, the ring!" murmured the aunt, burying her face in her handkerchief.

"Here it is," replied her niece, replacing the magic hoop upon her finger.

"Child, child! it's an awful sign!"

"Of what, aunt?"

"Accident or misfortune of some kind, for 'tis said—"

Ere the sun be set, sorrow will rise, when from a bride the ring doth fall," replied the aunt, with a melancholy anticipation of evil.

A merry laugh burst from Ida's lips, and she turned the object of discussion derisively round upon the end of her finger, when her aunt's anger was somewhat excited at this expressed contempt for the prophecy, and she sharply continued, "You may ridicule anything, child; but recollect many loud laughs have changed into bitter tears."

"Why do you wish to frighten me?" asked Ida, in a tone of remonstrance.

"I've no wish to alarm you but I much disapprove of levity upon occasions requiring seriousness," replied the aunt.

"I can not believe in such obsolete things—they are so very silly," said Ida, with an ill-suppressed smile.

"So it appears, my dear; but I do believe in them," added the aunt.

"Then tell me the reason for so doing," said her niece.

"My reasons are countless. Circumstances admitting of no doubt have been related to me by dozens," rejoined the old lady.

Not convinced that hearsay evidence was to be deemed conclusive, Ida inquired if her aunt had ever witnessed an illustration of this to be dreaded fatality.

"Bless me! you talk like a lawyer! I once heard at the ling that a neighbor had told him of something which had assizes, who would not permit an honest man to say what he heard!"

"Indeed!" exclaimed Ida, with pretended gravity.

"It's quite true, my love. The man was about positively been related to a very particular acquaintance of his, when the inconsistent lawyer jumped up and said, 'That's no evidence; tell us what you saw, sir, not what you heard.' Goodness me! as if one couldn't be told the truth," said the aunt, quite indignant at the reminiscence.

"We certainly should not give too much credence to what we're told," replied Ida; "circumstances are so exaggerated, altered, and purposely misconstrued."

"Yes, yes, that is perfectly true; but people nowadays disbelieve every thing; it was not so when I was a girl—warnings, signs, omens and dreams were regarded with proper observance. Now it is thought fashionable to laugh at them; although, for my part, I think persons who laugh at superstition are as full of it as those who admit its influence."

"We are all, more or less, prone to be superstitious, I believe," said Ida. "But tell me about the ring. I wish to hear of some mishap following the luckless fall from the wearer of this public sign of matrimony."

"Listen, child; and I'll narrate to you one which I know to be true, although I did not see the occurrence," rejoined the aunt, with another shake of the wig.

"It was a rough day in March, and two years after the union of a very dear friend of mine, that her husband was dressed for hunting. Oh! that dangerous, reckless amusement! Being late, he was hastening to depart, and; in his hurry to bid her adieu, he snatched her hand quickly, and drew off her wedding ring, which rolled upon the floor. This circumstance was unnoticed at the time, and he proceeded to the door, where his patient horse stood pawing the ground; held by a groom. Just as he was going to mount, the cries of the hounds in full chase were heard. No sooner were the well-known sounds caught by the high-spirited animal, than he reared upon his haunches straight in the air, bounded from one side of the road to the other, and became completely ungovernable from excitement and eagerness to join in the sport. After many useless attempts to gain the saddle, his master, angry at not being able to start, threw himself passionately across the horse, and gained one foot in a stirrup; when accidentally a spur struck deep in the side of the restless animal. Furious with pain, he snapped his bridle, jumped from the earth with a sudden bound, and hurled the groom far from him. Away he rushed down the avenue with his rider half on, clinging to his mane. A high gate was closed at the end of the avenue, towards which the horse gal-lopped with fearful speed. The creature neared the barrier, and leaped at it without hesitation, but dashing against the top rail, he fell with desperate force, carrying his ill-fated master with him.

"My poor friend saw the accident with feelings that may be conceived, but not described. For many hours she was unconscious of the extent of her lamentable misfortune. Upon recovering from her swoon, she found her husband stretched upon a bed a ghastly figure. A surgeon was watching him with fingers pressed upon the fluttering pulse; bandages stained with blood were wrapped round his head; his cheeks were ashy pale; his lips livid and clenched together. A slight moan escaped them occasionally, which were the only remaining signs of life. In one short hour more, from being as happy a wife as ever the sun shone upon, my poor friend was a heart-broken widow."

Tears rolled from the old lady's eyes as she concluded her brief, but melancholy narrative.

"No wonder that you believe in the omen of the ring," sobbed Ida. "My poor, dear Harry! oh! what will happen him?"

"Nothing, I hope and pray, my love. Do not weep," entreated her aunt. "It was very foolish of me to tell you this story—very wrong, indeed; but it was want of reflection; I'm a silly old woman. There, there, don't cry, child."

A loud crash of thunder at this moment occasioned both to start. Flash after flash of lightning succeeded, and a few large drops of rain splashed at intervals against the windows. Suddenly, one deafening roar pealed over head, reverberating over the hills miles distant, and a deluge of water fell, making the earth appear involved in smoke. Roll after roll of the warning elements followed, and the heavy clouds floated slowly on spouting forth their overcharged contents.—The heavens grew momentarily blacker, and the storm increased in its violence.

Peering through the wet streaked panes, Ida watched, with fear depicted in her trembling limbs, the raging storm. Generally without the common nervousness of her sex, Ida now paced the room with hurried step, clasping her hands and lost to all control of feeling. Her aunt endeavored to calm her excitement, but without success. The narration of the event of the ring, and the violence of the storm, had produced an effect not easily erased.

As she was walking with haste up and down the apartment, anticipating evil of every kind that her heated imagination could form, she stood before the window speechless with emotion, at seeing the gamekeeper running towards the house. On he came, but his master neither preceded nor followed him. Ida beckoned to her aunt, and pointing to the hurrying man, rushed out of the house to meet him, regardless of the pouring torrents.

"Tell me," she gasped, clutching John by the arm, and stopping him in his course.

"My lady, my master is—" John could say no more.

"Quick, quick," she rejoined, in a voice hollow with dread.

"My master is in bed quite—" again John's breath was quite expended.

Looking as one about to hear the judgment of death, Ida murmured "What?"

"Wet through!" replied the gamekeeper, in amazement at the expressed agony of his mistress and her extraordinary determination to become, in a like situation. "He's in bed, wet through," continued John, "in my cottage, and he wants a change of clothes."

Years have swept away since Ida's wedding ring fell. Sorrow has not traced a single furrow upon her brow, if time has left the print of days gone by upon it. May my fair reader's be a similar destiny—a happy and contented wife.

A SERMON.

"Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." St. Matthew iv: 4.

The great and fundamental doctrine of revelation, that there is a supreme being who rules and governs in all worlds and among all intelligences, can not be well disputed by a truly enlightened mind. This, above every thing else, appears to be a necessary article in the belief of mankind, and it must be exceeding difficult to throw off every conception of a wise and beneficent Creator. Every effect must have a cause; and as all the operations of the material universe are the effects of some moving cause, it follows as a legitimate, yea an incontrovertible conclusion, that this cause must be distinct and separate from the effect produced.—The Bible affirms that this cause is God; and a more forcible and philosophical solution of this great subject can not be imagined.

As man is the effect of the operations of God's power, wisdom and goodness, it is reasonable to suppose that the Creator exercises a supreme control over this noblest work of his hands. Hence, it is by God's permission that man exists—it is by his word that he lives, and moves, and has his being. Whether the Deity in the creation of man, made such wise arrangements at that time as should insure him a constant support, or whether he continually exercises a providential care over his offspring, makes no manner of difference. One thing is certain. Man is the effect of some living, moving power—for it must take life to produce life—and whatever and whoever that power is, the creature, the effect must depend upon that power for existence and support. The language of our text was spoken by the Saviour to Satan in the wilderness. The tempter had requested him to prove the divine authenticity of his mission, by commanding the numerous stones about him to be transformed into bread. Jesus replied, "It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God."

Some may be ready to inquire, who, or what was this object with which the Redeemer conversed. It appears to be the opinion of many, that the personage with whom the Son of God held converse at this time was a personal being, who was once an angel of light, but who revolted from the government of the supreme majesty of heaven, involved the celestial abodes in war, collision and strife, but was overcome by the power of the Almighty, driven out of heaven, (where no unclean thing can ever enter) and with his rebellious companions cast down from the high battlements above to the fiery depths beneath, there to suffer the fierce indignation and wrath of the Deity "world without end." But notwithstanding Satan had been secured in the regions of immortal darkness, it is not long before we find him engaged in the work of tempting our first parents. In some way or other, he had contrived to escape from his uncomfortable abode, and to revenge himself for exclusion from the courts of bliss, he attempted to ruin the fairest workmanship of God: and as through his exertions Adam was tempted, and as Christ was the second Adam, it was thought proper that he should be tempted, and thus save us from the penalty of the law which our first parents incurred. This tempter is called the devil, and the chapter which contains the text is often quoted as triumphant proof that he is actually a personal being, and that he prowls about the earth seeking the ruin of God's offspring.

But it is our candid opinion, that an individual will find more proof in Milton's Pandemonium for the personal existence of a being called Satan, than he will in the Bible; and we furthermore think, that a far-fetched and forced construction is given to the chapter which embraces the text, when it is urged as proof of the existence of a personal devil. We say, a forced construction, because we think it an unnecessary one, opposed to the Scriptures and the rules of the divine government. The original word, rendered Satan in our common version, signifies an accuser, an adversary, &c. Hence Peter is called Satan, and Judas is declared to have a devil—because they opposed Christ. In accordance with this usage of the word, which was sanctioned by public custom when Jesus appeared, sin is represented as an opposing power; and to convey to the mind a more forcible and tangible conception of its malignity, a personification is given to it; the same as wisdom is personified in Proverbs, and is represented as uttering her voice in the streets to the children of men. I think the language of the apostle will set this matter in its true light. He informs us, that Jesus "was tempted in all points as we are, yet without sin." Now if we know how we are tempted, we can easily imagine how the Saviour was tempted. Hear the language of James on this point. "Let no man say, when he is tempted, I am tempted of God; for God can not be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man. But every man is tempted when he is drawn away by his own lust, and enticed." Jesus Christ was a man, endowed with superior powers above his fellows, and sustained by his Father; yet like all our race, he was liable to be tempted! And a wise purpose was to be accomplished by it; it was a purpose which should create in him a disposition to sympathize with man, and by an all-powerful example show him the great value of virtue.

I suppose that the temptation in the wilderness, consisted in the earthly honor and glory which awaited the Saviour if he would forsake the work which God sent him to accomplish. He doubtless knew that the crown of Judea could be his if he would exert his delegated power to free the Jewish nation from the bondage of the Roman yoke. All the honors and glories of the Holy Land could be his, if he would only fall down from the height of pure and uncorrupted integrity, and worship at the shrine of a nation's darling wish. But this was not the purpose of Almighty God—this was not the work which Jesus was sent to finish. The days of the Jewish peculiarity were numbered, the glory of Jerusalem was about to depart forever, and the mountain of the Lord's house was soon to become as the high places of the forest; and in the place of these a more universal religion was to arise, a better and more enduring kingdom was to take its place, and a more extensive and lasting temple was to be erected. Hence, we say, it was necessary that Christ should be tempted, as his brethren were tempted, and that the subjects of his reign might see the power, and beauty, and majesty of true holiness.

We have dwelt longer on this point, perhaps, than was necessary for one that ought to appear so plain to the most common understanding. But some good people imagine, that Universalists are very much troubled on account of his satanic majesty—that they have no place for him in their system, and labor to disprove the personality of his existence. Be it known then to all concerned, that we have no fears that an all-wise, an all-powerful, and an all-good Deity has ever granted a power to an enemy to overturn his own purposes and designs. We have the rich consolation of believing, by and with the authority of the word of the most High, that the old serpent, with all his attendant train, will be ultimately destroyed, and no longer tempt the children of God. "For this purpose was the Son of God manifested, that through death, he might destroy death, and him that hath the power of death, that is the devil, and deliver those who through fear of death, were all their life time subject to bondage." Hence, whoever, and whatever this devil is, one thing is very certain, a time is coming in the wise purpose of God, when he will meet with sure and remediless destruction, and no more disturb the peace and happiness of the children of men.

"Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." This passage suggests to us several doctrinal reflections, and many practical inferences may be drawn from it. We learn first, that the word of God produces and sustains life. Hence the spiritual life of man is supported, and kept in some degree of exercise, by not only the rewards of virtue, but also by the judgments which are inflicted by God for his wickedness. They both aim to produce the same end, differing only in their manifestations. The reward of virtue is conferred by goodness, and the divine judgments are inflicted from the same principle; and they both seek the life of the receiver. This is evident from the language of the text. "Man shall not live by bread alone but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." The reward of the upright man cometh from our heavenly Father, and the retribution of the transgressor springs from the same source—they are both administered by the same parental and benevolent hand, and both seek to accomplish the same end, viz. life.

I wish to present an idea here, which has struck my own mind very forcibly, and which if correct proves fatal to a long cherished dogma in theology. I refer to the doctrine of the eternity of misery, which is generally denominated eternal or endless death. Now if it be true, that man "lives by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God," can it be possible for eternal death to produce life? and do not those persons who contend that this doctrine is the word of God, show conclusively that every word which proceedeth out of the mouth of Deity does not produce life, and thus virtually falsify the testimony of the Son of God? Hence we may rest assured, that the dogma of endless death was never uttered by the wise King of heaven; for his word, in every case tends to produce and sustain life, while death, considered as an end in the divine government, can never produce the life which the word of Jehovah is said to produce. Consequently the language of the text forever strikes a fatal blow at the very root of the doctrine of eternal death. Man receives life from God's word, and as eternal death can never produce or secure eternal life to the believer, we may be satisfied that it is not of divine authority, is not the word of God, and consequently has no life in it.

"Man shall not live by bread alone; that is there is something besides mere animal life to be sustained—something else that requires nutriment, and which will not be satisfied with that food which is administered to support the life and strength of the body. Before man was ushered through the portals of creation, the word went forth, "Let us make man in our own image." Now what is this image? It can not be this earthly body, for this bears no likeness to the divine nature—it is like the rest of the animal creation, earthly, and exposed to dissolution. Man, considered with reference merely to his physical system, differs not from the brute creation; and all that prevents him from running like them to excess, is owing to an intellect with which he has been endowed, and which governs in a greater or less degree his animal propensities, and this constitutes him superior to the brute creation.

In order then for man to be the image of the divine nature, it is necessary that he possess some of those traits of character which distinguish the Deity, and which make him infinitely superior to all other beings. And this we find to be the case. Man has a spiritual nature—a like nature to the divine—though in an infinitely less degree. Man is gifted with goodness, wisdom, power, compassion, and justice; and the strength and manifestation of these principles depend upon the degree of exercise which is given them; and these several principles, and others which are connected with them, constitute man the image of God. It may be asked, if all men, without exception, bear this image? I answer unhesitatingly, yes. Even among the most abandoned of our race—among those whose whole life has been given to crime, and who have been stained with the most degrading moral pollution, you will find some exhibitions of that original nature which God conferred upon them. All men, in some circumstances, will exhibit benevolence, wisdom, power and compassion; and the frequency of these exhibitions, and their power over the animal nature of man, will depend upon the degree of exercise given to these divine principles, and the light which man as a spiritual being, enjoys. But let it be faithfully remembered, that man, even in his most degraded state, possesses principles at the very foundation of his nature which make him the image of the infinite God. If these principles did not exist—if man had no nature like the divine, then Deity could not be consistently styled the Father of all intelligent beings; any more than he could be styled the father of the brute creation.—The connexion must be a spiritual one—one which gives the relation between the parent and the child, and which shows at once the origin and destiny of the moral creation.

Hence, as man possesses a like nature to God, and as he is sustained and controlled by him, so this spiritual nature, which makes him the image of the Supreme Being, must be supported, and kept in existence by the word of the Almighty. This word is either revealed to him in nature, or a revelation is given and adapted to his wants. Those who have the light of revelation combined with that of nature, are more apt to exhibit clearer manifestations of their spiritual connexion with the Supreme Divinity, and show forth more plainly that they were made in the image of God. Those who have only the light of nature to guide them, are more liable to wander from the fountain head, and to hew out to themselves broken cisterns that can hold no water. But still the image, the spiritual nature is there; and when the light of divine truth shall dawn upon, and reveal to it all the supernal loveliness, and beauty, and majesty of God's character, then indeed will man know and feel, that he "shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God."—He will then realize, and recognize the high and holy connexion which exists between all above and all below, and which binds all to the throne of the everlasting God. And when he sees and feels this sublime and glorious truth in all its fulness, and properly appreciates its high and holy bearings, then will he know that his beneficent Parent will never doom his own image to the fires of almighty wrath and unending perdition.

And, my beloved brethren, do we properly realize and appreciate the holy and tender connexion which exists between God the Father and us his children? Do we feel the great truth acting upon our souls, that it is not by bread alone we live, "but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God?" Did you ever sit yourselves down in holy and quiet meditation, and reflect upon the great, and all-absorbing, and all-important truth that God is our Father; and not ours only but also the Father of the spirits of all flesh? That you as children of the Most High are partakers of the divine nature, and as such are necessarily connected with the highest order of intelligences that surround the everlasting throne? If these things have ever occupied your attention, I beseech you to cherish them, to reflect upon them, and to behold the duties which devolve upon you as the offspring of an all-wise and immutable Parent. We can not too often meditate upon this subject. We can not too frequently take up our Bibles, the word of God, and read the melting descriptions which are therein given of the tender care, solicitude, and love of our common Father. No! this can not be done too often; and with this great truth pervading the mind, we may safely defy the power of all man-made systems, and even in the dark hour of sorrow and adversity, when the tempests of affliction beat upon the soul, and threaten to overwhelm this frail tabernacle, even then we can know that our Almighty Father watches over us, and sustains the spiritual man by his all-consoling word. O! let me have the great and fundamental doctrine that God is my Father, and I will fear not. Earthly friends may forsake me, the ties of this world's affection may be sundered, riches may take to themselves wings and fly away, cruel poverty in all its hideous forms may assail me, yet I will remember that I have a Friend and a Father on high who doeth all things well, and from seeming evil continually educes good. With this glorious and all-happyfying truth, man may safely defy all the rude assaults of time, and look with confidence to God. There all his hopes can centre, and there he can behold goodness that is boundless and changeless, wisdom that never errs, power that knows no resistance, mercy that never faileth, and justice that knows no partiality nor revenge.

And let us, my beloved brethren, remember that we are the children of this great and good Being—that we are bound to him, and he is bound to us by a holy and indissoluble tie—that we have been created in his image—that we have received a portion of the divine nature, and are in very deed the offspring of God by creation, by a kindred nature, by preservation, and by redemption. Let us remember, that in whatever condition in life we may be placed, we live by the word of God—that the spiritual man is a bright emanation from him, is sustained by him, and preserved by him. "With Christianity, the child of God and the friend of man before us," let us go on to perfection, leaving behind us the old antiquated rubbish of earthly wisdom, and press forward through life and forever in pursuit of heavenly treasures. With the effulgent rays of a glorious and god-like faith beaming brightly upon us, let us ever conduct as children of an infinitely wise and holy Father, and as beings born to a glorious destiny. And above all, let us remember, that we bear the image of the Lord God Omnipotent—that the seal of Jehovah's divinity is stamped upon us, and that we wear the "royal signet" which marks us and all intelligences as children of him "who sitteth upon the circle of the heavens," and who holds the reins of universal empire, and who guides, directs, and conducts all to one glorious, happy and everlasting home. O! my brethren, let us remember these things; and let this soul-cheering theme inspire our hearts with gladness, and tune our voices with anthems of praise, and swell our songs, until all shall land on the peaceful shores of immortality, and with angels and archangels, cherubim and seraphim, and with all God's ransomed creation, drink from the pure and boundless ocean of Jehovah's changeless and wasteless love, and forever live by that immutable word which is the life of every soul. Amen.

LOVE AND IMMORTALITY.

Welcome change, that waits to begin our happiness, and put a period to our complaints and pains. When this languor and lukewarmness shall be turned into immortality and love, we shall be all life and vigor, and this vigor shall be all love and praise. Now corruption is a counterbalance to our love, and mortality a clog to our devotion; but then every power shall be life, every faculty active, every thought winged, and every motion heavenly. We shall praise with transport, and sing with rapture; we shall adore with ecstasy, and love with delight, and all this, day and night, without ever ceasing, or being exhausted, being then perfect in every grace, and immortal in every power. Receiving our fulness from the divine plenitude, as a pipe supplied by the vast ocean, we shall pour out perpetual streams of praise, and torrents of love, and be more and more capacitated, enlarged, and replenished, by this eternal employment. Such is the happy state, which the Universalist's belief and hopes claim, and to which, some time or other, we all shall attain. Such was St. Paul's belief, when he said, "For as in Adam all die, even so (in like manner) in Christ shall all be made alive." "It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption; it is sown in dishonor; it is raised in glory. It is sown in weakness; it is raised in power. It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly," etc. Such language I find on almost every page of my Bible, (which is purely a Universal one.) When this takes place, then shall our love be wholly a vigorous immortality, and our immortality exercised in nothing but love.—On the Sun of Righteousness, divinely bright, transcendently glorious, we shall fix our eyes, which shall be strengthened as they gaze, and never cease to behold and admire the divine object. We shall emulate the seraphim, and strive, not out of self-conceit, but from the glowings of sacred gratitude, the prevalence of divine love in our breasts, to sing as loud, and love as intensely as they, the exalted ones, whom we can call our Redeemer, our Resurrection, and our God. We shall go out, in all the faculties of our spirits to Him, without one moment's interruption; and yet our eyes shall never be so satisfied with seeing, as to shut them on the glories above, nor our ears fatigued with hearing the hallelujahs on high. Sleep shall be as foreign to our immortal perfections then, as it is impossible for our mortal frames to subsist without nourishment. There is no comma in the hosanna above; no night in the years of the better land of the most High. No distractions shall disturb the vast family of redeemed man, when in the presence of God, where perfect love casts out fear, where bliss is as boundless as our desires, and measures with eternity itself.

BR. R. W. CHENEY—REPARATION.

The readers of this paper will recollect that a few weeks since I made a call for "information" concerning the whereabouts, circumstances, and occupation of the above individual, on account of a demand I held against him, having written a number of times to him in different places, where I heard he was, without receiving any answer. Br. C., has lately written informing me that he had never received (previous to that notice) either of the letters I had addressed him, having left Tompkins county for a visit to Vermont previous to my last letter being sent, acknowledging his indebtedness and promising payment. He says he could pay at once if the people where he has preached would pay him what they agreed to; "for yet," he adds, "I never received that in my life." Now the question occurs, are not individuals and societies who engage a minister to preach for them, agreeing to pay a stipulated sum or salary, and then refuse or neglect to pay him, guilty, both before God and man, of dishonesty? Are they not as criminal as if they employed a man to till their farms and refused to pay him his wages? And if their minister fails to meet his pecuniary engagements in consequence, are not they the cause of his failure and morally, if not legally accountable therefor? It is true, ministers ought not to contract debts unless morally certain of being able to pay; but this fact does not lessen the guilt of those who agree, and then refuse, to pay their public servants. I exonerate Br. C. from all blame for not answering letters which he never received, and trust that hereafter societies will fulfil their engagements with him; that so he may discharge his engagements to me, and all others to whom he may be indebted, and thus "owe no man any thing to love one another." D. SKINNER.

EXPOSITION.

"For it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell: and having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things unto himself, by him I say, whether they be things in earth or things in heaven." Col. i: 19, 20.

We have here in this portion of the Scriptures, an unanswerable argument in favor of the doctrine of universal salvation, so clear that every one can see it, whose mind is freed from prejudice. We will divide the texts under different heads, to comment upon them.

1. Who is it, in whom it pleased the Father that all fulness should dwell? We answer, in Jesus of Nazareth, the Son of God, and the Saviour of mankind, to redeem and regenerate a fallen race. He is the Messiah, therefore, spoken of by the ancient prophets. The mediator between God and man, the propitiation for the sins of the whole world.

2. What is meant by "in him should all fulness dwell?" We answer, as the representative of God, entrusted to perform a mighty work, Christ was clothed with many of the attributes of Deity, in a high degree—therefore he was called "the power of God, and the wisdom of God." 1 Cor. i: 24. And he says, "all power is given me in heaven and earth." Matt. xxviii: 18. With wisdom to devise, and power to execute, omnipotent in themselves, the Son of God was fully prepared to perform the great work of saving the world from sin, corruption and death. No one should doubt the Saviour's ability to perform his Father's will, which is, that all men shall be saved. See 1 Tim. ii: 4.

3. What is meant by "all things in earth or things in heaven?" By this we understand, all intelligent creatures. Mankind, are here represented by this mode of speech—and in favor of this, we have the opinion of the learned Archbishop Newcome, and Professor Stuart.—Nothing else, though, from the phraseology of the text, could be meant. Persons—intelligent creatures, must be those who are to be reconciled—and these are all mankind, as a whole.

4. What is this work, which Christ has to do, called in the text, "to reconcile all things?" We answer—"to reconcile all things," means to save, regenerate, and redeem all God's offspring—all and every one of the descendants of Adam. Man is represented in the Scriptures, as being at enmity with his Creator, his God, not that God is at enmity with him. Christ was sent to render all mankind reconciled to God—to save them from sin and from error—to make them holy, and, consequently, happy. But this can not be effected this side of eternity. Vast multitudes of the human family go down to their graves, irreconciled, and even without a knowledge of Christ, or of the word of God; but the work of Christ must be accomplished. His power must extend beyond the confines of the grave—and as he is to conquer death, his victory must and will be so universal as to save and redeem the whole of the intelligent creatures whom God has made and placed upon this earth.

We therefore draw from this part of the word of God, the cheering intelligence, that our heavenly Father invested his Son with all power and wisdom sufficient to redeem and save every creature of the human family—and with this evidence before us, who can doubt that this purpose of God will be accomplished? Infinite power and infinite wisdom, can not be thwarted. There is nothing that can prevent the performance of this work, on the part of the Great Captain of our Salvation!—Warrior.

PROCLAMATION,

BY WM. C. BOUCK, GOVERNOR OF THE STATE OF NEW-YORK.

In obedience to that high sense of gratitude, due the Almighty Ruler of the Universe, I do hereby designate THURSDAY, the 14th day of December next, to be observed by the people of this State as a day of PRAYER, PRAISE and THANKSGIVING to ALMIGHTY GOD, for the numerous and unmerited blessings of the year.

I feel assured that this act of public duty is in accordance with the wishes of the People, and will meet with universal acquiescence.

As a People, we have great reason to be thankful, and to praise the Almighty Dispenser of all good, for the continued smiles of His providence on our State and Nation.

During the past year, we have been permitted to enjoy our religious and political privileges unmo- lested. We have been exempt from those ravages of malignant disease which sometimes afflict a people. The season has been highly propitious, and seldom has the harvest been more abundant. As a crowning blessing, the Spirit of the Lord has revived the hearts of Christians, and brought to a saving knowledge many who knew not God.

For the distinguished blessings we have enjoyed, we should raise our hearts in humble adoration to our Father in Heaven: thereby presenting to the world the imposing spectacle of the entire population of a great State, abstaining from all secular engagements on the day designated, and devoting themselves to the service of the Almighty. We should always remember that "righteousness exalteth a nation."

Given under my hand, and the privy seal of the State, at the city of Albany, this tenth day [L. s.] of Nov., in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-three.

WILLIAM C. BOUCK.

A HEBREW WEDDING.

A Hebrew Wedding took place at the Synagogue, in New York, on Wednesday. The ceremonies, as usual on such occasions, were very impressive. A long recitative in Hebrew was chanted by the priest from the altar, after which a canopy, 120 years old, resting on four uprights, was brought out, and held over the heads of the reader and the groom, all wearing their hats. The bride was then brought in by her bridesmaids and family, and closely veiled, took her place also under the canopy. The priest then chanted a prayer, and after that a glass of wine was brought him, which he tasted, and then the bridegroom and bride. The wedding ring was then placed by the groom on the finger of the bride, accompanied by the admission that it was the evidence of their betrothing. The priest then chanted the seven blessings from the prayers, which were appropriate to such an occasion. The wine was again tasted, and after that, the glass in which it was contained was dashed to the ground and broken in pieces. It is done as an emblem of the mortality of our race, and a memento of the destruction of the temple. This ended the ceremony, and the married couple immediately left the synagogue.

The True Sun gives the following account of these ceremonies among the English Jews:

"We understand it is rather an innovation upon the ancient practice, to have these weddings solemnized in their synagogues. Among the English Jews they usually take place at houses of public resort. The London taverns are quite celebrated in this respect. It is usual in England for an engagement to exist for six months or a year before the marriage, and the ceremony of betrothing is one at which there is much rejoicing among friends. A month before the wedding day, there is a circular sent round to the acquaintances of the betrothed, inviting friends to the ceremony. It is also customary there to read the marriage contract under the canopy, (after placing the ring upon the finger,) in which there are very curious stipulations for the benefit of the female, either as a wife or widow. Bands of music are not unfrequently employed at these weddings, and the pieces performed are solemn Jewish melodies. All the guests bring presents proportioned to their means, and such sometimes is the profusion of their liberality, that the amount received is very large.

It must not be forgotten that the Jews always considered marriage as a matter of obligation, and the earlier their young people marry, the more honorable is it in their estimation. There were also some curious customs and laws established by Moses, most of which have fallen into disuse since the final dispersion of their race."

MANKIND are not satisfied with the bitter schools of affliction through which they pass, but rather seem to court the shadowy cloud, to drink still deeper grief.

THE NEW-YORK CHRISTIAN MESSENGER

Enters upon its 13th volume on the 18th of November. Extensive improvements are in contemplation, on the new volume, both as to its matter and appearance, by securing increased talent to its columns, and putting it on new type throughout.

For its general character and standing, reference may be had to its persevering efforts in the cause of Universalism, and the moral elevation of the race, for the last twelve years. As in the past, so in the future, no efforts will be spared to render it one of the best publications in the order—a valuable journal of Religion, Literature—in short, an acceptable Family Paper, either for the established Universalist, or for the inquirer after the truth of the doctrine—and even for the candid opposer, who is disposed to examine both sides of the question. In all its course it aims to be guided by the law of kindness and love, and to say to those who can not unite with it in sentiment—"Come now, and let us reason together."

Its Religious Department will embrace Sermons; Essays, doctrinal and practical; brief Expositions of (supposed) difficult passages of Scripture; the consideration of Objections to Universalism; Denominational Information, &c.

Its Literary Department will embrace interesting Tales, Sketches, Poetry, &c., original and selected, and great pains will be taken that it shall be of a moral and elevating character.

A very interesting Youth's Department is also sustained to which Mrs. C. M. Sawyer, very favorably known in the literary world, has contributed regularly and extensively, for a few years past. A brief record of passing events, Foreign and Domestic, is also given.

Arrangements are in progress for a series of articles of a Commentary, Expository and Literary character, which shall give a greater solidity and permanence to the volume, and render it still more worthy of preservation.

It is proposed, also, to give in the course of the volume, (to commence in the early part,) a highly interesting Historical Tale, entitled, "THE SCOUT; OR THE FAST OF ST. NICHOLAS." To those who had the pleasure of perusing the very interesting Tale—"Eagle of the Mohawks"—inserted in the volume for 1840-1, it need only be stated that the "Scout" is a continuation, or more properly speaking, a Sequel to that work, taking up the narrative and bringing the history down to the succeeding generation, and possessing, if possible, a more thrilling interest than even that admirable work. The story, of itself, is worth half the subscription of the volume. Other interesting Tales, Sketches, Essays, &c., will be given, all combining to render this volume, it is hoped, much superior to any which has ever preceded it.

The general Editorial management will remain under the charge of Mr. Price, who has labored so devotedly at that post for the last twelve years.

To meet the heavy outlays of all these improvements, the Proprietor respectfully, but earnestly asks of the friends of this paper, one and all, early and active efforts for an extension of its circulation. The "hard times" of the past few years has curtailed its list, but there are now more encouraging prospects, in regard to business, and a moderate but general effort will place the paper at once in a favorable condition, and warrant the proposed improvements.—Will each subscriber consider this as addressed to him, personally, and act accordingly? It is hoped, present subscribers will continue, and each try to get an additional one.

The paper is issued in two forms—one, the "Universalist Union," in octavo, making a yearly volume of 832 large closely printed pages, embracing the religious and literary matter of the Messenger, at $2.50—the other, [the Messenger,] in folio or newspaper form, at $2.00 per annum, both in advance.

Specimen numbers may be had on application, by letter, (post paid or free,) or in person, at the Publishing Office, Universalist Book and Paper Establishment, No. 140 Fulton street, (second floor,) New York. Address [post paid or free] "Editor Union and Messenger," or the undersigned, at the above number. C. L. STICKNEY, Proprietor.

TO THE POLAR STAR.

BY MRS. C. M. SAWYER.

Star of the North! I hail the dawn of thine effulgent light,
 Whose steady ray is beaming now in beauty on my sight;
 Thou comest like a friend to me upon this distant shore,
 To tell me of the home I love, but may behold no more!

Bright polar star! thou art the same that, o'er my childhood's home,
 Looked in my young and dreamy eye, ere I had learned to roam.

And here thou gazest on me now, tho' thousand miles away,
 Where, on the Iowa's green shore, a wanderer I stray!

Oh, thou a sacred mission hast, perchance, bright star! for me,
 To waken in my truant heart some dimmed home memory!
 It needeth not!—each voice I love sounds ever in my ear,
 And home, with all its thousand ties, seemed never half so dear!

Shine on! for other eyes than mine are gazing up to thee—Fond eyes that now, I well believe, are dim with tears for me—

Eyes that full often upon mine with deepest love have turned,

'Till their soft, sweet and thrilling gaze far down my deep heart burned!

Shine on! for ancient seers have taught, there are whose gifted eye,
 Can read the deep, mysterious love that's written on the sky;

Whose spirit's gaze, from earthly mist all purified, can trace

Language by others all unseen, oh! star upon thy face!

I do believe the tale, bright star! and on thy page to-night,
 My spirit shall for those I love a tender message write,
 My pen shall be this burning ray, which from thy beams I cull,

Dipp'd in the fountain of my heart, whose tide is ever full!

Oh, thou, whoe'er thou art, to whom she priceless boon is given,

To send thy searching gaze on high and seize the love of heaven,

Read what my spirit now inscribes upon the Northern Star,
 And tell it to the friends that dwell in my loved home afar!

Tell them that though on distant shores with weary foot I stray,

My fond heart, as the magnet true, still turns the homeward way;

That, as the dove which left the ark no resting place obtained,

So will my spirit flutter still till its own home is gained!

Oh, bid them pray for me—those friends—if that I still am
 dear,

Pray, I 'mid strangers may not die and leave my ashes here—

Here, where no sacred kindred dust beside mine own may sleep,

And not a heart I ever loved will o'er me come to weep!

Tell them I hope—may hope avail—my journeyings soon o'er,

With health and gladness on my brow to meet them all once more—

To stand again within my home, beside the sounding main,
 And clasp my treasures to my heart—all, all my own again!

Star of the North! my task is done, and from thy radiant face,

May no dark, envious storm arise my message to efface.

And nightly shall I watch thine orb, if I perchance may see Some answer from the friends I love, there written out for me!

"AFFLICTION COMETH NOT FROM THE DUST."—JOB.

BY REV. H. BELDING.

The question is often asked, "Why should man be afflicted?" "Why is it that the tear of sorrow must course down his cheek?" In some cases, this question may seem unanswerable. Attendant circumstances may entirely prevent us from arriving to any thing like a satisfactory why or wherefore.

 There are things occurring, in the providence of God which, to us, are mysterious; and we may truly say of him, as David said, "clouds and darkness are round about him." But, are we from this to conclude that, on the part of God, any thing is not as it should be; that he that ordereth all things is un mindful of us, not having consulted our highest good? When brooding over our afflictions, we are apt to forget that we are but shortsighted beings; while he sees the end from the beginning. This being the case, we can not expect to comprehend and understand all his designs. "As the heavens are higher than the earth; so are his ways above our ways." Then would I say to all, when the providences of God appear dark and mysterious, let this thought be uppermost in the mind, man is finite and limited in all his faculties; but God is infinite and unlimited in his. With this thought well impressed upon the mind, you will not expect to understand all the allotments of Divine Providence.
 You will see that, were it otherwise—were man able to understand the ways of the Deity perfectly, there would be little need of a controlling agency to direct in any of his affairs.

From the foregoing remarks, I would not be understood as favoring the absurd practice of disposing of every thing by affixing to it the term mysterious. No: but I wish it to be well understood, that things may occur in the providence of God, right, probably in themselves, though not understood by us. Take for instance, the case of any only child, snatched, early in life, away from the fond embrace of doating parents. The question arises, "Why this? Why could it not have been continued on earth, the joy of its father, and the delight of its mother?" Such a case is disposed of only by resolving it into an appointment of the Deity; nor is this all; we have yet to say, that all his appointments are in accordance with infinite goodness.

But, it may be asked, if God be a being infinite in goodness; where is the evidence? We read in the good book, it is true, that "the Lord is good to all; and his tender mercies over all his works;"
 but is it with us a matter of experience; and do we see the application, so far as we ourselves are concerned? I think we do: each of us having evidence sufficient to assure us of the benevolence of the Deity. Who is there that can say, his whole life has been one continued scene of affliction? Or who, all things considered, can say, better had I never been, than to exist under precept circumstances? There are moments doubtless, in the lives of most people, when they can almost persuade themselves, that it would have been better, had they been left out of existence! But mark you, this state of mind does not long continue. As the dark cloud that, for a moment shuts from our view the rays of the sun, passes away; so it is, generally, with the gloom that shrouds the human mind.

But, after all our endeavors to account for the wondrous ways of God to man, there is yet something rather forbidding in the reflection, that man must suffer, and that too, by the appointment of the Deity; and no doubt this feeling would become immovably fixed in the mind; were we not relieved by the reflection, that the world was not designed for us an abiding home. It was among the benevolent appointments of the Deity, that we should continue but a short time, this side the grave.

And, although many things appear dark and mysterious here, let it once be admitted, that our present existence is but a prelude to a state of eternal happiness hereafter; and the magnitude of present evils will be lessened; yea they will sink into insignificance—they will remain but to wean us from the world, and prepare us for that change that awaits us. Seeing we must all, in due time, leave the world; it is well there are things in our experience, to counteract too strong an attachment to it.
 The ills of life are these counteracting influences; and many a one, on his death bed, has felt that their effect was not lost upon him. At that trying hour, a person can look back upon scenes passed through, and see a mixture of joy and sorrow. At one time, all was life and joy. At another, afflic-tion bowed him down beneath its heavy load; and often, yes full often, he could say, this world, at least, is but a world of trial.

Such is the experience, and such the testimony of all, concerning this fleeting world. All here are at agreement: and I would that they were equally well agreed respecting the world to which we hasten; that is if they could unite in views that would give consolation to all. Could all, when about to leave, contrast the two conditions; and, after casting an eye upon the present, and seeing it as it is, a scene of trial, look beyond the grave, and by a lively faith, see there a world where nothing shall disturb; where peace and happiness shall hold their eternal reign—then would they rejoice; and, in their plenitude of joy bid farewell to earth without a sigh.

Such views, and such only, will reconcile us to a world like ours; and with a faith, such as these inspire (and these only) can we be reconciled to all the dealings of mysterious providence. Ah blessed faith! and with it, can we not die in peace?—
 When we shall come to that point, where we shall know that our days are numbered; O then if this shall fail us; I know not what may not fail! If a firm belief in the unending, the eternal, the universal love of God to all his dependent children, and a belief that this love shall effect the reformation—the glorification—the eternal salvation of the vast family of man—if this will not stand the test; I know not what will! Where are they who could wish for other faith, as friends stand around to close their eyes in death? Such are numbered not among our fallen race.

Let me say then, had the time come when you were about to say to earth—to friends farewell—a long farewell; would you not wish for a belief in which was an assurance, that the separation would not be eternal? Or, suppose it were not your lot to pass from earth so soon; that you were to continue years yet upon the earth; and, during that time, were to follow to the grave the cold remains of many a friend—many a near and dear relative—and when standing by their side, and looking into the "narrow house"—and while dropping the tear to the memory of the dead; would you not wish for the assurance, that their future home would be your home, and that home heaven? And, in such a trying moment, were you to lift your voice in prayer to the great Disposer of all events; and, had you one wish above all others, would not that wish be, that, in future time, you might find all your friends, yea the world in the kingdom of immortal blessedness! The feeling, the benevolent, the sympathetic say yes. Give me but this faith in its purity, in its firmness, and I ask no more, when death shall lay me low, or take from me near and dear kindred. If we have all one Father—a Father in heaven; and if that Father operates for the best—the highest happiness of all his children—and let me know that the declaration of the apostle is true; "that, in the dispensation of the fullness of time, he will gather together in one, all things in Christ"—this is enough; let what will come, I can look heavenward, and in imitation of the Saviour say, "not my will, but thine be done."

ANXIOUS CONCERN ABOUT THE FU-TURE CONDEMNED.

BY J. M. DAY.

"Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Matt. vi: 34.

Anxious care about the future is with mankind, a fruitful source of evil and unhappiness: It is true indeed that man's hopes and desires are not bounded by the present; but by overlooking the present, and having his mind anxiously concerned for the future, he sacrifices present comfort and enjoyment.
 By this anxiety—this great solicitude—this apprehension lest things will not turn out in future to his advantage, he adds tenfold to the evils that daily and hourly throng around him from causes which he can not control.

Our Saviour, conscious of this fact, exhorted his disciples, not to be anxiously concerned about the future, in consideration of the fact, that "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof," that is, every day brings with it enough of evil, enough of calamity, enough of misfortune, without adding to them by an anxious concern respecting what is hidden from human view, by the impenetrable veil of futurity. Said he, "Take therefore no thought for the morrow"—that is, "Be not anxiously careful for the morrow." Have confidence in God. Trust in his providence, for his care extends over all, even the inferior creation. He feeds with his bountiful hand the birds of the air, and clothes in beauty the lilies of the field. You then have abundant reason to trust in his providence, and should not be anxiously concerned about the future, which is a fruitful source of unhappiness. Bear with patience and manly fortitude the evils that are incident to every day life and do not add to them by imaginary ones, resulting from concern for the future.

This is evidently the substance of the meaning of our Saviour's words. He did not by any means intend to teach his disciples that their temporal wants would be supplied without any exertion on their part—that whether active, or inactive, they would suffer no inconveniences from lack of food and clothing. The lesson which he taught them, was, that they should trust in the goodness and providence of God their heavenly Father, whose care extended to the minutest objects of his creation, that they need not be anxiously concerned about temporal matters, as to what they should have for food and raiment, while engaged in the discharge of the duties that devolved upon them. Sufficient evils would every day throng around them, which would require a good degree of patience and fortitude to withstand. These would be enough without distressing and perplexing the mind with imaginary ones. The disciples were taught that God who did not neglect to feed the birds of the air, to clothe in beauty and grandeur the lilies of the field, would not neglect to place within their reach the means of subsistence, while they were engaged in the important duties, belonging to the mission on which they were to be sent. It was needful that they should be instructed in this matter, because they were to teach and preach the goodness and providential care of the Deity, and in view thereof to exhort man to repentance.

That we should not be at all concerned about, or that we should make no provision whatever for, the future, is by no means the sentiment we would inculcate, nor is this the sentiment taught by our Saviour. It is that anxious solicitude for the future, which causes us to overlook the duties and concerns of the present, and which deprives us of many joys and sources of enjoyment by adding to the evils that are incident to every-day life, which Christ directed his disciples to avoid, and which, for many reasons, it is highly desirable, should be guarded against; but especially in view of the fact that "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Every day brings with it sufficient evils. We have more or less to contend with daily—many of them evils from which humanity can not be exempt.

The arrows of sickness and disease often pierce us—death makes inroads upon the circle of our friends and relatives, and draws from our eyes the tears of sorrow. Men are oftentimes sadly distressed in consequence of the loss of property, from causes which they could not control—disappointments fall to their lot and beset their paths with thorns. Often is one's brow clouded with sadness, as the melancholy tidings of the disasters and misfortunes, that befall his fellow creatures, reach his ear and touch a sympathetic chord in his heart. Often is the parent's soul filled with anguish in consequence of the folly and waywardness of his child, and many a bitter tear does he shed over his depravity and wickedness, and many a prayer, coming from the depth of his agonized heart, wings its flight to heaven on his behalf.

This is a glance merely at the evils to which we are daily exposed; but is it not emphatically true that "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof?" that each day brings with it enough of misfortune and disappointment, without adding to them by apprehending future ill. The minds of multitudes are in constant perplexity and agitation lest their plans will not succeed to their satisfaction and advantage, lest some untoward event will arise and defeat the objects, to attain which they bend their energies. Thus by being anxiously concerned with the future, which they can not penetrate, and by apprehending misfortunes will befall them of which perhaps there is no real danger, they add greatly to the evils that are incident to every day life and deprive themselves of many comforts and enjoyments. And in their anxiety to discover what the future has in store for them, they neglect many of the important duties and concerns of the present.—The future is alone open to the eye of the Omniscient. It is folly therefore to attempt to lift the curtain. It is folly to be so anxiously concerned about the future, and only adds to the evils and misfortunes of life. Let us then have a realizing sense of the truth of the Saviour's language, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Let us have confidence in the goodness of God our heavenly Father. Let us attend with fidelity to the duties of the present and endure with patience and fortitude the evils to which we are unavoidably exposed.

THE BOUNDARY OF HUMAN KNOWLEDGE.

The writer of this article is fully aware, that to circumscribe the objects of human knowledge, and confine thought within such boundary, is no easy task; but the cause of truth against error, in the present state of the public mind, seems to demand its accomplishment. Truth is an object worthy the belief of all; and scepticism gains but an ignominious victory when it lessens its value. An ardent desire, that the limit of human attainment may be clearly seen by all, prompts the following exposition of that limit.

First. Mind and matter are separate entities, in the constitution of man united, each known to the mind by properties and qualities peculiar to itself. The properties of matter are entity, or thing, form, size, weight, color, number, in things or properties; order, in arrangement, and locality, in position.—These, we believe, include all the properties of matter; by them it is known, and by them alone.

Second. The qualities of mind are consciousness, desire, feeling, emotion or will: and thought, including perception and reflection. These include all the qualities of mind; they are wholly distinct from any thing we do or can know of matter; by them is mind recognized, and by them alone.

Third. Mind and matter are, each, governed by its own laws; and, in man, these laws are intimately blended, producing mental, and material or physical action.

Fourth. Every acting cause must produce an effect; every effect must have had an adequate cause, and like causes, acting in the same circumstances, must produce like effects. These principles in philosophy will not be controverted.

Fifth. The cause of an effect may be the effect of a previously acting cause; as man is the cause of a steam engine, so is he the effect of a previously acting cause.

Sixth. The universe seems susceptible of three great divisions; viz. inanimate matter, as a stone; inanimate matter, as in man; and the animating principle or spirit, as the mind. These divisions appear to be so graduated, that neither rises above its own nature; animated matter rules the inanimate, as man in the material world; and spirit seems to rule the animate world, as pure mind is believed to rule man. Hence, each grade must act, if it act at all, upon the one immediately beneath itself.

Seventh. As every effect, within the bounds of human knowledge, must have an adequate cause; as an inanimate, or animate, thing could not have been adequate to its own creation; and as things animate and inanimate, exist, therefore, their adequate cause must, necessarily, have been superior to themselves.

Eight. As an inanimate engine could not have caused itself, it must have had an animate cause; and as animate man could not have caused himself, he must have had a super-animate or spiritual cause. To gain a conception of the nature of a spiritual cause, mind must be considered apart from matter—thus being turned to an examination of itself.

Ninth. The intellectual faculties, acting through matter, acquire a knowledge of external things—their properties, and the origin, relations and tendencies of those properties. The other qualities of the mind constitute the selfish, moral and religious character of the man. The intellectual faculties are perception, relative and reflective, in their offices or functions. The perceptive faculties perceive the physical or material properties of an object; the relative have reference to the relations of those properties; and the reflective reflect upon the origin, relations and tendencies of objects, properties and actions. Now, as it is the office of perception to perceive objects, properties and relations; and as reflection acts upon such perception, when there is no perception there can be no reflection; and as the immaterial mind has no physical or material properties for perception, reflection has no data, from which to draw conclusions relative to the nature of the mind. This conclusion to the mind of the writer, is a satisfactory answer to the question, Can the mind understand its own nature? and, with due deference, he submits it to the mind of the reader.

Tenth. The mind can understand the properties of matter, but it can not understand the prime essence itself; it can also perceive and reflect upon the action of laws which govern it, in its various forms and relations; but it can not fathom the intrinsic nature of those laws themselves. Is not this sufficiently evident?

Eleventh. When the mind contemplates outward things, perception perceives the earth, and vegetation, and animal life, as great facts for reflection; reflection discovers relations between the earth and vegetation, and between vegetation and animal life; reflection sees adaptation and design in those relations, and concludes, that they are not the properties of matter but of mind, because they are not the objects of perception but of reflection. Hence, arise all our ideas of the nature of mind, and, when applied to the origin of the universe, of Deity.—This process does not unfold the nature of either; but it shows, that the mind can not rise superior to itself, and comprehend its own nature and origin. It also exhibits the defect of the Atheist's reasoning, who says, "There is no God," merely because he can not comprehend his nature and origin. The writer would be deemed inexcusable for saying that the sun is not, merely because he can not see how or whence it is; and, if he were an Atheist, he would be quite as consistent and reasonable to deny his own being, as to deny a cause for that being, simply because he is man and not Deity.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

At a meeting of the Universalist Society of Canandaigua, held Nov. 5th, 1843, in view of closing an engagement with Br. U. Clark, as an expression of sentiment from this society which is justly due him, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted.

Resolved, That in parting with Br. U. Clark, who has officiated as our pastor for the last year, it is with feelings of sincere regret. That his highly exemplary character, and his untiring devotion to the cause of universal and impartial grace entitle him to our most sincere and heartfelt esteem, and we shall ever cherish the memory of his sojourn with us among our pleasantest recollections.

Resolved, That in whatever quarter of our Master's vineyard our young brother may be called to labor, our best and most heartfelt wishes for his welfare and prosperity will follow him. That in his future career of life he may be guided and sustained by Divine providence, and be enabled faithfully to promulgate the doctrine of God's impartial grace and goodness, to the family of man.

Resolved, That these proceedings be signed by our Chairman and Clerk, and the Clerk furnish a copy of them to the Rev. Uriah Clark, and to the Editors of the Magazine and Advocate and Western Luminary, for publication.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

EDITED BY

Revs. A. B. Grosh, G. W. Montgomery and A. C. Barry

UTICA, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1843.

ARE SUCH FEELINGS CHRISTIAN?

I have seen some people look very sad, and even get angry, on hearing a Universalist advance proof after proof and argument after argument, each one clearer and stronger than the one that preceded it. They looked, and spoke, and acted, as if they were really grieved and vexed at the bare idea that all men would finally be saved from sin, and become holy and happy! Could it be so? Were they really angry at hearing such glad tidings proved to be the truth of God?

After a time some one of their number would make out to reply after a fashion—and as text after text rolled out, containing the words “hell,” “hell fire,” “everlasting punishment,” “damnation,” etc.; and as he urged and repeated the doctrine of endless sin and suffering, these people would begin to look pleased again—their cheeks would glow, their eyes sparkle, smiles would wreath their lips, and every look and every motion would express satisfaction and delight. Was it really so? Did they really rejoice at the increasing prospect opened to their minds, that finally a great portion of our race—perhaps themselves included—might be endlessly sinful and miserable? If so, were those feelings Christian? If not, what is the doctrine?

FLUCTUATIONS IN RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.

The mutations of this world extend to every thing.—In this city, since I have resided here—that is to say, within thirteen years—two or three Presbyterian societies have died, besides other so-termed orthodox societies. The Old School church of which the Rev. Dr. Weeks was pastor, died first. Afterward (for I do not remember the precise succession) a Bethel Presbyterian or Congregational Society in West Utica, Rev. J. B. Shaw, Pastor, died. The Presbyterian Society in Bleeker street changed its name, and the character of its seats, while under Dr. Lansing's care, and then died as the Bleeker street, or Free Church Presbyterian Society, as it had died before when it changed its name from the “Second” to the “Bleeker street” society, to relieve itself from debt. The Congregationalist society took its place, until I believe it is now dead, or dying; being swallowed up by a new society of Old School Presbyterians, or (as they have called themselves) “the Presbyterian Church of the United States,” or, as they are now facetiously termed in reference to their half national claim, “the United States’ Church.” In the mean time, one or two other societies have also given up the ghost—and, in some cases, have revived again, or assumed a new form as well as a new existence. Thus change has followed change in the religious societies around us—and many that have lived on, have suffered every thing save death in their fluctuations between prosperity and adversity.

The foregoing is given to show the instability of human affairs; and that the popular and wealthy sects, as well as the more humble, are not exempt from decay and death.

ANOTHER NEW PREACHER.

By the following letter from Br. J. Potter, it will be seen that we have another accession to the ministry of the Reconciliation. Thus they come, and thus let them continue to come, only let them be well prepared for the great duties of the high office they assume; if they are so, and then continue faithfully to fulfil the preacher's mission, the abundant blessings of God will attend them and their labors; and the cause be built up and multitudes of hearts be made to rejoice “in the living God as the Savior of all men.”

“Ogdensburgh, Nov. 8, 1843.

“BR. GROSH—I am happy to be able to inform you, that there appear evidences in this part of our Zion of an increased interest in the cause of universal grace. We have ever prayed for the spread of the truth and the conversion of the world to God, but to effect this, laborers are needed to gather the whitened fields—and lo, they are coming. Br. E. A. HOLBROOK who has been with me most of the time since I have been in this county has commenced preaching the word to good acceptance and with flattering prospects. He is a young man of good academic education which he acquired at Potsdam and Clinton “Institute;” he possesses a well balanced mind, and a reputation without reproach, and withal a zeal worthy the cause he has espoused.

The ladies of this place have given evidence of their zeal in the good cause by forming a sewing society with flattering prospects and whose aid is of much importance in carrying forward the cause.

Yours in the Gospel,
Rev. A. B. Grosh.”

A NEW COMMENTARY ON THE NEW TESTAMENT.

We see it announced in the Trumpet, that a Universalist Commentary on the New Testament is in the course of preparation, by our venerable Br. Lucius R. Paige, and is shortly to be published. We need a work of this kind—we have long needed it—and we are happy to learn that we are soon to have it. Br. Paige has long devoted himself to those studies which will fit him well to produce a good work—one which will be indispensable to the library of every Universalist. And if it shall be what we have every reason to believe it will be, it must meet with a good fortune in an extensive circulation in our denomination, and prove to thousands an invaluable aid in explaining and defending our distinctive doctrines, by a true and learned interpretation of the New Testament Scriptures. Let it be forthcoming—it will find hosts of eager readers.

UNIVERSALIST QUARTERLY AND GENERAL REVIEW.—No. 1, January, 1844. Boston: Published by A. Tompkins, No. 38 Cornhill.

Such is the title of a new work which comes before our denomination for its patronage and support. It is edited by Br. Hosea Ballou 2d—all our best writers to be contributors. It is just such a work as we need, as we can not live without. In mechanical execution, it is equal to any similar work published in our country. It is not designed for our preachers only—and I hope that erroneous and hurtful idea will not obtain currency among our lay brethren, as it did too extensively with regard to the Expositor—but it is designed for any and every man who would himself be, and who would have his family, thoroughly read on the great subjects of the day, especially those that have any bearing upon the interests of Universalism, or the religious interests of man. It is hoped—it is expected that not only every preacher in the denomination, but every lay brother also, who can possibly spare two dollars for the support of a reputable, denominational standard work, will immediately subscribe for the Quarterly. Now is the time to do it so as to secure a full copy of all the volumes that shall be published.

We have only room this week to give the contents of the first number, and the publisher's conditions. The articles contained in the present number are as follows:—1st. Whately's Kingdom of Christ, by S. R. Smith;—2d. Past, Present, Future, by T. B. Thayer;—3d. Doctrinal Preaching, by O. A. Skinner;—4th. Puseyism—Neology, by Horace Greely;—5th. Apparent inequalities of Providence, awards of particular and distinct laws, by W. M. Fernald;—6th. Sin and its desert, by

H. Ballou 2d;—7th. State of opinion in the churches of the Apostolic Age, by H. Ballou 2d;—8th. Luther, by Sarah C. Edgerton;—9th. Literary Notices.

Conditions;—1. The Review will be published in numbers, containing 108 octavo pages each, on superior paper and new type, corresponding with the present number.

2. It will be issued quarterly, on the first of January, April, July, and October, making four numbers, or 432 pages in the course of the year, at two dollars per annum, payable, in all cases, on the delivery of the first number.

3. Any person paying for six subscribers, in advance, shall receive the seventh copy gratis.

4. All letters and subscriptions to be directed (post paid) to A. Tompkins, 38 Cornhill, Boston, Mass.

ALISON'S HISTORY OF EUROPE, ABRIDGED, BY EDWARD S. GOULD, ESQ.—We have had the pleasure of examining this valuable work, and find it to contain the cream, as well as interest, of Alison's elaborate work, without his errors and useless repetitions. Its style is clear, comprehensive and beautiful, and must be sought after with avidity, by the reading public, when its merits become known. It is comprised in one large volume, octavo, of about 500 pages. It is printed on good paper, with new long primer type, and comes at the very low price of one dollar, about one fifth the price of the large work. Address J. Winchester, No. 30 Ann street, N. Y.

We have received No. 6 of the “Mysteries of Paris,” and find it as we expected, to be filled with increased interest.

ATTEMPTED MUTINY.—We learn from the New-Orleans Courier of the 6th inst., that a mutiny broke out on board the ship Nicholas Biddle, of New-York, for New-Orleans, on the 25th of October. One of the steerage passengers, who imagined that he had been grossly insulted by the cook, made a violent attack on that person, and inflicted several wounds upon him with a hatchet. The excitement soon became general, the cabin passengers taking sides with the officers of the ship, and those in the steerage being of course disposed to aid their comrades. The offender, through the prompt conduct of the mate, was soon secured and placed in irons; but the passengers were obliged to remain under arms for 48 hours. He will be tried in New-Orleans.

There is a dispute in New-Orleans between the Roman Catholic Bishop of that diocese and a part of the Catholic population. Meetings have been held, one party passing resolutions that if carried out, would restrict the powers the Pope has conferred on the Bishop; the other upholding the Bishop and every thing he demands. The ground of difference seems to be in the appointment of coadjutors and assistants, the people claiming some power here and the Bishop granting none.

RESURRECTIONISTS.—We learn from a Buffalo paper that the village of Chambly, Canada, was thrown into great excitement on Wednesday last, by the discovery that the body of Sergeant Campbell, a much esteemed soldier, had been disinterred by some students of medicine. Says the paper, so little pain had these midnight robbers of human flesh taken to conceal their atrocious act, that on the family of the deceased going early on the morning after the day of the interment to visit the grave, they discovered it untenanted; the coffin and winding sheet thrown aside; and marks of hair and blood on the high wall that the body had been dragged over.

BURNED TO DEATH.—A gentleman has informed us of a sad catastrophe that happened in Newark, Thursday evening. A Mr. Chadwick and family moved up from Rahway yesterday, to near the depot. A person passing by their house early in the evening saw it on fire, and threw a stone into the window to wake them up.—The man immediately sprang from the bed, and seeing the flames rushed out of doors, without thinking at the moment of his family left behind. It was then too late to return, and the wife and two children were burned to death. A shriek only was heard, and the flames closed over them for ever. The children were between 11 and 16 years of age. The family are supposed to have been much fatigued and to have retired to bed early.

A remarkably brilliant meteor passed over the town of Newbern, (N. C.) on the night of the 4th inst., about half past 10 o'clock. The Newbernian of the 11th inst., says:—

"The meteor itself was seen in a direction south west of Newbern, presenting as it shot towards the horizon in a southeastern line, a splendid trail of light. Some who did not see the shooting of the meteor noticed at the time, three distinct flashes of light followed each other in quick succession. The explosion, which was not heard for some minutes after the flashes of light were noticed, was tremendous. The concussion was such as to shake many of the houses in town, and caused the leaves of tables, &c., to rattle distinctly. The explosion was followed by a rumbling noise that caused fears with some, that it was the shock of an earthquake."

A PENITENTIARY BURNED.—On Wednesday evening last, about eight o'clock, the whole interior building of the Penitentiary at Milledgeville, Georgia, was discovered to be enveloped in flames, and before they could be subdued all the shops, tools, and materials within the walls, were consumed. The origin of the fire is not known. The building containing the cells was saved by the heroic conduct of a few men, and all the prisoners were secured by the citizens and removed beyond the walls until the fire was subdued, when they were returned to their places. The loss is variously estimated at from $20,000 to 50,000.—U. S. Gazette.

DEATHS.

In Marathon, October 9th, Mrs. HARRIET SMITH, wife of Mr. Wm. B. Smith, aged 22 years. Mrs. Smith endured a lingering illness (consumption) with becoming fortitude and Christian resignation; and made her departure for the "spirit land," in humble hope of a reunion with all for whom "Jesus died" and "rose again." The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the relatives and a numerous audience of sympathising friends, in the Methodist chapel, at Marathon, on the 11th inst., by the writer. T. J. W.

In Cincinnati, Oct. 10th, after a short, but painful illness, Mr. MARK LITCHFIELD, aged 75 years, formerly of Connecticut. Br. Litchfield possessed a vigorous mind, and was esteemed as a good neighbor—made his own arrangements for his funeral services; and died in peace with the world of mankind. His obsequies were performed according to his last directions, by T. J. W.

In Cincinnati, Oct. 7th, 1842, Mr. DAVID WADDLES, aged 87 years. A revolutionary pensioner, and a believer in the restitution as taught by all God's holy prophets, ever since the world began. T. J. W.

In Norfolk, Oct. 14th, Mrs. ALMIRA, wife of Mr. Samuel Johnson, aged 29 years. Sister Johnson has been the subject of severe and intense pains, both of body and mind.—Some two or three years since, for a while she found herself on the brink of eternal ruin; and oh the excruciating pains she experienced. But by the grace of God, this thought was banished from her mind for that more comforting faith which was once delivered to the saints. And with this faith came her usual cheerfulness and joy. She again moved in the circle of her friends and relatives, and to bless her husband with the smiles of love. But uninterrupted joys are not for mortals to enjoy. Sister Johnson had tasted of the sweetest of reason, of health and love. But again the heavy hand of wasting disease is placed upon her. Physical skill is defied. No power seemed able to relieve her pains as it were for a moment. Still she fondly clung to that existence which three years ago seemed to be a dreg to her. But in the midst of all these pains her hope was in God, and it continued to grow brighter and brighter until the lamp of life died away in its socket. A few days previous to her death, I was called to see her die. As I entered the room, she gave me her hand and said her work was most done—that she had but one thing more to do, and then she was willing to go. She said that she had never been baptized, but wished to be before she should go hence to be here no more. Baptism was administered, after which I conversed with her upon death. She said that she had been unresigned, but now she was willing to go—she believed that all would be well—that Universalism was the truth of God—and urged her friends to be more faithful in its promulgation. She desired me to preach her funeral sermon. I then left her for night, but visited her several times before her death, and always found her suffering extremely in body but happy in mind. For her husband and child she would like to live—but that hope was gone, and she desired to depart and be with Jesus. Often did she say to die would be gain; and when last I saw her, she said, I hope we meet not again on earth but in heaven—and when the hour of her release came, she said, Mother, I am going home, farewell. And she sweetly fell asleep.

PROSPECTUS

For the Fifteenth Volume of the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate.

Rev. H. B. Soule, Editor;

Revs. A. B. Grosh, A. C. Barray, S. R. Smith, D. Skinner, Corresponding Editors.

THIS old and useful periodical will be continued as here tofore, with the above changes in its Editorial Department; and a change to the CASH, or ADVANCE-PAY system. The principal Editor by becoming Corresponding Editor, secures to our columns the regular and continued productions of his pen. The Editor engaged in his stead is as prudent and talented, if not experienced; and will serve while he remains in this city. Should he remove, another, as well qualified, and entitled to public confidence, will be secured. The other Editors are too well known to need our commendations; and the engagement of Mrs. Smith and Skinner will, we hope, be taken as an earnest that we mean to endeavor deserving what we ask—the support of a liberal public.

We intend to test the substantiality of our patronage, by placing the Magazine and Advocate on the CASH system. Every paper sent out after the present volume, must be paid for in advance—and will be sent only as long as it is thus paid for. This plan is best for both subscribers and publishers, if both will unite in it. To subscribers, who will save the enhanced price, which now goes toward making up the loss on bad subscribers—and to publishers, who can then purchase for cash, and of course at a cheaper rate; and who will no longer lose what ever the enhanced price does not make up. To both it will save the necessity—the disgusting and painful necessity—of writing and reading duns, complaints, and coaxing entreaties to delinquents, &c., &c.; which, on the credit system must always lumber our columns to the injury of the paper's credit and usefulness. Will our subscribers, one and all—for there can be no exceptions—support us in this mutually advantageous system? If so, let every one pay for next year before January next—in time for us to receive the money and enter them on our list before the first number of the new volume is issued. Those who send by mail, can remit a one or two dollar bill, (the Post Master will frank it, of course, if properly requested,) and we will send papers till the money is exhausted.

Our principles are the same as ever—Universalism in word and in deed—in theory and in practice—in heart, and soul, and daily conversation—in life and in death—now and forever! And every rational and proper means to bring its believers to the full adoption of this sentiment—to build them up, and make them "a peculiar people, zealous of good works"—and to bring our opposers to a knowledge and practice of the truth; will be mildly, but earnestly and constantly advocated by this paper, so as to render it increasingly worthy of a liberal support from liberal Christians generally, and from true-hearted, devoted Universalists especially.

TERMS.

The Magazine and Advocate is published every Friday, on a royal sheet, quarto form, for binding, at $1.50 per annum, invariably in advance.

Any person sending us the names of six subscribers, and paying for the same ($9.00), free of postage, shall receive a copy gratis. Eleven copies will be sent for fourteen dollars, and fifteen copies for twenty dollars.

Names of new subscribers should be returned by the first of January, 1844, or as soon thereafter as possible, to the Publishers. The names, with their post office, county, and State, should be written plainly and in full.

THE DAIRYMAN'S BILL.

A dark and stormy evening in February is not a time when any one, who has freedom of choice will leave a warm fireside for a walk in the shelterless streets. But, with the worthy man to whom we are about to introduce our readers, there was no alternative. Sandy Patterson was a dairyman in the suburbs of Edinburg, who maintained his little family by the sale of the produce of two cows. His wife and their only child, a comely girl of nineteen, were all Sandy's household; and every member of it took a share of the labor which supplied their few and humble wants. Their small cottage was neat and clean, as were also the inmates themselves, though their countenances, on the rainy February night in question, betokened depressed and sorrowful hearts. "Heaven speed thee, gudeman!" said the wife, as Sandy Patterson threw his plaid about his shoulders, and prepared to encounter the blasts without. "Heaven speed ye! or else we shall be harried and rui'd creatures the morn. What a night too, to gang o'doors in! Hap' yourself up, Sandy, and pu' the bonnet firm on your head, for that wind is enough to tear the coat off your back. But the trial moun be made." Her husband drew his bonnet tightly over his grey and scanty hairs, as he was desired, and after speaking a word of hope and comfort, left his spouse and daughter alone in their lowly tenement.

The dairyman was too much inured to exposure, at all seasons, to feel any great distress from the sleety rain, which fell in fitful showers around him, as he proceeded along the causeway side, towards the centre of the city. Few passengers were in the streets that night; the many closed shutters showed that all who could remain within doors were enjoying themselves in their parlors. Poor Sandy walked on, scarcely conscious of the storm, having that on his mind which rendered him heedless of any personal inconvenience. He reached at last, one of the most fashionable streets in the new quarter of the city, and stopped in front of a handsome mansion, which, unlike the generality of those around it, was not closed and shuttered up. On the contrary, a brilliant flood of light came from the windows, and the sound of music and mirth were audible even in the street. Sandy Patterson was the least envious of mortals; still he could not forbear sighing as he listened and gazed. With a slow step he mounted the stair of that abode of enjoyment, as it seemed to be, and applied his hand timidly to the bell. No answer followed his gentle pull; the sound was perhaps drowned in the revelry within.—Sandy pulled again, and with a very little additional energy. A man servant, in plain clothes, now opened the door. To the question, "What do you want?" Patterson replied, "I am sorry to give you trouble, sir, but I am the milkman. I have been once or twice of late, about the bit account for the milk, that the family had forgotten; and though it's an untimely hour, I would be greatly obliged if it could be settled the night. I wad ha been laith to trouble ye, but I am in sair want on't." The servant, who had been listening to this speech with the door open to the least possible extent, that the blast might not visit the interior, now asked the petitioner to come into the lobby, while he should mention the matter to his master. Sandy with many scrubbings of his feet, did as he was required, and took a chair pointed out to him. Here his patience, and he had a great deal of it, was not long tried. The man having gone up stairs, returned in a minute or two, with the answer, "It was not convenient to settle the account at present; this was an extraordinary time to come in quest of money; he must call again in a day or two—or Saturday, perhaps on Monday."

The answer was a dreadful blow to the humble dun. The sum which was owing by this family to him amounted to about five pounds; but that sum was of the greatest importance to him. He had called for payment nearly a dozen times, although he had modestly mentioned but "once or twice," and sad necessity alone had pressed him to renew his claim on the present occasion. Unless he procured the sum he was in quest of, his cattle and his furniture—his all, in short—would be seized on the morrow, by legal execution, and brought to public sale. The disconsolate petitioner attempted, in language broken by the heaviness of his heart, to make the footman aware of the state of things; but seeing that his words made not the slightest impression, he drew his plaid about him, and turned away from the scene of his disappointment.

On returning to his home, Sandy Patterson well nigh gave way to an agony of despair. Without hearing a word from his lips, his wife and daughter read in his look the frustration of their hopes. "So they hae just served you as usual Sandy," said his wife at last.

"Just the old story—call again—not convenient," was the husband's sorrowful reply. "What is to be done now Nanny?" continued the poor man, rising and striding in agitation up and down the floor—"What is to be done now? I doot we are clean ruined. Not even the means left to us o' winning our morsel o' meat. And you too, Peggy, puir thing," stopping and laying his hand on his daughter's head, "this disgrace may gar some folks to slight you, and that wud be sair for you to bide."

"Nae fear o' that, father," said the daughter, "if William—if any body," continued she, correcting herself, "were to slight us for misfortunes which we couldna help, their scorn wouldna vex me, sair. Who can blame you for hauding out a helping hand to your ain brother? He may not be to blame neither, puir man; but, if a fault can be laid at any body's door, it's to his, and no to yours, father, and the creditors that may take a' you have the morn, are his, and no yours."

"Troth, and that's true, Peggy," said Sandy, sitting down with something like composure; "there's no disgrace in't, at least, and that's a great consolation."

The poor family, though divested of all hope of acquiring the sum of money which Sandy had gone in search of, now sat down calmly to speak of their affairs. Twenty pounds was to be seized. Of this they had mustered only ten pounds, and their anxiety about the account which had been sought that night, arose from a promise of the principal creditor to stop proceedings, and allow more time if fifteen pounds were paid. In this their hopes had been disappointed, as we have seen.

Before retiring to seek that repose which none of them, it is to be feared enjoyed that night, Sandy Patterson and his family knelt down as usual, and thanked their Maker for all his mercies, beseeching at the same time strength to submit to his will. The performance of this act of devotion was not without its effect in composing the spirits of the suffering family, as it brought to their minds the refreshing recollection, that whatever might happen to them on this earth, there was one whose protection man could not deprive them of.

We would now ask the reader's company, while we return to that mansion of comparative luxury, from the door of which Sandy Patterson had turned away in sorrow and sickness of heart. Several hours after his visit, the door of that house once more opened, not to admit duns, but to permit the gay and fashionable to pass out after their entertainment was over. It is not with them we have to do, however; therefore let us walk up stairs, and enter a room now emptied of its visitors, and tenanted only by the ordinary inhabitants of the mansion. Davidson—for such was the name of the host—then remained alone in the drawingroom, with his wife and eldest daughter.

Davidson, let us premise, was a man of easy and somewhat indolent nature, but remarkably liable to be affected by general impulses. The income which he derived from his profession was ample, and it was rather from a want of system in the management of his household, than any other cause, that poor Sandy had remained so long unpaid. Stretching himself listlessly on a sofa, he began with his lady to chat over the incidents of the party, and among other circumstances to which he alluded, was the ludicrous application of a dairyman for the payment of his bill, by which he had been interrupted in the midst of a very profound discussion on the merits of Hertz's quadrilles. At this illusion, his daughter, a fine child of eleven years, approached, and with a tear in her eye, said, "Ah! but papa, the poor man was obliged to come to-night, for his cows are to be sold to-morrow for his own debts. I heard him tell John so, as I was crossing the lobby. Poor man, he cried as he went away."

"Good heavens!" exclaimed the conscience-stricken debtor, "can it be possible? Was this the cause of his late application, which I only laughed at? Can any one tell me where he lives?"

Inquiry was made below stairs, but no one knew more than that Sandy lived somewhere in the south side of the town. They did not know even his second name.

"I will instantly go," cried Davidson; and in spite of his wife's remonstrances, he dressed himself for the weather, and accompanied by a servant, set out through the rainy streets. Long and anxiously did he search, but in so populous a district, with so imperfect knowledge of the individual he was in quest of, is it wonderful that he did not discover Sandy's residence. At length, from an old woman that kept a small shop in which milk was one of the articles sold, he learned enough to give him the strongest hopes of having discovered the man he sought. The residence of this man however, was at so great a distance from the spot in which he was, that Mr. Davidson saw the necessity of returning home for the time to relieve his wife's anxiety. At an early hour he was resolved to resume his inquiries in the quarter to which he had been directed. Mrs. Davidson and her husband slept but little in the few hours that now intervened between night and morning, so deep was the impression which the little incident we have related made on their minds.

Davidson had been directed fortunately to the right quarter. The officials of the law had reached Sandy Patterson's humble abode; they refused his request for a little time in consequence of his inability to produce fifteen pounds. Nanny and her daughter were sitting in a corner hopeless, and soon to be to all appearances houseless; one of the cows were already brought out from her stall, and stood lowing at the door amid a crowd of intended purchasers. Already was the poor cow put up when Mr. Davidson arrived, made himself known, and put a stop to the proceedings. Conceiving himself in some measure to be the cause of all their distress, he was not contented with paying the sum he owed to the poor dairyman, but advanced enough to settle the whole amount of the claim. The worthy Sandy could only speak his gratitude by tears.

This affair was no less an era in his honest family's history, than it was in that of Mr. Davidson. This night's experience taught him a lesson, that the whole hopes of the family may be dependent on a sum altogether unimportant to the individual who owes it, and in the discharge of such obligations, benevolence is as much to be gratified, in many instances, as conscientiousness. It may serve to show the interest which he and his family ever after that period, took in the Pattersons, when we mention, that the little girl, to whose accidental presence in her father's lobby, the happy issue of this affair was owing, was permitted by her parents no long time afterwards, to dance at the wedding of Sandy's pretty daughter Peggy, who married a certain William hinted at, as the attentive reader may have observed at an early part of this true story.

A SERMON,

Delivered before the Sabbath School Quarterly Conference in Boston, Sept. 14th, 1843.

BY REV. W. M. FERNALD.

"All thy children shall be taught of the Lord, and great shall be the peace of thy children."—Isa. liv: 13.

I know not how I can serve the present occasion better, than by presenting the nature of that instruction which we seek to communicate; some of the means to be used, and errors to be guarded against, in imparting it; and the effects which may encourage us, as the fruit of our labor.

I would observe, however, here, that we all know the object of our efforts. It is the inculcation of moral and religious truth;—all that relates to God and man, in their connexion one with another, and in man's connexion in society. This theme is instantly recognized to be so vast, and withal so shorn of its importance by the familiarity which has become to be connected with religious subjects, that perhaps we could not do a better service for the young Teacher of religion, than to present, in the first place, the nature of that instruction which we make an object of so systematic effort for children and youth.

What, then, I ask, is the nature of religion?—And here I do not mean, what are its duties, its teachings, its promptings? But, what is religion, in the abstract? From whence does it proceed? And I have only to answer, it is a part of our natures. Like the intellect, or the moral feelings, it is something which lies as truly imbedded in the human constitution, however poorly it may sometimes be manifested, as any power or tendency in the mind. This you may call a familiar truth; it is enough for me that it is an important one. Men have not generally so considered it. They have rather sought for religion through supernatural agency, than looked upon it as any evolution of the powers of nature. They have considered it a duty to be performed for some extraneous reward, rather than as a healthy exercise, for its own good, of the powers God has given us. Hence, all religious training, saving the more human and moral parts, has been seriously questioned as to its utility, by many guardians of the young. At least, its more vital and saving characteristics have presented a discouraging obstacle to the whole power of instruction. It has looked, in the eye of those Christians, too much like a man-made piety, which is thus brough about. That power which is beyond humanity and above it—that influence straight from heaven, is wanting, to give the whole an unction, and a genuineness, and an effect. But we repeat it for its power, that religion is entirely natural.—There is not an influence, not a motion of the mind, religiously, but what is the product of a natural power. Let me not be misunderstood. I do not mean to say that there are no supernatural agencies employed to wake up this power—to give life and truthfulness to the religion of the world. The revelation of the truth, the dispensation of the Christian system, and I know not but many providences through communities and to individuals, have exerted the direct power of God, to give an impulse to the religious principle. But whatever may have been employed in this respect has only appealed to the native and universal powers of humanity.—The influence of God's truth may in this respect be said to be the operation of his spirit. It is his spirit which hath given the truth. The contemplation of his love may beget in us the likeness of the Divinity. And this we believe to be all that the Scriptures mean by the spirit of God in the human soul. Unless indeed all spirits are to be identified with His—that the apostle's language is literally true, that God doth indeed dwell in us; which, if so, is only to be resolved into the truth, in a still nearer sense, that religion is a natural and universal thing.

I do not feel called upon to prove this truth, by a resort to history, or to metaphysics. It were an easy task to do it. If we analyze the human mind, and ask ourselves what is religion, and what is morality? I apprehend the only true and comprehensive answer will be—Religion is our tendency or our duty toward God; morality is our duty toward man. Now, all mysticism away, and things which are perfectly gratuitous, I am sure there is not a tendency towards God, nor an emotion or influence in a religious way, but what the known nature and history of man are sufficient to account for. The "universal cloud of incense rising from ten thousand altars from all the habitable globe," is a sufficient testimonial, that civilized or savage, pagan or christian, the nature of man is touched and kindled by a sense of God, nor can the most depressing and long-continued ignorance obliterate this impression from the mind. Now, what is the religion of Christian conversion? What is the element in this new-created piety, which the popular religionists would represent as the supernatural, the genuine, the saving? Analyze it, my friends, and let us know what it is. Sometimes we are told that a simple sense of God is not the chief element in a Christian's religion. Granted: What else, then, can it be? We are assured, then, that the element of gratitude, the love of the divine excellence, and habitual thought of God, recognizing him in all our enterprizes, allotments, and hopes, enter also into the composition of a Christian's religion, without which it is but an unavailing sentiment of nature. Then I am sure that the pagan devotee who bows down to wood and stone, is in possession of a profounder and more vital piety, than many of a Christian faith, who profess the largest infusions of the pure spirit of God. It is worthy of remark here, how infinitely superior is the piety of the heathen nations, to that of thousands of Christians in the most favored land of light and liberty. These people have almost continual reference to the divinity. "An honor and an homage is paid to him, and an open profession of entire dependence, in all their undertakings, successes and disappointments. On all their private occasions, such as journeyings, voyages, marriages, diseases, the divinity is invariably invoked, and with him their every repast begins and ends. No war is declared, no battle fought, without his aid being first implored, to whom the glory of the success is constantly ascribed, and a portion of the chiefest of the spoils invariably set apart, as the indispensable right of the divinity." Such is the piety of the heathen. And if gratitude, adoration, and continual thought of God, are the elements of true religion, the pagan world outstrips the Christian, a thousand cases to one. Religion is thus far seen to be a natural element of humanity.

But we are told again, that a more genuine element of the religion of a Christian convert consists in a principle of loyalty to God in respect of virtue, as well as the other observances named,—that it does not at all consist in the mere performance of many or all the duties which God requires; for this so frequently comes from a man's own selfishness, and not from any respect to the Lawgiver and Judge—from the fact that he sees his interest connected with his duty, that all the virtues and lustre of humanity are no evidence against, but rather a proof of, the total and natural depravity of the heart, and the utter absence of religion. This system, then,—and we suppose this comes the nearest to it—would make the true element of religion consist in loyalty to God in respect to duty, as well as the religious emotions of the heart; so that whatever of virtue may adorn the man, it may spring from a true attachment and love of the Supreme, and not from a principle of utter selfishness. We grant, that if this is what is meant by the true religion, a strong argument may be made for but little of it, both before and after conversion. But is even such depravity, total? Is it universal, in a state of nature? Is man, as proceeded from the hands of his Creator, and with the aid of all the natural helps to be acquired, to be contemplated in such a light in respect to obedience to God? That were a hardy and arrogant task, to prove our nature so deformed as this. The very heathen, in their practice, hurl the denial against it. Thousands are the acts performed among them in reference to the divinity. And however much the question of disinterested virtue may be combatted, sure we are that much reference to the Deity is had, even in his love, in countless acts of men who never dream of supernatural aid. It would be superfluous to attempt a labored proof of the position. There is no total corruption, much less, universal, even if this last theory be received as the true exposition of a Christian's religion.

What, then, we are still obliged to ask, is this element in the new-created piety of Christian conversion, which can not be found in any degree, in the nature of humanity? And echo answers—what? We may resort to mysticism, and say, that words are inadequate to define it—that they only know who have experienced it. But I answer—we find words to explain every other phenomena of mind; metaphysical distinctions, nice subtleties of the emotions, thoughts, and passions; and every working of this invisible, intangible, immaterial essence, if it be; words, however indefinite and untransparent they may be, yet which are inadequate to all the purposes of a refined and subtle philosophy; and yet, there are no terms that can approach the idea of a Christian's religion! Happy is that people that is in such a case, yea,—Alas! my friends, what phantoms we pursue.

We return, now, to the position that religion is natural. I am anxious to produce this conviction, for much, I am persuaded, depends upon it, for the instruction of the young. Religious powers, like the intellectual, are a part of our nature, and we can not eradicate them if we would. Suppose there are some individuals to be found on earth, as history sometimes asserts, who have discovered no traces or impressions of a Deity above them. Does this prove that man is not naturally made a religious being? As much so as the fact that there are some idiots, proves that man is not naturally a reasonable being. But we can not escape the conclusion. And to this end would I use the fact:—I wish the youth who are before me to consider what they have to do in their labors in the Christian vineyard. It is to bring out—to expand our natures. This, surely, is a rational task. And if we see its rationality, we may be encouraged to progress. The religious powers of our youth have been sadly neglected. Why they have been, may be in part ascribed to the very error we have labored to expose—that religion is an unnatural thing. And if our own denomination have not imbibed this error, I know not but that they have caught the infection, even as the disciples of truth in all ages have struggled with the spirit of the age, or of the philosophy with which they have lived. We do not wait for streams of divine grace to descend from the skies: but we seem to be waiting for a thorough comprehension and appreciation of the matter. I do not utter mere words when I say that religion is natural. We know what we mean when we speak of the intellectual nature. Now, what if the intellect had been as much neglected as the cultivation of the religious powers? Where would have been our progress? But we say, we have certain faculties of the mind—we have an intellectual nature that must not be neglected. And we mean something by this. And so the whole process of early training and discipline—of school education—and the whole host of instructors have stood forth, to lead up the youthful mind to the manhood of its understandings. We have acted the part of nature and humanity in this matter. But compare it with our religious training. Those who make religion a supernatural matter, may plead somewhat of consistency in the neglect that is manifested towards religious discipline. But even these, as it frequently happens, have outstripped us whose views should have prompted us to outdo them! There is certainly no excuse for us. If religion is this natural thing—if our native capacities as we proceed from the hands of the Creator, are more than intellectual—higher than worldly; then we do grievously sin against the laws of our being when we exalt the intellect and lavish all attention upon it, at the expense of dwarfing the religious affections, and rearing up a race of intelligent worldlings. Hence it is no uncommon thing, nor need we marvel, as says Horace Mann, to "See lads and young men thickly springing up in the midst of us, who startle at the mispronunciation of a word, as though they were personally injured, but can bear volleys of profanity unmoved; who put on arrogant airs of superior breeding, and sneer with contempt, at a case of false spelling or grammar, but can witness spectacles of drunkenness in the streets with entire composure. Such elevation of the subordinate, such casting down of the supreme, is incompatible with all that is worthy to be called the prosperity of their manhood. The moral universe is constructed upon principles not admittive of welfare under such an administration of its laws. In such early habits there is a gravitation and proclivity to ultimate downfall and ruin. If persevered in, the consummation of a people's destiny may still be a question of time, but it ceases to be one of certainty."

We look upon Sabbath Schools, then, as we look upon our common schools; as nurseries and helps to nature—as institutions for expanding the natural capabilities of man, by a system of rational and natural instruction. We make a diligent and systematic business with the intellect. We look upon it as a dishonor and disgrace to neglect it. And the secret of our whole endeavor is, that it is the nature of man, and without the cultivation of which he can not secure the amount of good which is allotted him in nature and society. But much more is this true with the religious affections. Here is indeed a dearth when neglect is suffered to exist. The soul has wants which are not to be met by the sciences taught in the school and the academy.—And the force and truth of the whole matter is, that all the truths of religion, so far as we are concerned, have their origin in the soul. We must start, in religion, from our own minds. Here, then, we see again, the strength and capacity of nature. Religion is no thing that can be forced or introduced into us, as a foreign substance into the fused matter of the crucible. The very origin of all its truths, so far as we are concerned, is within us. The foundation of religion is the character of God. Now, an outward revelation of his character is only intelligible or possible, on the supposition that in our own minds are the natures and likenesses of the Divinity. I know there have been philosophers who have declared that we must begin, in our conceptions, with the absolute and the Infinite. But the fact is, we must rise to these from our own natures. We can have no conceptions of God, as a moral being, other than those which come from our own attributes of goodness, justice, &c. Our only idea of God is the idea of our own spiritual nature, perfected and infinitely expanded. Suppose, indeed, there were a Deity—an abstract, infinite, irrelative Existence; of what use would be such a metaphysical notion to us, destitute of all those qualities which form our own minds, and which enable us to comprehend the minds of others?—What would such a being be to us? A mere notion—a nonentity. Thus we see, the spring of all religious knowledge is in the soul itself. Even the Deity's existence is revealed to us by the inward man. Here we need the attribute of intelligence. And many think the origin of their knowledge of God's existence is in marks of design in the outward universe. But the idea of design, of skill and contrivance, comes from consciousness. This, then, is the source; and the soul is, in fact, the origin of all the truths, so far as we are concerned, of the religion we receive.

Now, this is a mighty help to our encouragement of religious culture. We go to work rationally and understandingly. We cultivate the religious powers for the same reason that we cultivate the intellect—for the gratification of nature. Nature must grow, and it must expand in regular proportions, if we would secure the highest happiness of which we are susceptible. Indeed, we are here let into the secret of that unhappiness and discontent which so largely prevails throughout society. How many are there who do not know, precisely, the thing that may be wanting, to give them the peace and contentedness they need. But the fact is, they have forgotten a prime part of their natures. In one almost universal scramble after property and intellectual enjoyments, their religious natures have lain dead and dormant. Or at least, religion has been but a mere form or duty to secure some extraneous reward. And no wonder it is irksome, for labor itself is irksome when the reward is not in itself, but in the property it accumulates. Now, it were a reflection upon God's goodness to suppose he has provided no better, in his revelation, for the happiness of his creatures, than what appears from the condition of many Christian people. And the fact is, a faith—a well-exercised faith in his everlasting goodness and care, and in the truths of the Christian revelation, is all-sufficient for the comfort of the virtuous man, through all the vicissitudes of life. But if we will not attend to these things, the fault is ours. The truth is, God has given us a whole and perfect nature; and surely, with but a partial exercise of it, we can not expect to reap the pleasures of the whole man, walking in the sphere of an entire interest, in the fulness and dignity God designed he should. We might as well expect happiness with a dislocated or dismembered body. Cut off the arms of a man, and leave but a part of a man, and he could not expect to enjoy the pleasures of a perfect body. And so, kill the religious powers, quench the spiritual flame, and improve but a mental wreck or fragment, and you can not expect to walk, whole-souled, into that vastness of mental empire where perfect man was designed to expatiate and be contented. This is the secret.—And it is as philosophical as it is forcible. Indeed, it is the truth that makes it forcible.

He must be a blind observer who does not perceive, in the present age, almost an exclusive tendency to intellectual improvements. I know, indeed, that much is done for religion and morals, but I know the comparison is fearfully unequal.—This may be seen in a familiar occurrence. Man is exceedingly proud of his intellect. Indeed, so much so, that many a time nothing offends him more than a disparagement of this. Not even a detraction from his moral character will give that quick offence, and kindle that dislike and resentment, that you might be sure of to speak meanly of his talent. Many there are who would deem it more of a compliment to be called a bad man than a fool. Tell one of his moral deficiencies, yet still he may linger in your company; convince him that you think he is half-witted, and you may be sure to be troubled no longer with his acquaintance.—This shows the comparative estimation in which the mass are accustomed to hold talent and virtue.

But I must leave this subject to proceed to another. You see now, teachers and friends of the Sabbath School, your duty. You see how rational, how consistent it is, You understand its nature.

It is but to bring out the whole nature; or rather, that part of it which has been so grievously neglected. It is to perfect the human soul. And thus to secure the perfectest human happiness. Understanding religion in this light—in the light of a native and important capacity which slumbers at our peril, you will guard with renewed zeal, such a breach in the natural happiness of man. You will present God's truth to it as the proper food of the soul. And you will be encouraged in your work by the reflection that you are engaged in such cultivation as that, in the language of the Scriptures, "instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree"—a fruitful and fragrant garden of the Lord.

I proceed now, to a notice of some of the means to be used, and errors to be guarded against, in imparting the instruction which we seek to communicate. And the subject I would first bring to notice, and make it the topic of much earnestness, is the error in which schools are too apt to fall, of too formal and mechanical instruction. Here, I think, is the need of great reformation. If religion is that natural thing which we have seen it is, then the subject most intimately connected with this, is the fact that it can only be truly and efficiently taught by the voluntary and untrammelled exercise of nature itself. I mean, that the child is not a piece of marble to be wrought upon merely and hewn into a statue; but a free, voluntary, thinking creature. Many a time he has thoughts which the teacher knows not of, and which, were they not smothered and checked by a mistrusting diffidence, would discover a depth of philosophy more radical and difficult than the elders ever would have cogitated—blinded by familiarity to the most vital truths.—Here is mind unprepossessed by former instruction, simple and free to catch at the most weighty and original principles. It is a great part of adult learning, to unlearn what is learnt. Hence, the boldest and most original and truthful minds are frequently those who have been little trammelled with the learning of the schools—who have had but little learnedly to unlearn—who have started comparatively with free and unoccupied minds. It is so with children. And they should not be contemplated, much less treated, as the mere heaps of passive material, for the intellectual artist to mould and fashion to his own ideal. The child's own thoughts must be set agoing. He must be made to feel his own individuality as a rational and responsible agent. It is not our minds, but their own minds which must form their character. And the whole process of education—what is it but, not to implant our thoughts, or the thoughts of any man or body of men, into the mind of the pupil; but with them to stir up their own minds to the formation of their own ideas and characters? Think it not presumptuous to intimate that a child can have his own ideas. I have no other idea of a rational, responsible being. And I do exceedingly fear the whole process of youthful, religious instruction.—Not that I have any sympathy or patience with the late cry of no doctrinal teaching. The fact is, we can not keep our children from learning, if we would. The whole world in which they move is a school to them. They have ears and can hear; and understandings, and can know. And if we do not teach them, somebody else will—God only knows who or how. But I dread this formal, mechanical instruction. We have much of it. It abounds more or less in all our schools. Even if truth is imparted, it has not the living power and force of the truth. It lies as a dead form in the understanding of the child. I should say, in the memory. It is mere parrot knowledge. It is nothing that the child can evolve in its reason, affections, and thoughts. It can hardly be called a species of thinking. To them, the kingdom is "in word," but not in power. Now, says Dr. Chalmers, satirically enough, in reference to older children, "one of the simplest cases of the kingdom of God in word, and not in power, is that of a child, with its memory stored with passages of Scripture, and all the answers to all the questions of a substantial and well-digested catechism. In such a case, the tongue may be able to rehearse the whole expression of evangelical truth, while neither the meaning of the truth is perceived by the understanding, nor, of consequence, can the moral influence of the truth be felt in the heart. The learner has got words, and nothing more."

This is the difficulty with which we labor in the Sabbath School. And it demands the teacher's most sedulous care. His duty is to teach the child thoughts, not words. And he who has ever mingled with, or had much to do with children, knows that children can think. They sometimes astonish us with the simple and unconscious profundity of their own artless souls. This is the only true way to create and preserve that interest which is needed in the Sabbath School, and do away with all the dullness, indifference, and death, which, in some schools especially, sits so like an incubus upon us. Children have no more relish for hollow, wordy, lifeless, ceremonial, mechanical form, than we have. They are creatures of interest, and do not generally live in vacancy. A Sabbath School teacher, therefore, needs to be one of the most flippant, pliant, easy, natural, good-natured, soul-engaging personages imaginable. At any rate, he needs to have thought, and to be able to awaken thought.

Here let me add, that religion is a thoughtful subject. It is serious, profound, comprehensive, vitally interesting. And it is the peculiar property, too, of Christianity, that it is adapted to all minds. It is the highest philosophy adapted to the lowest capacity. While it stretches into the vast—to heights and depths which awake the genius of a Newton, a Priestley, or a Locke; and rolls itself up in the sublime, to the far-reaching vision of a Milton; it also comes down, in condescending simplicity, to the humble capacity of a child. No subject can be made so interesting, and at the same time so fruitful, to a child. And it is only to teach it in the right way, to enlist all his sympathies, and make him eager for instruction.

Here let us ask, what is that way? I have alluded to names connected with the interests of science. How do we teach science? Is it a mere formal introduction to the intellect, of the opinions and theories of others? Do we shut up the pupil from all the operations of outward nature, and merely require his assent to certain systems that have stood the test of observation, and are received as the most modern and approved theories of nature? We know we tax the learner's own thought by submitting him, as far as possible, to the same observation—the same workings of nature; and we even institute the test of experiment and absolute practice upon all her secret influences. Now, how much more may the child see, experiment, and practice, upon the great truths of religion! Religion is nearer to us than science. It is in our own souls. It has, as has before been explained, its origin and foundation there; and it is only for our Sabbath schools to avail themselves of this advantage, that they also may become the—scientific, shall I say? Yes, the scientific, philosophical, experimental Institutions of Religion.

Here let me say to the teacher, that he must, if he would be successful, rely upon his own resources. He must question the pupil from his own thoughts and convictions, and stir up original and spontaneous answers and inquiries. Here I fear the very books we use. They are mostly books with printed questions and answers. Books are necessary, I allow, for a guide to the mind, and especially to the younger children. But they should be used as only guides. They are not to supply the place of living, natural instruction from the heart and soul. I am impatient with the trammeling influence of these books. I wish, sometimes, there never was a book of the kind for a child over ten years. And I verily believe, that with the present habit of teachers in the general, we should be better off without them than with them. Books without answers are what we need. Arranged in such a way that the answer to one question should suggest the question next to come, and one question and answer, another, conducting the whole process of the lesson in a natural, easy, and systematic way, and throwing the child upon his own wits for the answers.—Better, a hundred fold, assist these wits at every question, than trammel up a susceptible understanding with "base authority from other's books." Let him learn and inquire at home, or any where, for answers. I speak earnestly here, for I feel it. I have seen too much of automaton teaching and learning. Many schools, or I should say, some teachers may be free from it; but it infects, more or less, every school. I would even risk perplexity and incoherency; any thing but a formal, mechanical, square-and-compass method—neither word exactly suits—of conveying instruction to the youthful mind. It is death to the intellect, and death to the interest of any establishment.

Here let me quote a passage from Channing:—"The great end in religious instruction, whether in the Sunday school or family, is, not to stamp our minds irresistibly on the young, but to stir up their own; not to make them see with our eyes, but to look inquiringly and steadily with their own; not to give them a definite amount of knowledge, but to inspire a fervent love of truth; not to form an outward regularity, but to touch inward springs; not to burden the memory, but to quicken and strengthen the power of thought; not to bind them by ineradicable prejudices to our particular sect or peculiar notions, but to prepare them for impartial, conscientious judging of whatever subjects may, in the course of Providence, be offered to their decision; not to impose religion upon them in the form of arbitrary rules, which rest on no foundation but our own word and will, but to awaken the conscience, the moral discernment, so that they may discern and approve for themselves what is everlastingly right and good; not to tell them that God is good, but to help them to see and feel his love in all that he does within and around them; not to tell them of the dignity of Christ, but to open their inward eye to the beauty and greatness of his character, and to kindle aspirations after a kindred virtue. In a word, the great object of all schools is, to awaken intellectual and moral life in a child.—Hitherto, most religions and governments have very much contrivances for extinguishing life in the human soul. Thanks to God, we live to see the dawning of a better day."

I have said thus much with regard to the defective mode of instruction which teachers are so apt to fall into, because I deem it almost an irreparable evil to the child. I know, from my own remembrances, how like an old song were all the homilies, verses, catechisms and little prayers, through which I once went with all the ease and precision of the old clock that ticked in the corner. And it is a strong fact in the philosophy of association, how, even now, Saturday night suggests the same sounds, with the same vacancy of thought as then. Those verses, to me, need more than common effort, to strike meaning into them. I look upon this defect, then, as an irreparable evil to the child. Indeed, I question whether a child should ever be taught any thing that he does not understand. All such teaching is, to me, the infliction of a positive injury. It is the creating of listless and mechanical habits.

Let me conclude this portion of our subject by reverting to the fact that God has made the human soul singularly susceptible of his truth. The early thought, frequently before we are aware, is running its sallies to the mysteries around it, and, though obscured, none the less real, the Great First Cause—the origin of all things, the soul itself, death and beyond it—these are the themes of broken, though immortal thought, that stir all readily, and lie contracted in the mind of a child. Oh! shall we not lead them through this thicket, out to the fair fields of truth? Shall we not do it faithfully, seriously? But let us not do it mechanically.—Indeed, it is not thus done at all. Rightly done, there is nothing half so interesting to them. And this is the doing of it naturally. By the way side, in the garden walk, out under the clear heavens, they show their interest in questions that sometimes teach and astonish us. If Sabbath Schools would only have the freedom of a child in a walk! then we should rear up a race of little thinkers, who would grow up men of serious profundity.

Need I say, here, my brethren, do it cheerfully?

Make not religion a forbidding, an austere thing. Do it not, especially, to the young. More injury, we very believe, has been done to the cause of religion, by the face which it has been made to assume, than by almost any thing else; especially among children and youth. She has been clothed in sackcloth, and brought forth in groans and melancholy, as from among the tombs. She has been dragged as from the den of darkness; and tones of woe put into her mouth, and sorrow in her aspect. And it is no wonder, with such a demeanor and dress, that the young have been frightened from it; for it was more like a haggard ghost of glooms, than an angel of loveliness; and when it approached, farewell to cheerfulness and every laughing spirit, and come ye shades, and horrors, and dim visions! Even the associations of heaven have almost repelled the natural spirit of a child. I remember a child who had known by experience the gloomy and rigid exactions which a Puritan Sabbath required of a formal people; and one day, from the pulpit, the man of faith chanced to portray the attractions of heaven under the figure of an "eternal Sabbath." This was enough. The child returned home sorrowful with the idea of heaven itself. She had no wish, as expressed to her parents, to enter heaven, if heaven was an eternal Sabbath. This illustrates the power of a forced, staid, and unnatural religion, over the free and joyous spirit of a child. But I need not enlarge. True religion is as cheerful and easy as it is natural. And it should be communicated in the same way. A child knows nothing of affectation. His young and artless heart will inquire of religion as it inquires of any thing else—free, eager, and joyous. And it is a sad thing to have that spirit repulsed by an uncalled-for solemnity which so many assume in honor of religion. I say assume in honor of religion; for I fear a little honest hypocrisy here. How many are there, young and old, who from wrong views of religion itself, or respect to the popular manifestation of it, get drawn into unnatural straits—even those, I mean, who make no pretensions to the popular kind of religion—and all is uneasy, counterfeited, and fictitious. Nature is checked in its full and free manifestations, and the countenance shaded with an unreal air. Now, children are generally good physiognomists; and if they do not secretly suspect appearances, they inwardly shrink from them as they would from terror. There is no running of soul into soul—no power of instant communication—that unaccountable sympathy which charms and mingles kindred minds unconsciously. I am impatient with this drivelling, solemn mimicry in religion. It may be that we have comparatively little of it, but it is not the real, criminal, that I complain of; but that sort of little, innocent, well-meaning hypocrisy, which affects a thousand silly, solemn airs, as an expression of respect to the seriousness of Christian truth. What under heavens is there in a Christian's religion which should check the free outpourings of nature? Let us have it—full and free—joyous, laughing, strong and clear; whose entereth the kingdom of God must do it as a little child; and if we would gain these souls we must conform to their simplicity.

Shall I briefly remark, that we must also do it in love? He who would act the part of a successful teacher must study to gain the affections of his pupils. Nothing can be effectually done without this. Children are attracted by love. Affection and interest will almost supply the place of every other encouragement. This was the spirit which filled the amiable Saviour, when he took little children in his arms and blessed them.

Having detained you sufficiently with regard to the nature of the instruction which we seek to communicate, and the means to be used, and errors to be guarded against, in imparting it, I now proceed, finally, to offer what encouragement can be offered, to be seen in the fruit of our labors. It is needless, here, I trust, for me to dwell, though there are some facts to be considered. We do not realize the worth of our labors. Neither, I may say, the weight of our responsibility. If the estimate could only be made, of the amount of usefulness, virtue, and happiness secured, and the amount of worth-lessness, vice, and misery produced, by the training up of children to habits of religious thought, and impressing the great truths and precepts of the Gospel upon them; and the letting them go untaught, and open to all the influences of the world around them: this estimate alone—the fearful balance then needed to be struck in the causes of good or evil, to a Christian people, would seem enough to rouse every parent and guardian of youth to diligent and untiring labor. How many a case of grievous and pitiable ruin, can be traced to the first act of a drama that commenced in youthful indulgence, inspired by parental neglect! How many a poor culprit upon the gallows has been heard to upbraid his parents or early instructors, in the most heart-searching tones, for not having watched the early developments of principle, and trained them up to virtue and religion! Such instances come like warning notes from the land of the departed—they rend the very air with sepulchral power, to urge upon parents the strong requisitions of the Scriptures; to bring them up in the way of wisdom, and patronize the institutions established for this end.

The young mind has been aptly compared to wax in the hands of the artist—susceptible of almost any impression which the seal of education may impart. True, we admit—we are obliged to admit, a strong, constitutional, innate and organic difference, both for the moral and the intellectual man; but it is also known that even that organic structure may yield and alter by an early discipline. It is here that much may be done in shaping the destinies of men. It is here that the young and tender twig receives its bent; and

It is here that we learn, notwithstanding the varied range of inborn and constitutional powers, the omnipotence of education in fashioning the mind. And it may be remarked, that it is next to impossible to turn a mind which is once thoroughly bent in youth. Turn a mind thus bent? Go out into the forests, and attempt to turn the old gnarled oaks, which have grown into deformity, and curled as they have grown, with the potent influence of a hundred summer's suns. Alas! if you had taken them as saplings, you could have shaped them into beauty, an acre in a day. This is none too strong a figure to portray the yielding susceptibility of youth. The exceptions are not worth counting a discouragement.

The history of a common experience speaks most impressively to us on this subject—the breaking up of the family circle by the demands of the world upon the rising members of community. Many of you have been called thus to attest the saving influence of an early instilled Christianity. And you can all testify, that if there be one spectacle interesting to the heart of man, it is that of a youth going out into the world to enter upon its mazy paths of temptation and allurements, but who, by the influence of years of faithful instruction, and anxious, parental admonition, has formed the noble resolution which has the authority of a commander over him, to keep clear from the whole of it—to turn from iniquity as an accursed thing—and pursue those objects which do honor to his parents' well-directed efforts, and secure for him the blessings and honors of an unsullied integrity and virtue. Now, it is for the honor of our country that many such guardians of youth are to be found.—“Even in the most corrupt and crowded of our cities, (says Chalmers,) parents are to be found who nobly dare the surrender of every vain and flattering delusion, rather than surrender the Christianity of their children—who feel this to be, indeed, the burden of their best and dearest interest; and who, by prayer, and precept, and example, have strenuously labored with their souls from the earliest light of their understanding; and have taught them to tremble at the way of evil doers, and to have no fellowship with those who keep not the commandments of God—nor is there a day more sorrowful and affecting in the annals of this pious family, than when the course of time has brought them onwards to the departure of their eldest boy—and he must bid adieu to his native home, with all the peace and all the simplicity which abound in it—and as he eyes in fancy the distant town or city whither he is going, does he shrink as from the thought of an unknown wilderness—and it is his firm purpose to keep aloof from the dangers and the profligacies which deform it—and should sinners offer to entice him, not to consent, and never, never to forget, the lessons of a father's vigilance, the tenderness of a mother's prayers.” And oh! if he should forget, and should fall, the hearts that would break and bleed for his unfaithfulness, should possibly then have the effect to reinstate him for their name's sake.

In all this we see the importance of our subject. But alas! while there is one such case of successful moral enterprise, how many are there who, through criminal neglect, are cast out worthless and ruined, and the mercy of God must deliver them!

But we must draw this subject to a close. It is to prevent these consequences that we have established Sabbath schools. Honor to the illustrious Raikes who was the father of them! They furnish aid to the parent's endeavors, by drawing from larger resources, and by the more systematic instruction which they are able to impart. But, teachers and friends, you see your work. It is no trivial task. You are to operate upon the highest powers of humanity. It is a natural work that you are to perform. No discouragement from disappointed waitings for miraculous influences—no looking for the interposition of the skies—but you are presented with a ready and susceptible nature. It waits the plastic influence of careful and judicious culture. The germs are there which may expand into a tree of life, and bring forth fruit well worthy of your toils and labors. Yours is a noble vocation: follow it as nobly. Do not make a mechanical work of God's noblest powers, the gifts and capacities of the human soul. Study it more spiritually, and treat with it freely. Consider each mind a living, acting, responsible agent. Do all your work seriously. And do it with cheerfulness and in love. Teach religion as a reality, and not as a mere custom or duty; and in the tone of strong conviction. Let your pupils see that you yourselves are impressed with the truths you would impart to them. And above all, let no teacher assume that office out of mere diversion or sociality with others, or to discharge an unwilling duty.—No! let every one beware how he tampers with such a business as this. Better at once, than to cherish such a thought, renounce his profession, for he has mistaken his calling. A high responsibility rests upon you; though if cheerfully submitted to, and the work performed, the promise of God to the ancients shall be yours, that they which are wise shall shine as the firmament, and “they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars forever and ever.” Your names will be cherished in grateful remembrance, and posterity shall be your crown. But consider not your work done till you have distinguished in religion the matter of mere transport and exalted feeling, from the sturdier duties of integrity, honesty, and charity to men. One honest purpose created by your teaching is worth a thousand emotions, ever so moving and sincere. Then shall your children be fitted for a truthless, treacherous world. Train them up to honesty and virtue. Lead them on, from thought to thought—from excellence, to the Origin of all thought, excellence, and good. Unite piety and goodness. Then shall our schools be as trees planted by the river's side, and shed their influence upon our children's children, to the third and fourth generation. Then shall “our sons be plants grown up in their youth, and our daughters as corner stones, polished after the similitude of a palace. Happy is that people that is in such a case; yea, happy is that people whose God is the Lord.”

THE CHARACTER AND DESIGN OF GOD.

Paley says:—“When God created the human species, either he wished their happiness, or he wished their misery, or he was indifferent and unconcerned about both. If he had wished our misery, he might have made sure of his purpose by forming our senses to be so many sores and pains to us, as they are now instruments of gratification and enjoyment; or by placing us amidst objects so ill suited to our perceptions as to have continually offended us, instead of ministering to our refreshment and delight. He might have made, for example, every thing we taste, bitter; every thing we saw, loathsome; every thing we touched, a sting; every smell a stench, and every sound a discord. If he had been indifferent about our happiness or misery, we must impute to our good fortune, as all design by this supposition is excluded, both the capacity of our senses to receive pleasure, and the supply of external objects fitted to produce it. But either of these, and still more both of them, being too much to attribute to chance, nothing remains but the first supposition, that God when he created the human species, wished their happiness, and made for them the provisions which he has made, with that view and for that purpose.

“The same argument may be proposed in different terms, thus:—Contrivance proves design and the predominate tendency of the contrivance indicates the disposition of the designer. The world abounds with contrivance, and all the contrivances with which we are acquainted are directed to beneficial purposes. Evil no doubt exists, but is never, that we can perceive, the object of contrivance.—Teeth are contrived to eat, not to ache; their aching now and then is incidental to the contrivance, perhaps inseparable from it, or even if you will, let it be called a defect; but it is not the object of it. This is a distinction that deserves to be attended to. In describing implements of husbandry, you would hardly say of the sickle, that it is made to cut the reaper's fingers; though, from the construction of the instrument and the manner of using it, this mischief often happens. But if you had occasion to describe the instrument of torture or execution, this engine, you would say, was made to extend the sinews, this to dislocate the joints, this to break the bones, this to scorch the soles of the feet. Here pain and misery are the very object of the contrivance. Now nothing of this sort is to be found in the works of nature. We never discover a train of contrivance to bring about an evil purpose. No anatomist ever discovered a system of organization calculated to produce pain and disease; or in explaining the parts of the human body, ever said, this is to irritate, this to inflame, this duct is to convey the gravel to the kidneys, this gland to secrete the humors which form the gout; but if by chance he comes to a part of which he knows not the use, the most he can say, is, that it is useless; no one ever suspects that it is put there, to incommode, to annoy or torment. Since then God hath called forth his consummate wisdom to contrive and provide for our happiness, and the world appears to have been constituted for design at first, so long as this constitution is upheld by him, we must in reason suppose the same design to continue.”

The contemplation of universal nature rather bewilders the mind than effects it. There is always a bright spot in the prospect upon which the eye rests; a single example, perhaps, by which each man finds himself more convinced than by all others put together. I seem, for my own part, to see the benevolence of the Deity more clearly in the pleasures of young children, than in any thing in the world. The pleasures of grown persons may be reckoned partly of their own procuring; especially if there has been any industry or contrivance, or pursuit to come at them, or if they are founded like music, painting, &c., upon any qualification of their own acquiring. But the pleasures of a healthy infant are so manifestly provided for by another, and the benevolence of the provision is so unquestionable, that every child I see at its sports, affords to my mind a kind of evidence of the finger of God and of the disposition which directs it.

But the example which strikes each man most strongly, is the example for him; and hardly two men hit upon the same, which shows the abundance of such examples about us. We conclude, therefore, that God wills and wishes the happiness of his creatures; and this conclusion being once established, we are at liberty to go on with the rule built upon it, namely, "that the method of coming at the will of God concerning any action, by the light of nature, is to inquire into the tendency of that action to promote or diminish the general happiness."

Now if the above are facts, and for one I can not deny them, then we conclude that Christ came here on an errand of mercy, and his object was to benefit mankind—that all to whom the atonement extends are benefited thereby—that the resurrection is the result of the atonement, seeing if Christ had not died no resurrection would take place—hence all who rise, rise by virtue of it, and receive the benefits concomitant thereto. From these views, I can not be surprised that joy at his (Christ's) birth should prevail in heaven, or that at his death, the angels should bend over the battlements of heaven and shed a tear—that the angelic host should hang up their harps—that the sun should mantle his face and refuse to shine—that the moon should be clouded in crimson—that the little warblers as they fly through the vast ether should stop and gaze—that the mountains should rend, and the whole earth be convulsed—in a word, that nought should break the silence of earth, heaven, land or sea, but the piercing cry of a dying Saviour, IT IS FINISHED. ### "ETERNAL LIFE IS TO KNOW GOD AND JESUS CHRIST."

"Vain delusive world adieu,
With all of creature good;
Only Jesus will I know,
And Jesus crucified."

"Him to know is life and peace,
And pleasure without end."

Yes, truly—to know Jesus—in the true sense of the word—is to know "the way, the truth, and the life," which is "peace, and pleasure without end." To know Jesus, is to appreciate, and unite in spirit, with the pure principles which Jesus possessed while he was on earth with his mother and brethren. And what were the principles of Christ, with which we must unite for the purpose of enjoying life and peace? The principles of Christ consisted in being "about his Father's business." And although he was but a youth—yet he was neither afraid, nor ashamed to be found in the midst of the learned doctors—both hearing them and asking them questions. But in all of his conduct, he was meek and lowly—and he was also "subject to his parents." Jesus possessed a philanthropic nature, in every sense of the word. O how did his soul yearn for the welfare of mankind. His arms were continually reached out in administering to suffering humanity! His tongue was continually uttering forth the truth of God, and the truth was that which did give "joy and peace" to all who believed it. All who united in spirit with the truth which Jesus uttered, found "great joy in believing." One great principle which Jesus possessed was love for his enemies! And he exhorted his brethren to love their enemies, for the very purpose that they might be like God. Jesus was the image of God in "blessing them that cursed him." Jesus said "he that hath seen me, hath seen the Father also"—and now if we would be like Jesus—and like "the Father also," we must love our enemies—we must love them that hate us—we must pray for them which despitefully use and persecute us! When an "enemy smites us on one cheek, we must turn the other also." This, I know, is a hard saying—and who can bear it? Perhaps we may say, it is an easy matter to be humble—it is an easy matter to do what appears to be right—but to love an enemy!—one who is continually seeking to injure us—is not in the nature of man to do! Well, if it is not the nature of man, it is the nature of God, to love His enemies and to bless them with a needful blessing—and we can not be "perfect in Christ," until we can feel in our hearts to love our bitterest enemy. And truly there are some dear souls who do love their enemies! The compassionate mother will love the son and daughter who rises in rebellion against her. With feelings of compassion she will entreat of them to desist from their evil course, and turn to the paths of righteousness, which lead to peace. And though their conduct may be ever so vile—yet she can not be willing that they should suffer—only enough to reform their conduct—and the thoughts of an endless hell for them, makes the blood chill in her veins!

I have heard of an instance where the love of a woman for her husband, was manifested while he was so bitter against her, as to seek to take her life! Although he was continually abusing her—and with an uplifted axe, would threaten to kill her—yet she could not be willing that he should be confined in jail.

An apostle says, "the carnal mind is not subject to the law of God—neither indeed can be."—Although it is not possible for the carnal mind to be subject to the law of God—yet it is possible for a legion of carnal minds to be cast out of a man; and when they are cast out by the power of God, then he is "clothed and in his right mind." And so long as he is in his right mind, he is of the spirit of Christ—which is "meekness, temperance, long suffering, and forbearance"—with a holy love for his enemies, which causes him to wish, and earnestly desire their welfare, both in time and in eternity. While he is of the Gospel spirit, he will not heedlessly see his enemy suffering in excruciating pain, without feeling a desire for his deliverance—and he will endeavor to aid and relieve him—even should he know that after being relieved, he will turn and injure him! And thus being of the spirit of Christ, he unites with that principle which is pure and holy! While we are in the possession of the principle which causes us to love our enemies, so as to earnestly wish and desire their welfare—which also leads us to "live a quiet and peaceable life with all men"—not seeking to injure others because they have injured us; but, being loving and forgiving, are willing to "suffer wrong, rather than do wrong"—we are of the spirit of Christ; and so long as we are of his spirit, we are united with his nature, and are "one with him, even as he is one with the Father."

To know Christ who is the holy spirit of truth, is to appreciate and unite in spirit with "whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely." This, truly, is the knowledge of Christ—and "Other knowledge I disdain,

'Tis all but vanity."

As we are frail mortals in this state of existence, we can only "know in part" of the glory and happiness of Jesus Christ. But O how transporting is the thought that "when we see Jesus we shall be like him!" O then we shall be divested of all that is evil! We shall then be clothed with the pure robe of righteousness. We shall then "be clothed with humility," and "love on the bond of perfectness." O then there will be "joy, and peace, and pleasure without end."

NO CHRISTIAN COMFORT IN UNIVERSALISM.

BR. GROSH—Dear Sir, A short time since I had handed me by a Methodist brother whom I verily believe wishes Mount Zion well, but who still believes the tormenting doctrine of endless misery, a work entitled, "Universalism Examined and Refuted; and the doctrine of endless misery of such as do not comply with the terms of the Gospel in this life, clearly established, by Luther Lee, minister of the Methodist Episcopal church." Possessing a spirit, as I think, to "prove all things, and hold fast that which is good," I took the book and read it. I find many things contrary to truth and reason; and out of the multitude is the following, that "there is nothing comforting to the Christian in the doctrine of universal salvation, but much that comforts the sinner." Whether Mr. Lee possesses the heart of a demon, and thinks it that of a Christian, or is dishonest, is not my business at this time to inquire; but one or the other I think must be true—which the Searcher of hearts can tell.

It is my present object to examine the declaration itself. One of these two things must be true—either that the doctrine of endless misery must comfort the Christian, or that of God's universal salvation. If to believe that some will be endlessly miserable, produces joy, satisfaction and comfort; then it is a matter of course that the greater the number that are finally doomed to never ceasing and unutterable woe and torment, the greater will be the amount of happiness produced. And further—if Rev. Luther Lee believes the assertion himself, and he is a Father, what a source of comfort it will be to see his children whom he dearly loves, writhing in the flames of unceasing torment! Does Mr. Lee take pleasure in such a thought? "No!" every sane person must quickly reply. I at least will speak for one; for I have, till quite lately, believed and advocated the doctrine of partial grace, and have been tormented by that fear which hath torment, but the Lord hath delivered me from the fowler's snare, and from him that would willingly destroy. And I am led to inquire, how long, O Lord, how long, before mankind will acknowledge their Father's universal love and impartial grace? W. T.

"THE PRIDE OF LIFE."—ST. PAUL.

BY REV. H. BELDING.

A suitable share of pride is necessary for the well-being of every individual. Without it, decency and respectability are out of the question.—But, while I would encourage that laudable and praiseworthy self-respect which it becomes each one to cultivate; I would bear in mind, that there are extremes in this, as well as in every thing else. There is a point, beyond which, prudence will not allow us to go.

The workings of an inordinate pride are seen in all those petty strifes for the mastery in show and fashion, which to the prudent and unassuming, are justly held in utter contempt. What more disgusting than a rivalry for such distinction as, at best, can be but momentary, conferring neither profit nor honor upon any one! Add to this the circumstance, that attempts are often made by those who have not the means of sustaining themselves in their false positions, and hence, must ultimately suffer, as a consequence attendant upon their folly, and the subject appears in a still more ridiculous light.

How many there are that, in the end, find themselves the companions of wretchedness and woe, merely in consequence of being overcharged with a false pride! How many that are now pining in want, enduring all the miseries attendant upon a state of extreme poverty were once well provided for, and might still have been, had not "the pride of life" blasted all their prospects! How many, black with crime, morally sunk to the lowest state of human degradation, whose first step toward iniquity, and whose after cause was induced by "the pride of life!" Go you to the lawless bandit, whose deeds are deeds of blood, and to the cruel pirate, who hides his murderous works beneath the ocean waves; and often, yes full often, you will find they are they, whose circumstances were first rendered desperate by "the pride of life!"

I might go on enumerating instances, till the catalogue were full. I might name all the sons and daughters of wretchedness, their actual conditions being known, it would be found, that "the pride of life" would claim a full share in having caused the evils they suffer.

The day closes in darkness, the year fades in desolation, and man sleeps in dust; but there is a morning and a spring time for all. Youth that is cut down in its loveliness, like a morning flower, shall bloom afresh in the garden of God; and age that shines in righteousness, till it sinks beneath the sod, shall arise again in glory, like the sun in the firmament.

Virtue is sure to produce happiness.

Be industrious if you would be contented.

GRATITUDE TO GOD FOR ALL HIS MERCIES!

When I think of the utter dependance of our race upon bounteous Heaven—when I consider our own nothingness in contrast with the sublimity and glory of that blessed Being, who crowns our lives with blessings, my soul is drawn out in ardent gratitude to the Father of mercies! Surely I do love that universal Father and Friend, who is impartially good unto all, and whose tender mercies are over all His works. "God is Love" to ALL mankind—unchangeably "THE SAME YESTERDAY, TO-DAY, AND FOR EVER!" Can I, then, ever feel gloomy on the subject of the Christian religion? Verily, the creeds and traditions of men may render gloomy those who credit them; but a firm believer in God's universal love, can never despond, so long as he maintains his integrity as a FAITHFUL disciple of Jesus the Saviour of all men, especially of those who believe! O! that all would embrace the doctrine, so clearly inculcated in the Bible, of "the restitution of all things"—even the eventual universal salvation of man, which is in very deed THE GOSPEL in all its beauty and glory! Methinks the salutary tendency of so holy a faith, must fill every heart with joyful praise.

"The Record is true,
And witness is given,
Our hearts to imbue
With graces of heaven.
O may our devotion
In purity flow,
And every emotion
With gratitude glow."

FAITH.

Jesus said—"if thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth." Again it is said—"According to thy faith, so be it unto thee."

These are encouraging words to the Universalist. They are truly encouraging to him who has faith in the "restitution of all things." To him who truly believes in the reconciliation, the holiness and happiness, of the human race, it may justly be said—"According to thy faith so be it." L. H.

QUESTION. How long did the Sodomites "suffer the vengeance of eternal fire?"

AT HOME AGAIN.

Having prepared a lot of "copy" before I left home, it may be that the readers have not missed me from my post during my nearly four weeks' absence. It is well that I made those ample preparations; for, on the day I left for Boston, the rheumatism commenced an attack on my right arm and shoulder, which combined with neuralgic symptoms, and increased in severity, until, to avoid a fever and utter prostration, I placed myself under the charge of a worthy brother, Dr. Jonas W. Chapman, 32 Cambridge street. In his Thompsonian Infirmary I met with the best treatment long practiced skill could devise, and the kindest attention and hospitality brotherly and sisterly affection could yield. By these aids I was enabled to preach every Sunday—with constantly decreasing pain each week—and was strengthened to reach home in comfort. While out of the Infirmary, I was treated with unwearied kindness, and my wants were more than ministered unto as far as hospitality could do so, by brother and sister S. Packard, with whom I made my home. The pain of the disease has been greatly mitigated, but not entirely removed; and may, in this season of frequently and rapidly changing weather, be so much increased as to prevent me from attending to my duties as steadily and promptly as I could wish. All around me—in my own family and among our citizens generally—there are complaints of severe colds, coughs, aches and pains induced by long continued wet and cold weather. Very few families have escaped the universal visitation.

As early as I can, I shall bring up the rear in my editorial labors, correspondence, &c. Several works are waiting notice, and some subjects are calling for discussion. We hope to attend to them all in a week or two—for we expect to remain as well as we now are, even if we do not get any better. A. B. G.

TOUR OF THE UPPER LAKES.—No. I.

BR. GROSH—Monday, August 15th, bidding my family and friends adieu, I left this place on board the cars, bound for the "Far West," of which so much is "said and sung." Passing through Utica, Syracuse, Auburn, Geneva, Canandaigua and Rochester, I reached Buffalo about 4 o'clock Tuesday afternoon.

"Then we are in Buffalo at last," said a fellow passenger. "I should judge so," said I—"Listen." The cars had halted within a high, narrow enclosure, composed of rough boards—being a sort of substitute for a depot—and astride of the top of this, or hanging upon their chins, or peeping in at the entrance—the whole scene reminding one of Bedlam—were men and boys crying out at the top of their voices, "Any baggage for Huff's Hotel!" "Omnibus here from the American—carry passengers and their baggage free of charge!" "Gentlemen, pass your baggage for the Eagle!" "The Temperance House—any passengers for the Temperance House!" and so on to the end of a very long chapter. We were glad to shelter ourselves from this din and confusion in the carriage nearest at hand, and were driven to Huff's Hotel, where we found very comfortable quarters.

Buffalo, for its commercial advantages and its enterprise, has been very justly styled, the "Queen city of the West." Situated upon the outlet of those vast inland seas which stretch far northward for nearly two thousand miles—the point at which the vast tide of emigration gathers, as it were for a mightier flow—its shipping bearing to its wharves the produce and wealth of the westernmost portions of our extended territory—its proud steamers arriving and departing daily with their living freight from and to distant ports and cities on the western boundaries of the great lakes; its busy population engaged in the traffic of many climes, and the din of whose business goes up like the sound of many waters—the number and splendor of its public buildings, and its mercantile establishments—all, all go to render Buffalo worthy its proud title, and stamp it as a place of the first importance in the Empire State.

To many, the arrival and departure of a steam boat is of almost infinite moment. Ere the first "note of preparation" had been sounded on board the Illinois, hundreds had gathered on the wharf—not all of them idle spectators—but those whom the love of gain, or stern necessity had brought to the spot. Here, near the bow of the boat, was a hand carriage, in which was displayed to the best advantage, brass and silver wares in the shape of safety chains, breast pins, finger rings, &c.; while the question was being continually asked, "want to buy any jewelry?" A short distance from this carriage was another, similar in construction, containing "fancy articles," pocket-maps, musical instruments, such as fiddles and jewsharps; while pushing about among the crowd were numerous ragged urchins crying, "Two apples for a penny," or "Graham's Magazine, Evening Post, Bennett's Herald." All had their customers, and after disposing of a trifle, joined again in the everlasting din.

The band now ascended the deck and commenced playing a national air. Carriages came rolling up from the various hotels with passengers for the Illinois.—Trunks, valises, and handboxes were thrown in at the gang way pell mell. Men jostled against each other in their haste. Husbands and wives were separated in the glorious confusion that prevailed. And while hurried adieus were being spoken, and kind looks exchanged, and parting hands given, and sweet words uttered on board and on shore, the command was given to "cast off," and amid the scrambling of news-boys and candy-peddlers, the crying of children, the hoarse, hollow rumbling of machinery, the cackling of hens and the squealing of pigs—the steamers flying, and men cheering, and the band playing the Emigrant's Farewell, we took our departure for the Prairie land at 11 o'clock, the 16th day of August.

As soon as the excitement had subsided somewhat, and order began to reign, we found we had as pleasant and agreeable a company as one could wish. Of clergymen there were six or seven; and laying our several heresies aside, we enjoyed ourselves alike with others in friendly converse. The only exciting topic introduced was that of slavery, but ere the debate "ran high," we were told we were near the place where the Erie was burned.—This at once directed our thoughts and reflections into another channel, and a sadness came over the spirits of us all. Perhaps at the very spot we were passing over, the gifted and the fair went down in their winding sheet of flame—perhaps here the strong man and the helpless female, sent one cry to God, and perished! And ere the morrow's sun should rise we might sleep as lowly as they, having struggled with the same destroyer and met the same fate! When we laid our heads upon the pillow at night, it was with the prayer that we might be preserved from so fearful a doom.

Yes, it was a fearful doom! When no suspicions of danger or disaster were lurking in any bosom, and the proud steamer was urging it way towards the Prairie land, a light explosion was heard, and in a moment the tall and writhing flames gleamed out upon the waters, and flashed frightfully in the faces of the sleeping and waking. The rapidity with which they were dashed over the deck, and through the gangways baffled all attempts to extinguish them, or to furnish the means of self-preservation. O, who may tell the feelings of agony and despair that rent the bosom then! Who may know the shrieks and cries that went out over the waters; or the prayers for help, save Him before whom they came up from the fire-girt vessel! Manhood was there in its vigor and prime, and perchance old age with its silvery hairs. Blooming and promising youth, and innocent and prattling childhood were gathered on that fated deck. But all went down, save few, with the blackened hulk of the noble vessel, to sleep in a watery grave! A. C. B.

THE FLOWER VASE.

This is a most beautiful little book—a perfect gem—the neatest little thing we have seen for a long time for philopœnas, (is that orthography correct, Mrs. Drew and Thayer?) Christmas and New Year gifts, tokens, remembrances, &c., &c., of a cheap kind. It is full of the language of flowers, tastefully furnished and selected and arranged by Miss S. C. Edgerton, and as neatly printed by Bagley and Powers, of Lowell, Mass. Br. Tompkins handed me a copy while in Boston, but it was too pretty to keep. I expected to find them for sale by Grosh & Walker on my return home, but was disappointed. So I have to notice it from memory alone, and can give no samples of it to the reader; but Grosh and Walker will soon have some, when (we advise the reader in confidence) those who want them must apply soon, for they will go off like a shadow before the light! A. B. G.

We hope our Southern and Western friends will endeavor to assist us, now that we take their good money at par. Will they just take a glance at our terms for the next volume, also?

LOOK AT THIS!!!

We hope our patrons and friends will read the following short and sweet letter, and we care not how many "go and do likewise." Perhaps it would be asking too much to have them do so well, but how many will take hold of the work and obtain enough new subscribers (see terms) to get their own copy gratis? Are there not a great many who could easily do this? But to the letter.

"Chittenango, Nov. 27, 1843.

"Friends Grosh and Walker—Some two weeks since, I received from your office a circular for obtaining new subscribers, and was glad to see you had placed your paper on right ground. I have obtained fifteen subscribers, of which, six never have read, much less subscribed for a paper advocating the "faith once delivered to the saints," which our friends think is doing very well for this place, where self-styled Orthodoxy has blasted every germ of true religion and real happiness around, for years. I think I shall get about twenty subscribers. Your obedient servant,

B. D. FRENCH."

That's encouraging, and though a large favor, we assure our friends that small ones, such as one, two, three good cash paying subscribers, will be thankfully received.

THE SERMON

Published in our last, by some mishap of the printer, was sent into the world destitute of the author's name. The omission was not noticed, (the Editor not being at home to read the proof,) until after the paper was worked off. We therefore state here that the author is Br. Darwin Mott, pastor of the society in Madrid, St. Lawrence county. We thank him cordially for the favor, and thus apologize for the neglect which separated his name from his work. We hope he will excuse it.

A. B. G.

BR. C. B. BROWN.

We hope that the charitable and liberal among our readers in Central New York, will not forget that this brother is still a helpless sufferer, constantly needing aid, in the form of cash, provisions, bedding, and clothing, for himself and family, but especially at this season of the year. His neighbors have been very kind, and have been for four years past; but they can not do all he needs. Remember, then, the wants of our excellent brother.

A. B. G.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—We are very glad to receive a letter from Br. J. L. C. G., of Virginia. We had read occasional articles from his pen in some of our papers, so as to have become somewhat acquainted with him, and by reports had been led to esteem him for his work's sake.

The article he sends us on the unhappy publication named in it, we respectfully decline publishing, and hope that it will end where it began. We avoid as much as we can meddling in any private controversies, especially when they originate in other papers.—Besides, silence, now, is best, as the accused has had full opportunity for reply and defence, and the opposite party does not seem disposed to say any thing more on the subject. "Let by-gones be by-gones," is a good rule of action.

The other article we cheerfully publish. The pamphlet we have sent him.

A. B. G.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW noticed by Br. Soule is a capital work, well worth the money. How many of our laymen will prove themselves intelligent, thinking men, men fond of solid information and first rate themes of thought, by subscribing for the work? Send in your subscriptions—which means names and money—early. That Quarterly must be sustained. Each number will contain at least two articles worth double its cost.

A. B. G.

THE ROSE OF SHARON.—Our readers must not forget this elegant and interesting annual. Thanksgiving day is at hand—Christmas and New Year are coming—birthdays are constantly arriving—gifts of friendship and affection are always in season—and there is no book better suited for any or all those purposes than the Rose of Sharon. It costs but two dollars, and who would grudge that sum (if able at all to purchase the book) in making a present to brother, sister, child, wife, friend, or—some one dearer than a friend? Call and examine, and purchase it, at this office.

A. B. G.

We have received No. 6 of the Theological Library. It is a treatise on the consanguinity and affinity between Christ and his church. It contains 44 pages of closely printed matter and comes at the very low price of 12 1-2 cents.

Br. Tompkins—Credit Miss H. L. Chamberlain, Vermont, N. Y., $2.00 current Vol. Repository. Also, Miss E. A. Mason, of Perrinton, N. Y., 25 cents, (amount deducted for postage last August) and send her the January (last) No. she has not received it. Charge us.

PROSPECTUS

For the Fifteenth Volume of the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate.

Rev. H. B. Soule, Editor;

Revs. A. B. Grosh, A. C. Barray, S. R. Smith, D. Skinner, Corresponding Editors.

THIS old and useful periodical will be continued as heretofore, with the above changes in its Editorial Department; and a change to the CASH, or ADVANCE-PAY system. The principal Editor by becoming Corresponding Editor, secures to our columns the regular and continued productions of his pen. The Editor engaged in his stead is as prudent and talented, if not experienced; and will serve while he remains in this city. Should he remove, another, as well qualified, and entitled to public confidence, will be secured. The other Editors are too well known to need our commendations; and the engagement of Mrs. Smith and Skinner will, we hope, be taken as an earnest that we mean to endeavor deserving what we ask—the support of a liberal public.

We intend to test the substantiality of our patronage, by placing the Magazine and Advocate on the CASH system. Every paper sent out after the present volume, must be paid for in advance—and will be sent only as long as it is thus paid for. This plan is best for both subscribers and publishers, if both will unite in it. To subscribers, who will save the enhanced price, which now goes toward making up the loss on bad subscribers—and to publishers, who can then purchase for cash, and of course at a cheaper rate; and who will no longer lose what even the enhanced price does not make up. To both it will save the necessity—the disgusting and painful necessity—of writing and reading duns, complaints, and coaxing entreaties to delinquents, &c., &c.; which, on the credit system must always lumber our columns to the injury of the paper's credit and usefulness. Will our subscribers, one and all—for there can be no exceptions—support us in this mutually advantageous system? If so, let every one pay for next year before January next—in time for us to receive the money and enter them on our list before the first number of the new volume is issued. Those who send by mail, can remit a one or two dollar bill, (the Post Master will frank it, of course, if properly requested,) and we will send papers till the money is exhausted.

Our principles are the same as ever—Universalism in word and in deed—in theory and in practice—in heart, and soul, and daily conversation—in life and in death—now and forever! And every rational and proper means to bring its believers to the full adoption of this sentiment—to build them up, and make them "a peculiar people, zealous of good works"—and to bring out opposers to a knowledge and practice of the truth; will be mildly, but earnestly and constantly advocated by this paper, so as to render it increasingly worthy of a liberal support from liberal Christians generally, and from true-hearted, devoted Universalists especially.

TERMS.

The Magazine and Advocate is published every Friday, on a royal sheet, quarto form, for binding, at $1.50 per annum, invariably in advance.

HEART LONGINGS.

BY THOMAS MCKELLAR.

I long to be beloved. My bosom yearns
Tow'rd's all that's pure and beautiful; and fain
Would find a recompense of love again.
My pensive soul with ardent thirsting turns
To heaven and earth to seek its fill of love.
Beyond the sun's domain, in realms above,
Abideth many whom I loved on earth;
My father liveth there, and there my mother;
My sister there, and there my elder brother;
(For coldness rests on our paternal hearth;)
Though kin and friends remain who love me well;
I long to hear again my parents' voice—
With early loved ones fain would I rejoice,
And in God's presence, reunited dwell.

THE WITHERED GERANIUM.

Tell him my heart is with him still,
Though many days have passed,
Since in my pride and happiness
I gazed upon him last;
That all the love this bosom knew
When life was young and fair,
And his dear smile upon me beamed,
Is still unchanging there.

Go tell him that I treasured thee
And loved thee for his sake,
And how, when by my warm heart laid,
Its pulses thou wouldst wake;
O say how many a burning tale,
Thy little leaves have known,
To that of pure and fadeless love
For him and him alone.

Go tell him that I saw thee die,
When growing faint and weak,
And pressed thee still with thoughts of love
Close to my hectic cheek;
And trembled when the thought would come
That from the parent tree,
He plucked thee first with his own hand,
Then gave thee up to me.

Go tell him that the rosy bower
Has lost its summer bloom,
And she who sat within its shade
Is ripening for the tomb;
O tell him that I send thee back,
A faded gift to him,
To cast his kindling eye upon,
Long after mine is dim.

AN INCIDENT OF THE REVOLUTION.

In the summer of 1779, during one of the darkest periods of our revolutionary struggle, in the then village of S——, (though it now bears a more dignified title,) in this state, lived Judge V., one of the finest and truest patriots within the limits of the "Old Thirteen," and deep in the confidence of Washington. Like most men of his time and substance, he had furnished himself with arms and ammunition sufficient for the males of his household. They consisted of himself, three sons, and about twenty-five negroes. The female part of the family consisted of his wife and daughter Catharine, about eighteen years of age, the heroine of our tale, and several slaves. In the second story of his dwelling house, immediately over the door was a room called the "armory," in which the arms were deposited, and always kept ready for immediate use. About the time at which we introduce our story, the neighborhood was much annoyed by the nocturnal prowling and depredations of numerous Tories.

It was on a calm, bright Sabbath afternoon of the said summer, when Judge V. and his family, with the exception of his daughter Catharine, and an old indisposed slave, were attending service in a village church. Not a breath disturbed the serenity of the atmosphere—no sound profaned the sacredness of the day; the times were dangerous, and Catharine had locked herself and the old slave in the house, until the return of the family from church. A rap was heard at the front door.—"Surely," said Catharine to the slave, "the family have not come home; church can not be dismissed." The rap was repeated. "I'll see what it is," said Catharine, as she ran up stairs into the armory. On opening the window and looking down, she saw six men standing at the front door and on the opposite side of the street, three of whom were Tories, who formerly resided in that village; their names were Van Zandt, Finley and Sheldon; the other three were strangers, but she had reason to believe them to be of the same political stamp from the company in which she found them.

Van Zandt was a notorious character, and the number and enormity of his crimes had rendered his name infamous in that vicinity. Not a murder or robbery was committed within miles of S——, that he did not get the credit of planning or executing. The characters of Finley and Sheldon were also deeply stained with crime, but Van Zandt was a master spirit of iniquity. The appearance of such circumstances must have been truly alarming to a young lady of Catharine's age, if not to any lady young or old. But Catharine V. possessed her father's spirit—the spirit of the times. Van Zandt was standing on the step, rapping at the door, while his companions were talking in a whisper on the sidewalk on the opposite side of the street.

"Is Judge V. at home?" asked Van Zandt, when he saw Catharine at the window above.

"He is not," said she.

"We have business of importance with him, and if you will open the door," said Van Zandt, "we will walk in and remain till he returns."

"No," said Catharine, "when he went to church, he left particular directions not to have the doors opened till he and his family returned. You had better call when church is dismissed."

"No," retorted the villain, "we will enter now or never."

"Impossible," cried she, "you can not enter until he returns."

"Open the door," cried he, "or we'll break it down, and burn you and the house up together." So saying, he threw himself with all the force he possessed against the door, at the same time calling upon his companions to assist him. The door, however, resisted his efforts.

"Do not attempt that again," said Catharine, "or you are a dead man;" at the same time presenting from the window a heavy horseman's pistol, ready cocked.

At the sight of this formidable weapon, the companions of Van Zandt, who had crossed the street at his call, retreated.

"What!" cried their leader—"you are cowards, are you frightened at the threat of a girl?" And again he threw himself against the door; the weapon was discharged, and Van Zandt fell.

The report was heard at the church, and males and females at once rushed out to ascertain the cause. On looking toward the residence of Judge V., they perceived five men running at full speed to whom the Judge's negroes and several others gave chase, and from an upper window of his residence, a white handkerchief was waving as if beckoning for aid.

All rushed towards the place, and on their arrival, Van Zandt was in the agonies of death. He still retained strength to acknowledge that they had been frequently concealed in the neighborhood for that purpose, but no opportunity had offered until that day, when, lying concealed in the woods, they had seen the Judge and his family going to church.

The body of the dead Tory was taken up and buried by the Sexton of the church, as he had no relations in that vicinity.

After the absence of two hours or thereabouts, the negroes returned, having succeeded in capturing Finley and one of the strangers, who were that night confined, and the next morning, at the earnest solicitation of Judge V., liberated on promise of mending their lives.

It was in the month of October, of the same year, that Catharine V. was sitting by an upper back window of her father's house knitting; though autumn, the weather was mild, and the window was hoisted about three fathoms. About six and seventy feet from the rear of the house was the barn, a huge edifice, with upper and lower doors; the lower doors were closed, and accidentally casting her eyes towards the barn, she saw a small black door on a range with the front door and window at which she was sitting, open and a number of men enter.

The occurrence of the summer immediately presented itself to her, and the fact that her father and the other males of the family were at work in a field some distance from the house, led her to suspect that the opportunity had been improved, probably by some of Van Zandt's friends, to plunder and revenge his death. Concealing herself, therefore, behind the curtains, she narrowly watched their movements. She saw a man's head slowly rising above the door, and apparently reconnoitering the premises—it was Finley's. Their object was now evident. Going to the "armory," she selected a well loaded musket, and resumed her place by the window. Kneeling upon the floor, she laid the muzzle of the weapon upon the window-sill between the curtains, and taking deliberate aim, she fired. What effect she had produced she knew not, but saw several men hurrying out of the barn, by the same door they entered. The report brought her father and his workmen to the house, and going into the barn, the dead body of Finley lay upon the floor.

Catharine afterwards married a captain in the Continental army, and she lives the mother of a numerous and respectable line of descendants. The house is also in the land of the living, and has been the scene of many a prank of the writer of this tale in the heyday of his mischievous boyhood.

LOUIS PHILLIP'S LOVE OF ORDER.—Among the varied qualifications of the King of the French, none, perhaps, are more striking than his love of order. He has essentially an orderly mind. All his pecuniary arrangements, all his distribution of property, all his expenditure, all the management of his estates, all the provisions made for his children, all the matrimonial negotiations he has entered into for them, all his military plans, all his diplomatic measures, all his senatorial acts, all his conduct as a citizen, as subject, as a son, as a brother, as a prince, as an exile—all were stamped with a love and a principle of order. Thus it was in America, when possessed of but a very small income for the support of himself and his brothers, he kept a minute account of the expenditure of every dollar, and that account is still in his possession. This principle of order it is which enables him out of his civil list to found those glorious galleries of Versailles, which are indeed noble memorials of his taste, of his love of the fine arts, of his just sense of all that is national and grand, and which will continue during many generations to add lustre to his great name, and to mark with just and deserved fame the age in which he flourished. Louis Philippe has been accused of parsimony, of meanness, and of a love of money, not for the sake of applying it to great and wise ends, but of a love of money for the pleasure of hoarding up wealth. The charge is unjust. No prince has contributed more than the king of the French has done, of his own private wealth, to adorn the palaces, improve the parks and gardens, enrich the galleries and museums, encourage the arts, manufactures, sciences, and agriculture of his people. But he is economical, prudent and just, as well as liberal, generous and noble; and it is this union of excellences which constitutes his grand characteristic of order.—Fraser's Magazine.

The greatest repose which a man can enjoy, is that which he feels in desiring nothing.

He is a free man who desires nothing; and he is a slave who expects that which he wishes.

REFLECTIONS ON THE LIFE OF MURRAY...NO. I.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

That the Ruler of the universe does his will on the earth, as well as in the armies of heaven, is a truth as clearly attested by "the course of human events," as it is distinctly declared by the inspired Word. The all-wise Deity chooses his own ways and selects his own instruments, in accomplishing his purposes among the children of men. And although the means and instrumentalities to which he resorts, often appear very singular and altogether inadequate to the work in which they are to be employed, yet the result invariably proves that divine Wisdom has made no error in the arrangement of its plans.

In contemplating the history of the world, we can not fail to see that when the Divine Being designs to accomplish any great work on the earth, in which the welfare of his creatures is involved, he raises up certain men for the express purpose of making them the chief instruments in commencing and carrying on the undertaking. And he seems mysteriously so to shape their lives, and so to lead them by his invisible hand, that while they undoubtedly feel they are acting according to their own will, yet they seem irresistibly directed, as it were, by the force of circumstances, into a career which they had never even dreamed was before them. The histories of Moses, of Saul, David, Cyrus, Paul and the other Apostles, with many others that might be named, who have taken a prominent part in the affairs of the world, all go to prove the correctness of these suggestions. When Luther, the poor monk of Ebrfurt, first ventured to whisper his discontent of the gross hypocrisies and corruptions of the Roman church, can it be supposed he had the slightest conception that he was to become a renowned reformer? Could he have imagined that he was destined to put into operation a movement which was to shake hoary thrones, pull down old governments and build up new, change the whole face of the religious world, and bring out Christianity from much of the darkness which had for ages obscured its brightest beauties? And yet who can doubt that God raised him up expressly for the part he took in this great revolution? It is in such events that we see the truth of the poet's words—

"God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform."

Since the days of the Reformation, there has been no instance where the interposition of Divine Providence in the affairs of men, has been more signally manifested, than in the establishment of the doctrine of Universal Grace in this country, and the raising up of its first great and successful preacher, Rev. JOHN MURRAY. Those who were contemporaries with Murray, and aided and encouraged him in his important work, might not amid the fierce and bitter opposition which beset him and them, at every step, have discovered so clearly the hand of God in calling him to be an ambassador of the Saviour of the world. But when we, in our advanced day, look back and contemplate the remarkable history of that servant of the Most High, in connection with the wonderful changes which he was instrumental in effecting in the religious world, and the important results which have already been the fruit of his labors, we can not fail of being sensibly struck with the visible manifestation of the finger of the Deity, in his call and his ministry. If there ever was an uninspired man raised up by Providence to do a great work, I verily believe that man was John Murray. The history of his life shows such wonderful coincidences, such a marvelous concatenation of circumstances, such singular combinations of events, that taken in connection with the result to which they all tended, even the establishment of a denomination which bids fair in due time, to become one of the most numerous and influential in the land, the reflecting mind distinctly perceives the workings of a Wisdom altogether surpassing that of man.

"Thick darkness around his throne he draws,
His work performs, conceals the cause;
But though his methods are unknown,
Judgment and truth support his throne."

John Murray was born in Alton, England, on the 10th day of December, A. D. 1741. When but a child, he seems to have won all hearts, by the benevolence of his disposition and the sweetness of his temper. In this we see how perfectly his natural temperament was adapted by the Creator, to the reception of those pure, charitable and heavenly sentiments, of which he in after years, became so eminent a proclaimer. His parents were respectable people in easy circumstances, and rigidly Calvinistic in their religious sentiments, which they took great pains to instil into the mind of their son. But God had implanted nothing in the soul of young Murray, in consonance with the cold and cheerless system of Calvin. The highest emotion it could inspire in him, in regard to God and religion, was gloomy foreboding and alarm.—It made him view the Creator as his enemy, and religion as destined only to deprive him of those innocent enjoyments, which his soul naturally craved. And such is the influence of all terrific tenets on every youthful heart. The young behold nothing in them attractive or beautiful—nothing in sympathy with the open, generous, free impulses, which they feel stirring within them. They never adopt the cruel and heartless creeds of men when under the legitimate influence of the emotions which God infused into their souls. It is only when impelled by overwhelming fear, that they violate the natural instincts of their hearts, and really embrace doctrines which chill the very life-blood of cruelty itself.

When Murray was eleven years of age, his father removed to Ireland, near the city of Cork.—About this time, the Methodists, who were then coming into notice under the eloquent preaching of John Wesley, established themselves in that vicinity. His father soon became a zealous friend and adherent of the new sect. And John Murray, finding something a little more congenial to his sympathetic and ardent temperament, in the warmth and zeal of the Methodists, very readily joined their ranks, and entered with spirit into all their religious movements. While quite a lad he attracted the attention of Wesley himself, who made him the leader of a class of boys, that had been awakened by the revival then in vigorous operation. With these boys he prayed, and sung, and exhorted, and discharged all the duties of a class leader, to the great satisfaction of his parents and friends. Indeed it is clearly evident from his history, that Murray, in his early days, was a precocious lad—outstripping in maturity of thought, all his young associates. He was also gifted with uncommon readiness of speech and quickness of apprehension—characteristics which eminently distinguished him through life. Even aged and devout persons, looked upon him with surprise and admiration, and declared he was "destined to become a burning and a shining light!" This prediction was literally fulfilled; but how differently from the manner which those who made it, anticipated! For a short time after arriving at manhood, Murray preached to great acceptance among the Methodists. But he finally removed to London, and entered into secular business. Here he attached himself to the Whitfield Methodists—whose Calvinistic notions agreed with the views he had early imbibed from his father. Soon after this, he was married to Miss Eliza Neal, a most amiable young lady, to whom he was attached with an affection of uncommon depth and intensity.

ADDRESS

Delivered at a public examination of the students of Raymondville Academy, April 12th, 1842.

BY WM. J. GRANDY.

The time has now arrived, fellow students, when we who have so long associated together in a school, are met, some of us perhaps for the last time. The time I hope we have not unprofitably spent in storing our minds for future usefulness, and the varied scenes of pleasure through which we have passed, are now at an end. But the strong ties of friendship, which now bind us together, will still exist in the memory of the past; and though time and distance may estrange the smiling faces which I now behold, yet will the enjoyments of the past season, in which we all have participated, cast a ray of sunshine upon our path, amid the cares and trials to which we are subject in future life. Although some of you may meet, and enjoy the pleasure of each other's society again, and again have the privilege of appearing before an assembly like this, yet such is not my lot. Long ere you meet again in the capacity in which we have assembled this evening, should fortune smile upon me, my foot will have pressed the fertile soil of Ohio—or perhaps the shores of the distant Mississippi—or no man knoweth but it may be that fair and happy land to which we are all so swiftly hastening. The withering hand of disease, whose power I have already felt in some measure, tells me to "Boast not of to-morrow," for I know not what a day may bring forth! To-morrow is not mine! But should I be spared to return, we know not how many sparkling eyes which now gaze upon me will be dimmed by the cruel hand of death—or how many cheeks tinged with the ruddy glow of health and beauty, will be laid in the cold grave, by the pale monster in his devastating march. But though I should never again be permitted to associate with you and enjoy your society, yet long, long will the remembrance of the joyous and happy hours we have spent together be cherished in my bosom; and, fellow students, when in a distant land I am toiling in adversity or blessed with prosperity, Oh

"Now and then send

A wish or a thought after me,
To tell me I yet have a friend,
Though a friend I am never to see."

But as I wish to be brief, I would say to those with whom I have spent the past season, continue in the path pointed out by our judicious Instructor, which leads to the attainment of that knowledge which will enable us to become useful in our day and generation; and above all, strive to obtain that knowledge which maketh the heart glad—and which gives us the blessed assurance that though we are called to part here on earth, yet, when time will have laid us in the silent grave—when time will have crumbled the works of nature and art—when time will have rolled together this earth as a scroll—and when time shall be no more—then we shall all "Return to Zion with songs of everlasting joy upon our heads," to spend the ceaseless ages of eternity in one eternal round of praise—and where parting will be no more.—So mote it be.

REFLECTIONS IN A HOUSE OF DEATH.

BY MRS. S. ELIZA GIBSON.

And is she indeed dead? I place my hand upon her brow; it is cold and clammy. I bend an ear to listen to the low whisperings of her breath; it has gone out, and all is hushed. I press a hand upon the once beating heart; it is motionless, and its pulsations are all stilled; and because these are so, is she dead? Will her closed eye never again open, to beam upon those who lived beneath her smile of affection—will that clay-cold brow never again be warmed by the animating principles of life; and will that pallid cheek never again, in glowing blushes, speak the language of long cherished emotions? Will those lips, once of carnation hue, never again open, to call upon friends ever named in warmth and holiness of feeling; and will those cold and stiffened hands never again with winning gesture, be extended to receive the now lone and motherless babe? Can it be, that that heart will never again resume its office, to send the life-current over that still and motionless frame? They tell me never—and this is death! How wonderful that it should produce so great a change!

And must my friends—those who are bound to me by ties so strong, that, to sever them would seem like the sundering of life's chains, must they too, be laid thus low? They must, they must.—Oh, how can I bear to think it will be so; and if I can not bear to think of such a change, how ill prepared indeed should I be to stand by the bed-side, to hear, and to repeat that last, lone word, "farewell." How ill prepared to see the lamp of life go out in the darkness of death, and those I love, lowered in the narrow coffin to the last, low resting place of the dead. But—I too must die! Yes, yes I must die; yet I can not realize it; I can feel that all others must submit to the mandate of this monarch of earth's children, but I can not realize that death has power over me. And why? I place my hand upon her brow; it is icy cold, while mine glows with living warmth. The pulsation of the arteries, too, as the life-current passes beneath my fingers, in its now wild and tumultuous flow; speaks not of a time when the purple blood shall be curdled by the freezing breath of the king of terrors. And yet it must be so. The time will come when I shall lay me down and be as cold, as lifeless, and as motionless as she; and others will look on and say, "this is death!" And that last sad hour may not be far distant. A season of sickness, of pain and anguish, like that which she endured, or, perhaps, but a moment's warning may make me more conscious that the time of departure is at hand; and going before them, I shall be spared the pain of seeing any of my friends enter the darkened and shadowed valley. Ah, how dark—how kindly the future!

But again, I press a hand upon these throbbing temples. Within is that which thinks, which prompts to act, which wills, loves, and adores—yea, within are burning thoughts which the feeble powers of speech can not employ language to utter; and this I call myself. Now when the "mortal coil," the frail tenement, which entwines around, and encases this, shall be laid low in the earth, to moulder back to its native elements; will this, the spirit follow, and with it mingle back to dust? Some may answer "yea;" but such have never asked their thoughts if they could die. And such would call an existence like thine, pale corpse, LIFE. O did we all live to be old—did we all live till the tabernacle of clay became ruined and shattered, till its windows became so dimmed by the breath of age that the soul could not shine forth upon the world without; then it were more possible to persuade us, that the taper is mortal, and goes out in the dark abode of the tomb. But, no; the infant, the youth, the muddled aged die. Some live to labor and toil a few short years, and then they lay them down in death's bed, and must it be to rise no more forever? Others suffer pain and affliction, struggle against misfortune and adversity, and then die; but must such be the volume of their existence, and such a close, the finis? Or, perhaps, in the few short moments, as it were, of their stay, they may have learned how bright it is to hope, and how good it is to realize—they may have felt how blissful and blessed a thing it is to have friends—to be loved by them and to love in return; but must hope so soon go out in eternal darkness, fruition be snatched away to be never again tasted, and such endearing ties of holy affection, be severed never to be reunited? Can it be, that this devoted wife and mother, who is now so suddenly snatched from the husband of her love, and the child of her care, ere scarce twenty summers have deepened the lustre of her eye, and ripened her heart in affection—can it be, that after so many of sorrow's dregs have been mingled in the cup of her earthly happiness, she shall be taken away, thus pale and statue-like, to meet them no more forever? Oh, believe this ye who can; and with this belief, wear away as you may, the burden of your lives!—but for me,

"I will not bow me so,
To thoughts that breathe despair!
A loftier faith we need below,
Life's farewell words to bear!"

THE JUBILEE.

Every thing that was written of old, was written for our instruction, on whom the ends of the world are come. Now, Israel, when redeemed from Egyptian bondage, had both a Sabbatical year appointed them, and the great Jubilee. The first was every seventh year, that not only weeks, but years might have their Sabbath; and the last was, when a week of Sabbatical years was completed. There was also a full, general release, respecting every individual, when, after six years service, the man-servant and maid-servant were set at liberty, and the heirs entered again into their possessions. All these, Israel, by divine command, observed; and though their deliverance from Egyptian bondage was thereby commemorated, yet it respected a much diviner and more interesting liberty. By one, the land was to rest; by another, the laborers were enlarged; and by the third, the lawful heirs returned to the inheritance of their fathers. And may not this prefigure, that wherever the Gospel is promulgated, the land that reeled to and fro, that was moved exceedingly because the transgressions of its inhabitants were heavy upon it, is favored with a kind of rest and repose, in comparison of those places where the beams of the house, and the stones of the wall, cry out to one another? Again, is not here prefigured the deliverance of the Adamic family of man, from the slavery of sin, into the glorious liberty of the sons of God? And, lastly, is not here shadowed out the salvation of the whole world, (not a part,) from the ignorance, idolatry, and darkness that overspread all nations?

But though the Jews had both their Sabbatical year, and great Jubilee, yet they could not be made partakers of that love without the Gospel dispensation. Therefore, all their grand epochs were only typical of "the acceptable year of the Lord," when the great High Priest of God, with the trumpet of the everlasting Gospel, proclaimed liberty to the captives, the opening of the prison doors to them that were bound, not only through all the land of Israel, but to the ends of the earth. It was not strange, that the people who lived in the times of types and shadows, without us, should not be made perfect; but it is strange that those who fall asleep in Christ, and so have past their week of trouble, and entered on the year of release, on the Sabbath of rest, (so graciously has God connected things,) though possessed of all felicity, can not, without us, who are expectants of the same state, be made perfect; as their souls (spirits) wait for the resurrection of their bodies, that the whole man may exalt and enjoy him, who is the "Father of the spirits of all flesh." Now, though the seventh year was very pleasant and divine, yet the jubilee in all respects excelled it very far, being proclaimed with loud sounding trumpets to the ends of the land, inviting the captive to liberty, and the impoverished heirs to their paternal estates.—But the jubilee of the glorious Gospel darkens description itself, being "glad tidings of great joy to all people," and a general proclamation to disinherited spendthrifts and bankrupts to return, through their elder brother, who has redeemed the mortgaged inheritance, to the full and ample possession of spiritual things, of which they shall never be again despoiled.

But the grandest and most glorious jubilee of all, is the jubilee of glory, when the great trumpet of eternity shall be blown, and all nations which now seem outcasts in the land of mortality, shall hear and assemble, and enter into the full possession of the immortal kingdom. In this great and last jubilee, all former deliverances shall be summed up, so that there shall be no after-mortgaging of the inheritance, as might take place among the Israelites, no fears of being dispossessed of the land of promise, which often vex many a Limitarian's breast. The blast of the ram's horn was heard all over Israel—the sound of the Gospel shall be preached in all the world; but the last trumpet shall be heard in heaven, earth, and hades; (or the grave,) so that the family of man in all ages shall be equal sharers in this jubilee that shall end their and our sorrows, and begin our and their joys. Then shall the ransomed family of man enter, not into a sabbatical year that can be succeeded by time, but into a sabbatical eternity, even an eternal Sabbath of rest that shall never have an end, there to enjoy bliss, throughout the unending ages of eternity.

A QUERY.

In perusing a work, abridged from the writings of the Rev. A. Keith on the prophecies, published by the American Tract Society, my mind was forcibly impressed with the reading of the following language, respecting the Jews and the sufferings which they have endured.

"And who that either thinks on the great and wonderful miseries which every where they have suffered so long, or believes that the receiving of them shall be life from the dead to those who yet sit in darkness under the shadow of death, and to those, also, who have but a name to live, and yet are dead—can refrain from feeling a deep interest in their fate, or from cherishing an ever-earnest wish and offering up many a fervent prayer, that the close of their long-continued plagues may be hastening on, when God will bind up the breach of his people and heal the strokes of their wound; and surely it is full time to try whether Christian kindness and those efforts on which the blessing of God may be expected, may not be the means of preparing the way for their conversion, and for effecting far more, in a short space toward that prophetic consummation of all their miseries, than all that coercive measures, or savage cruelty ever have been, or ever could be, able to accomplish."

Now this is, indeed, remarkable language for a believer in the doctrine of endless misery to put forth, inasmuch as it would be difficult for him to reconcile it with his own creed, and the consequences which are said to follow such a faith. Surely, the Jews have suffered the severest affliction that has ever fallen to a nation upon the earth. The unsparing finger of scorn has ever pointed directly toward their habitation and the demon of un pitying cruelty ever followed hard in their footsteps; or, at least, such has been their situation during nearly, if not quite, the whole period of the last eighteen centuries. Their suffering has been such as to arouse the feelings of sorrow, in every truly pious and Christian heart; and we wonder not that the writer above quoted, should, as he intimates, earnestly desire, and pray God to bring their sufferings to a consummation. This is commendable—it is a desire worthy of a Christian, and a prayer from the heart, where, for the time being, there

Where are those thousands of Jews that perished so horribly, at the siege and destruction of Jerusalem? Where are the thousands of the same people that have gone down to their solitary tombs, during the last eighteen centuries, followed by the scourging hand of a relentless persecution?—where are those, we inquire? According to the faith of the sympathetic author above quoted, they long since made their abode within the dismal caverns of an endless hell! And there, throughout unnumbered ages, they are to endure suffering, such that the miseries, the horrors, and the woes which they suffered at the siege of Jerusalem, and all which they have endured since that memorable event, bear no proportion, a mere mote is to a ponderous mountain; a drop to the heaving ocean, so much less were the sufferings of those Jews in this world, compared to their sufferings in the fiery furnace of an endless hell, in the future world!—And yet, how is that suffering to operate upon the pious heart of the Christian, while in the regions of immortal glory, he has a view of their misery? Will he “refrain from feeling a deep interest in their fate, or from cherishing an ever-earnest wish, and offering up many a fervent prayer, that the close of their long continued plagues may be hastening on, when God will bind up the breach of his people and heal the stroke of their wound?” Yes, he will refrain from these things; for such sympathetic feelings, desires, and prayers, are not permitted to enter the blissful abode of the saints—of the just made perfect; but they are only fitted to the inhabitants of earth, whose minds are low and grovelling in their nature; and hence in that kingdom of perfection—of endless love and boundless benevolence, will be seen a different order of things. There, no feeling of love, for the wayward, and unfortunate, and doomed beings, will ever fill the chambers of the soul! There, no emotion of sympathy will stir the deep sensibilities of the heart! There, no desire will ever arouse the soul to send up a humble petition in behalf of the sufferer. But there, arrayed in his robe, made white by being washed in the blood of the Lamb, and with his golden harp in his hand, the Christian will stand upon the confines of that blissful abode, and while full before his view are millions of those who were bound to him in life, suffering the vengeance of everlasting burnings and putting forth the moans of a dread and endless despair, he will sweep the strings of his harp in a song of praise, and chant glory to his God! But has there not been a remarkable change wrought in the mind of this Christian, since his sojourn upon earth? Indeed—else he would sorrow over mankind, suffering misery in the future world, as well as he does in this. Where, then, is that doctrine which tells us that there is no change after death? Ah, we have gone on too rapidly with our thoughts. The Christian meets with no change in a future world, but he there sees the justice of God displayed, in the endless punishment of the sinner; especially in the endless punishment of the rebellious Jews; and hence, in view of the same, he can praise God for the things which he has accomplished. Indeed, and does the Christian rejoice when he beholds the justice of God displayed? It is even so. And does God ever act upon the principles of injustice, in his dealings with the children of men? Never. Then of course his justice is displayed in that punishment and misery, which have followed the Jewish people during the last eighteen centuries? Surely. Then why does not the Christian rejoice in view of this punishment? Why does he, as above quoted, offer up “many a fervent prayer, that the close of their long continued sufferings may be hastening on when God will bind up the breach of his people, and heal the strokes of their wound?” We fear that the Christian seldom indulges thoughts like these; for if he did, we are certain that many inconsistencies which now appear in this doctrine, would be given up, and a more rational system be adopted.

It has long been a query, in my mind, how so much

GLIMPSSES OF THE SPIRITUAL STATE.

"Lord, remember me, when thou comest into thy kingdom."

I, for one, do believe that the malefactor, who spake these words to Jesus, had allusion to the spiritual kingdom, in the celestial world—because they were both just ready to be crucified; and according to the answer which Jesus gave, he knew this was his meaning; for he said—"To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise." *

We find there is much said in the Scriptures respecting the kingdom of heaven, and it is often spoken of as being with mankind on earth. An apostle said—"Our conversation† is in heaven, from whence we look for the Saviour the Lord Jesus Christ." To me it is plain—that wherever God is, there heaven is also; and it is the veil of mortality which blinds our eyes from the invisible world of glory. According to scriptural accounts, the curtain which separates between the earthly and the heavenly, was often drawn aside, so that the disciples of Christ had a glimpse of the celestial world of glory, even while they were in the body. The glory of heaven was seen on the mount by Peter and John. They saw two persons, (Moses and Elias) talking with Jesus.

The heavens were opened to the eyes of Stephen! Jacob had a glimpse of the heaven in which he "moved and had his being," when he "awaked out of his sleep, and said—surely the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not! How dreadful is this place! This is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven!" "Moses, and seventy of the elders of Israel, saw the God of Israel,—and there was under his feet, as it were, a paved work of sapphire-stone, and as it were, the body of heaven in his clearness."

When Elisha the Prophet prayed for his servant, "the Lord opened the eyes of the young man, and he saw; and behold the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha."

When Saul of Tarsus was on his way to Damascus, "a light shone round about him,"—and he heard the voice of Jesus, which said, "Saul, why persecutest thou me?" Had the curtain of mortality been withdrawn, to me it is probable, that Saul would have seen Jesus as perfectly as he heard him speak.

Jesus did often vanish out of sight, (before his ascension,) and the eyes of the people were "holden," so that they could not see him for a space of time. Angels administered to him; and a convoy of angels were present with the shepherds to proclaim the news of his birth. When Peter and John saw Jesus in glory—with Moses and Elias—had the whole veil of mortality been removed, what a heavenly world would have appeared to their view. Indeed, methinks, such glorious mansions would have appeared as is not possible for the heart of man to conceive.

The immortal power of Jesus is every where present. He is continually carrying on that work which his Father gave him to do. The work of Jesus is to "open the prison doors," and set the captive free from the galling chains of sin and misery—and this work must be done by suffering and death. "If we suffer with Christ, we shall reign with him." The believer and unbeliever, both suffered with Jesus on the cross—and according to the promise, they do reign with Christ in glory. To me it is plain, that so fast as we go off the stage of this life, just so fast "death is swallowed up in victory." When we step out of the body,

* I hope the reader will be pleased to forgive me for thus freely expressing my own opinion. L. H.

† NOTE—by the Editor.—The word conversation, as used by the translators, meant at that time every kind of intercourse—all the acts of social life and intercommunication. The original word is derived from one signifying a city or community, and has relation to a republic, community, or general government. It may therefore be properly rendered, and is rendered by many good translators and commentators, "our citizenship is in heaven"—meaning, that is our abiding city—our proper country and community—our home. In this world we are sojourners only for a season—subjects, it is true of the kingdom established here by the King of that country—but heaven, only, is our home.

A. B. G.

we then appear in the presence of God and the holy angels. We are then made "free from the dominion of sin," and thus an "end is made of sin and transgression."

This glorious work of Jesus will be carried on, until "all enemies shall be destroyed," and until "all shall know the Lord," "whom to know is life eternal." When all things shall be made new, then "the glory of the Lord will cover the earth, as the waters do the sea." Then "every creature in heaven, on earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, will sing the praises of God and the Lamb forever and ever." LUCY HORTON.

LOVE OF GOD.

Love in the creature is a noble grace, but superlatively glorious in God. On it angels look and admire; and we should look and adore. Every thing in God has the majesty of a God. Hence his mercy is in the heavens; his truth reacheth to the clouds; his judgments are in the earth; his pity is like that of a father; he is ready to forgive; he is good to all; and his tender mercies are over all (not so me of) his works! And his love in height, breadth, depth, and length, is past knowledge. Although, some say, "the mercy-seat that dwells so long between the cherubim of Gospel-grace, shall in a little time be turned into the fiery throne of judgment, and long-abused patience into indignation and wrath; when the royal signet, that sealed the salvation of thousands, shall stamp the irreversible doom of an unbelieving world; yet, at the same time (they say,) the love of God shall undergo no change." Dear readers, this needs no comment; for the latter part of the sentence contradicts the former; and you must know it is false. The love of God, here, shines as the morning-star, through the scattered clouds; there, (in the immortal kingdom,) it is as the noon-day sun, in the illuminated regions of fruition. "From everlasting to everlasting," is the epithet of love. A love without beginning and without end, gives a bliss without limits and bounds. This amazing love of God should produce a sweet similitude in the love of his creatures; so that as the one measures with the existence of God, from everlasting to everlasting, the other will measure with the existence of the new creature, from the hour of the resurrection to all eternity. Their gifts shall end, their graces change, faith be turned into vision, hope into fruition; but love shall neither end nor change; it shall heighten and brighten in the altitude of glory, when the drop is lost in the ocean, when the spirits of all flesh arrive at their Centre, and rest, with ineffable complacency, and unknown delight in God.

Again—Oh, how free is this love of God! nothing moving him to love, but the sinfulness and misery of man. When we love, it is for something we think excellent and agreeable to us; but he loves sinful man when weltering in his own blood, and, as a proof of such love, only read your Bibles, and you will find it in almost every chapter of the New Testament.

Again—God's love is a full love. The mighty oceans ebb and flow; if at one time they cover the shores, at another time they leave their beds bare and dry; but God's love is perfect in its plenitude. Notwithstanding its boundless tides have watered the whole universe—have run in mighty torrents among the angelic and seraphic hosts above, and in amazing inundations among fallen men below—though there be repeated manifestations of love to the Adamic family, and thousands of them feast on this heavenly food, while travelling through the howling wilderness of mortality; yet the flowings of divine love, through the unnumbered ages of eternity, shall be continued to the Adamic throng, and still its ardor and exuberance will be evermore the same. The ocean will not be one drop less for all the waterings of the fields of bliss. After the Sun of Righteousness, through a duration in eternity beyond human conception, and above the reach of thought, has illuminated the spacious continuent of glory with his beams; not one ray—not one irradiation, shall be in the least diminished.

Again—God's love is efficient, active, and an operative love. I may love a fellow-creature, an absent friend, and yet avail them nothing, nor they so much as know it; but the love of God, like the light, reveals itself wherever it is. Love draws, and we ought to obey; his love constrains, compels our love; for a sinner can not choose but love. Wherever the heavenly spark falls, it sets the creature in love to his God and fallen man.

Again—the love of God is a fixed and unchangeable love; and the more the person is in sorrow or distress, the more free and full are the communications of divine love. In the time of need, the world's love will give us the slip; but in the most calamitous circumstances, sacred love performs the part of two loves, and sticketh closer than a brother. Mortals' love, (alas! how many can attest the truth of this!) may to-day appear ardent, steadfast, and sincere; but to-morrow be entirely cooled; yea, converted into slander, hatred, and revenge. But let all the created intelligences of God know, that divine love shall be to them what the holy waters were to the prophet, ever on the increase, till it be an ocean to swim in for ever. Against fears on every side, this is comfort—that God will rest in his love.

Divine love is also a beneficent love. Jonathan loved David exceedingly, but could not do much for him, nor save him from being expelled his native country; but the love of God is fruitful of every blessing—is the tree that bears all kinds of fruits that nourish the spirit, and feast every power. The love of poor men can bring no advantage to the persons loved; but when God sets his love upon a person, at once, he who had nothing of late, has all things—life, liberty, friends, riches, glory, a kingdom; sufficiency here, and all-sufficiency hereafter; in a word, all that can be named, sought after, wished for, or thought upon. Then, ye sons of earth! do not hug yourselves in the embrace of wealth, and bless your own condition; but think you are the favorites of Heaven because his common providence pours gifts upon you. As for me, may I be the object of this love, and, in spite of poverty, I am rich; in spite of sin, I am in a measure secure, and walk on triumphantly to the better country. And not I alone—but if all would be governed by this love, instead of the fears of an endless hell, we should not need to meet with so much of a change at the sound of the trumpet, before entering into the joy of our Lord. Now, I firmly believe that all will be changed at the dawn of the resurrection morn, if not St. Paul did not know what he was writing about.

But again—the love of God is an intimate love. Oh how the high and lofty One reveals the secrets, and the sweets of his love to man in his Word, where he condescends to come and dwell! When by the Holy Ghost the love of God is shed abroad in the soul, what heavenly joy refreshes the whole inner man! "I know thee by name," says Job; "I beseech thee show me thy glory," says Moses. The intimacy begun in time, will be the bliss of eternity, and in greater or lesser degree is the privilege of every believer in this love. The more our fellowship is with the Father, and his Son Jesus Christ, the more of his divine likeness we shall put on; and in the other world, in the different degrees of assimilation to God, consist the different degrees of glory.

Again—the love of God is infinite; and what that is, none but an infinite Being knows. Ours is a spark, his the sun; ours a drop, his the ocean. And his love is uninterrupted. Not sin within us, hell without us, nor the Limitarian devil tempting us, can interrupt his love; and this is encouragement to serve him in spite of sin and mortality as well as we can.

Lastly—his love is eternal. Heaven and earth shall pass away, but love will not. Time must end with us, but love attends us beyond the grave. Death cools the love of the nearest relations, but can not separate from the love of God. Love is the quintessence of bliss, the heart of heaven, the joy and song of the angels, and the character of God; yes, "for God is love" says one of the apostles. O happy day! when I, together with the ransomed family of man, shall rise to enjoy love equal to the angels and all the anthems of angelic choirs! Dear readers, may you seek for this love, which is immutable and imperishable, and as immovable as the rock of ages, and as illimitable as God's own immensity. And may the bright beams of the Sun of Righteousness rest upon the path of all future life, dispel the dark mists which earthly passion may engender, roll back the clouds of error and ignorance, and with their refulgent radiance light us in our upward march of intellect. And may you have that love to brighten your passage through the valley of the shadow of death to immortality and endless bliss.

WM. D. BRADFORD.

REMARKS.—Br. Bradford's articles are very acceptable—particularly that on the Love of God; the other being rather figurative, though breathing a good, doctrinal spirit, and a correct sentiment generally. We should be pleased to hear from him as often as convenient, though he is a stranger to us in the flesh.

STREET CONVERSATION—SHORT, IF NOT SWEET.

"Good morning, Br. H.; I have heard a strange story about you. I hope it's a lie—it must be an unfounded report—have you become a Universalist preacher, I should like to know?"

"I am happy to inform you, sir, that I have become a minister of the reconciliation."

"Well, you don't preach Universalism do you?"

"I publish the news of the Gospel of glad tidings of great joy which shall be unto all people."

"Are you a Universalist, then?"

"I am in belief, a thorough one; but in practice I fall short, yet endeavor to carry out in action the principles of Universalism as shown in the life of the Oracle and Exemplar of the doctrine, the Lord Jesus Christ."

"Well, but do you believe the Universalist doctrine?"

"After a serious, earnest and prayerful study of the Scriptures, I am convinced that that belief is the truth for these reasons—"

"You say, then, that the wicked will go to heaven, such as murdered, when they die, do you not?"

"I believe that the principle of God is an all powerful agent in saving mankind, not in, but from their sins—"

The last of this sentence died in empty air, for the worthy Partialist friend made himself suddenly invisible!

SYNOD OF DORT.

I have recently had put into my hands, a work on the subject of election together with the creed, &c., of the Synod of Dort. It has been read carefully and prayerfully, as I was requested. I now desire to make my views public on the subject.—True it is, that of all the Phrenologists that have felt my caput, not one has seen fit to make known to me that the bump of combativeness was very prominent; yet I feel in duty bound to say, I can not agree with the author; and all I can say, must be, that I am an odd mortal, and foreordained so to be. He states that "he can not conceive how any person can read the canons of the Synod of Dort, and compare them with the Bible, and not be convinced." He contends that pain is the result of wearied nature, and is symbolical (being often the effect of sin, which wearies nature) of the future pains of the lost!

Again—speaking of eating and drinking unworthily at the table of the Lord, quoting 1 Corinthians xi: 29, he says the superstitions and fears of many may lead them to consider this sin unpardonable—its translation is harsh—and then he cites Dr. Doddridge, who appears to regret that our translation here assumes a harshness which the original does not require, considering it a most unhappy mistake in all the versions of our Bible.—(See D.'s Family Expositor—note.) He argues that the word Krina signifies judgment, and is often so rendered. He says the Dutch translation expresses this idea by the word (Oordeel); in this instance as well as many others, to be preferred to the English. He then assumes that instead of, or for, the word "damnation," we ought to understand temporal affliction, and quotes 1 Cor. xi: 30. "This is good as far as it goes; but if our translators have been harsh in one case, have they not in two, and so on? For one, I think that if more pains were taken in reading the Bible as a connected link, with a desire to understand, and not just read to say we have read, no great need would be found for the use of so much sophistry to get at its meaning, and men would not be so elaborate to try and twist isolated passages to meet their own desired views; knowing that each man enjoyed a mind of his own, and could read for himself that blessed book, which is so plain that "a wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein." ### A STRAY LEAF.

My old Herbarium—there it lies—two quires of foolscap enclosed in a paste-board cover, tied with green ribbon. It contains but a small collection of faded wild-flowers apparently valueless, but to me inexpressibly dear.

Pale withered blossoms! a few short years have they survived their beautiful sisterhood, but how are they changed! The rainbow tints, the graceful outlines, the delicate pencilling of the silken petals, the fragrant breath, have all departed.—They are but shadows of the past, yet they embody a world of pleasant memories, and unseal a fountain overflowing with sweet, sad thoughts.

I wish for no better journal of one happy summer, than my old Herbarium. I love to linger over its dim pages and muse upon the bright scenes that glide before me, as if led by the hand of magic.

Let us turn the leaves. Here are some early violets. Their "voiceless lips" are eloquent.—Strange, that those frail things should be here, while she who gathered them has passed from among us, and the grass is already thick above her low damp bed. She was the companion of many a delicious ramble. Often have we spent whole summer afternoons in roaming through the woods, forming acquaintance with the "fairy throng of flowers," and holding sweet converse together. Those "hours were traced in lines of golden sunlight," and they will return no more. She has gone, but her home is in a fairer clime, and Hope whisper's "ye shall meet again."

Here is a water-lily; and on the next page, a pale anemone. In vain do I look for some remains of that delicate beauty which distinguished them in days of yore. The pearly white of their petals, has changed to a greyish tint, and the rich, green leaves are now a dingy yellow. Well do I remember where they grew. It is a sweet spot—that small clear pond, bordered by a few ancient willows whose shadows extend far down the crystal depths, is a fitting home for the Nymphaea Odorata. There too, the Sarracenia Purpurea rears its curious form, and blue-eyed grapes gaze meekly up towards heaven.

On the last leaf of my Herbarium is a group of humble blossoms—a daisy—a butter-cup, and dandelion. They are clustered around with recollections of childhood, when to gather them, was pleasure unmixed with pain.

There is a loveliness about these way side flowers. Almost unnoticed, they live—smile alike upon all, and die. Yet not in vain, is their brief existence. Each tender leaflet is a page, on which is written in glowing characters, the wisdom and goodness of their divine Author.

It is right that we should give heed to these lowly teachers, and rejoice that among other blessings, our lot is cast in a world strewn with flowers.

[My absence from home delayed the appearance of the above. Was sorry that Mary reached the last folio of her Herbarium so soon—would have been better pleased had she filled up the other blank page of the letter with similar reflections. I hope she will "continue in well doing." A. B. G.

TOUR OF THE UPPER LAKES.....NO. II.

BR. GROSH—I took leave of our readers in my first number rather abruptly—being "afloat" and on my way to "untried scenes," and not unmindful of what might befall me on the "deceitful wave." And thus I resume the "thread of my discourse."

"Now the night grows deep,
And silent as it clouds, and full of sleep."

Nay—not "full of sleep" to me. The novelty of my situation—to me novelty—the rumbling of machinery—the rattling and croaking of tiller chains, and the mind dwelling on the dangers to which we were exposed by flood and by fire, kept slumber from my eye-lids, and restless and feverish I turned from side to side in my berth. Thus I lay till near midnight—courting sleep only to have her fly farther from me—when at once the startling cry ran through the cabin, "A man overboard!" Then came the rush of many feet across the deck—the engine paused in its work—the boat at the stern was lowered away, and a hardy crew, as I came aft, were pulling into the darkness in search of the drowning mortal. But to their "Halloo" no answer was returned, and a half hour's search was vain and fruitless. It was one of their number who had perished—an active German lad, who for six seasons, as the captain with a husky voice told me, had wrought on board the Illinois. It appears that the "hands" were unshipping the bow rudder, and this lad was standing upon the guard pulling at a tackle-ropes, when a hook gave way and he fell backward immediately forward the wheel. In an instant then must he have perished. No human aid could avail him aught, but without a moment's warning he met his fate, as many an one must meet it.

There were circumstances connected with the death of this young man, which threw around it an affecting interest. This was to have been his last trip, had he lived. During the six years that he had travelled the great lakes, he had by dint of strict economy, accumulated a few hundred dollars, with which he had purchased lands, and made improvements; and was designing now to enter upon an enjoyment of the fruits of his labor. When the boat reached the wharf at Detroit, there was a sister and a fair girl to whom he had "plighted his troth," anxiously awaiting his arrival, and prepared to meet and welcome him with smiles. But he was where smiles could never greet him more till the sea gives up his dead. And when told how he had perished, and that he lay buried where the tear of affection could never water his grave, the revulsions of feeling was too great, and ghastly and pale they sunk insensible to the ground. We thought then of a home where the loved and the loving will be united—and where the wrung heart will know nothing of sorrow or tears any more. Disappointment, and change, and grief, and pain are here—but there no blight, no anguish, no bitterness can ever come! But we must pass.

Early on Thursday morning, August 17, we reached Cleveland, where we landed a few passengers, and received as many more on board. As I saw but little of the place, I can say but little about it. I was told, however, that it was a flourishing town, and of considerable importance as to its commercial advantages. It has an excellent harbor, back from which, on a high commanding bluff, the town lies.

This day, for the first time in my life, I experienced that most disagreeable of all sensations—sea-sickness. I will tell you how it was—for I am a faithful chronicler of all that befall myself. Immediately after we left

Cleveland, our gallant steamer entered, seemingly, a cloud that rested heavily and darkly upon the very bosom of the waters. As it closed around us we found ourselves in the midst of a frightful storm. The lightning flashed vividly—the thunder crashed in deafening peals—the wind swept along in fitful gusts—the rain fell in torrents—the waves leaped, and foamed, and lashed each other as if maddened under the descending scourge—and away went our vessel, bounding and careering through the conflicting elements. There was a grandeur and sublimity in the scene, which mocks all human power of description. And I could have looked on and enjoyed it all, but for that strange, giddy, half-fainting, sickening sensation that came over me, and made me helpless as an infant. As there is but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous, the reader may guess the rest, and save recital.

About noon we passed from out the cloud—the winds and waves were rebuked, and there was a great calm. A clear sky and the bright sunshine produced a happy change on board, and the palest countenance was soon lit up with smiles. And as we gathered aft for reading or conversation it was with spirits made happier by the contrast. Thus we enjoy life.

"There," said one, "are the Cumberland Islands;" at the same time pointing westward to where they lay in their greenness and uncultivated beauty. But what of the Cumberland Islands? Nothing—save near them the vessels of two mighty nations met in conflict—that tempests of iron hail shattered and slew, and that the waters around were made red with human blood! That is all! It was an innocent affair! And yet our country must needs resist aggression, and repel the haughty invader. But war is an accursed business, and falls like a judgment upon those who pursue it.

We now soon entered the Detroit river—a broad and beautiful stream, with cultivated farms on either side and adown, which many a sail was gliding, adding much to the variety and interest of the scene—passed Malden on the Canada shore, a small fortified town, garrisoned with black troops in red coats, who paraded as we went by. Other quite little villages were observed and remarked upon, when all at once "Detroit!" "Detroit!" was the cry of some one forward, and away we went to get sight of this ancient town, which has so much that is thrilling and wild connected with its history.

Detroit has suffered much from the mad speculations of 1836 and 1837, and from the effects of which it will not recover in long, long years to come. It has nevertheless a stirring, enterprising, industrious population; and is a place of no considerable importance, being the emporium and capitol of Michigan. Ship-building is carried on quite extensively here. Two very large steamboats were receiving their machinery at this time, and otherwise being finished, designed for the Upper Lakes. But I will not trouble the reader with a long description, especially when he can obtain much better ones. We remained in Detroit until the next morning, discharging and receiving freight; and at 8 o'clock were on our way again toward the "Far West."

SOCIETY DEBTS.

A number of instances in this state, in which a small portion of debt contracted by a society in building or buying a meeting house—perhaps not more than one fourth or one eighth of the whole cost—has increased by the non-payment of interest, or become comparatively greater by the depreciation of the property and the hardness of the times, has opened the eyes of some of our societies to the evils of debt. By allowing one fourth or one fifth of the house to be unpaid for, a canker has been fastened on the vitals of the society that has prevented its prosperity, eaten up its increase, added intolerably to the difficulties of its officers, and is now, when money is hard to be raised, slowly but surely eating up the house itself. In some cases the house and lot will not pay the debt, which once was deemed so trifling. In other cases, the interest of the money eats so large a hole in the preacher's salary, that the society is unable to have more than half as much preaching as formerly—and in others, it has thinned out the society until it is unable to have any preaching! Time, would fail us, in short, to depict in detail all the evils arising from these society debts.

We name not these things to reproach any one, or to discourage any society. We refer to them, because the experience of the past may be made useful for the present and the future. We would hold up these most melancholy and grievous instances of former imprudence, as warnings to our societies—never to get in debt. It is always easier to pay for a meeting house before it is erected than afterward. At all events, it is most certain that if not built until its payment is provided for, no debt can rest on it ultimately to sweep it away.

But there are other debts which societies are too careless in avoiding, and which are as injurious to the welfare of the cause as meeting house debts. Take debts contracted for preaching. How common is it for societies to delay collecting subscriptions to pay the preacher, until the very close of the quarter or the year, and then dally along in the work until another quarter or year expires before the work is—not completed, for in such cases completion is out of the question, but—abandoned, leaving the society in debt some 20 to 100 dollars, and the preacher minus that amount to his grocer, tailor, &c. Extra efforts have then to be made—begging is resorted to—to raise the deficiency, until people hate to go to meeting because they are importuned and dunned; and if paid at all, it is paid at last by those who have already paid more than their share. Now, it is certain that no cause can be prospered in this manner. If societies would flourish, they must do it by the same means that secured individual prosperity—by a sacred regard to their engagements, and a certain and ample provision to fulfil them promptly and fully. Let them have it fully and clearly understood that every man shall engage to pay only what he can and will pay at a given date. On that day let him be called on for payment. If he has it not, let him borrow it. Make his society subscription a sacred debt, which no man can neglect or refuse to pay without a loss of honor. Let it be paid before or on the day it is due, and then let the society pay its debts as soon as due. And then let them require of their preacher to pay his debts, if he has any. But, the truth is, any preacher will preach better and feel better to be entirely free from debt, and should therefore "owe no man any thing, but to love one another." And if societies would pay their preachers a fair compensation, and pay it as soon as the preacher earns it, he could pay as he goes along too; and the consequence would be, better preachers, better societies, and a more speedy and permanent advancement of our cause than it ever yet has witnessed. This beating down a minister to starvation-wages, and paying only a part of that, and delaying that payment until he is in debt to every body for his living, is enough to ruin any cause—even Universalism itself—in any place where such is the policy of societies; for debt, like sin, is a curse to any people.

PITY FOR SINNERS.

How far are the men of this world from copying after this most admirable and excellent trait in the character of Jesus of Nazareth! Even among the professedly religious portion, there is not only a want of love for the guilty—of compassion for those that are out of the way—but a scowl will gather on their brows and a sneer curl their lips, even if hatred curdles not the blood in their hearts, when they behold others sympathise with the sufferings of the vile and sinful. One of the strongest reproaches such unfeeling Pharisees can hurl at the believers in the Restitution, is, that they preach that sinners of every nature and dye—murderers, oathbreakers and pirates are all going to heaven—just as if Jesus had not taught the same thing; and not only taught it—but lived, labored, suffered, died, and rose again purposely to make his teaching true—to save just such vile and sinful beings from their miseries and their sins. Oh, would that the hearts of such cold, unloving religionists could be warmed into strongly desiring the salvation of the greatest, deepest, darkest, vilest sinners of our race—and then into rejoicing in the glorious, blessed faith and hope of their salvation! We wish them nothing worse—we can wish them nothing better than such warmed hearts and such rejoicing souls.

But probably the un pitying spirit of the world to the sinful and wretched is best shadowed forth in the treatment heaped upon them in our common newspapers for the amusement of the readers. The amusement of readers! Good God—how unthinking—how unloving of our race—how un pitying toward human degradation and suffering must that man or woman be, who can sit down and deliberately make a fellow creature's sin, and shame, and sorrow, a subject of wit, and mirth, and amusement! And what must those readers be whose patronage for a paper can be secured and retained by such means! Yet take up some of our most widely circulated papers, published in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore or New Orleans—turn to the Police Reports—mark the most miserable cases of destitution and depravity there narrated, and then note the tones in which they are spoken of—the low, base wit—the unfeeling vulgar mirth and humor—the strained efforts to raise a laugh by representing the loathsome effects of crime in books, language, dress, &c., as things very ludicrous and comic! What right-minded Christian—not a mere wordling, professing Christianity, but a true follower of Christ in very soul and spirit—can think of such things without the deepest horror and loathing at the deeper depravity which can thus sport with human vice and suffering—without feeling more saddening despair at the conversion of the reporter (and of the readers who can be pleased by such reports), than at the thorough regeneration of the miserable sons and daughters of sin and shame that are thus held up as legitimate objects of mirth and jollity! For the reflecting religionist beholds in such moral ruins, objects more worthy of sadness and commiseration, than in those who are only mentally insane—and would far sooner think of going to an Insane Asylum to make merry by observing its inmates, than he would of making matters of sport and jest the moral obliquities of clay-encased angels and archangels fallen from their high estate into moral insanity and wretchedness, both surpassing in derangement and misery any other earth ever beheld.

A. B. G.

We would again respectfully call the attention of our readers and friends to the matter of our discarding the credit, and adopting the advance pay system. Our reasons were given at some length several weeks since.

We are glad to find that those who have paid most punctual, approve of the change, at least all with whom we have conversed, and seem to be willing to give us their aid in good season. We trust all who have heretofore been advance paying subscribers according to the old terms, will not suffer a few weeks or months time make sufficient difference to induce them to desert us in this "our time of need." Those who have suffered themselves to fall in arrears, have but little to say, thinking, we presume, that silence in this case "is the better part of valor." Some of those however, we must do them the justice to say, have honestly come up to the work and paid their dues, or at least accepted the inducements which we have recently held out to them, and we hope that many more, shall we say all, will "do likewise."

As we have given early notice of the change, and shall repeat it until the close of the current volume, none need be surprised who have not paid for next volume, that their paper is not sent after the first of January next. We shall continue to strike off about our usual number of copies for a few weeks after the commencement of next volume, so that we may be able to supply with back numbers those who may be tardy in forwarding subscriptions or from unavoidable delays.—We wish our agents would take a little pains to ascertain all who are taking the paper at their Post Offices, and induce them if possible to continue their patronage, and give us the earliest possible notice.

☞ We learn by the Barre Gazette, that a Mrs. Harriet Smith, wife of Mr. Josiah Smith, of that town, a lady of respectability and a communicant in good standing with a Christian church, has been unexpectedly detected in shoplifting to a great extent. The dry goods dealers in Barre had met with repeated losses, which they were unable to account for, and "suspicion had changed into various quarters without settling with certainty upon any one." On Tuesday of last week, Mrs. Smith was detected in a sly theft, in consequence of which suspicion was roused against her, and an examination instituted, which resulted in the discovery of several hundred dollars worth of the stolen goods, and a confession on her part that she had carried on a regular business of pilfering for three years. The Gazette adds: "Mrs. Smith has been considered as a model to be held up for imitation as a wife, mother, friend and christian. There is not a woman in the whole town who would have longer escaped suspicion. The development of such unmitigated and long continued dishonesty has cast an expression of gloom and surprise over our little community."

DEATHS.

In Lincoln township, Delaware county, Ohio, February 25th, 1843, (after a long and tedious illness,) of scrofulous consumption, WILLIAM JAMES GRANDY, eldest son of Wm. and Celinda Grandy, in the 20th year of his age. His health had been delicate for some two years. The family removed from New York to Ohio in the fall of 1842. The son being unable to accompany the family by land, took a water passage. "We had (say the surviving relatives) strong hopes that the journey would improve his health, but were disappointed. He said he had strength given him according to his day until he arrived at Cardington, O., where he had numerous relatives, with whom he visited a short time, when his health began rapidly to decline; and when the family arrived, they found him confined to his room. He seemed for a time to cling to life, as he said, that he might be able to pay a debt of gratitude he owed to his parents, for what they had done for him. About a week previous to his departure, his mind became reconciled and calm, and he even seemed in an ecstasy at the thoughts of being released from this clay tenement, to join the heavenly hosts in singing the song of Moses and the Lamb, and chanting the praises of the Most High God. He was a great lover of music, and observed to his friends that there, there would be no tuning of voices, but that each voice on entering there would immediately be tuned with love. Some writings he left behind, considering his age and chance of improvement, seem to indicate that he would have been an ornament to society, and most probably a Universalist minister; in fact he had expressed as much to his friends, frequently.

The survivors will not mourn as those who have no hope (at least a goodly portion of them,) because they look forward, by the eye of faith, through the dark valley, to the time when "all shall be made alive in Christ"—when songs and anthems of salvation shall be sung by every tongue—when shouts of victory, VICTORY, shall resound through the vast, the boundless universe of God. * * Will the Watchman please copy?

At Unadilla Forks, on the 24th of November, Mrs. TAMMISON W. BABCOCK, wife of Mr. H. H. Babcock, aged 33 years.

The disease that carried Mrs. Babcock to the grave, was a species of consumption. She was attacked with what her friends supposed was a bronchial complaint in the latter part of last winter. Medical aid was soon called, but no permanent relief was obtained. Physician after physician was called, but the disease seemed, and indeed proved to be, entirely beyond their control. Constantly, but slowly, she wasted away, until death finally put an end to her suffering.

She has left a husband, to whom she was much attached; and four children, to whom she ministered in life with the kindness and attention of one whose only object was, to make her home the residence of peace, and her household happy. She possessed a kind heart, and a superior intellect—which enabled her to be extensively useful as a friend, companion, or counsellor. These, together with other excellent traits of character, obtained for her the esteem and confidence of all who knew her well, and appreciated her moral and intellectual worth.

Some time last winter, she became a firm believer in the doctrine of the restitution. And with her, it was, as it is with every true believer, no half-way work. She was a Universalist—decided, unyielding, yet charitable to all who yet lingered in the murky cloud of Partialism. She received it as God's immutable truth; and realizing the joy and gladness it ever imparts, she was anxious, and very anxious, it should be preached and propagated, until a knowledge of its life-giving truths should pervade every soul, reconcile man to man, and all men to God. She lived a little less than one year, after she embraced the doctrine of Universalism—and yet, she lived long enough to test it in health, in sickness, and in death. In all—in every situation in which she was placed, she found it all, and even more than she expected. The last time I saw her in life, she remarked to me—"I am not afraid to die!"—"God is good unto all," whether living, dying, or dead. To a female friend she remarked, a short time previous to her death, "I suppose you think me in a miserable situation"—or words to that effect—"but I would not exchange situations with you. I am almost done with the joys and sorrows of earth. My hope, I am sure, is genuine, and will not deceive me—it is centered in God. I feel that I have done nothing—God has done it all." Thus did she continue to converse from time to time, until death came, and in mercy conveyed her purified and well taught intellect, to the bosom of its Father, God.

By her request, the undersigned delivered a discourse to an immense concourse of friends and neighbors.

ACROSTIC.

BY W. J. GRANDY.

Lovely daughter, when in dreams,
Oft I kiss thy little cheek,—
Vew thine eye that brightly beams,
In fancy hear thine accents weak—
Nature, as if my bliss too great,
Awakes me to my mournful state.

Great God, did death at thy decree
Rudely snatch my child away,
And set her infant spirit free,
N'er more to chant her little lay?
Does she to thee her accents raise?
Yes, in a song of grateful praise!

THE EMIR'S DAUGHTER.

BY MRS. MARY Y. SPENCER.

"Sing again, Christian," said the Emir's daughter to the captive who knelt at her feet.

"What shall I sing," asked the minstrel, starting from a reverie, and carelessly running his fingers over the instrument, giving utterance to a prelude of wild, but exquisitely melodious tones.

"Shall I sing of war, or of love, or," and he become suddenly sad, "of captivity?"

That princess turned her large dark eyes on the speaker, and involuntarily sighed, for she felt how much that little word meant.

"No—no, not of captivity—sing of some gayer theme—let—let it be of love," she continued, and the blood mounted to her forehead as she spoke.

"There is but one song I remember of that kind," replied the minstrel, in a sad but musical voice, whose softened accents told how grateful he felt for the sympathy of the maiden. "There is but one song of that kind I remember, and it is of my own far off home. Lady, I know not that I can sing it, for it fills my heart with tears, when I think of it now, but your wish is my law," and again running his fingers over the instrument, he evoked a strain of melody that might have been from the stars.

The maiden leaned her face on her hand to listen; and as she reclined thus the minstrel thought he had never seen anything so beautiful. Her brow was as smooth as marble; her mouth and chin cut in the most exquisite proportions, while her long lashes drooping over her eyes gave them the depth of shaded water. If there was majesty in that face, there was also grace. If the classic features made it for a moment seem stern, the kind smile and softened look relieved you instantly from the feeling. And now, as she gazed on the minstrel, there was a dewy tenderness in those full dark orbs which might have said volumes to him if he had noticed them closely, which perhaps he did. He raised his head and spoke:

"The words are my own language, but the music you can understand."

The princess nodded, and he began. The song was mournful, and before the minstrel had finished, he had drawn tears into the eyes of the listener, merely by the touching pathos of his voice. A pause ensued.

"Sir minstrel," she said suddenly, "you pine for your country—do you not?"

"Can I forget the home where I was born, or the churchyard where my fathers sleep?" he answered sadly. Again there was a pause, and there seemed a struggle in the lady's bosom. When she spoke there was a deep emotion in her voice.

"And would you run the peril of reaching the Christian camp, if your escape thence was connived at?"

"Dear lady, yes!"

"You shall go. To-night there will be one at the seaward postern—you are allowed the freedom of the interior—the gate will be opened for you and a boat at hand. And may the God you worship bless and preserve you"—and she turned away to hide her tears.

A new light broke on the minstrel. Could it be that he was beloved? Was this the cause of the kindness with which he had been treated? With a sudden hope he was about to fling himself at the feet of the princess, when one of her father's eunuchs entered the apartment, and he was forced to resume his instruments in order to conceal his emotion. No further opportunity to speak with his mistress occurred during the day, and he left her presence towards the evening in despair.

Should he avail himself of her offer to escape? If he were certain of her love, nothing could induce him to fly without her; but did she love him? This question the captive could not answer. Harassed with doubts he saw the appointed hour arrive, without having come to any conclusion. A new hope now arose. He would meet his mistress at the postern. Alas! there was no one there but a eunuch whom she had bribed, he was perversely silent. The minstrel was still in doubts, when lights were seen in the garden advancing towards the postern. No time was to be lost. The eunuch pushed him into the boat, the crew of which instantly rowed off from the land, and the captive yielding to his fate, bade farewell forever, to the Emir's daughter.

But he could not forget her. Even after arriving at the Christian camp, and resuming his round, (for all had thought him dead,) his only thought was of the Saracen beauty, and long he lingered in Palestine, when his interest should have called him home, hoping to hear of her. But despair at length took possession of him, and he returned sadly to Europe, where the fairest ladies of his own gay province strove in vain to win him by their smiles.

Oh, had he known the agony with which the Emir's daughter watched, from her tower, his departure—had he been told how, day by day, she sought to glean some intelligence of his arrival at the Christian camp, he would have left his broad possessions at once, and found his way back to her, through a thousand perils, rather than she should consider him ungrateful. But little did he imagine the sacrifice she had made. Since the first day she had seen the pale but still noble looking captive, she had surrendered to him her heart, and the offer of his freedom sprang from the heroic wish to see him happy, even at the sacrifice of his company. Had he spoken his love then, and she almost wished he would, few words could have induced her to sacrifice father, country and faith, to follow him; but he was silent, and she feared her love was despised. Still her noble heart refused to take its revenge by interrupting his escape; but she watched his departure, hoping to the last that he would communicate with her; and when she could no more catch the shadowy figure of the receding boat, she flung herself on her cushions and wept as if her heart would break. From that day her attendants noticed that she grew paler and thinner as if some secret malady was eating out her life. But none suspected the truth.

In the proud castle of Limoges sat the owner leaning his head upon his hand. He was thinking of her who had set him free from Moslem slavery, and when he recalled her beauty and gentleness, he felt as if it would be no sacrifice to surrender houses and lauds and knightly honors, to be again the captive minstrel at her feet, enjoying her smiles and her sympathy, even though denied her love.

"It is vain," he said, "I can find no happiness here. Beauty has no charms for me. I will go again to Palestine, and never return till I see her." He was about to summon his squire, when that individual entered the room.

"There is a page, my lord, without," he said, "who wishes to see you on urgent business."

"Let him enter."

A youth, apparently of Italian origin, appeared and stood humbly at the door, until the knight signed to him to advance. The page looked at the squire, when his master understanding the hint, ordered him to leave the room. Then hastily advancing, the youth threw off his hat, and exposed to view a countenance of singularly feminine beauty, for one of his sex.

"Henri! Henri!" said the page, and bursting into tears, fell at the knight's feet.

"My own Zenora!" and the knight clasped her to his bosom, for it was the Emir's daughter.

"And how did you thread your way through such innumerable dangers?" the knight asked, using her own tongue, when, after weeping long upon his bosom, she was somewhat composed.

"I know not. Your God—for him I now serve—protected me. I fled bearing with me a few jewels, determined to seek you out, and be your minstrel as you have been mine. I assumed this disguise, and knowing nothing of your language but your name and nation, found my way hither, where for three months, I wandered up and down, repeating 'Henry de Limoges.' At length a jewel of some price induced a man to bring me hither, and now—now may I be your minstrel, anything?—only do not send me away."

"You shall be my own bride!" and so it was; and never in Languedoc was a more beautiful couple than the Count de Limoges and the Emir's daughter.

THE YANKEE IN MAIN STREET.

"I calculate I couldn't drive a trade with you to-day," said a true specimen of the Yankee pedlar, as he stood at the door of a merchant in Main-street. "I calculate you calculate about right, for you can not," was the sneering reply. "Wal, I guess you need not get huffy about it. Now here's a dozen real genuine razor strops, worth two dollars and a half—you may have 'em for two dollars." "I tell you, I don't want any of your trash, so you had better be going." "Wal now, I declare! I'll bet you five dollars, if you make me an offer for them are strops, we'll have a trade yet." "Done!" replied the merchant, placing the money in the hands of a bystander. The Yankee deposited the like sum—when the merchant offered him a picayune for the strops. "They're yours," said the Yankee, as he quietly fob'd the stakes. "But," he added, with great apparent honesty, "I calculate a joke's a joke, and if you don't want them strops, I'll trade back." The merchant's countenance brightened. "You're not so bad a chap, after all; here are your strops, give me the money." "There it is," said the Yankee, as he received the strops, and passed over the picayune. "A trade's a trade—and now you're wide awake, in airnest. I guess, the next time you trade with that are pic, you'll do a little better than to buy razor strops." And away walked the pedlar, with his strops and his wagger, amid the shouts of the laughing crowd.—St. Louis Ariel.

A glass of new milk, taken two or three times a day, is said to be a remedy for the headache, when occasioned by a disorderly state of the stomach.

The headache may generally be relieved by rubbing fine salt on the head. The hair of the patient should be opened, a little fine salt laid on the head, and then it should be rubbed hard and quick with the palm of the hand, until the friction produces considerable irritation which will cause a tendency of the blood outward, and relieve the brain. The operation should be performed on five or six places on the head. Salt is said to be good to promote the growth of the hair.—[Boston Cultivator.]

THE REFORMED.

A Sketch from Real Life.

BY REV. I. GEORGE.

"What did you think of the remarks of Mr. Sherman, this evening?" said Emily Stowell to her husband, as they were returning from a meeting of the Washingtonians, a few evenings since.

After a moment's silence, her husband replied, "Well, really, Emily, I am not prepared to give your question, what I should deem a satisfactory answer. But I assure you, my dear, that I am firmly resolved to test their practical utility, by which you may learn from the fruits of my conduct, an answer which will be more satisfactory to your mind."

"Satisfactory," said Emily, throwing her arms around her husband's neck. "dear Henry, the satisfaction which I now feel for your noble and promising resolution, it appears to me, could only be superseded by the infinite." And the tear of gratitude which moistened her now glowing cheek, sparkled in the moon's silver beams as they passed silently on—their hearts too big for utterance—to their humble dwelling; where we will leave them for the present, while we endeavor to give the reader a more elaborate history of the two characters thus unceremoniously introduced to his notice.

Henry Stowell was an only son, of highly respectable, though not wealthy parents, residing in the western part of what is politically called the "Empire State." Possessing in a good degree, the necessary qualifications of life, both moral and mental, he soon won, and was justly entitled to that share of confidence and respect, which naturally grow out of the same when regulated by prudence and economy. At the age of nineteen he made choice of the legal profession, as an object to engage his attention in future life, and accordingly entered as student, the office of Hon. T. M. C., of his native town; where, by strict application to his studies and the duties of his profession, he soon gained an honorable reputation, and was admitted to the Bar of his country under the most encouraging prospects, at the age of twenty-two. During this period he had become acquainted with Emily Scott, the daughter of a reputable and wealthy merchant of a neighboring city, whose admirable qualities of mind, and singularly prepossessing appearance, soon won his warmest and most devoted affections. And although he had reason to believe that the current of her affections had not been left unmoved by their past acquaintance and now growing intimacy, when he looked upon the vast difference of their situation in life, he could not but distrust the "mystic powers of love," and regret that his circumstances were not less unlike her own. His future prospects, although far from being unenviable, did not afford the present desideratum. He knew not how far worldly opulence and riches might influence Emily's parents; and he was determined, that he would never enter into an alliance with any lady, against the pleasure and will of those who were entrusted with her protection and interest.

Thus time passed on. The flame of love already kindled in kindred hearts, increased with the same, until their hearts were evidently beating in unison to the purest anticipations of conjugal felicity and happiness. Although Henry's attachment to Miss Scott had become both warm and ardent, he had not dared to broach the question; nor, indeed, did he feel disposed to, until he had learned the feelings of her parents upon this, to them, important subject. And how he should accomplish this object, properly, was a question with him, which needed some farther reflection. He however resolved that, at the first opportunity, he would forward a line to Mr. Scott, informing him of his partiality for his daughter, and requesting him to grant his permission, at a proper time to visit her at her father's house.

This resolution was soon put into execution; and Mr. Scott received direction to several influential gentlemen, of whom all necessary information respecting the character and standing of the writer might be obtained, and farther, stating the reasons for his adopting the present policy, at so early a period of his acquaintance with Miss Scott. A few weeks now passed by, which to the mind of Henry were almost interminable. He was waiting between hope and fear; the result of this correspondence.

Reader, had you been seated near the parlor window of Mr. Scott's pleasant mansion, on a certain evening in the latter part of May, 1835, beside receiving the mellow fragrance of an almost innumerable multitude of flowers, that adorned a spacious garden; you might have discovered two gentle lovers walking hand in hand along those gravelly aisles, that tended to beautify the same, and heard those vows of mutual love and affection which doubtless have their origin in hearts cast in the same heavenly moulds. It would seem unnecessary for me to describe the conversation as it passed between them; suffice it to say, that it consisted in the usual parlance of lovers. Henry had received from Mr. Scott a reply to his communication, in which the open and frank manner in which it was written, was highly complimented; and he was informed that he (Mr. S.) "had no objection to any engagement that his correspondent might enter into with his daughter, which was laudable and honest. For his part, he had never considered it the prerogative of parents to exercise supreme authority over the 'love affairs' of their children. He, indeed, considered it unwise to seem to take from children those responsibilities which were innately their own. He had ever labored to impress upon the minds of his children the fact, that these responsibilities were their own, and that they would tell upon the future pages of their life with what wisdom they had been discharged, and with what skill they had been controlled. He considered it a principle fraught with very evil consequences, that would take, or seem to take this burden from the world. Without it man would be like a ship upon the ocean without ballast; liable to be capsized by every wind and wave with which it comes in contact. And, in short, he sincerely hoped that his correspondent was well aware, that in following the course which his anxiety had suggested, he was but increasing his own responsibilities, which it was his duty, by every principle of honor to discharge."

Although these truths fell with emphasis upon his mind, and caused him for a moment to forget the enthusiastic ardor of his love; the fact that every barrier was thrown down between him and his beloved Emily, whose feelings he had but too plainly read in nature's language, her eyes, all other impressions than those to visit her immediately, were banished from his mind. And in accordance with this idea, he soon repaired to the city, where he was received with every mark of attention and respect by both Emily and her parents; where, and at which time, those familiar vows were plighted at which we have before hinted. From this time arrangements were being made by all parties concerned for the celebration of nuptials.

A joyous party was that which assembled at the house of the father of Emily, on a pleasant afternoon in early Autumn; to witness the farewell of the latter to "single blessedness," as many of her companions were pleased to term it. But notwithstanding that Emily was as sensible as her companions of the joys and pleasures of "single life" beneath a parents' roof and care; she nevertheless believed with the poet, that "Marriage, rightly understood,

Gives to the virtuous and the good
A paradise below."

And she could not but believe from the confidence she had been led to place in Henry Stowell, that he would faithfully perform the part of a companion and friend to her, and thus, as far as he was capable, gratify her fondest hopes and most ardent anticipations. Meantime Henry felt that no sacrifice in his power would be too great, providing it was to enhance the happiness of the object of his affections—the much admired and lovely Emily Scott, who was now to become his companion in life—the sharer of his joys and sorrows.

Few young men; perhaps, start in life under more promising circumstances. His increasing wealth, and rapidly growing fame, drew around him numerous admirers, who were now impatiently waiting to salute the happy couple, and wish them the richest joys of conjugal life. Under circumstances like these, the marriage vows of Henry Stowell and Emily Scott were solemnized, which made them one in life—one till death.

According to arrangements which had been previously entered into, Henry Stowell removed with his young bride, to the "far West," where he purchased a pleasant location in one of the most flourishing villages of this, then, fast populating district of the Union. Here he soon established a reputation for talent and pure integrity, which promised much for future life.

We will now pass hastily over about four years, a period, during which nothing transpired worthy of note to ruffle the smooth current of affairs which had existed heretofore. This being a time when the speculating mania was at its highest flood in that section, Mr. Stowell had embarked, with many others, in what was supposed to be the money-making enterprises of the day; and from some fortunate movements, had become so intoxicated with the idea of immediate wealth and splendor; that he had exposed all his honest earnings upon this popular and much admired "wheel of fortune." He however, ere long, found himself among the many unfortunates who were driven to bankruptcy, and the lowest ebb of poverty; and being naturally of a sensitive mind, he was left in a state of indisposition not very flattering to his friends, and especially to his fond and doating Emily. She, however, was firm to her trust, and undeviating in her attendance to the wants of her husband, whose life and happiness were closely bound within her own. She threw around him by her cheerful words and enlivening smiles, every object of encouragement, which she hoped might have a tendency to calm the current of his feelings, and restore the even tenor of his mind. She stood by him like an angel of mercy, administering comfort to his every want; and when he would speak to her of her former privileges and advantages, and contrast them with her present condition, brought about, as he said, by his folly and enthusiasm, she would with much kindness and presence of mind, tell him that the treasures for which she had been induced to leave her home, and the undimmed gladness of girlish joy, did not consist of the miser's choice, but in that offering of affection, his own kind heart, which she would be content to share, and pass uncomplainingly with him through life's bright weal or life's dark wo, on to the end; until a shadowy hand should separate them at the grave! With many other evidences of a generous heart, fraught with prudence and economy from his beloved Emily, Henry Stowell soon found himself again able to attend to the duties of his profession.

Thus time passed on without any particular change; yet Henry was not that joyous and happy being, that he had been in earlier days. A deep melancholy seemed to rest upon his mind, which at times would throw a dark shadow upon the future. He gradually became forgetful of the allurements of home—the society of her who leaned upon his breast as her only earthly stay—and passed his time in the bar-room, and among the idle crowd. Emily murmured not; for she thought that such a course might better tend to throw off that embarrassment which seemed to rest upon him. But it was not long, before suspicions arose in her mind which she would have gladly refrained from cherishing. The truth was—a truth which she viewed with agonizing regret—that Henry, her chosen of earth, had sought refuge from his troubles in the cup of dissipation! Oh, how sad and painful are tidings of this description, to the ears of the young and tender wife! How must her gentle soul yearn within her, as she views, for the first time, its unhallowed traces upon the once fair features of the one she loves! O could Emily Stowell have seen that proud form, before it had been thus tainted, stretched in its manliness upon the narrow bier, her tears could not have been half so bitter, nor her anguish half so great.

Her course was still the same; every means within her power was exerted to make him happy, though she trembled with anxiety for his safety. She dared not—indeed she wished not to upbraid him, for fear that it might increase, his already aggravated and disconsolate feelings. She chose rather to suffer, than to do wrong. She had learned from her beloved parents, who were strangers to the sorrows that now weighed heavily upon her heart, that kindness was a powerful and effectual engine when skillfully arrayed against the force of error, and she felt that in this case, at least, she could act the part of a true Christian. She hoped, she prayed, she sighed and wept for one who was daily becoming deeper and deeper involved in the mazes of intemperance and folly. Those who had been his professed friends in brighter days, were forsaking him; while there were gathering around him a new array, whose every path was marked with death and ruin! Emily found herself obliged to forego many inconveniences on account of her destitute circumstances, which soon induced her to seek employment among her neighbors, to defray the necessary expenses of her family. Yet she hoped that Henry would reform—yea, she believed that she should yet see brighter days—she trusted in the Christian's God; nor was her trust in vain. That day had at length arrived when Emily Stowell's prayers were to be effectual—when the voice of the Almighty was to break with emphasis upon the heart of the dissipated Henry Stowell. "Your paper 'Squire,'" said the carrier as he passed the bar-room door of one of the inns of the village on a summer's morning—Esquire Stowell, as he was called, standing at the door. He took his paper, and seating himself in the portico, fronting the house, he was glancing his eyes busily over the weekly news, when his attention was arrested by the following

"WASHINGTONIAN TEMPERANCE MEETING."

"Our voice, Inebriate, is to thee—Love and Responsibility. "Mr. S. T. Sherman will lecture at the 'Free Hall' in this village this evening. Subject—The Responsibilities of every man should lead him to exert himself in behalf of the cause of Temperance. A general attendance is requested. Per order of the Committee."

He read the "Notice," and unconsciously caught its inspiration. He began to read other items, as they met the passing glance of his eye, but his mind was not there. A restlessness seemed to agitate his frame. He turned the paper again to read that "notice." He read it again, and again. It was chaining his attention with an iron hand. Yet he scarcely knew why! He carelessly laid th paper upon the floor by his side, and resting his head upon his hand, he seemed for a while unconscious of the world around him. At length arising as if awakened from a dreamy slumber, he began to pace the portico with a quick and agitated step. He tried in vain to shake off the spell. It clung to him, and coiled around his heart, stinging him like the poisonous viper. At length he exclaimed in a wild and melancholy tone, "Oh that responsibility—how have I discharged it! how have I mocked the expectations of my dearest friends! how have I slighted to meet the sanguine hopes of my confiding Emily! With what seeming contempt have I trampled under foot the rich counsel of her venerated father, and scorned the prayers of her affectionate mother! O that responsibility!" He left the tavern, and crossing the street, walked toward his humble residence.

Emily, who was a stranger to the miseries that were now preying upon her husband's heart, had resolved that at the first opportunity, she would pour out to him the grief of her soul—she would tell him of her love and attachment to him—of their early vows and anticipations—what they had been—what they now were, and what they might be, if he would but forsake his intemperance, and become again a sober man. And as she reflected upon this subject, again the pleasures and delights of other days rolled in beauty over that gentle mind, and were met by an involuntary flood of tears. She knelt in humility beneath that cottage roof, and once more breathed out her spirit in prayer. She knew not that she was heard save by Him "who suffers not a sparrow to fall to the ground without his notice." Yet there was another listener. Another who listened to those tender effusions of woman's love. There was one to whom that familiar voice was harsher than the thunders of a righteous law! Her words fell upon his heart like the arrows of death; and he vainly strove to hide himself from their burning reproaches. He heard those stifled sobs of grief, and they seemed to search the very depths of his soul. The truth of his degenerate and abandoned situation came home to his mind, with a power and effect that he had never felt before. And Henry Stowell resolved, from that moment to become a sober man. He turned quickly from the house to avoid being discovered by his wife, and with hurried steps returned to the tavern but for another purpose than to revel in his former unhallowed practices. He took measures to induce all his associates, to attend the evening lecture, and then returned home to surprise his wife, by giving her an invitation, to accompany him in doing the same. His wife was so much overjoyed to see her husband return home a sober man, that her resolution to upbraid him for his follies entirely forsook her mind. She quickly went about preparing him some supper, during which time their conversation was cheerful and enlivening. Indeed we have reason to believe, that in the tone of their language there was no deception on either side. For while Emily was cheered by the sober appearance of her husband; he could not but rejoice that he had been led to view himself in a proper light, and to make wise resolutions in regard to the future. After supper was prepared, and they sat partaking of the same, Mr. Stowell informed his wife of the expected lecture, and asked her if she would not like to accompany him to hear it. She, with much readiness, assented. And surely, all this in appearance, was something which she felt it out of her power to divine. She, however, asked no questions, but was soon ready, and with her husband on her way to the lecture. Not a word passed between them, until they found themselves comfortably seated within the hall, when Mrs. Scott remarked to her husband that she had promised to call on a sick neighbor that evening, and that she should probably leave a short time before the close of the lecture, in which case she wished him to call and accompany her home, at the close of the meeting. This being acceded to by her husband, they were now prepared to listen to the speaker. Mr. Sherman arose, and in his interesting and easy manner called the attention of his assembly, to the important proposition, which he felt himself called upon to illustrate. It is not my intention to attempt any thing like a description of this lecture, but will merely give the reader an idea of the ground occupied by the speaker, by a few notes taken by Henry Stowell himself, during the progress of the same, for his special benefit, as a future reference. It was briefly as follows:

"Man's responsibility, is that distinguishing trait in his character, which renders him superior to the beasts of the field. It is not the result of any laws human or divine, but is innate in the nature of man. Law does not make man 'responsible,' but merely speaks as a monitor, warning him of the existence of those responsibilities, and the evils resulting from their abuse. Law is to a moral and intelligent being, what light is to the natural vision—it serves to guide him in the darkness of his inexperienced and undisciplined imagination, through the intricate mazes and labyrinths of this imperfect state of existence. For this object was the law given by the Almighty, not as an arbitrary, unmeaning requirement, binding man to perform, or to refrain from performing, various isolated and otherwise non-essential acts; but to discover to him through their medium, those responsibilities, which are the great sources of human happiness and melioration. And a knowledge of these responsibilities, is the very mainspring and essence of moral and intellectual improvement and progression. Their light first shone upon the altar of man's heart in the garden of Eden, causing him after his disobedience to their holy requirements, to view himself as a naked, helpless, unprotected and guilty being. "And since that fatal period," said the speaker, "has the guilty and mistaken mind, startled by the rustling of every harmless leaf, fled from the presence of the voice of wisdom and reform; and supposing that he had lost all affinity to the holy sympathies of his fellow beings, he has been content to sit down beneath the dark shades of sin and error, to linger out a life of wretchedness and wo, and at last to go down to the shades of death,

'Unwept, uncoffined and unmourned.'

"But why these fears? Why this canine and slavish wretchedness, by those who can justly claim affinity to the holy throne above? Arise, O fellow man! assert the imperial dignity of your nature. Lay hold upon those sacred privileges which surround you and tear yourselves from the iron hand of sin and dissipation. Close not your ears to that 'still small voice.' It is the voice of responsibility! it is the voice of God, your Father! it is the voice of love, and human sympathy! It will awake in your soul the sleeping numbers of nature's lyre, and tune the mind of down-trodden and degraded man, in unison with that of angels! Say what we may of worldly distinctions, grades and conditions, there is a chord in every heart which, when rightly touched, will be felt with electric power throughout the vast arena of moral and intellectual existence!"

With much force and precision the speaker now proceeded to point out the evils of intemperance in the land, and the most efficient means of reclaiming its victims from the downward road to ruin. And he verily proved himself a skilful workman. He closed amidst shouts of applause, laden with tears!

Mrs. Scott, who had found not opportunity during the lecture to leave, now hastily left the house to fulfil her engagement. Just as she passed out of the door, Mr. Sherman arose and requested all who felt disposed, to come forward and sign the "pledge." He had scarcely closed his lips, when his congregation rushed toward the "stand," almost en masse, and I think I need not inform the reader that Henry Stowell was among that number. And many a countenance revealed expressions of gladness as he signed that "noble declaration." In a short time the assembly dispersed, and Henry, as previously agreed upon, sought his beloved Emily in the house of sickness and distress, where she was administering to the wants of the afflicted. After affording the assistance that her circumstances would admit, to comfort her friend, she left in company with her husband for their residence. It was at this time, that our introductory tete a tete had its origin. After our happy couple (for surely happy they must have been) had seated themselves before a blazing fire. Henry informed Emily of all that had passed during the day, which had induced him to declare before the world, that he would, come weal or come woe in future live a sober man.—Reader, that was a happier hour to Henry and Emily Stowell, than that in which they were made one for life. They are now reaping together, the rewards of honesty, virtue and kindness. And since his reform Henry Stowell has often been heard to say, that he believed the last named principle, to be the most powerful weapon in the universe.

IS THE DOCTRINE OF ENDLESS MISERY TRUE?

BY REV. A. M. WORDEN.

If it is, the advocates of that sentiment will please answer the following important questions.

First, if mankind are rewarded in another state of existence for their conduct in this; and if the righteous merit endless happiness and the wicked endless misery; suppose the conduct of a man should be equally good as it was bad, and equally bad as it was good—that his piety should exactly balance his sins—I ask, what will become of such a person? He can not be received to heaven as a reward; for his sins are equal to his holiness—and it would be unjust to send him to hell; for his righteousness is equal to his sins. If the doctrine of future rewards is true, I know of no other way that such a person can be rewarded according to his deeds, but be doomed to hell half of the time, and received to heaven the other half. Will my Partialist brethren be so kind as to solve the question?

Second—If there is a reward after death, why did the wise man teach to the contrary, by saying, “the living know they shall die but the dead know not any thing, neither have they any more a reward; for the memory of them is forgotten.” Ecclesiastes ix: 5.

Third—If we enter the spiritual world with the same dispositions and principles which we imbibe in this, why does he say (verse 6) “Also their love and their hatred and their envy is now perished, neither have they any more a portion forever in any thing that is done under the sun.”

Fourth—We are told by our Partialist brethren, that God will contend forever—that he will be always wroth, and the spirit of the sinner shall always endure his wrath and never fail. If this be so, why did Isaiah say in his 57th chapter and 16 verse, or why did God say by the mouth of the prophet, “For I will not contend forever neither will I be always wroth; for the spirit should fail before me, and the souls that I have made?”

Fifth—Our Partialist brethren tell us that God will cast off forever a part of the souls which he has made. If that is so, why did the prophet Jeremiah say in his Lamentations, iii: 31, “For the Lord will not cast off forever?”

In the above questions there appears to be a plain contradiction between our Partialist friends and the ancient prophets whom God inspired to speak the truth. Now if their words be true, what shall we say of those who reverse and contradict them? Let God be true and every man a liar.

LETTER FROM BR. G. W. LAWRENCE, OF ILLINOIS.

Elk Lake, Susquehanna co., Pa., Nov. 25, 1843.

Having communicated such business items as I had designed, and much of my sheet remaining yet a blank, I will improve the opportunity of penning a few sentences in reference to Universalism in this vicinity; feeling confident you are always grateful for information on this subject from those who are “set for the defence of the Gospel” on the watch towers of Zion.

I would remark in the outset, that something more than five years ago I left this vicinity, and took up a permanent abode among the prairies of the West. At the time I left here, I was a votary of Partialism; I was, in fact, well-nigh a bigot.—Universalism, in my estimation, constituted one of the most egregious errors that had ever crept into the mind of man. Yet how frequently are the opinions of men doomed to undergo a radical change; especially when those opinions savor more of error than of truth. I had not been long in the land of prairies before I found myself obliged to reject the absurd, unholy and soul-chilling doctrine which teaches the endless misery of a portion of the human family. I have not space on this sheet to delineate the causes that contribute to my rejection of this dogma. Suffice it to say, in process of time, though the medium of careful investigation, I was constrained to acknowledge belief in that doctrine I once hastily condemned—Universalism.

Five years have rolled around, and I have been graciously permitted by the Father of mercies to return to the place of my nativity. During my absence, I find changes have been wrought in other minds as well as in my own. Some, who were Partialists when I left here, are now rejoicing in the belief cherished by the apostle Paul, and for which he labored and suffered reproach, to wit—that “God is the Saviour of all men.” Others, who although they might have been Universalists, yet were nothing more than nominally such, are now actively engaged in the dissemination of their religious views. There appears also to exist in the hearts of all a more ardent desire to cultivate the heavenly graces of Christianity, and to be governed in their deportment by the wholesome requirements of the blessed Jesus. Thank God, there is vastly more of the spirit of Universalism here now, than there was when I left. The leaven of the Gospel is at work, and the fruits of the spirit are beginning to be made more plainly apparent than formerly. And that our most holy faith may continue to exert its healthful influence in the hearts of the believers here, and not only here, but elsewhere, yea, everywhere, is the sincere prayer of him who pens this short epistle.

There are in this country quite a goodly number of believers in the Abrahamic faith, and this number is gradually augmenting. Brs. J. R. Mack and O. G. Hempstead are here zealously engaged in the defence of our principles; and being men who know whereof they affirm, are doing much for the advancement of our cause in this region.—Another public advocate of Universalism, to say the least, might be supported in this county; and ere long another will be obtained. The friends of our cause in Montrose, the county seat, are now busy in the erection of a house of worship to be devoted to the service of the one living and true God—the God of salvation. The house will probably be completed sometime during the coming Winter or ensuing Spring. There will then be an opening in the village for the admission of some herald of the Gospel of peace who may proclaim the word of life and salvation, and instruct the people in the various duties and graces of the Christian profession. May a worthy man become their pastor, and may Universalism flourish under his ministration of the word.

Since I came here I have preached in several places, and am rejoiced to say that a spirit of inquiry is abroad among the people. True, there are many whose prejudices in reference to our doctrine seem to be as deeply rooted as ever; yet, thank the Lord, there are also many who feel disposed to canvass our views and ascertain what evidence we have confirmatory of our faith and hope in reference to the destiny of the undivided family of man. Investigation seems to be going on in their minds; and may this state of things continue until every inquirer after truth shall see our system of Gospel faith in all its beauty, and be led to appreciate its excellences. Heaven grant it for the truth's sake.

I shall soon leave this place for my home in Illinois. By the way, Br. Grosh, let me say, Universalism is rapidly “running down” in that region. It is running down, too, in the right manner. Its influence is beginning to be felt in the hearts of thousands who have sought their homes among the beautiful prairies of the “far West.” Evangelical faith, and Christian love are at work, kindling up the fires of devotion upon the altar of their hearts, imbuing them richly with the heavenly spirit of the Gospel of Jesus. They are beginning to awaken to the importance of cultivating a living faith in the Son of God. They are beginning to say with St. Paul, we are not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ, and are consequently making an effort to be governed by its introduction. In this way Universalism is running down at the West. I have not space left for further remarks at present. In the Gospel of Jesus, yours truly,

G. W. LAWRENCE.

REV. JOHN GRAY.

This name has been several times presented to our readers in calls for information respecting his conduct and character in various places. We now present it, (I hope for the last time,) in the way of caution. He is a vain, supercilious, arrogant, dogmatic, abusive modern revivalist—with all the impudence of his tribe, though not endowed with the calmness and talent of some of them. He was well attended to in Frankfort, and his trickery and dishonesty were boldly exposed, and his arts defeated, by our friend E. T. Marsh, Esq., of that place, who won the thanks of many of Mr. Gray's own denomination for saving them from Mr. Gray's impositions. The following extract from Br. Marsh's letter will conclude all we have to say on the subject.

A. B. G.

“His stay in Frankfort has been blessed with a number of conversions to Universalism. His departure was hastened by the investigation of the Committee sent here by the Montgomery Classis. He had made application to join that body for the purpose of fingering $200 of the Home Missionary funds. He did not get into the Classis, and in consequence lost what was a matter of great grief to him—the cash. He was sustained here by a set of zealots and fanatics, and a few mistaken friends. The latter number diminished daily, until the number of his supporters were reduced to a corporal's guard. In him we had a living witness of the truth of Universalism. His letters written from here to persons in Camden and other places, prove clearly, “that the way of the transgressor is hard.” He was brought here from Cohoes Falls to put down the Universalists and their doctrine; but, unlike Samson of old, he bowed his head and pulled down his own church on himself and friends. He has gone to palm himself off on other communities. I hope some one will give me information of his future location, as I have a number of uncollected executions against him.

MAIL ROBBERY AT HUDSON.—We learn from the Albany papers that the mail bag from the Albany post office, containing the mails of Wednesday and Thursday last, for New York, was stolen from the post coach or coach office, at Hudson, on Friday evening, cut open, its contents examined, and afterwards thrown into the river, where it was picked up by the steamboat Utica. There were drafts to the amount of 60 or $70 000 in it. The amount of money uncertain.—[Observer of Times.

It is somewhat dangerous for man to be a Judge in Arkansas if the statement of Judge Field can be believed. In a charge to the Grand Jury, he lately held the following language:—“In some parts of Arkansas it is really dangerous for a Judge to protect his station from insult, or assert his authority. If what he says or does is not exactly agreeable to the taste of some, he is in danger of annihilation. One or two prosecuting attorneys in the northern part of the State, have been waylaid and murdered for doing their duty. In another part a Judge was barred out of the court house by the populace, and his life put in danger merely because he wished to hold his court as the law directed. Another Judge was near being attacked whilst on his bench, for exercising his authority in keeping silence in the court house during business hours. Another was forced by an armed ruffian to leave the bench and drink with him, and this whilst the court was in session.”

REFLECTIONS ON THE LIFE OF
MURRAY...NO. II.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

There was at this time in London, a preacher by the name of Relly, who proclaimed the doctrine of the final restoration of all mankind to holiness and happiness. He was a man gifted with great eloquence, and much originality of thought; and preaching a doctrine which at that time, was new to the community, he created no small stir and excitement in the religious world. Like many who have preached the fulness of gospel salvation since his day, he was greatly calumniated by religious professors of different sects. The most unfounded charges and wicked misrepresentations were uttered in regard to his character and his doctrines.

Murray had heard of this preacher, and had imbibed a deep-seated prejudice against him—considering him but little less wicked than the Evil One, in whom he then strongly believed. A young lady belonging to the same Methodist Society with Murray, had frequently listened to the preaching of Relly, and had finally become converted to a belief in Jesus as the Saviour of the world. This caused no small stir in the Society; and Murray, being a class-leader, was sent with several of the brethren, to converse with the lady, and bring her back again to the fold. The interview which succeeded was one of uncommon interest, and is most graphically described in the Life of Murray. He entered upon the task with the utmost self-conceit, fully believing it would require but a very few words to convince the deluded young lady, of the error she had imbibed. How little he was then aware of the power of truth!—how unconscious that even in the most unskilful hands, it is a mighty weapon, capable of overthrowing giant defenders of error. It required but a short time to open the eyes of Murray to the difficulties of the task he had undertaken, and to bring down his high crest. He soon found himself utterly confounded and silenced by the reasoning of the young lady; and he was finally compelled to leave her presence, filled with shame that he was so easily overthrown by one so young and inexperienced.

At this period Mr. Relly published a book which has since become very celebrated, called "Relly's Union." It was an able production, supporting the doctrine of Universal Salvation on Calvinistic grounds. This book making some noise in the religious world, a Mr. Mason, a member of the same Methodist society with Murray, and his intimate friend, prepared an answer to the "Union," and submitted the manuscript to the inspection of Murray, previous to its publication. He read it through with great care, but with the deepest disappointment. He clearly saw that Mason had failed to touch the strong points in Relly's work—and saw, too, that the reason was, they were beyond his reach.

While in this state of mind, Murray accidentally got possession for the first time, of the book which had made so much talk—Relly's Union. At first he hesitated whether he should read it at all; but urged on by a strong curiosity, and encouraged by his wife, he finally ventured to open its pages. In describing this event, Mr. Murray says—"After thus weeping and supplicating [God for wisdom to direct] we opened the Bible and began to read the book, looking into the Bible for the passages to which the writer referred. We were astonished and delighted at the beauty of the Scriptures thus exhibited. It seemed as if every sentence was an apple of gold in a picture of silver. And still as we proceeded the wonder was, that so much divine truth should be spoken by so heinous a transgressor—that is, by a man whom they had been made to believe was so very wicked as Mr. Relly. The reading of this book produced a very singular effect on Murray. "At one moment," he says, "I wished from my soul I had never seen the Union; and the next moment my heart was enlarged and lifted up by considerations which swelled my bosom to ecstasy." Those who have been situated as Murray then was, can well enter into his feelings.—

They vividly remember the powerful conflict in their minds between the principles of light and darkness, when the truth first began to break upon their understandings. But such a conflict will invariably lead to the full development of truth, whenever the judgment becomes sufficiently unbiased to weigh and consider with candor the merits of the question.

As might naturally be expected, after reading this book, Murray and his wife had a strong desire to hear Relly preach. Accordingly one Sabbath when their own minister was absent, they summoned courage to go to Relly's meeting. While proceeding there, they were very much alarmed lest some of their Methodist brethren should meet them—an alarm in which many a Niodemus in later years, can sympathize with him. On entering the place of meeting they were surprised to witness so much decorum and devotion, where they had been told there was nothing but irreligion and confusion. In the wise providence of God, it was so ordered that Mr. Relly on this occasion, preached a very eloquent and able discourse, peculiarly adapted to the case of Murray. It seems to have let in a flood of light on his mind, and opened his eyes to the peculiar beauty and glory of the great plan of a world's salvation. On their return home his wife inquired his opinion of the discourse to which they had listened. To which he replied with great emphasis—"I never heard truth, unadulterated truth, before; so sure as there is a God in heaven, if the Scriptures be the word of God, the testimony this day delivered is the truth of God. It is the first consistent sermon I ever heard!" Here we discover the confidence which is immediately inspired by truth.—It makes the most timid bold and strong. In this case, also, we see another quality of religious truth—that while it is consistent to the mind, it is also grateful to the heart; and that its testimony is no more consonant with the dictates of reason, than it is joyful to the best feelings of the soul! Murray's wife fully concurred with him in regard to Relly's sermon. From that time they were both frequent listeners to Relly's preaching, and in a short period became confirmed, ardent and happy believers in a world's salvation.

The church soon began to deal with Murray for imbibing heresy. He frankly acknowledged he had attended the meetings of Relly, and had become a believer in the salvation of the world. But in this, he contended, he had not violated the articles to which he subscribed when he joined the Methodist church. His brethren were much more troubled at his publicly attending the Universalist meeting, and exerting his influence in that direction, than at the peculiar characteristics of the new doctrine he had imbibed. This is evident from the proposition they made to him, that if he would confine his sentiments to his own bosom, they would continue him a member of their communion. This proposal Murray indignantly rejected. Finding all efforts to make him hide the new light God had given him, unavailing, the Methodists finally cast him out from their synagogue. This endeavor to have Murray conceal his real sentiments, and willingness in such case, to continue him in the church, has been imitated in many instances, since that period. Most Partialist churches are willing to keep a Universalist in their midst, provided he will conceal his real sentiments. Propositions to this effect, have frequently been made, and in numerous cases, have been honorably rejected. In how many instances they have been accepted, we have no means of knowing. But that believers in the boundless grace of God, are to be found in all the Partialist churches throughout the land at the present day, is made certain by the admission of eminent Partialist divines. There is reason to believe their numbers, both clergymen and laymen, are by no means small! Would they could hear and heed the voice of the Most High in his commandment—"Come out from among them."

A great misfortune now overtook Murray. His wife sickened and died. His affection for her possessed an uncommon ardor, and her decease plunged him into the very depths of despair. This event broke up all his plans of life. For some months he was so depressed in spirits that his bodily health was greatly affected. He was sick of the world, and yearned for some place where he might plunge into solitude, and live the remainder of his days alone. At this period his thoughts for the first time, turned towards America. He believed that in its vast forests he might find the retirement he longed for. His relatives and friends in vain used every effort to persuade him to relinquish this project. Although the thought of leaving his native land was, he says, worse than death, yet some secret voice seemed to call him away. "I was impelled to go," he declares, "and go I must." Ah! little did he then understand that the affliction which weighed him down so heavily, was designed by the Creator, to prepare him for a new theatre upon which he was soon to enter! Little did he know that an Invisible Hand was there stretched out to lead him across the Atlantic, and engage him in a work marvellous in character and wonderful in results! It is by the infliction of sorrow and misfortune, that divine Providence frequently raises up the most successful instruments to accomplish his great and good designs. On the 21st day of July, A. D. 1770, Murray embarked at London on board the brig "Hand-in-hand," and sailed for America, with no other design but to find some secluded spot where he could spend his days in undisturbed solitude. But how different was God's design!

WHAT IS IT TO BELIEVE IN CHRIST?

According to the Scriptures, it is to believe the TRUTH as it is in JESUS. What is the TRUTH of Jesus? All his precepts and examples, of which we have an account in the New Testament. Jesus taught the people to "love one another," to "do unto others, as they would wish others to do unto them." He taught humility, and self abasement. He exhorted them against trying to excel each other in greatness. He even told them, "whoever would humble himself as a little child, should be greatest in the kingdom of heaven." The fruits of the spirit are, "love, joy and peace." When we have "love one for another," and are "humble as a child," then we are of the nature of Christ. When we are "clothed with humility"—then we are "clothed with Christ." A "faith is the substance of things hoped for," so when we hope for the welfare of mankind, then we have "that faith which works by love and purifies the heart."

Is it possible for any one to have faith in Christ, who never heard of him? Jesus said, "I am the way, the truth, and the life;"—and he also said, "Before Abraham was, I am." Abraham believed in the TRUTH of Jesus, even before the Bible was in existence; he believed the very truth which the Bible contains—and that is that "truth and holiness," and all that is glorious, (which is Christ,) will prevail, and overcome all that is evil; and that "the son of perdition will be raised up," and all things will be restored to peace and happiness.—And thus in the glorious spirit of "TRUTH and HOLINESS" "all the families of the earth will be blessed."

The infant has no external knowledge of the Saviour, and yet he is a partaker of his nature, because he is "clothed with humility." He is meek and lowly, his little heart is drawn out in love for his mother, even the same as the heart of Jesus was drawn out in love for his mother while he was on the cross! Often while the mother is in distress, the infant will look and gaze; and with tears in his eyes will look to sympathize with her, while she is groaning because of pain! and he will appear to earnestly wish and hope for her recovery, when she looks and smiles on him, his little face will shine with "joy and peace," and what is this, but the spirit of Jesus? Surely, the germ of Christ is in the infant. The infant possesses the very nature of Christ in being humble, and in having a desire for the welfare of his "mother, and sister, and brother." And whoever possesses the spirit of "meekness, temperance, long suffering, and forbearance," with a holy desire and "hope" for the welfare of mankind, is truly a disciple of Jesus, although he may not know that there is such a personage in existence.

To know Christ, (or to believe in Christ,) is to unite in spirit with that which is "pure and holy"—and wherever we see "truth and holiness," there we see Jesus. Wherever we see "joy, love and peace," there also we see Jesus. Whenever we administer to suffering humanity, then we administer to Christ. When the apostles spake the truth, it was "Christ which spake in them"—and whenever we hear the truth, we hear it from Jesus. And when we put on "the board of perfectness," then we "put on Christ." Such as make a feast for the poor, the maimed, the lame, and the blind, have the promise of being "recompensed at the Resurrection of the Just." "The meek, the merciful, the pure in heart," and the peace maker, are "of the kingdom of heaven." And may not a person possess those virtues, and yet not know there is such a man as Jesus Christ? In the time of Jesus and the apostles, the blind and the lame had faith to be healed—and yet they did not know as Jesus was the Christ. And so in like manner, a man may have faith to be healed of sin and iniquity—by turning from his evil ways, to the ways of righteousness.

LUCY HORTON.

* "Jesus is the Resurrection" and the "Just," and in his spirit "the poor in spirit" are blessed, for "theirs is the kingdom of heaven."

UTICA, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1843.

MRS. SCOTT'S POEMS.

With mingled feelings of sorrow, indignation and pity, I read in the Universalist Union and Christian Messenger of the 2d inst., a criticism on this work, by Br. T. J. Sawyer. It censures without mercy or palliation, the Editor (Miss Edgerton) and the Publisher (Br. Tompkins), for the manner in which they have got up and published the Poems, and especially charges the omissions of pieces of a certain character to improper motives in the Editor. As one who judging by the last written letters of Mrs. Scott herself, published in the Memoir) had some share in persuading her to consent to the publication of her poems; and who conversed much with her personally, as well as corresponded with her by letter, upon the subject, it may not be improper for me to express thus plainly my feelings and views in regard to that most severe, unjust and illiberal article. Br. Sawyer speaks of his great regard for the deceased, and his knowledge of her character; and yet his article gives plain contradiction to his profession of the first, and betrays his ignorance of the latter! (I pass by his manifest perversion of Miss Edgerton's language and meaning, in relation to Mrs. Scott's aversion to have her controversial articles published—no one but a mere critic who "hacks to expose," would so misunderstand her.) For some of the very things he censures Miss Edgerton for omitting were among the portions I urged Mrs. Scott to publish, but which she was unwilling should appear in book form. (See her own letter in the Memoir.) In my last conversations with her—some of which were in the presence of Miss Edgerton—I urged her to publish all that was considered of merit—her controversial and descriptive religious articles, and her humorous sallies, (many of which she had in manuscript,) included. It will be seen by her letter in the Memoir that she alluded to this, and dissented from my taste and opinions: I yet regret her dissent, and disagree with her final decision, while I admire the modest humility which led her to undervalue her productions, and the delicacy which led her to shrink from appearing prominently before the public, after her death, and in book form, as a female controversialist—for that was the light in which she seemed strangely constrained to look upon and feel the subject in our conversations and correspondence in relation to it. And she thought and felt thus without any, even the least, abatement of her love for Universalism, or of devotion to its interests—but solely, because she undervalued the merits and influence of her writings; and looked upon the contemplated book from her peculiar position alone. This latter (her position) was more especially the case with her humorous pieces. She was an invalid—was just recovering from a severe and (as we all thought) dangerous illness with which she had been suddenly attacked while on a visit at my residence—and she looked forward to a probably not distant departure from this life, and the publication of the book as bearing her dying approbation of its contents—as, in fact, her dying deed—and consequently her feelings could not be changed by my reasons and entreaties. But it shows a very needless disregard for her feelings, (wrong though they may have been,) and disrespect for her memory and character, to censure her best and most faithful friends for complying with her wishes; and to account for those feelings by supposing that their existence was incompatible with a sincere belief and hearty love of, and constant devotion to, Universalism. This Br. Sawyer has done—hastily and unthinkingly I would hope, and in the recklessness which ignorance only could create; for I would fain believe him sincere in his professions of regard for Mrs. Scott's memory.—Miss Edgerton would have been deserving of Br. Sawyer's harsh and unmanly burst of denunciation and censure had she disregarded the confidence and feelings with which the manuscripts and printed articles of her friend were committed to her charge for editorship.—In some few of her omissions she was guided by the advice of Dr. Scott himself, the husband of the deceased, who surely had some right to dictate in the matter, and who, it must be allowed, is not behind even Br. Sawyer in his knowledge of Mrs. Scott's character and last wishes, or in his regard for her memory, or in his will and ability to carry them out in deeds which shall prove them more judicious and real than such a criticism as I am noticing. I repeat it—I differ from the final decision of Mrs. Scott and her most amiable and excellent husband on the subject; but I can not accuse the former by implication of having by the exercise of her wishes and feelings lost any of her faith in or love for Universalism; nor, when I look at the numerous, constant, long continued acts of tender devotion and self-sacrifice of the husband to his sick and dying wife during her years of illness—when I look at all that, and remember her own bursts of deep gratitude as she recounted them to me by word and in letter, I can not impliedly insinuate that he was moved by selfish, or pecuniary, or popularity-seeking motives in this business, and prate of my regard for her memory in contrast with his!

I repeat it, then—Br. Sawyer's criticism has excited my mingled sorrow, indignation and pity. Sorrow that he should in such an ungenerous and unmanly manner, visit with severe censure a young and gentle female who had, at the expense of much pains, time and labor, and in despite of the difficulties of getting her letters answered and materials collected, and finding a publisher, obeyed the injunctions and wishes of Mrs. Scott without charge—with, indeed, an absolute refusal to receive one cent for her arduous task. Oh, it is most cruel, unjust, and tyrannous in any man thus to visit with condemnation, where praise alone should wait! Indignation, that any man connected with the Universalist press, should, while so utterly ignorant of facts as the article itself proves Br. S. to be, deal out its thunders so lavishly and mercilessly on Mrs. Scott and her best and truest friends, even while pretending to a knowledge of her character. The man who wilfully shuts, or neglects to open, his eyes, and then flings around indiscriminately firebrands, arrows and death among gentle and sensitive natures, and on the verdant grave of the lamented and lovely dead, may call it "sport" or "justice," as best it pleases himself; but men of common humanity and reflection, not to say Christian ministers and editors, should first look where the brand and blast is to fall, before they deal in such missiles. And, I add, in pity—for if Br. Sawyer is a man, when he comes to know the facts he should have known before he wrote that article, he will wish to God that it had never been written. If he is what he should be, when that event takes place, no sum of money would hire me to take his place (were it possible) for even a single hour! May God grant him a mind to seek that knowledge, that his repentance may be speedy, and his forgiveness from those he has cruelly and unjustly injured, and from God, may be the sooner experienced; and that in future he may be less severe and more wise, before he enters on the work of criticism.

P. S.—The above was written last week; but I did not get home from Syracuse until it was too late to prepare it for the press and get it into the last week's paper. I regret this the more, as I learn that Br. Whittemore has taken up the foul and black brands after Br. Sawyer has flung them, and is engaged in flinging them about for his diversion. I did hope that there was not more than one editor among us, who would be guilty of the folly (not to say wickedness and unmanliness) which two have exhibited.

TOUR OF THE UPPER LAKES.....No. III.

BR. GROSH—At Detroit we parted with our Captain—who, by-the-bye, is a perfect oddity of his kind—with an outside as rough as that of a Greenland Bear, and yet possessed of as big and kind a heart as ever beat in mortal bosom. An incident or two will give you an idea of him. During the storm I have described, a lady went to him and asked if they were not in danger of being lost. Such questions, I was told, always offended him. "Yes, Ma'am," said he—"you will be in—h—l in five minutes." And yet at any other time, no man could be more attentive and polite to the ladies than Captain Blake—ready and willing to answer any inquiry, and to impart any information in his possession. But rough as was the reply, it was not prompted by an unkind nature—for a little while after this, I saw him weeping, absolutely, at the tale of a poor lad on board, who had no money to pay his passage; and who consequently was carried free of charge.

Captain Blake is a well known and experienced commander on the lakes—brave and resolute—constantly busy in inspecting every part of his boat—sleeping only two hours in twenty-four, and maintaining the most perfect order in every department. Travellers always feel safe with him, for he is a safe captain, has a safe vessel, and a safe crew.

We left Detroit, as I gave you to understand in my last, on the morning of Friday, Aug. 18. Passing up the Detroit river, which abounds on either side with the finest scenery, and across lake St. Clair, and up the river St. Clair—a noble stream,—we reached Fort Gratiot, which commands the entrance to lake Huron, about sunset. The fortification here named, so far as I was capable of judging by an inspection from the boat, is one of considerable strength, and of no mean importance—at least, would be, in case of an invasion from this quarter, which is not very likely to happen at present. The mounted cannon, the glittering musket, the silent round of the sentinel, the roll of the drum, the parades of soldiery, and all the "pomp and circumstance of war," are now only an innocent show; and long may it be ere these peaceful scenes are disturbed by the sound of conflict, and the accompaniments of battle.

Saturday morning, Aug. 19. Awoke—so says my journal—and saw nothing around me but water—no land in sight, and ignorant of my "whereabouts," save that I was on board the Steam Packet Illinois, which was driving along at no mean rate over the calm and unruffled lake. Soon after breakfast, Thunder Bay Island appeared like a speck in the distance, which, an hour's time brought us along side of—when the larder was supplied with some excellent fish—I say excellent, for they proved to be such, when tested at the dinner table. This island is inhabited only by a few fishermen, and is not cultivated.

After leaving Presque Isle, where we "wooded"—20 miles distant from Thunder Bay Island—we began to think and talk of Mackinaw; and many took their stations forward, in order to get the first sight of it. Not being ambitious of that honor, I sat down on deck, under the awning, to the perusal of a book with which I had been engaged for a day or two past. This I had just finished, and had thrown myself back, and stretched my arms upward, and opened my mouth preparatory to a yawn, when several voices shouting, "Mackinaw!" "There is Mackinaw!" brought me instantly on my feet, and I relinquished "gaping" to gaze. Sure enough, right ahead of us was Mackinaw, which the point of an island had for a long while hidden from us. And there, high above the town, on a rocky eminence, were the white walls of the fort, thick and towering. And there, skirting the beach for a mile, were hundreds of the cone-shaped tenements of the Red men—real wigwams, while moored near them were the bark canoes. There was much of romance in the scene, and we seemed transported back to "other times and early days," so like was it to the picture of the olden period, seventy years ago.

Mackinaw, situated on an island of the same name, is an old French town, built in the seventeenth century, and contains outside the garrison, about six hundred inhabitants. Ever since its settlement, it has been a famous resort of fur traders and Indians; and for many years was subject to great vicissitudes, and many a thrilling legend is connected with its history. It is now a station at which many tribes receive their yearly pay, and they had at this time assembled for that purpose.

In visiting the Fort, I was made acquainted with Capt. Scott, at present in command, whose fondness for hunting, and whose unerring skill as a marksman, have become almost proverbial. Even birds and beasts stand in awe of him, and on learning his name, instantly surrender. At one time—so the story runs—while enjoying himself at his favorite sport in the forest, he spied a 'coon at the very top of a tall pine. He instantly made preparations for bringing him down from the commanding station he occupied; but ere trigger was pulled, he was asked to "hold on" for a moment. "What is your name, if I may be so bold?" inquired his honor, the 'coon. "My name is Scott, sir, at your service"—and a "tip of the beaver" accompanied the answer, "Capt. Scott?" "Yes, Capt. Scott." "What, Captain Scott of the army?" "Yes." "Well, you needn't fire—I'll come down—I'm a dead 'coon!" And so down he came. I can not vouch for the correctness of this, but such is substantially the story that is told.

At the ringing of the last bell, we hurried on board, and were soon, "under weigh." The darkness prevented us from viewing objects along shore, each retired to his berth to sleep, perchance to dream of friends and home. "Tired nature's sweet restorer" never was more grateful to me, and my eyes unclosed not, until the morning's sun had risen, "Where are we?" I inquired, perceiving the boat was not in motion, and at the same time hurrying on my clothes. "We are at the Manitou Island," was the reply. Well, what of the Manitou Island, thought I. So up I went, and found that here was a wooding station, as it is termed. We had a fine walk along on the beach, while the boat was receiving the trifle of sixty cords of wood. It was a delightful morning, and we enjoyed our exercise much.

At half-past ten, the bell was rung for religious worship. An excellent congregation assembled aft, when a prayer was offered, a hymn sung, and an appropriate and interesting discourse delivered by a Presbyterian divine, whose name I have forgotten. At two o'clock, divine service was again performed, and though on the "open sea," yet that deck on which we gathered, became to us the house of God, from which the heart's warmest thanks went up we trust acceptably. Our several sectarianisms were laid aside, and we met as brethren should meet.

We were now, it will be understood, on lake Michigan, or, as it was anciently termed, lake Illinese—a vast sea of itself, nearly four hundred miles long, and one hundred broad. Until four o'clock, from the time the Manitou Island sank below the horizon, no land appeared in sight. We then saw in the distance the Wisconsin shore, and were told that the far-famed city of Milwaukee would be reached by the hour of eight, as it was. I did not go on shore here, as it was not the point of my destination at that present time. Many of our fellow passengers landed at this port, and those who had contributed largely toward rendering our voyage pleasant. In the language of the Persian benediction, "May they live a thousand years!"

I will conclude this number by saying, that I was put ashore at Racine, in the territory of Wisconsin, on the morning of Monday, at half-past two o'clock, having by the aid of steam performed a journey of thirteen hundred miles, in less than one week's time.

OUR NEXT VOLUME.

I confess that I had some serious doubts in regard to the adoption of the advance paying or cash system for this paper—I feared that the change would not be sustained by a sufficient number of the subscribers. But every day is bringing proofs to the contrary, and rejoicing my heart with a glimpse of more prosperous times for the Proprietors. Subscribers generally applaud the measure—even delinquents declare it the best plan and wish it had been adopted long ago. And our best and most active agents say that it will greatly lessen their labors, simplify their accounts with subscribers and proprietors, and shorten their letters. Some of the agents have already sent in new names—others say they shall succeed in retaining all the old subscribers and adding many new ones. And these, be it remembered will all be cash subscriptions. There are many agents not yet heard from, but we hope they also are busy in the good work; and if so, they will, very generally, be successful also. In some cases, persons of whom we never heard, have aroused up, and are engaged in trying to get new subscribers for the paper.

Now all this is encouraging. True, the danger is not all past. It takes more than one swallow to make a summer, and more than a dozen active and successful agents are needed to sustain the paper in passing through its change from the credit to the cash system. In fact, it needs every subscriber's aid—first, to convert himself into a cash paying patron, (if he is not one already)—and, second, to get as many as possible of his neighbors and friends to do likewise. We look for much aid of this kind. We hope each subscriber will do all he consistently can in getting new cash subscribers, and in sending in his own subscription immediately.

But there are other changes which have given us no fears—among the Editors. The new broom will sweep cleaner than the old one. Br. Soule is busy engaging some capital new correspondents, and in enlivening some of the old ones. We are certain he will succeed—and we hope all the old ones will continue their very friendly and acceptable favors. Give Br. Soule plenty of communications to select from, and he will give the world a capital paper.

Of the Editors themselves it becomes me, perhaps to say little. Br. Smith will furnish an article at least every two weeks. Br. Skinner will do no less, and probably more. He has rested for a long time, and will prove that he has not rested in vain. Br. Barry is mending his pens and getting ready for a lot of good articles. Br. Soule will do his full share. And as it is certain (almost) that I shall be at home all this winter—and as it is probable (to say the least) that I will remain in this section of the state for another year. (though I shall leave Utica in the spring—where to go, I know not yet,) I hope to let the readers hear from me every week during the next volume.

Such are the prospects for the next volume—and the Editors will do their best to realize them to the subscribers. Will not the subscribers and agents do their best, to realize to us our expectations as to the support of the paper. It will need a large income to pay for all the good things we shall furnish.

REMOVAL.—Br. D. S. MOREY has accepted an invitation to take the pastoral charge of the society in Clinton, and has removed there. He wishes to be addressed accordingly. We are happy to learn by a note from Br. M. that the prospects of this society "are beginning to look up again." The congregation is increasing in numbers and zeal, and every thing seems to speak encouragingly for the future. There is a field open in Clinton for a noble work—there are materials there for one of the strongest societies in the State, and we trust, that under the united labors of Br. M. and the society, this good work will be speedily accomplished. Let the society and the preacher both work, and work together, and they can not fail in building up there one of our strongest societies. Unity in feeling—unity in action, and a strong, enlightened zeal, will do the work. May the blessing of God attend their efforts.

APPROVAL OF OUR ADVANCE PAY SYSTEM BY SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends have now had time to consider well our plan of placing the Magazine and Advocate on the cash-in-advance system; and we are happy to say, that so far as we have heard, it is meeting with general approbation. Almost daily we are receiving letters from our subscribers, in which they speak plainly and warmly in favor of our plan. We have two letters now before us, from which we will take the liberty to make a few short extracts. The following is from a subscriber in Ravenna, Ohio.

"MESSRS. GROSH AND WALKER:—I have just been reading for the third or fourth time the 'plain talk' from the pen of the Editor of your excellent paper. It is just the sort of address I have been expecting for some time. I think the course you have determined to pursue, is the very best; that it is indeed the only one that will ever enable you to realize anything from the publishing of your paper. I am fully satisfied that it will be far better for you, and the subscribers also, to have 300 subscribers who pay in advance, than three times that number who do not pay, for the most part, for several years in succession.....With my best wishes and most ardent prayers for yourselves and the glorious cause in which you are engaged, I subscribe myself,

Your obedient servant,

ED. T. TREMAINE."

We take the following extracts from a letter from a subscriber in Lindley, Steuben co., N. Y.

"MESSRS. GROSH AND WALKER:—I see you are about placing your paper on the advance pay system. This is right; yes, make us pay as we go; it will be better for you, and it certainly will be better for us. I firmly believe this course will enable you to make our paper more valuable, more richly worth the small sum we pay for it, while we shall be more improved by it, enjoy ourselves more in reading it, and altogether escape the remorse, the unpleasant reflections arising from felt neglect of duty to our publisher. I here enclose $3.00 for the present, and next year.....I am as willing to pay for 'The Magazine and Advocate' as I am for the bread I eat; and I can not see how any one can feel different....I am glad you have resolved to place your paper on the advance pay system.....I shall do all I can for it; I shall spend a day or two with your Prospectus this week, and I hope it will receive the same attention from every honest subscriber.

Yours in the faith,

JOHN FENDERSON."

It has been suggested to us that our terms have not been explicitly stated with regard to the amount of copies to be sent, or rather, that it is not distinctly understood whether the person obtaining the subscribers is entitled to a copy gratis. We will here state that any person sending us the pay for 6 subscribers (9.00) shall receive a copy gratis. Eleven copies will be sent for fourteen dollars, which includes the agents copy. We will send sixteen copies (instead of fifteen as before published,) for $20.00—the sixteenth copy being sent to the agent. It will be seen that if the agent obtains 10 subscribers and receives pay at the regular price of the paper (1.50 per copy,) and sends us $14.00, he will receive one dollar and a copy of the paper for his trouble. In the case of fifteen subscribers and $20.00 he receives two dollars and fifty cents and a copy of the paper. It must be at his option to give the subscribers the benefit of clubbing, and thereby receiving the paper at less than the subscription price. Will those who have received

WHAT IS POVERTY.

Is it that we possess no earthly store
To stand neglected at the rich man's door;
To pass unheeded, in a mean attire,
To take the humblest walk nor dare look higher?
This is not poverty.

To know that all who pass us idly by
See in us nothing, that can please the eye;
Perhaps would rather shun us than advance;
Or if when noticed, knew us not, perchance:
This is not poverty.

Though 'lorn our aspect, not so hard our fate,
Though scant'd as nothing, by the worldly great
With aspirations which to Heaven ascend,
Viewing above this earth a steadfast friend:
This is not poverty.

If in our hearts we feel the cheering glow
Which gilds, and animates, where'er we go;
If we possess a conscience void of guile;
If resignation dwell with us the while:
This is not poverty.

But—should we glitter with the brightest gem
That might adorn a monarch's diadem;
And 'mong the highest take the loftiest place,
And there—add lustre—dignity and grace,
To know that in our minds no room is given
For God—for Christ—not e'en a wish for Heaven;
A beaming creature, with a thankless soul,
O'er which the world holds absolute control;
Receiving all that Heaven on man bestows,
And not adore the source from whence it flows:
This—this—is poverty.

RIDICULE.

Is the fact, that ridicule exerts a powerful influence upon the feelings of all, as deeply impressed upon our minds as it should be? Do we always act as though we were fully sensible, that a word or a look, a curve of the lip, or a motion of the hand, were arrows producing more painful wounds, than bitter words in open contest? And yet is it not so? Have we not felt the warm blood start back in our veins, while chilling cold followed quick its rapid retreat; and our hearts in their fulness, to forbid all utterance, save the sound of their own quick and impatient beatings? Have we not felt the scalding tears press hard against the eyelids, which strove still harder to imprison them, and the flush of indignation fever our brows, when we have been aware that we were the subjects of hateful, jeering ridicule? Truly we have; for none of us are so fortunate or circumspect in our lives, as to be entirely exempt from these hated attacks; and none are so constituted as to be beyond the reach of their painful influence. And why not then always act, as though this truth had been brought home?

Some may reply in justification, that there are certain individuals whose improprieties of conduct can be remedied only by a resort to ridicule; and others still, who will assert that the fear of this, in common with all other principles of the human mind, has its sphere of action, and consequently it can not be wrong to exercise it. Without entering into any disquisition concerning the soundness of these positions, we would inquire of the one class, if it be quite certain that no other appeal would prove equally successful?—of the other, if the fear of ridicule, is indeed, a principle in the human mind requiring such a sphere of action?—and of all, if the innocent or undeserving, are not more frequently made to suffer than the deserving, and more pain than profit always effected by such means?

I have known an instance, (and parallels are not few and far between,) in which a modest, intelligent and worthy young female, was made, in public, the subject of contemptuous merriment, merely because her dress was destitute of the appendages of wealth and fashion. True, it was in accordance with the means of those on whom she was dependant, or perhaps it was all her own hard earned but scanty pittance would procure, aside from that devoted to the adornings of her mind; but what of that; such considerations could not screen her, and she turned aside, and while the tears which she could no longer force back, fell fast, she resolved that, in future, the decorations of her person should shield her from the piercing darts of ridicule! And who, who levelled the arrows? The same who talked long and loud of the folly of the sex in kneeling at fashion's shrine—the same who could not be interested in the conversation of females, because it was always of new styles and late cotillions! O Consistency! be thou the friend, the guide, and teacher of man!

We could speak of others who are sneered at, because precision and correctness do not mark the construction of their sentences; and of others still who are ridiculed because they are careful in conversation, to clothe their ideas in language expressive of their meaning; but to point out instances like these was not the only purpose for which we took up the pen. There is a class, and it is far from numbering the least of those ridiculed, who having the "audacity" to appear before the public as writers, it may be of only a few brief thoughts, are supposed by some, to set themselves up as targets, at which any one may aim the shafts of merriment and contempt. And it is for this reason that many, very many, who are well calculated to aid in the researches of science—to instruct and to improve others, in the various departments of knowledge and in morals, confine their influence to the small circle of their friends and acquaintances; and it may be for this reason too, that some who have promised much in their first efforts, have suddenly ceased their labors. But some may ask, "would you wish that criticism should be laid entirely aside?" No: there are none so perfect but they may sometimes err; and their errors may be so gross that even those incompetent to criticise, may see and point them out; but there are few, who would not thankfully receive any improvement or correction, which should be kindly suggested. But it is not criticisms like these which effect the evil to which we have alluded. It is the scanning closely of the written productions of others, not so much for the improvement of any one as for the purpose of detecting something which may afford subject for laughter. And of what class are such critics? Are they not those who are unable to compete with the productions at which they laugh?

In proof of the evil which we have mentioned, and to illustrate the characters of such critics, we will speak of one, out of the many instances which have fallen beneath our notice. One there was whose early life was passed amid all the disadvantages and inconveniences which surround the children of the poor; yet these prevented not the yearnings of her feelings and affection for sympathy, nor the ardent desires of her mind for cultivation and improvement. Time passed by, as it will by the doors of the poor as well as the rich; the situation of those beneath the same roof, had taught her to feel—the bright blue sky and singing birds, the falling dew and scented flowers had taught her to love; and labor and toil, physical as well as mental, had schooled and ripened her thoughts till, as thoughts will do, they struggled for utterance; and when none congenial were near into whose listening ear she could whisper them, she seized a pen and they stood before her, and then—before the public. Needed she an excuse? Let it be an honest desire to correct those opinions which she had been taught to feel, and which were associated with her early life. Another there was, who had known her in her infancy; around whose pathway had been showered paternal smiles and fortune's favors; and into whose hands these productions fell. And what were the feelings which actuated her mind? Did she rejoice that one of her sex had met the tide of adversity with fortitude, and had triumphed over difficulties which had thickly strown her pathway? Let her comments answer. To one they were; "well, who will write next? Why her advantages for a common education, have been very limited;" to another, "whew! she actually makes pretence to sentiment"—to a third, "I could make a great many corrections."—This was well; but to the fourth; "well the girl has one merit, she remembers all she reads." Now, these sayings reached the ear of her, who had struggled and toiled with none to assist or encourage; and what was their effect? We know that she cared not for the praise, the commendation, or even the sanction of such an one; but when she has since seated herself to write for publication, the grin of the literary old maid has been pictured to her mind, and her scientific "whew" and other comments have been sounded in her ears, till she has turned from the desk; and while her lips trembled with emotion, they have whispered, "O, why could not thought, and feeling, and sentiment grow and expand, as well when nurtured by the poor, as when cultivated by the rich!" Now this critic may be unlike others belonging to the same class, for she was an author! True, she was too modest to place any of her productions in any of the periodicals of the day, but then she wrote "poetry" in albums sometimes! We will give one specimen which the reader may rest assured, she never remembered reading, for it is perfectly "original." It was perpetrated on the dedicatory page after she had been expressly told, that it was reserved for a friend who had not as yet found leisure to fulfil a promise. We give it below, "verbatim et literatim"

"Fair damsel, the whole wide worlds is before thee;
Look upon it not in despair;
Although I fain thyself not in "Cupid's" vast sea
Where men and women are so fair;
Yet we have no reason for to complain;
I say "we," because it is you and me;
For years (3) we have continued to remain
Perfectly in friendship it seems to me."

Little indeed did the writer of the above album tribute think, when ridiculing the writings of others, that she was assailing them with that which might with seven-fold power be turned upon herself. And let us all consider, that there are many things respecting our situations and actions, which might be made the subject of ridicule; and hence let us never stoop to indulge in it, but ever extend to others that which we would receive in return.

ANECDOTE OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.—I saw it stated in some city paper lately, that the Croton fountain in the Bowling Green, occupied the spot upon which stood the statue of George the Third, at the commencement of the revolutionary war. This statement brought fresh to my recollection the account of that statue which I have often had from William Barrows, Esq., late of Hebron, Maine, who deceased about five years since, at the age of eighty-two years. He was a soldier of that war and fought in the battles of Long Island and Trenton.

He said when stationed at or near the city of New-York, he with ten or fifteen young men went one evening without any order or knowledge of his commander, with the intention of compassing the death and destruction of his Majesty the King, so far as overthrowing his statue would effect it. On reaching the spot his companions hoisted him up upon the house, behind his Majesty and gave him an axe with which he commenced cutting off his head, applying the blows thick and heavy to the back part of his neck—but the task was not easily accomplished—his instrument was soon dulled, and soon the noise attracted the notice of the Tories, who collected with lanterns in great numbers and threatened his party with violence—and as they far outnumbered the whig soldiers, the latter thought it advisable to retire. He however, had the pleasure a few days after, of making one of a party detached by order of their commanding officer, who went in full day light, when all the Tories in the vicinity could have a view of them and their sacrilegious conduct, and threw a rope around his Majesty's neck and prostrated him horse and all upon the ground. On removing the bronze, the statue of the King and his horse was found to be composed of lead, which those who demolished them run up into bullets and afterwards fired at his Majesty's more loyal subjects. The statue was of George the Second and not George the Third, if my recollection is correct.

DISCOURSES ON PRAYER....NO. V.

BY REV. DAY K. LEE.

"Worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness." Psal. xxix: 2.

We will conclude our series of discourses on prayer, with a sermon on Family Worship. If there is a subject to which the text will apply with a touching and a tender import, it is to the services of Family Worship. "Worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness!" There is, methinks, in established, stated family worship, a BEAUTY,—day, a beauty of holiness,—a beauty of example, enjoyment, blessing; surpassing that of any other form of divine service. Oh, it is a service, and a sight, upon which I conceive, the radiant spirits of the skies must look down with rapture; and increase their own lofty joys, and gladden their own heavenly devotions by the contemplation!

The family altar! It is a sacred structure, around which the tenderest associations rise, the fondest recollections cluster; and from which the divinest benefactions are gathered. It is an altar reared on the cold shores of time, to the love of Christ, to the communion and adoration of God, and the hope and cheering anticipations of future immortality!

And it is, we again say, a sight of beauty, to behold a whole household engaged in the acts and the meditations of family worship. To see the reverend father, with his snowy locks whitening for the grave, his ardent spirit struggling for the skies; and his no less venerable consort, with whom he has shared the mingled joys and sorrows, duties and devotions of a long and a blessed life; together with his little circle of loving and dutiful children around him; himself leading the solemn and endearing service—himself making interesting comments on the morning and the evening lesson, imparting excellent counsels, encouragements, instructions; and at last directing the minds of the happy worshippers, by his own devout spirit, up to the Father of men, through the utterances and emotions of full, and free, and fervent prayer;—each confessing his many faults; each calling to mind the enjoyment of past benefits and mercies; each looking forward in joyous anticipation to the fulfilment of all divine purposes, and promises; each forming higher hopes and holier resolutions in his bosom;—this, this is a scene more than interesting, it is sublimely, heavenly beautiful! No outward, material pageant; no worldly, sensual parade or procession, can be compared with it. It affords, I apprehend, the best idea we can conceive of the assembly and the worship of those who rejoice, and lift their glad hosannas around the dazzling throne of Jerusalem above!

The dedication service—the ceremonies, offerings, anthems, praises of Solomon's Temple, were of a scene, and a spectacle of rare magnificence, perhaps unparalleled by any like convocation that was ever held below. The sacrifice and offering of a hundred and twenty thousand sheep, and twenty two thousand oxen during the festival on which that sublime service was performed; the appearance of a choir of four thousand singers and musicians, all standing arrayed in a single line around the great brazen altar that rose in the court of the priests before the door of the temple—all robed in white linen; a hundred and twenty of them having trumpets, and the rest of them having psalteries, harps and cymbals; all chanting some of those noble odes in which it was sung—"Lift up your heads, oh ye gates, and be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors, and the King of glory shall come in"—the sight of a whole nation crowded with rejoicings, within the same gates,—the bright, brazen scaffold of the King, and the supreme magnificence of every apartment, court and cloister of the building—the appearance of this scene of unparalleled architectural and ceremonial grandeur, must have struck the eye, and filled the hearts of beholders with an admiration and a transport verging on heaven!

But there was one sight on that august occasion which, for true sublimity, transcended even the grandeur of what we have named. It was Solomon, the monarch, father, chieftain of that mighty and rejoicing people—Solomon upon his knees, with his hands raised toward heaven, and his lofty spirit directing their thoughts, their thanks, their thrilling devotions to God, in prayer! It was Solomon, lifting to the ear of Jehovah such words as these:—"Will God, in very deed, dwell with men on the earth? Behold, heaven, and the heaven of heavens can not contain thee; how much less this house which I have built! Have respect therefore to the prayer of thy servant and to his supplication, O Lord my God, to hearken unto the cry and the prayer which thy servant prayeth before thee..... Let thy priests, O Lord God, be clothed with salvation, and let thy saints rejoice in goodness!"

And we repeat the affirmation, that there is no sight or scene on earth of which we can conceive, that would appear to us more sublime, more divinely beautiful, than the appearance of a whole family or a whole nation, in one assembly of worship, through one venerable leader directing their thanks, their supplications, and lifting their soaring spirits to the blest communion of the God of glory!

As it regards the season of family worship, we would recommend that it be chosen morning and evening. The train of our sympathies, the nature of our obligations, and the proper arrangement of time, would seem to suggest that we sanctify a portion of our many hours to this sacred and endearing employment, and that it be done morning and evening. In the morning, as the family rise from the refreshing slumbers of the night,—while yet their minds are free, vigorous, unoppressed by the cares and anxieties of business—at this delightful season should the father and husband call together his circle of affectionate hearts, and for a few moments direct them to the communion of that merciful Father, who has watched over them during their recent slumbers,—when their eyes and their minds were sealed in a sleep as profound as that of the tomb, when no arm but his own could protect and shield,—watched over them all—preserved their lives, embosomed their very spirits in his own overshadowing, overfolding mercy, protected them from accidents of the elements, from sickness, sorrow, bereavement, and raised them up to the beamings of another morning whose outgoings he maketh to rejoice!

They should call to mind the benefits of an existence, which, though commenced in a mortal world, where sufferings abound, is to continue in a higher and heavenlier sphere; and ascend in its approaches toward the sublime standard of his own freedom, pleasure, glory; while he himself exists to impart to the shouting, soaring myriads that surround his throne, of the fulness of his own beatitude.

They should remember the blessings of Christ and the Gospel by which we have the irrefragable assurance of immortality; they should remember Sabbath joys and sanctuary pleasures; they should think of the endearments of friendship, affection, society and home; and grateful, generous thanksgivings should go up to the heavens for them all.

They should not forget that they will need his care and protection during the day before them; that they will want his strengthening and restraining grace to hold them from temptation and deliver them from evil, calamity and grief; that they depend upon His own sovereign mercy for food, and gladness, and friends; and they should supplicate, lifting up holy hands and holier hearts, for a continuance of his favor toward themselves, toward their absent friends, their needy neighbors, and dependent fellow beings.

In the evening also; should the family altar attract its votaries, and parents and children should surround it and seek communion with God. It is a season of peculiar advantage, and of the selectest influence. All nature is at rest. The woodlands and meadows sleep. The pastures are clothed with slumbering flocks, and the cattle upon a thousand hills participate in the general, hushed repose. Earth's solemn silence seems prophetic of the rest that remaineth for the people of God.

The broad and beautiful heavens above have a sweeter, tenderer look than the loving mother casts, with the soft benisons of her spirit, upon her sleeping babe. They more than intimate that they have joy and glory, an eternal night for us all, in their far off habitations! They declare the glory, goodness, kindness, of our Father; and seem to suggest that our meditations be placed upon His love, and our petitions rise for a continuance of his excellent benefits! We have gone through with the labors, the afflictions, instructions, enjoyments of the departed day. Worn and sinking nature pleads for repose; a repose too, in the arms of One who will give us back our life in the morning. We should assemble our household and our thoughts; read a portion of that Word which assures us of God's existence and man's future immortality; and then our offering of gratitude should rise for the mercies that are past, and our desires go up for protection from harm and distress, till the morning cometh, when we hope to feel refreshed from the toils of departed hours, and with sins forgiven, and hearts set free, go out with joy, and be led forth with peace.

Let not this service fall from its high significance to a mere outward show of mummery and noise; but let it be a worship in the fervency of feeling; in the spirit, and ardor, and beauty of holiness! Let the whole soul be moved by a conviction of the import and sanctity of religious meditation, by a wakeful sense of the high and endearing privilege of communing with the Father of all. Let the morning and evening worship minister to the enlargement, the elevation of the soul, and the refinement, and exaltation of its divine affections. Let us feel that we are commending ourselves to the care of the kindest and tenderest of all parents,—a parent in the infinitude of that word's lofty meaning; who will purpose for his children's good; who will deliver them from unnecessary evil; and either in this world, or the world to come, continue our being, and immortalize our fondest joys, and noblest love, and our holiest recollections!

Let it be a season of devotion—reverent, spiritual self-devotion, when new pledges are made to God, when the trespasses of our enemies are forgiven, and we feel at peace with all men, and desire the greatest good, and the greatest conceivable happiness of all our Father's children.

Among the benefits of true family devotion, we may consider the salutary, the refining, the ennobling effect which it is likely to produce on the children of pious parents. Many religious parents, it is true, have the misfortune of wayward and ungodly offspring, but I believe this is a fault not to be charged upon the services of worship. Let parents begin with their children when they are young, and susceptible of tender and exalted impressions, and teach them to pray,—tell them about the goodness of their Father in heaven, of his nearness to them, of his love for them, of the infinite tenderness, and the infinite abundance of his mercy; of the home which he has built for them and for all in the bright world of his immediate habitation. Cultivate in them devotional feelings, and spiritual inclinations; and they will be engaged, and interested, and enlightened in prayers and thanksgiving. They will spring up as goodly willows by the water courses. They will make glad parents, and will be ranked among that amiable company whose feet are beautiful upon the mountains.

I have seen the effect of such teaching. I might name many instances of the kind, but one will suffice. I know a boy, a bright and beautiful boy, who has scarcely attained to twelve years of age, that is already "an example of the believers," in spiritual refinement, and devotional feeling and inclination. His parents are practical Universalists. They knew of the fulness and tenderness of the Father's love; they had felt peculiarly embosomed and beatified in that love at the family altar, and they taught this little one to pray, even before he could distinctly articulate the expressions of his pious thoughts. They taught him to repeat from memory the Lord's Prayer; and often as he was about to go to his evening rest, have I seen him kneel by his mother, and utter that prayer, in all the expressiveness of its sublime significance; and then retire, as to the tender embrace of a loving Father. They impressed his young heart with a living conviction of God's goodness, of his infinite kindness to all his creatures, of his benevolent design, of bringing all men to future purity, happiness and glory. And before ten summers had shone upon him, his mind had soared above his years, and he would talk like a Christian philosopher of divine government, and human duty and destiny. He read in nature the beautiful revelations of our Father, as he would tenderly speak of God, and his whole heart was continually inclined to pious thoughts and lovely anticipations. He seemed to live in no material atmosphere, and to have come to the assembly of the "just made perfect." No irreverent expression escaped his lips, and no profane or malicious thoughts seemed to rise in his bosom. I have seen him laid low in sickness, when hope of his recovery could be but faintly entertained, and he would converse as one who was reconciled to God, and who contemplated death as but a step from a gloomy wilderness to a beautiful garden of rosiest flowers and rarest fragrance, in the great embosoming paradise of heavenly love! On the departure of some little playmate to whom he was attached, I have heard him say, with a tear of mingled regret and rejoicing bursting from his eye—"he has gone to be folded in the arms, and to rest upon the bosom, and receive the caresses of our Father. We shall meet again. Heaven is our home."

Such is the effect of prayer, and devotional culture, and clear, decided religious impressions upon one child. And I believe what he was made, others may become also. Thus we discover the benefits which children derive from the services of family worship. Their influence upon those of mature years is a blessing of equal value. It is a softening, refining, exalting influence upon all who enter into its delightful meditations. It perpetuates the holiest inclinations, it establishes and carries forward from one period of life to another, the most tender and endearing recollections. It is the shrine at which we have offered up our thanksgivings.—God has been gracious to us in a thousand ways, and in a thousand signal blessings. He has lent an abundant increase to the earth. The harvests have been ample. The pastures have been clothed with flocks. The showers and the dews have descended. Our lives have been preserved. Our friends have been permitted to gladden our homes. Our hearts have been filled with joy and rejoicing. Our sicknesses have been mitigated. Our prospects have been brightened, and our existence made radiant and blessed in the land of the living. And from time to time, we have gathered in communion with home's loving inmates around this shrine and offered up emotions of gratitude for all of life's favors, and prayed that every blessing be sanctified to our good. And from a recollection of the devotions which have there been paid, and the mercies which they have seemed to call down upon us, remembrances, and endearments, which we would be pained to lose, are revised and perpetuated. In fancy it transports us back to other times, and other seasons, when we were reaping in joy, or sowing in tears and bitterness. The services of this altar are waymarks on the ascending scale of existence, at which we have rested, and held glad communings, and received encouragement and invigoration.

It is our resort in dark and discouraging moments. The gloomy cloud has come over, the tempest of tribulation descends; our tabernacle is dreary and cheerless. We feel insufficient for our sorrows! They compass us about, and press heavily upon us. God has been gracious hitherto. He is unchangeable in his love and mercy. He is kind, he is compassionate, from everlasting to everlasting. Will he forsake us, now? Ah no, we trust that he will not! We will seek the strengthening of his pitying spirit! The service of family devotion is enjoyed. We bow before him in confidence and contrition, and invoke his mercy upon our household. Our anguish is mitigated. God seems to hear, and pity, and bless. His unseen hand wipes away the gathering tears. His sweet consolations spring up in our hearts, and we experience a good deliverance. We see once more "with open face" the strength of our hope, the blessedness of our faith, and the end of our salvation.

From its being the spot around which we gather in the extremes of happiness and misery, of peace and tribulation, it has a sacredness, and imparts a hallowing virtue that savors of heaven. It has an influence to attach us to home, and to friends, and to God. It puts us in fruition of faith's sweetest and holiest transports; and gives us visions and earnest of the joys of paradise! There we have commune with God in the presence of his overshadowing spirit, as the Priest of the Hebrews did beneath the outspread wings of the glorious cherubim! There we have received his blessings and his consolations. There we have offered up with rejoicing hearts, our free thanksgivings. There perhaps our father and mother have been wont to bend with snowy locks, and trembling voice, and struggling heart; for strengthening grace in declining years; for an increase of faith, and hope, and pious emotions; and to invoke rich blessings and richer mercies upon their children. There we remember to have seen them last in their moments of health and devotion; and when they are passed into the skies, to join the family worship of our Father in heaven, the dearest, and the sweetest recollections that we can have of them will cluster about the old Family Altar; and the attachments that will link our spirits most indissolubly to things, will seem to have assumed their strength and endearment, in the hallowing dews of its blessed communings!

There two have we joined the affectionate brother, and the loving sister in the morning and evening worship. There we have jointly presented our thanks and our supplications. There confessed our sins; there made our vows to be more devoted to duty and to God. Our affections have there been increased, and our attachments to them have been rendered more warm and sacred. There husband and wife have knelt in loveliness and affection,—as well when the lifting joy has gladdened their hearts, as when the heavy sorrow has darkened their dwelling;—there they have knelt like the primal pair in the Garden, and communed—O, how deeply! with him who has shown himself their FATHER; who has sanctified their union; who has blessed their evenings and their mornings; who has chastened them with a father's love, guarded them with a father's care, beheld their prosperities with a father's joy, and showered the divinest benefits upon them! They feel that he is never so near, never so tender in his kindness, never so liberal in his consolations, as when they seek him there.—

That place is the gate of heaven, and through its lifted portals, the angels of paradise are seen going and coming, ascending and descending on their missions of mercy, and their errands of blessing! More and more do they come to realize that "they twain are one flesh," one bosom, one spirit, sharing jointly the benefits and endearments of this world, and anticipating in the world to come, a reunion of persons, and increase of all sacred affections, and a full measure of heaven's sweetest and sublimest beatitude in the "house not made with hands."

The family altar stands, indeed, in a holy place! It is a symbol, on the shore of time, of that throne in the heavenly country, around which the spirits of the ascended gather, as God's dear children, to enjoy his worship. Nay, methinks the high praises of our departed kindred, and the glad hosannas of the burning and adoring seraphim, are but songs that go up from the family worship of man's long home! And, O, transporting thought! the prayers and the praises that ascend morning and evening from our homes below, are the inarticulate breathings of those celestial devotions, and those ravishing pleasures!

The family worship here may render our dwellings an anticipated heaven. We may find it a source of joys more satisfying, of emotions more blessed, of endearments more exalted and extatic, than can be attained this side the radiant world of our high inheritance! We can there strengthen our resolutions to resist temptation, and to walk in righteousness. We can there lay up treasures in heaven—treasures whose intrinsic riches shall consist in heaven—heaven on earth. We can there increase our faith in God, by calling to mind the mercies that are passed, and supplicating for future joys and future prosperities.

Above all the services of that ordinance will prepare us for such a death as the Christian, and the man should die. Its altar was erected for our comfort, for our consolation. Its contemplations were instituted to perfect our faith, to elevate our trust; to increase, exalt, exhilarate our hopes of future life and blessedness. We can there so frame our mind, so train our sympathies, so brighten our visions, our anticipations, so anchor our souls in the very haven of immortality, that when death comes to call a dear one from our fold, although we may weep and lament in heaviness of sorrow, yet we will possess so much of the fulness of the kingdom, and wing our lofty way so above the scenes of earth's griefs and separations, that we can behold the departed standing among the seraphs of glory, sharing their holy joys, and lifting to God their rapturous hallelujahs!

And when Death comes to summon our own spirits, and bear us away from earthly friends and earthly tribulations, we will feel prepared to go. We will know assuredly that it is the gate to endless joy for every human soul—our thousand past services of devotion, have impressed deeper and deeper this glad conviction upon our minds,—and now we are prepared to meet the change, to pass the vale and go home rejoicing!—go home to that world whose services are typified, whose joys are anticipated, whose songs and thanksgivings are symbolized by the sacred rite, and the sweet meditations of the family altar! Nothing, I believe, under God, can establish us more firmly in the divine assurance of the Universalist faith, than this portion of its practical duties. It brings us frequently to contemplate life, and death, and immortality, in all that we can conceive of their conditions, circumstances, relations, import,—and to feel that God in the infinity of his mercy and the ubiquity of his love, hath ordered all things well for his children!

In conclusion of this series, and of this discourse, let me, brethren, express a hope that we shall all think more earnestly, and more solemnly upon the duty and privilege of prayer—especially family prayer, and be strict and be habitual, and devotional in its delightful services. Let us come before God with our family, morning and evening, continually with trusting and grateful hearts, and spend a season in his service. Let us there unbosom our heavy sorrows, and offer up our sincere gratitude. Let us there seek to grow in grace, and in the knowledge, and the love, and the joy of Christ. There let the wounded heart seek to be bound up, and the happy heart learn to be obedient and true to its nature and to God. There let us increase and sanctify those affections for friends, which we believe we shall possess in an Eden land—and so familiarize our thoughts with the dispensation of death, that we feel that its bitterness and sting are passed, and glance up to the gracious heavens upon joy unbounded and life everlasting.

UNIVERSAL SALVATION.

After a long and patient investigation of the subject, by the light of reason and revelation, I have been led to the following results; not willingly, because I wished so to believe, but irresistibly—my judgment has been convinced against my will.—And if by investigation I have been led into error, I trust that by continued investigation I may yet arrive at truth. I count not myself to have apprehended, but I follow after, that I may apprehend. The apostle saw but in part. But to the result of my investigation.

First. All men are God's offspring, or children, for "God created man in his own image," Gen. i: 27; and he "giveth to all life, and breath, and all things;" "in him we live, and move, and have our being," "we are the offspring of God." Acts xvii: 25-29. "The spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life." Job xxxiii: 4. "O God, the God of the spirits of all flesh." Num. xvi: 22. "Behold all souls are mine." Ezek. xviii: 4.

Second. All men are given to Christ, that he may give them all eternal life. "All things are delivered to me of my Father." Luke x: 22. "And all mine are thine, and thine are mine; and I am glorified in them." "As thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him." John xvii: 2, 10. "The Father loveth the Son and hath given all things into his hand." iii: 35. "All that the Father giveth me, shall come to me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out. For I come down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me, I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day." vi: 37, 38, 39. "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." xii: 32. That "to draw," means, to teach in such a manner as to lead others to conform to the mind of the teacher, will appear from Acts xx: 30. Heb. vii: 19, and x: 22.—Jesus has also given this meaning of the word "draw," in John vi: 44, 45. "No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me, draw him; and I will raise him up at the last day. It is written in the prophets, And they shall all be taught of God. Every man, therefore, that hath heard, and hath learned of the Father, cometh unto me." This "drawing" and "teaching" mean the same thing. Christ also says, vi: 65, "Therefore said I unto you, that no man can come unto me, except it were given unto him of my Father." Jesus tells us of the extent of this drawing, that it shall include all men. John xii: 32. "That the eternal salvation of all men is intended by their being drawn to Christ, is also certain from Gen. xlix: 10, "And unto him shall the gathering of the people be." The apostle Peter has given us an infallible rule for interpreting the prophecies of Scripture, and we are always safe in attending to that rule, which may be found in his 2 Epist. i: 20, 21, where it is said, "that no prophecy of the Scripture is of any private interpreting." According to this, every private interpretation of the prophecies, on every explanation which leaves out a part of God's offspring, is false. All the prophecies, when publicly interpreted, will come out in the end that all are given to Christ, that all are to be redeemed by him; that all people, nations, and tongues, shall at last serve and obey him. Num. xiv: 21. Ps.

ii: 8; xxii: 27; lxxv: 1-3; lxxvi: 3, 4; lxxxvi: 9. Isa. xi: 9; xxv: 6-8, and xlv: 22-25, (in the 24th verse leave out the supplied word "one" which annihilates the text.) Isa. liii: 6, 10, 11, and lv: 8-11. Dan. vii: 19. Hosea xiii: 14. Hab. ii: 14. Mal. i: 11. According to the above rule, all these prophecies are easy to be understood. With this rule in view, look at the first great and precious promise and prophecy to man in the Old Testament, Gen. iii: 15, God, speaking to the serpent, (or devil) said, "And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." On this passage, all after revelation may be considered as larger commentaries; for that this passage means the complete destruction of Satan and sin, and the full and eternal deliverance of all men from his power, may be learned from the apostle's comment in Heb. ii: 14, 15 and 1 John iii: 8. Look, also at the great and precious promise and prophecy delivered to Abraham, Gen. xxii: 18. "And in thy seed," (which is Christ, Gal. iii: 16.) "shall all the nations of the earth be blessed"—compared with Acts iii: 25, 26, "Ye are the children of the covenant which God made with the fathers, (or Abraham) see Gal. iii: 8, 17, 18. This promise or covenant "that was confirmed before, of God, by an oath," (Heb. vi: 17, and farther explained in Heb. viii: 10-13, and x: 16, 17,) may be compared to a vested right, which, it is well known, the government that gives can not take away. The apostle confirms this idea in Titus, i: 2, when he speaks of "eternal life, which God that can not lie, promised before the world began." Thus it will be seen that the covenant was a voluntary obligation, which God bound himself to perform, to all the nations, kindreds, and families of the earth, without any conditions or respects of persons, "for God is no respecter of persons;" and the blessing goes beyond every threatening in the Scriptures, even to a glorious immortality. Now believing or disbelieving this covenant of promise can make no possible difference respecting its truth or fulfillment. "If we believe not, yet God abideth faithful; he can not deny himself." 2 Tim. ii: 13. Rom. iii: 34. "For what if some did not believe? Shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect? God forbid: yea let God be true, but every man a liar," (that does not believe.) For, so John explains it in his 1 Epistle v: 10, 11. "He that believeth on the Son of God, hath the witness in himself: he that believeth not God hath made him a liar, because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son. And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son." Here unbelievers, as well as believers are said to have eternal life in Christ. One has that faith in the record "which works by love and purifies the heart," the other has not that faith, but the record is yet true. That it was given to them "before the foundation of the world," will further appear from 2 Tim. i: 9, "Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus, before the world began." Dear readers, may we practice the precepts of the Gospel of the Son of God, and finally be admitted into his heavenly kingdom, to bask in his love throughout the unending and ceaseless ages of eternity.

PROSPECTUS

For the Fifteenth Volume of the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate.

Rev. H. B. Soule, Editor;

Revs. A. B. Grosh, A. C. Barray, S. R. Smith, D. Skinner, Corresponding Editors.

THIS old and useful periodical will be continued as heretofore, with the above changes in its Editorial Department; and a change to the CASH, or ADVANCE-PAY system. The principal Editor by becoming Corresponding Editor, secures to our columns the regular and continued productions of his pen. The Editor engaged in his stead is as prudent and talented, if not experienced; and will serve while he remains in this city. Should he remove, another, as well qualified, and entitled to public confidence, will be secured. The other Editors are too well known to need our commendations; and the engagement of Mrs. Smith and Skinner will, we hope, be taken as an earnest that we mean to endeavor deserving what we ask—the support of a liberal public.

We intend to test the substantiality of our patronage, by placing the Magazine and Advocate on the CASH system. Every paper sent out after the present volume, must be paid for in advance—and will be sent only as long as it is thus paid for. This plan is best for both subscribers and publishers, if both will unite in it. To subscribers, who will save the enhanced price, which now goes toward making up the loss on bad subscribers—and to publishers, who can then purchase for cash, and of course at a cheaper rate; and who will no longer lose what even the enhanced price does not make up. To both it will save the necessity—the disgusting and painful necessity—of writing and reading duns, complaints, and coaxing entreaties to delinquents, &c., &c.; which, on the credit system must always lumber our columns to the injury of the paper's credit and usefulness. Will our subscribers, one and all—for there can be no exceptions—support us in this mutually advantageous system? If so, let every one pay for next year before January next—in time for us to receive the money and enter them on our list before the first number of the new volume is issued. Those who send by mail, can remit a one or two dollar bill, (the Post Master will frank it, of course, if properly requested,) and we will send papers till the money is exhausted.

Our principles are the same as ever—Universalism in word and in deed—in theory and in practice—in heart, and soul, and daily conversation—in life and in death—now and forever! And every rational and proper means to bring its believers to the full adoption of this sentiment—to build them up, and make them—"a peculiar people, zealous of good works"—and to bring our opposers to a knowledge and practice of the truth; will be mildly, but earnestly, and constantly advocated by this paper, so as to render it increasingly worthy of a liberal support from liberal Christians generally, and from true-hearted, devoted Universalists especially.

LINES

To the memory of Barnabas Eldredge, who died Sept. 5th, 1843, aged 75 years.

Written by his surviving partner, MRS. SARAH ELDREDGE.

When thy blest spirit took its flight, and left this earthly clod

To soar above this world of sin and hold commune with God,

O how I wish'd in that dread hour, I by thy side might lay,
My spirit soar along with thine to realms of endless day!

My guide, my counsellor and friend; my hope, my stay, my all—

The souter of my woes on earth, to whom now shall I call?
Who will forgive my weaknesses, my wanderings yet in time?

Thou God of love, I pray to thee to ease my troubled mind!

Blest shade, look down from realms above on thy bereav'd one here,

Assuage my grief, if souls above can drop a blissful tear;
A guardian angel may'st thou be to all thy children here,
O may they meet thee in the heavens, with their own Mother, dear.

The consort of thy latest years, whom thou hast left to mourn,

I've cherish'd and beguill'd thy age through all the wintry storm—

A wintry storm it was not so thy health was hale and good,
Thy form erect, thy intellect with equal firmness stood.

Not in the freshness of thy youth could I have lov'd thee
more,

Thy presence and thy converse came like an enchanting power.

O death, thou tyrant of the world, could no entreaty stay
Thy icy arms, that marr'd his form and took him thus away?

Thy neighbors and acquaintances have lost in thee a friend,
The poor man's wants thou hast supplied, and help to all did lend;

A father to the fatherless, thou hast dried the orphan's tears;
Oh if on earth thou could'st remain to cheer their future years!

But hark, a voice from realms above bids all my murmurs cease;

The gates of death we all must pass, they lead to life and peace—

The Saviour vanquish'd death and hell, and left to us a way Whence sinners may come home to God and ever with him stay.

Then why, my soul, art thou cast down? have confidence in God;

Consider has chastisements just, 'tis he appoints the rod—
The hour will soon arrive, when I from flesh shall be set free,

At heaven's gate be thou the first to greet and welcome me.

REFLECTIONS ON THE LIFE OF
MURRAY...NO. III.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

While Murray is voyaging across the Atlantic, let us turn our attention to another field, where Providence had been making singular preparations for his reception. In an obscure place on the coast of New Jersey, called "Good Luck," (and a place of good luck it was for the religious world,) which is situated on Cranberry Inlet, lived an individual named Potter. He was one of nature's original characters—a man of strong mind, great discernment, unbounded benevolence, and strictly upright and honest. Possessing a religious turn of mind, he reflected much on sacred things; yet he was not at all satisfied with the doctrines proclaimed by the sects which prevailed around him. They were altogether too contracted for his enlarged soul—the greatest good they pretended to be able to accomplish for mankind, was vastly too small to gratify his expanded benevolence. It would seem the Creator had implanted naturally in his heart, the rudiments of the doctrine of a world's salvation, and that he had obtained some indistinct glimpses of that doctrine, in his meditations on the character of the Supreme Being and the works of his hand; although he did not know that there was another mortal on the earth who entertained similar views, much less that any preacher ever proclaimed them as the Gospel of Christ.

Potter being a man of wealth, voluntarily erected a meeting house at his own expense, refusing all assistance proffered by his neighbors. In conformity with his native liberality, he allowed Christians of every denomination to occupy it, but strenuously refused to give it into the exclusive possession of any sect—saying he had built it for a preacher after his own heart, which God in due time would send him. He felt perfectly confident a messenger would soon arrive, who would proclaim a doctrine fully according with his own views; and nothing that his friends or neighbors could say, either in ridicule or serious expostulation, could divest him of this firm persuasion. Strange presentiment—singular reliance upon the righteous ways of Providence! What but God himself, could have fixed such an expectation in his mind! He had no conception that the Almighty was even then, leading just such a preacher across the Atlantic—although then not a preacher, nor entertaining the most distant idea of ever becoming one. But Murray sailed for New York—how, then, could the destination of the ship be altered? And if altered, how incredible that in the long stretch of the American coast, some thousands of miles in extent, the vessel containing him, would come into so obscure a place as Cranberry Inlet, and the town of Good Luck! It was true, a young, heart-broken man, was sailing across the Atlantic, himself unconscious of being sent on any errand; but how was this man to find Potter and make his acquaintance, and be induced to preach in his house? All these events were hidden from mortal eyes, but they were seen by an eye that never slumbers, and brought about singularly and marvelously by a Wisdom that never errs!

In the meantime Murray prospered on his voyage. The master of the vessel having for commercial reasons changed its destination from New York to Philadelphia, it arrived in the month of September, at the latter city. Murray being anxious to visit New York, determined to go on immediately by land. He accordingly made arrangements to take a seat in the stage, which then run but once a week between the two cities. But the stage had departed! On what trivial events do matters of the most momentous importance often depend!—How insignificant the hinge on which they frequently turn! Had that stage coach delayed its departure for a short time, until Murray had got a seat, the whole current of his life would have been changed. It is not at all probable he would have ever visited Good Luck, or known Potter, or have become a preacher of impartial grace—and so far as human knowledge can foresee, the large denomination of Universalists would not now have been in being!

Having been thus disappointed in going to New York by land, and the captain of the "Hand-in-hand," concluding to sail for that city, to find a better market for his cargo, Murray again embarked with him. They had pleasant weather during the first part of the voyage; but suddenly there came up a dense fog, which so bewildered them that they soon found the brig in the midst of breakers. The vessel struck on a bar, but soon passed over uninjured, into a small bay, where they cast anchor. Finding it would be impossible to get out over the bar again, with the full cargo aboard, the captain engaged a sloop lying near by, to take a part to lighten the brig. This was accordingly done; and Murray was requested to go on board the sloop, to keep an oversight of the goods. The next morning the wind being fair, both vessels got under way for New York. The brig passed out over the bar in safety; but as the sloop was about to follow, the wind suddenly changed dead ahead. Thus Murray and his small craft, were detained in the bay, while the brig passed on to New York.

Being in charge of the sloop, and finding no provisions on board, Murray went on shore to procure food for himself and the crew. He accordingly landed. Passing along, he was surprised to see a small meeting-house on the borders of a grove of trees. He could not imagine where there were people enough to make it an object to erect a place of worship. A short distance beyond the church, he saw a dwelling, before the door of which lay a large pile of newly caught fish. Supposing he could procure some of these for the sailors, he approached and accosted a tall, elderly man, who was standing near by. Murray and Potter stood face to face! Strangers in person, but brothers in spirit! From far distant lands, across trackless oceans, by a most remarkable and unexampled combination of circumstances, God had at last brought these kindred spirits into conjunction, for the purpose of opening a new dispensation, as it were, in the Christian religion. Strange that from the meeting of these two individuals, both of humble stations in life, moving hitherto in circles far remote, and entirely dissimilar—one in the dense throngs of the city of London, and the other in the obscure wilds of America—should flow consequences which will be felt in the religious world, through all coming generations! But God chooses his own instruments and his own times to accomplish his gracious purposes. And although his ways are such frequently as to seem inadequate to the object he has in view, yet the result vindicates the perfection of divine wisdom!

The remarkable interview which Murray first had with Potter—so strange as to seem almost the dreamings of romance—must be given in Murray's own words: "Pray sir, will you have the goodness to sell me one of those fish?" "No sir!" That is strange, when you have so many, to refuse me a single fish! "I did not refuse you a fish, sir; you are welcome to as many as you please, but I do not sell them. I do not sell fish, sir; I have them for taking up, and you may obtain them the same way." Potter then urged Murray to return after he had supplied the sailors with their provision, and pass the night with him. This kind invitation Murray accepted—not dreaming that Potter had any other object in view than simply to show a mark of courtesy towards a stranger. But the mysterious providence which had led him so strangely round the world, and which had so often seemingly crossed his path with sudden and needless disappointments, was about to reveal its purposes in a clearer beam of light, to his astonished vision. "I was greatly astonished," says Murray, "to see so much genuine politeness and urbanity under so rough a form; but my astonishment was greatly increased on my return. His room was prepared, his fire bright, and his heart open. 'Come,' said he, 'my friend, I am glad you have returned. I have longed to see you—I have been expecting you a long time!'" I was perfectly amazed. "What do you mean sir?" In reply to this question, Potter went on to give a brief history of his life to Murray. In regard to building the meeting house, he remarked, "I had no children, and I know I was beholden to Almighty God for every thing which I possessed; and it seemed right I should appropriate a part of what he had bestowed, for his service. My neighbors offered their assistance. But no, said I, God has given me enough to do his work without your aid, and as he has put it into my heart to do, so will I do. And who, it was asked, will be your preacher? I answered, God will send me a preacher, and of a very different stamp, from those who have heretofore preached in my house. The preachers we have heard are perpetually contradicting themselves; but that God who has put it into my heart to build this house, will send one who shall deliver unto me his own truth; who shall speak of Jesus and his salvation. When the house was finished, I received an application from the Baptists; and I told them if they could make it appear that God Almighty was a Baptist, the building should be theirs at once. The Quakers and Presbyterians received similar answers. No, said I, as I firmly believe that all mankind are equally dear to Almighty God, they shall be equally welcome to preach in this house which I have built. My neighbors assured me I never should see a preacher whose sentiments corresponded with my own. But my uniform reply was, that I assuredly should! * * * * My friends often asked me—

"Where is the preacher of whom you speak?"—And my constant reply has been, he will by and by make his appearance. The moment I beheld your vessel on shore, it seemed as if a voice had audibly sounded in my ears. There, Potter, in that vessel, is the preacher you have been so long expecting! I heard the voice and I believed the report. And when you come up to my door, and asked for the fish the same voice seemed to repeat: Potter, this is the man, this is the person, whom I have sent to preach in your house!"

There is nothing in history more wonderful than this good man's faith that God would send him a preacher of the truth, and its singular fulfilment. To what can we attribute it, that the ship which bore Murray should become bewildered in the fog, and without any design or knowledge of those on board, should be led into that obscure inlet—that Potter, on first seeing the brig, should immediately feel a presentiment that it contained his long expected preacher—and that he should at once recognize Murray as the messenger sent to declare the Gospel—to what can we attribute all this, but to the direct interposition of divine Providence? So Potter considered it—so Murray—and so must all, it would seem, who believe God exercises a controlling influence over the affairs of the world.

EDITORS.

BY E. W. LOCKE.

How great to be an editor! The editorial chair—what itching there is to get into it! Who is greater than an editor? No one—that is, in his own estimation. Not but there are some editors who can see themselves in a mirror less than six feet, but editorship tends greatly to self-importance. Who is a more privileged man than he? The lawyer has a right to feed the malice and revenge of his client till he robs him of all his money; he has a right to call his opponent of the green bag, a liar, a knave, and a scoundrel; he has the privilege of accusing innocence of vice and shame, and truth of perjury. The physician has a right to make any pale or spleeny fool believe death is near by, chasing him with his huge scythe in hand, and then to swallow such stuff as makes well men sick, and for which many besides those accounted fools have to pay their money; he has a right to know what a man lives on, and how much he eats; and more, he tells when and what he may eat; and the doctor must be obeyed. The doctor is a privileged man, and so is the minister. The minister has a right to know when a man experienced religion, how many times a day he prays, if he has any doubts, if he has difficulty in conquering the devil; he has a right to know all the jealousy, backbiting, and scandal of his church; he has a right to call whom he will a child of Satan, to send whom he pleases to hell, and admit whom he will to heaven; he has the right to apply his spiritual gauge to any heart, and tell the world whether it has any religion, and if any the precise amount. Congressmen are privileged characters. They can make two, three, and five hundred dollars out of their travelling fees to and from the seat of government, have eight dollars a day for gambling and chatting, and promenading with the ladies, and voting with their leaders. But editors are the most privileged of all. If any body writes a book, why, he must go to an editor and take off his hat, and say, "Your most humble servant, sir! and will you be so kind as to say a good word?" or, some afternoon, when this knight of the quill has just been exercising with knives and forks, and giving an ocular demonstration of the affinity between human and animal flesh, he will seize upon the knife of criticism, and cut away at the poor book and its author till he is out of breath, and send this fruit of an overloaded stomach off to his devil. If it is philosophy, it is shallow and sickening, or dangerous, though all this sage knows of philosophy he got from half a section of Locke on the Understanding. If it is romance that the book is filled with, the plot is miserable, the conclusion wrong, the filling up bad, and the moral licentious, though he may not have read one page in ten, and if he has, he knows no more of the rules of fiction than of legerdemain. If it is divinity, it is superstition, heretical, or infidel. If a lecturer enters a town or city he must send the editor a very polite invitation to attend his lecture, or he may take the neglect in high dudgeon, and call him an ignoramus, a clown, a pretender. If any body gets an office, and the editor is dissatisfied, he puts the steam to his slander-machine, hunts up every bit of dirty scandal ever propagated about his relations, and when he has loaded his sheet with his filth, sends it off to hundreds, and perhaps thousands, who read it and think it must be true, because it is in the newspaper. Character! why, character is nothing in the estimation of some of these friends of the public. If they can get the least fault of an unpopular man, then comes a mighty blast from their shells, totally indifferent as to the hearts they may make sad. Rumor tells them that somebody is not what he should be. Then comes a note of warning from them to the dear public. They make the public a god, always hungering for the sacrifice of human character, and most cheerfully do they offer up the victims. They make one think of burying a man before he is dead, who, when aroused by the falling of the earth upon his coffin, or perhaps by the surgeon's knife, looks up in astonishment, asking what is being done to him, and gets in reply, "Really, sir, we thought you were dead; to be sure we did; and it was for the public good that we were doing this." No matter how mean a man is—he can be an editor. If a man gets up, and puts one article into a monthly folio, six by five, he is an editor. Both have got the privilege of abusing whom they please. Yes; yes; editors are great men, privileged men, and they ought to be allowed to do just what they please.

PUBLIC DISCUSSION.

The Mechanic's Association in Homer, thinking religious subjects as well as others come within their province, the following question was taken up for discussion, "Does the Bible teach the doctrine of endless punishment?" the Association then passed a resolution that the clergy of the place be invited to attend, and take a part in the debate.

The affirmative opened by introducing the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, and "these shall go away into everlasting punishment"—which, with all other texts produced, were ably answered the first evening; and then the negative produced some of the many strong arguments to be found in the Bible in favor of the restitution; which changed the position of the two parties, bringing the negative in advance of the affirmative, and during the remainder of the debate they had to answer the negative as well as they could—but it was a feeble effort. The third evening a Mr. Cook, from Scott, who has lately commenced preaching the doctrine of impartial grace, came in and spoke, which I think caused our Orthodox brethren to think their covenant with death should be disannulled, and their agreement with hell should not stand. A Baptist preacher Rev. C. Darby, of Greene, being present, was urged by his brethren to stand up and lend a helping hand. His reply was, that enough had already been said. No doubt he was convinced that it would be bad policy to contend against the doctrines of the Bible, when held forth in so lucid a manner, the Partialists went from the scene of action this evening, discomfited and crest fallen.

On the fourth and last evening our opponents had called to their aid several preachers—one, only, had opportunity to speak, Rev. Bigsby, of the M. E. church in this place; he was aided by Mr. Rollo, teacher in the Academy in this place. Our opponents, seemed to think they had the advantage this evening, (as they really had in public speakers, for there were none but mechanic's to oppose them—but mechanics who were filled with that spirit that casteth out fear.) The opposition put much dependence on said Bigsby, for it is said he is a converted Universalist. He took the stand with all the dignity belonging to one of his profession; but alas! how soon was it lost. His attack upon Universalists was ungentlemanly and outrageous. If noise and confusion could be called argument, he alone gained the question. But two of the judges were men of sound minds, and could not be led astray from the point at issue by sophistry and misstatements. They are men who do not adhere to any religious sect, consequently were well calculated to judge. The other disagreed, being a Baptist in theory. The decision was given in favor of the negative, or Universalism. AN ATTENDANT.

EDITED BY

Revs. A. B. Grosh, G. W. Montgomery and A. C. Barry

UTICA, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1843.

TOUR OF THE UPPER LAKES.....NO. IV.

BR. GROSH—We had a "funny time"—as a Scotch acquaintance of mine would say—in landing at Racine. There were three of us; a heavy, dead sea was running in shore; the Illinois lay off three quarters of a mile, pitching and rolling, from which we tumbled with our baggage into a small boat manned by four oarsmen. We were told by our fellow passengers that we would swamp on the way, but the word "land" sounded pleasantly in our ears, and we were willing to run the risk for the purpose of treading once more of terra firma. And away we went, now mounting on the top of a huge swell, and then sinking down into darkness. Approaching the shore we could see the white crested breakers lashing the beach, and making any thing but grateful music. But into them our frail bark dashed—we clung instinctively to its sides and held our breath, when a returning swell lifting us up and holding us for a moment, a beachward sea rolled completely over us, drenching us thoroughly from head to toe. I never was very fond of a cold bath, and this tremendous showering was little to my liking. However, we reached the landing in safety, and a good warm bed at the Temperance Hotel, soon put every thing "to rights."

I was then in Wisconsin; so I cogitated on awaking the next morning; the "El Dorado" of so many hopes and wishes, and the point toward which the mighty tide of immigration is directed. Should I find it all my fancy had pictured? a land flowing with milk and honey, peopled with "fair women and brave men?" I will up and out, and see if the one half that has been told me is true. So up I got, but hardly had I finished dressing, and performed my ablutions ere the breakfast bell rang, and as I was getting a marvellous appetite, away I went to despatch a cup of coffee and a warm biscuit, and other etceteras, before seeing, for the stomach is more impatient than the eyes.

Well, on sitting down to the table, I saw opposite me a familiar face but could not recollect the name of the owner. "Sir," said I, "we have met before—may I inquire your name?" "My name is Carpenter." "My name is Barry." So we shook hands across the table and entered into conversation. He is a young lawyer who formerly resided in this State, but visiting that country, fell in love with it, and located himself in the village of Racine. So here was one acquaintance and friend to start with.

Breakfast being over, out we sallied for a walk through the town. We first repaired to the store of Mr. Ly Brand, formerly of Philadelphia, a gentleman with whom I had corresponded, and now had business pertaining to the denomination of which I am a member. By him I was warmly welcomed to Wisconsin, and during my whole stay he showed me every kindness. And I may as well remark here, that the people throughout that whole country, so far as I became acquainted, are all very attentive to strangers, and there is a continued exertion on their part to render his stay pleasant. There is a warm heartedness and liberality, and familiarity about them that does the soul good. I must now give you the result of my observations during my morning's walk, by way of description.

Racine, the county seat of Racine, W. T., is a fine flourishing village, beautifully located on Lake Michigan, at the mouth of Root river, 26 miles from Milwaukee, and 65 from Chicago. Its settlement as I was told was commenced in 1836 or 1837; and it now contains between 1200 and 1400 inhabitants. It has all the requisite county edifices finished in good taste and style; two large and flourishing hotels, besides other public and boarding establishments, an academy, two churches, a printing office, twenty or more mercantile shops, and all the various professional offices and mechanic's establishments found in our Eastern villages. Its private dwellings are all of them neat and many of them elegant. Its streets are regularly laid out, the principal one of which is lined on each side with beautiful white cottages, stores, shops, and offices for nearly a mile in extent. But there is a newness, a primitiveness about the whole place, and about all the towns in the "Far West" that first strikes the eye of the visitor from this side of the lakes. Tall oaks are left standing here and there; stumps yet remain in many places, and you may see pretty residences stretching themselves far away into the forest, and surrounded with all its unshorn wildness and beauty.

Racine is a busy town—has an industrious and enterprising population, and is fast increasing in size and importance. It is perhaps already the greatest wheat market in the territory, and the largest share of her one million surplus, will probably be shipped from its warehouses. An excellent harbor is being built at the mouth of Root River, which when finished, will add much to the importance of Racine, as also to its growth and prosperity, making it second to none on the lake.

At one thing I was perfectly astonished, and that was the number of religious societies in a village of this size—of which there are seven; Universalist, Methodist, Presbyterian, Episcopalian, Baptist, Catholic, and Whitfieldian. Verily, one must be hard to please, if he could not suit himself with preaching here.

Tuesday, August 22d, I set out in company with Mr. Ly Brand for Rochester, on Fox river, 25 miles West of Racine. Our way lay across the prairie, the greater part of the distance. All was new, delightful, and enchanting. White farm houses and cultivated fields, dotted here and there the vast expanse; occasionally large herds of cattle were seen cropping the herbage in the distance; flowers of every hue were blooming all around upon the unturned sod; and as we journeyed along, flocks of grouse and brant would start up before us, and now and then various small animals would dart across the road into the tall grass on the other side. The scene was picturesque and sublime beyond description—at times, wild and awe-inspiring; when the vast plain stretched out beyond the horizon, with no human habitation in sight, and treeless, save patches of forest, looking like islands in the midst of the ocean.

The prairies have a rich and productive soil, covered to a considerable depth with black sand and vegetable mould. A team consisting of four or five yoke of oxen is required to break them up—after this, a single yoke, or a span of horses is all that is required. They produce most crops in great abundance, though they are not considered quite as safe for wheat. Their yield, however, in this grain the past season, was large—say thirty bushels, on an average to the acre. A gentleman near Southport had a small field of four hundred acres which yielded him 13,000 bushels of good wheat.

Traveling leisurely through this delightful section of country, we reached Rochester near the middle of the afternoon. This is a small town containing about six hundred inhabitants. It has two public houses, three stores, several mechanic shops, and a flouring mill nearly completed. A short distance from here my parents and brother and sister reside: also my wife's mother and two brothers. Of course I paused not until I reached them.

Immediately after crossing the Fox river, a fine broad stream, you enter the "oak openings." The soil here is dry and undulating, and is composed of a sandy loam, intermixed occasionally with lime stone pebbles,—

When first broken it has a light appearance, but soon turns black by reason of the lime in its composition. The trees, which are mostly white oak, are scattered thinly over its surface, forming natural parks, through which the wild deer roams, and where vast quantities of game are found. I think I would prefer this land above the prairies. It is as easily improved, has the advantage with respect to timber, is better watered, and will produce as much grain of all kinds. "Although containing apparently but a thin covering of decomposed vegetable matter, the absence of that material is made up by the admixture of lime in its composition, which is favorable to vegetation; and in Summer the surface is almost entirely covered with red, yellow, white and purple flowers, spread a gorgeous carpet through the forest as far as the eye can reach."

The "oak openings" are fast receiving a hardy and industrious population. Where but a little time ago the red man dwelt, and the wild beast roamed, the sun shines and the rain falls upon the cultivated fields teeming with the rich fruits of the honest husbandman's toil. And the period is certainly not far distant, when every rood of this rich soil will be upturned by the busy plow, and when the hum of industry will go up in the midst of these wilds, making them glad. Already we may in more than fancy, hear

"The sound of the advancing multitude,
Which soon shall fill these deserts. From the ground
Comes up the laugh of children; the soft voice
Of maidens, and the sweet and solemn hymn,
Of Sabbath worshippers. The low of herds,
Bleats with the rustling of the heavy grain,
Over the dark brown furrows."

Saturday, September 9th, bidding my friends adieu, I set out for Milwaukee, the Emporium of Wisconsin. I had heard much of this place and found that I had not been deceived in regard to it. It is situated on lake Michigan, 180 miles from Mackinaw, 90 from Chicago, and 910 from Buffalo. Its settlement was begun in 1836—it numbers now between six and seven thousand inhabitants, which fact exhibits a rapidity of growth not much, if any, excelled by the history of any place. There are in this village—or city, as it is called—eight religious societies, six of which have churches—the Congregational, Presbyterian, Universalist, Unitarian, Methodist, and Catholic.

As a place of business, it is not to be outdone, and its merchants at least, are driving a profitable trade. Hundreds of emigrants are arriving here weekly, and one may find representatives from almost every nation under heaven—Germans, Poles, Swiss, Welsh, Irish, Norwegians, and the wild Indian in his paint.

This flourishing town has many large and elegant buildings, and its hotels, for comfort and accommodations, are scarcely surpassed in many of our Eastern cities. Standing in Water street and casting his eye upon the large brick blocks which adorn it, and around upon the busy bustling crowds that throng about them, one forgets that he is in a city scarcely eight years old. But when he is reminded of this fact, he is astonished at all he sees, and finds cause for renewed wonder at every step.

On the afternoon of the day in which I landed, I enjoyed a ride to Southport, distant from Racine 10 miles. The road winds along through the forest near the lake shore—was at that time perfectly dry and hard, with no ups and downs, free from stone, and overshadowed by the branches of the oak and linden, among whose branches the wild birds with many toned voices made sweet music. Need I tell you I was delighted and in ecstasies?

Southport is also situated on lake Michigan, ten miles above Racine; and is a fine flourishing village of the same number of inhabitants. It is beautifully laid out and arranged, and is a place of extensive business, has a pier or steamboat landing, and efforts are being made to obtain for it a harbor; which when obtained will enable it to keep pace with its sister villages on the lake.

Now for leave taking of Wisconsin. We found it a beautiful country—we believe it will be a great country—greater than it now is, when its resources come to be developed. It has a healthful climate, a rich, productive soil, an enterprising, industrious, and intelligent population—it possesses exalted commercial advantages, and it must advance rapidly toward wealth and prosperity. "Seven years ago," says a recent writer, "and the Territory was almost a trackless wilderness. Now, flourishing towns, and villages, and settlements are sprinkled over the whole country.—Roads are built, markets are at hand, all the conveniences and luxuries of life are easily and cheaply procured, the hardships incident to the first settlement of a new country are over, and the way fully open and prepared for that influx of wealth and population, which sets toward a country perfectly new, but which in a rapidly increasing ratio pours in, as improvements are made and society formed." ## THE IMPORTANCE OF CHRISTIAN ACTION. No. I.

"But be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves."—ST. JAMES I: 22.

CARELESS AND WORLDLY HEARERS.

It is lamentably true, as the existing state of things testifies, that the great mass who attend upon the ministration of the divine word, are hearers only. The Gospel is preached to them Sabbath after Sabbath, and year after year—its warnings and entreaties are faithfully sounded in their ears; and yet, they remain cold, and careless, and indifferent, as though they were under no obligations to God or their fellow-men. If there is ever a time when the preacher feels utterly discouraged and sick at heart, it is when he looks around upon the attendants on his ministry, and reads the fact in their inactivity and unconcern, that he might as well have wasted his words on the stones of the street. God knows that he has discouragements enough without this—with this added, I tell you his heart will faint within him.

Why is it, I ask, that vice prevails to the extent that it does? that carnality triumphs? that the bleeding cause of virtue pleads in vain? that the great moral enterprises of the day languish?—why is it, but that the uttered precepts of God's word fall upon unlistening ears, or that men steel their hearts against the conviction of right and duty? Why is it, but that there are more hearers than doers; and that the great lessons of the sanctuary are unfelt and unheeded?

Do not take a word of this to yourselves, my friends, unless you feel that it is applicable; nor of any thing that may come after; but if there shall be a truth uttered that may have a personal application, take it home with you, for it was intended for you.

Among all denominations will be found different classes of hearers. Of these, one class may be denominated careless hearers. I mean those, who, while they seem to pay considerable attention to what is being uttered, yet hear indifferently, and who treasure up no holy truths in their hearts. They know that a preacher stands before them, that words are falling from his lips, but they interest themselves but little in his discourse—they do not even think that a part of it may be applicable to themselves; and though some passing remark may interest them for the moment, yet it soon passes from their minds, perhaps never to be recalled.

This carelessness is many times the offspring of indifference. They have never yet perhaps thought seriously of their responsibilities, or that they had many and great duties to perform. So long as they are not guilty of any outbreking sins, they set themselves down as being good enough, and consequently need not trouble themselves with anything further. Their hearts thus become frozen over with the ice of indifference; and though the demands of God and truth may be set home with power—though the precepts of the Gospel may be eloquently enforced—yet they seem to be unconscious that there is any thing demanded of them, or that there is any work for them to do. They do not hear as though they themselves were personally addressed, but rather as those who have no interest in, the matter, who have cancelled the demands of Heaven, and fully and forever discharged every moral obligation. I do not say that this is a settled conviction of their hearts, but that they seem to hear for others and not for themselves. And hence they derive but little or no benefit from the preached word—the calls, and warnings, and rebukes, are unheeded, or passed over to their neighbor, while they slumber on in their carelessness and unconcern, putting forth no efforts in obedience to God's command, neglecting their own spiritual interests, and looking coldly upon the evils, that, like a consuming fire, make desolate the Eden of the world.

2. Another class may be denominated worldly hearers—those who are drawn to the house of God by worldly considerations, or who think, perhaps, to advance their pecuniary interests by so doing. True, such will be generally found in the most popular churches, but wherever found they are the same. They too will seem to be the most attentive of hearers; but this is not true of them in fact. There is a certain respect due to the place they are in; and motives of prudence would suggest the importance of an interest in the services of the sanctuary. But with all their seemingness—if I may be allowed to coin a word for present use—with the show of attention they manifest, the heart has neither part nor lot in the matter. And thus, while the demands of God's word upon the soul and life are being presented with energy, and the principles of moral action enforced in burning and eloquent words—while the sublime truths of the Gospel are being proclaimed in all their melting and subduing power—while the whole duty of man is being set forth, and enforced by the most powerful motives; and the sanctions of the divine law are arrayed in all their startling emphasis; their minds perhaps at the same time will be dwelling on stocks and exchanges—on bonds and mortgages—on goods and merchandize, or on some profitable investment of dollars and cents. If farmers, they will perhaps be thinking of a choice bit of ground that may be bought at a bargain, or of the depreciation in value of real estate, or of the probable prices of produce in the fall market. And thus, no matter what may be the trade, occupation or profession—instead of leaving the cares, and excitements, and business, and speculations of the world at home with their week-day garb, they bring them along into the house of God, and suffer them to steal their thoughts away from the most important and sacred subjects. Thus they hear without being profited—they prevent any deep and durable impression being made on the heart—the seed falls on stony ground, or among thorns, where it can neither vegetate nor bear fruit.

UNION CONFERENCES—AGAIN.

In giving an account of my first trip to Boston last September, I incidentally, in three or four lines, referred to some remarks I had heard in relation to excesses that had been committed in these meetings last winter. Br. Austin of the Evangelist took up the incidental remarks in an article of about two columns length (of this paper), and ridiculed my remarks, and my informants, to which I replied—not “in dudgeon,” as he asserts, by any means. He has rejoined in the same strain of ridicule; but declaring that he meant no disrespect to myself or my informants; but merely to ridicule the idea that any excesses were committed in any of those meetings. So be it, then.

He requests me to publish his first article, that our readers may judge of its tone and meaning for themselves. I have not been able to find a copy, or I would do so; and have therefore given his denial of intention, to hold up my informants as falsifiers, or myself as a dupe. He also requests me to state what the excesses were, &c., &c. I have no time at present for a controversy with him, especially on that subject, and in the strain in which he seems disposed to treat it, all serious as he deems it. Our readers, also, have no interest in the subject.

Br. Everett represents me as making an “assault on those who differ in opinion from” me “concerning Union Conferences,” and opposing the Conferences themselves! This is unfair, because not strictly true. I merely alluded to the Conferences incidentally, and in a few lines—and said nothing of persons who favored them—and for so doing, was attacked—was “assaulted” myself—with a long article full of ridicule. I never opposed those Conferences, but rather approved them—it was only the excesses that I deplored, and rejoiced they had done very little injury.

Brs. Austin and Everett can now do as they list in regard to the whole subject—I shall, most certainly, not enter into any controversy with them, on any subject, unless I deem it profitable to our readers, and can be treated soberly, candidly, truthfully and respectfully—They may have meant to treat me and this affair thus; but I do not think they have succeeded in their intentions, (certainly not to my mind,) and I therefore respectfully, and without any ill feeling toward them or the subject, leave them in possession of the whole road—they can occupy it as they please. A. B. G.

P. S. Since writing the foregoing we have received another number of the Evangelist which contains the following disclaimer. We are glad to read it; for we had understood Br. Austin's remarks on Brs. Bacon and Harris in a light far from friendly and fraternal—and so did several others whom we heard speak of the subject—even as we understood his remarks in relation to us and our informants as being far from respectful to us, or in accordance with his alleged importance, and seriousness, and divine origin of the subject. As to my feelings, I will not disguise the fact that I was wounded in my feelings; for I thought that I and my friends deserved better treatment; but I spoke not in anger—in “dudgeon” as Br. A. says—but in sincere sorrow, and with a desire, even a hope, that my respectfully meant and earnest remonstrance would not be met by a repetition of the same wanton levity, ridicule and sarcasm (for so I deemed it) which had called it forth. Had I supposed otherwise, I had not noticed the first article, except to decline any such controversy; for whether I have or have not, any skill in the use of such weapons, I do not choose to use them among brethren, and on subjects which both of us deem serious. For, I repeat it, I have ever been in favor of Society Conferences—I am disposed to favor Union Conferences, so far as I know any thing of them—and only alluded, incidentally to excesses which (whether I was rightly informed or not) I deemed of no benefit to them or the cause. However, Br. Austin's disclaimer of evil intention satisfies me that I (and others) misunderstood him, even as he and Br. Everett misunderstood me; and there I am willing to drop the subject.

Our senior editor thinks I have “wasted labor” in reply to Br. Grosh. I am sensible I have occupied a large portion of the columns of the Evangelist in this matter—perhaps too much. But I consider the subject of no little importance. Union Conference Meetings, I am satisfied, can be made a source of immense benefit to our righteous cause—they have already been so, in those sections where they have been held—and I am anxious to prevent, so far as in my power, any prejudices being disseminated in regard to them, which will have a tendency to prevent our brethren from establishing them in those sections where they are yet unknown. This must account for the time and space I have given to the subject, and for the interest I may have exhibited. I was very much surprised that my playful, or at least, good natured remarks, on Br. Grosh's allusion to Union Conferences, should have stirred up just the feelings in his bosom they seem to have done. They certainly were never intended to produce such an effect. And I take this opportunity to disclaim emphatically and distinctly, the cherishing any feelings but those of the utmost friendship and of the most warm fraternal regard and affection, for Brs. Grosh, Bacon, Harris, or any other brethren with whom I have had an occasional “tilt” in regard to Union Conferences. Those who know me, will believe this disclaimer to be perfectly sincere. I would not have an enemy in the world, and especially among my ministering brethren; and I bless God for the belief that I have none. J. M. A.

There will be preaching on the fifth Sunday inst., by Br. J. J. AUSTIN in Madison—Br. SKINNER at Little Falls, and Br. T. L. HARRIS at Remington's Corners.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in January, by Br. GROSH at Little Falls.

Christmas Eve will be celebrated in Alexander, Genesee county. Services will commence at 6 o'clock. Sermon by Br. E. W. Locke.

The First Conference of the Chenango Association of Universalists will be held in Triangle, (Upper Lisle,) Broome county, on the third Tuesday and Wednesday, (16th and 17th,) of January.

The Second Conference of the Chenango Association of Universalists will be held in the Baptist Meeting house at the village of Greene, Chenango county, on the third Thursday and Friday, (18th and 19th,) of January.

Every society in the Association is earnestly requested to send two delegates to the Conference at Greene. A Council will there be organized—and undoubtedly a plan will be adopted to support, and measures taken to enable us soon to employ a Missionary to labor constantly within our bounds. AS BUSINESS OF GREAT IMPORTANCE IS TO BE TRANSACTED, we shall confidently rely, not only on the attendance of every preacher and delegates from every society in the Association, but of our lay brethren generally.—And as Greene is a flourishing village, and as no Universalist meetings have been held in it for many years, we trust that our ministering brethren from other Associations will not fail to be with us. The Council will convene on Thursday at 9 o'clock, A. M. Friends from a distance can call on A. Johnson, Esq., and he will direct them to places of entertainment.

The Third Conference will be held in the Methodist church at the village of Sherburne, Chenango county, on the fourth Tuesday and Wednesday, (23d and 24th,) of January.

Sherburne is an important place where Universalism has seldom been preached. A spirit of inquiry is now abroad and judicious efforts may accomplish great good. So to our clerical brethren from the surrounding counties, one and all, we say, “come over and help us.” They, and all our friends unacquainted at S., can call on Dr. Lyman, and he will send them where provision will be made for them.

J. T. GOODRICH, Standing Clerk.

CONFERENCE AND ORDINATION.—The third Conference of the Otsego Association will be held at Richfield Springs on the second Wednesday and Thursday (10th and 11th) of January, 1844. From the Young Lady's Friend.
THE DUEL.

BY THE EDITOR OF ZION'S HERALD AND JOURNAL.

The Rev. Mr. M—— was a veteran itinerant preacher of the West. He relates many incidents of his itinerant life. Among them was the following which I give in his own words as much as possible.

About four miles from N—— is an extensive grove, well known as the scene of several fatal duels. As I passed it one morning on my way to my appointment in that town, I perceived a horse and vehicle among the trees, guarded by a solitary man, who appeared to be the driver. My suspicions were immediately excited, but I rode on. About a mile beyond I met another carriage, containing four persons besides the driver, and hastening with all speed.

My fears were confirmed, and I could scarcely doubt that another scene of blood was about to be enacted in those quiet solitudes. What was my duty in the case? I knew too well the tenacity of those factitious and absurd sentiments of honor which prevailed in that section of the country, and which give to the duel a character of exalted chivalry, to suppose that my interference could be successful, yet I thought it was my duty to rebuke the sin if I could not prevent it: and in the name of the Lord I would do it. I immediately wheeled about and returned with the utmost speed to the grove.

The second carriage had arrived and was fastened to a tree. I rode up, attached my horse near it, and throwing the driver a piece of silver, requested him to guard him. While threading my way into the forest, my thoughts were intensely agitated to know how to present myself most successfully. The occasion admitted of no delay. I hastened on and soon emerged into an oval space surrounded on all sides by dense woods.

At the opposite extremity stood the principals, their boots drawn over their pantaloons, their coats, vests and hats off, handkerchiefs tied over their heads, and tightly belting their waists. A friend and a surgeon were conversing with each, while the seconds were about midway between them, arranging the dreadful conflict. One of the principals, the challenged, appeared but twenty years of age. His countenance was singularly expressive of sensibility, but also of cool determination. The other had a stout ruffian-like bearing—a countenance easy but sinister and heartless, and he seemed impatient to wreak his vengeance upon his antagonist.

I advanced immediately to the seconds and declared my character and object. "Gentlemen," said I, "excuse my intrusion. I am a minister of the Gospel. I know not the merits of the quarrel, but both my heart and my office require me to bring about a reconciliation between the parties, if possible."

"Sir," replied one of them, "the utmost has been done to effect it, without success, and this is no place to make farther attempts."

"Under any circumstances, in any place, gentlemen," I replied, "it is appropriate to prevent murder; and such, in the sight of God, is the deed you are aiding. It must not be, gentlemen. In the name of the law which prohibits it—in the name of your friends, the principals—in the name of God who looks down upon you in this solitary place, I beseech you prevent it at once; at least wash your own hands from the blood of these men. Retire from the field and refuse to assist in this mutual murder."

My emphatic remonstrance had a momentary effect. They seemed not indisposed to come to terms, if I could get the concurrence of the principals.

I passed immediately to the oldest of them. His countenance became more repulsive as I approached him. It was deeply pitted with small pox, and there was upon it the most cold blooded leer I ever saw on a human face. He had given the challenge. I besought him by every consideration of humanity and morality to recall it. I referred to the youth and inexperience of his antagonist—the conciliatory disposition of the seconds—the fearful consequences to his soul if he should fall, and the withering remorse which must ever follow him if he should kill the young man. He evidently thirsted for the blood of his antagonist, but observing that his friend and the surgeon seconded my reasoning, he replied with undissembled reluctance, that he gave the challenge for sufficient reasons, and that if these reasons were removed, he might recall it, but not otherwise.

I passed to the other. I admonished him of the sin he was about to perpetrate. He suddenly wiped a tear from his eye. "Yes Sir," said he, "there are hearts that would break if they knew I was here."

I referred to my conversation with the seconds and the other principal, and remarked that nothing was now necessary to effect a reconciliation but a retraction of the language which offended his antagonist. "Sir," replied he, planting his foot firmly on the ground, and assuming a look which would have been sublime in a better cause, "Sir, I have uttered nothing but the truth respecting that man, and though I sink into the grave, I will not sanction his villainous character by a retraction."

I reasoned with increased vehemence, but no appeal to his judgment or his heart could shake his desperate firmness, and I left him with tears which I have no doubt he would have shed under other circumstances. What could I do farther? I appealed again to the first principal, but he spurned me with a cool smile. I flew to the seconds and entreated them on any terms to adjust the matter, and save the shedding of blood. But they had already measured the ground, and were ready to place the principals. "Gentlemen," said I, "the blood of this dreadful deed be upon your souls. I have acquitted myself of it." I then proceeded from the area towards my horse.

What were my emotions as I turned away in despair? What! thought I, must the duel proceed? Is there no expedient to prevent it? Can I not pluck them as brands from the burning? My spirit was in a tumult of anxiety; in a moment and just as the principals were taking their positions, I was again on the ground. Standing on the line between them, I exclaimed, "in the name of God I adjure you to stop this murderous work. It must not, it can not proceed." "Knock him down," cried the eldest duelist, with a fearful imprecation. "Sir," exclaimed the younger, "I appreciate your motives, but I demand of you to interfere no more with our arrangements." The seconds seized me by the arms and compelled me to retire. But I warned them at every step. Never before did I feel so deeply the value and hazard of the human soul. My remarks were without effect, except on one of the friends of the younger principal. "This is a horrible place," said he, "I can not endure it," and he turned with me from the scene.

"Now then for it," cried one of the seconds, as they returned. "Take your places." Shudderingly I hastened my pace to escape the dreaded result.

"One—two"—and the next sound was lost in the explosion of the pistols! "O God," shrieked a voice of agony! I turned round. The younger principal, with his hand to his face, shrieked again, quivered, and fell to the ground! I rushed to him. With one hand he clung to the earth, the fingers penetrating the sod, while with the other he grasped his left jaw, which was shattered with a horrid wound. I turned with faintness from the sight. The charge had passed through the left side of the mouth, crossing the teeth, severing the jugular and passing out at the back part of the head, laying open entirely one side of the face and neck. In this ghastly wound, amid blood and shattered teeth, had he fixed his grasp with a tenacity which could not be removed. Bleeding profusely and convulsively with agony, he lay for several minutes, the most frightful spectacle I had ever witnessed. The countenances of the spectators expressed a conscious relief when it was announced by the surgeon that death had ended the scene. Meanwhile the murderer and his party had left ground.

One of the company was despatched on my horse to communicate the dreadful news to the family. The dead young man was cleansed from his blood and borne immediately to his carriage. I accompanied it. It stopped before a small but elegant house. The driver ran to the door and rapped. An elderly lady opened it, with frantic agitation, at the instant we were lifting the ghastly remains from the carriage. She gazed for a moment, as if thunder struck, and fell fainting in the doorway. A servant removed her into the parlor, and, as we passed with the corpse into a rear room, I observed her extended on a sofa, as pale as her hapless son.

We placed the corpse on the table, with the stiffened hand still grasping the wound, when a young lady, neatly attired in white, and with a face delicately beautiful, rushed frantically into the room and threw her arms around it, weeping with uncontrollable emotion, and exclaiming with an agony of feeling, "My brother, my dear, dear brother! Can it be!—O, can it be?" The attendants bore her away. I shall never forget the look of utter wretchedness she wore as they led her away—her eyes dissolving in tears, and her bosom stained with her brother's blood.

The unfortunate young man was of New-England origin. He had settled in the town of N——, where his business had prospered so well that he had invited his mother and sister to reside with him. His home, endeared by gentleness and love and every temporal comfort, was a scene of unalloyed happiness, but in an evil hour he yielded to an absurd local prejudice—a sentiment of honor, falsely so called, which his education should have taught him to despise. He was less excusable than his malicious murderer, for he had more light and better sentiments. This one step ruined him and his happy family. He was interred the next day with the regrets of the whole community.

His poor mother never left the house till she was carried to the grave, to be laid by the side of her son. She died after a delirious fever of two week's duration, throughout which she ceased not to implore the attendants, with tears, to preserve her hapless son from the hands of assassins, whom she imagined kept him concealed for their murderous purpose. His sister still lives, but poor and broken hearted. Her beauty and energies have been wasted by sorrow, and she is dependent on others for her daily bread. I have heard some uncertain reports of his antagonist, the most probable of which is, that he died three years after, of the yellow fever, at New-Orleans, raging with the horrors of remorse. Such was the local estimation of this bloody deed, that scarcely an effort was made to bring him to justice. Alas for the influence of fashionable opinion! It can silence by its dictates the laws of man and of God, and exalt murder to the glory of chivalry!

When we consider how many hearts of mothers, sisters and wives have been made to bleed by this cruel and deadly custom, shall we not invoke the influence of woman to abolish it? It rests upon an accidental state of public opinion, a fictitious sentiment of honor.—Whose influence is more effectual in correcting or promoting such sentiments than woman's? Human laws have failed to correct it, but her influence can do it. Let her, then, disdain the duelist as stained with blood. Let her repel him from her society as one who has wrongly escaped the gallows. Let her exert all the benign influence of her virtues and her charms to bring into disgrace the murderous sentiment which tolerates him, and it can not be long before the distinction between the duelist and the assassin will cease.

REFLECTIONS ON THE LIFE OF MURRAY....NO. IV.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

When Murray listened to the words of Potter, above recorded, he was overwhelmed with surprise. "I was astonished," he says, "immeasurably astonished at Mr. Potter's narrative; but yet I had not the smallest idea it ever could be realized. I requested to know what he could discern in my appearance which could lead him to mistake me for a preacher? "What," said he, "could I discern when you were in the vessel, that could induce this conclusion? No, sir; it is not what I saw, or see, but what I feel, which produces in my mind a full conviction." But, my dear sir, you are deceived, indeed you are deceived; I never shall preach in this place, nor any where else. "Have you never preached? Can you say you have never preached?" I can not; but I never intend to preach again. "Has not God lifted up the light of his countenance upon you? Has he not shown you his truth?" I must be has. "And how dare you hide his truth? * * * * If God has shown you his salvation, why should you not show it to your fellow men? But I know that you will; I am sure God Almighty has sent you to us for this purpose. I am not deceived—I am sure I am not deceived.

"I was terrified," says Murray, "as the man thus went on. And I began to fear that God, who orders all things after the counsel of his own will, had ordained that thus it should be, and my heart trembled at the idea. I endeavored, however, to banish my own fears, and to silence the warm-hearted man by observing that I was in the place of a supercargo—that property to a large amount had been entrusted to my care; and that the moment the wind changed, I was under the most solemn obligations to depart. Said Potter—"The wind will never change, sir, until you have delivered to us in that meeting-house, a message from God." What an unheard-of reliance upon the purposes of God! Wonderful man! his anticipations were all abundantly realized, to the inexpressible joy of his heart.

"The effect of this man's perfect assurance that God had sent him to preach the Gospel in the new world, was at first painful to Murray in the extreme. It filled him with astonishment, and with anguish of spirit. On retiring for the night, Murray says—"When I entered my chamber and shut the door, I burst into tears. I would have given the world that I had never left England. I felt as if the hand of God was in the events which had brought me to this place; and I prayed most ardently that God would assist and direct me by his counsel."

The next morning Potter renewed his solicitations for Murray to tarry and preach in his meeting house on the following Sunday. Although it was entirely against his inclinations, his wishes and designs, yet Murray finally yielded a reluctant promise, that he would preach if the wind did not change. This satisfied Potter, for he felt perfectly positive the wind would not change, until the stranger whom he believed God had sent to him, had delivered his message.

In the mean time Murray was in great labor and agony of mind. To enter public life as a preacher of the Gospel was so opposite to his feelings, and to his purposes in coming to America—so contrary to his ardent desire for retirement and seclusion—that the very thought was painful in the extreme. And yet "an overruling Providence," he says, "seemed to operate in an unusual and remarkable manner. I could not forbear looking back on the mistakes made during our passage, even to the coming in to this particular inlet, where no vessel of the size of the brig "Hand-in-hand" had ever before entered. Every circumstance contributed to bring me to this house. Mr. Potter's address on seeing me; his assurance that he knew I was on board the vessel, when he saw her at a distance—all these considerations pressed with powerful conviction on my mind."

The Sabbath finally came. The wind had not changed—and Potter had sent his servants far and near, to notify the inhabitants of the meeting.—They repaired to the meeting-house, and Murray delivered his message from God. Those only who afterwards had the happiness of knowing Murray, can conceive how he must have preached under circumstances so peculiarly exciting. Potter's heart was full of triumphant joy. "He looked up to the pulpit," says Murray, "with eyes sparkling with pleasure. It appeared to him as the fulfilment of a promise long deferred; and he reflected with abundant consolation, on the strong faith which he had cherished. * * * * Tears of transport filled his eyes; he looked round on the people, and every feature seemed to say, "There, what think you now!"

This was the first public discourse Murray ever preached in defence of the salvation of the world. It was undoubtedly an eloquent and soul-stirring production; for few were endowed with higher gifts of oratory and eloquence, than this then young man. And it was unquestionably to these gifts, together with the reasonable, Scriptural, and sublime system of doctrines, he proclaimed, that he was indebted under Providence for the unparalleled success which accompanied him throughout his whole career in the ministry of reconciliation.

When the services were over the warm-hearted Potter was in ecstasies. The ensuing scene is thus described by Murray. "When I returned to his house, he caught me in his arms, exclaiming, "Now, now, I am willing to depart, oh, my God! I will praise thee; thou hast granted me my desire. After this truth I have been seeking, but I have never found it until now. I knew that God, who put it into my heart to build a house for his worship, would send a servant of his own to proclaim his own Gospel. I knew he would!! I knew the time was come when I saw the vessel grounded. I knew that you were the man when I saw you approach my door, and my heart leaped for joy." Visitors poured into the house; he took each by the hand—"This is the happiest day in my life," said the transported man—"there, neighbors, there is the minister God promised to send me; how do you like God's minister?"

Murray himself was greatly affected as well as astonished, at the singular career which Providence seemed so mysteriously to open before him. "I ran," he says, "from the company, and prostrating myself before the throne of grace, besought my God to take me, and to do with me whatever he pleased. I am, said I, O Lord God, in thine hand, as clay in the hand of the potter. If thou, in thy Providence hast brought me into this new world to make known unto this people the grace and the blessings of the new covenant—if thou hast thought proper by making choice of so weak an instrument to confound the wise—if thou hast been pleased to show to a babe, possessing neither wisdom nor prudence, what thou has hid from the wise and prudent—be it so, O Father, for so it seemeth good in thy sight!"

And so it did seem good in the sight of God! From that hour John Murray became an open, bold, eloquent, and eminently successful preacher of the Gospel of Universal Reconciliation. He threw himself upon God as his protector, and for forty-five years proclaimed that Gospel in the midst of storms of opposition and persecution, of almost every conceivable description. But his Protector carried him through all in safety, and prolonging his life to a good old age, enabled him to die at last in calmness and peace. He died while pastor of the First Universalist Society in Boston, on Sunday morning, September 3d, 1815, aged 74 years. His last words were full of the inspirations of his glorious faith—"To him shall the gathering of the people be, and his rest shall be glorious, glorious, glorious. I am blessed with all spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus. Nor I alone; Jesus Christ hath tasted death for every man."

Such are some of the singular events connected with the first establishment of the denomination of Universalists in America. When we take all the connecting circumstances into view—when we remember the trials through which Murray was called to pass in England, designedly as it would seem, to direct his attention to America and prepare him for the great work in which he was here to be called to engage—when we recall the singular accidents, disappointments, and frustrations of his purposes and expectations, which so frequently and strangely met him, and turned him in directions entirely different from what he designed to go and all of which combined to bring him into the obscure and out-of-the-way place of Good Luck, and to the house of Potter—when we recollect the wonderful presentiment of the warm-hearted Potter, that God would assuredly send a minister, who should proclaim a new doctrine, and one in which his soul should delight—when we pass in review the reluctance of Murray to preach and to enter a public career, so opposite the purpose that led him to America, and realize that probably no other man but Potter, and no other circumstances but such as surrounded him at Good Luck, could possibly have induced him to commence the life of a preacher—and then when we look around and behold the results of this marvellous and unheard of combination of events, even the establishment of a new Christian Denomination, which in a little more than half a century, has become the fifth in size in our country, numbering 600 preachers, over 900 Societies, and at least 150,000 believers—when these things are passed in review, who can fail to see the hand of Providence clearly revealed? Who can doubt that the Divine Being ordered this marvellous concatenation of events, for the express purpose of raising up a sect who should present to the world the purer, brighter, and more valuable features of the Gospel, which for ages had been hid from mankind, and of appealing to higher and nobler principles of human nature, in efforts to turn man from sin and error! Let others believe, if they will, that these things were the effects of chance! I can plainly see in them the workings of infinite and unerring Wisdom. I can behold by the same Hand which raised up a Moses, a Paul, a Luther, also engaged in raising up a Murray, and sending him to a New World to proclaim the fulness of the salvation of Christ!

In conclusion, I would recommend the "Life of Murray" to all who have never perused it. It not only gives an account of the numerous obstacles which had to be encountered by the first advocates and professors of Universalism in America, but is full of detail and adventure, as exciting and interesting as the most romantic work of the present day.

False friendship, like the ivy decays and ruins the wall it embraces; but true friendship gives new life and animation to the subject it supports.

UTICA, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1843.

VALEDICTORY.

The difference between my past and my future relations to the paper, must be so very slight to the reader, however great it may be to myself, that I long hesitated to write any valedictory. For months to come, I shall probably write as much for its columns as ever—the only difference will be in labors, the results of which are seldom noticed by the reader; and which in this case will be so well performed by my successor, that I doubt not mine will never be missed.

But from henceforth I no longer have the care and direction of the paper—its character will no longer be moulded, and measurably formed, by me—the responsibility for what it contains, or for rejecting aught from its columns, will no longer rest on my mind and conscience. This—is the greatest care, the most arduous portion of editorial life—and my release from this may well call forth some valedictory remarks.

I have always felt willing to abide the judgment that might be passed on my labors as an Editor during the years 1836 and 1837; for then I had (supposedly, at least,) very nearly all the means I needed for the employment of assistance in editing, and for procuring numerous good correspondents, and employing them on such special subjects as I deemed most interesting and valuable to our readers. I lacked only a little more cash, leisure and experience to have made the paper all I think it should be. But since then, I have waded through many most trying difficulties—all I was able to make by editing and preaching, and keeping boards, became transformed into charges against subscribers and others who seem never to think of paying what they owe—and my partner and myself floated down, down even to bankruptcy in fact, if not in form! My thoughts, and feelings, and energies, were thus forcibly drawn aside to subjects and employments very ungenial and unfavorable to my success as an Editor—and my means became more and more limited and deficient, even to exhaustion, until, for years past, I have been dependant almost on charity for the aid received from my co-editors and our numerous correspondents. And though they have done nobly for me—far, far more than I dared to ask, or had any reason to expect—yet still, I could not do all I wished, or get all I wanted. Since then no proprietor of the paper could afford to engage persons to furnish such valuable articles as we furnished in the articles on Episcopalianism, Voice to Youth, Voice to the Married, Difficulties of Infidelity Removed, and the Law of Kindness—the last four of which continue to be published in the book form, as valuable and standard works. Indeed, I could not, even in regard to myself, write as, nor what, I wished much to write; for often I had not leisure, and my mind was not always under my own control—other duties, cares and perplexities, demanded too much of my thoughts and exertions. It is for these and similar reasons that I feel justified in asking the public to be lenient toward me on account of the numerous errors and failures I have undoubtedly committed from these untoward causes alone.

But there are cases of a different kind from these, where it becomes me humbly to confess my faults and ask forgiveness. I have generally endeavored to cause the paper to breathe a truly Christian spirit—to strive for the peace, and harmony, and unity of the denomination in all things essential; and to urge a charitable, tolerant, liberality in those things in which we differ—to keep out all merely personal squabbles and difficulties, which always grow worse the more they are indulged, and become only the more unforgivable by being made public—and to prevent all undue and unnecessary agitation of mere measures of expediency or cases of discipline, to the increased difficulty of settling them, because the parties became thus more excited, and the public mind biased. Thus have I generally endeavored—but on looking back over my course, (as I frequently have done in passing over it,) I behold too many cases where warm feelings outran the dictates of cool reason; and where my judgment formed from seeing only a part of the subject, led me to act very injudiciously. In other cases, also, I have written in too much haste, and under the impulse of excited feelings, and therefore have violated the spirit of peace or propriety, or went beyond what Christian indignation and justice demanded. I most heartily have regretted these instances, and if there are any whom I have thus injured and not yet apologized to them, I now solicit their forgiveness, and hope the readers will forget those manifestations of my infirmities of mind and temper.

With these occasional exceptions, I can truly say that I have endeavored faithfully to do unto others as I would be done by—to teach plainly and clearly the great truths of Christianity—to be as liberal in regard to those opinions and practices held by brethren, from which I dissented, as I asked them to be in regard to my peculiarities of religious faith and practice—to urge a union of zeal and effort among Universalists in those things wherein all are agreed, rather than to contend with each other, and waste time in endeavoring to convert the world to the belief and practice of those things in which we differ—and to exhibit in a practical manner the spirit and precepts of our faith, to our readers and the world. I wish I had been more earnest and persevering in these things than I have been—that I had more frequently addressed our societies on their duties as societies; and our readers, on their obligations to God, to the world, to their preachers, and to each other, as members of the Universalist denomination. And this I will yet do, if God permit. In short, with the exceptions named, I have endeavored to be honest, conscientious and faithful as an Editor, whether the parties concerned applauded, or censured, my acts or my motives. And I believe I can truly say, that I have borne and suffered more wrong than I have resented—avoided and suppressed more quarrels and difficulties than I have engendered or fanned into a flame—given more in money, time and labor, than I have received pay for—endured more from the neglect of subscribers, than I have ever caused them to endure for my neglect—and received more favors from the Editors of our various periodicals, and my co-editors and our numerous excellent correspondents (God bless them!) than I can ever repay. I part from all in good will—and forgive those who have injured me in any way, as I hope to be forgiven. And thus, after five years of pretty constant labor as Assistant Editor of this paper while owned by Br. Skinner; and eight years of severe toil and cares as its principal Editor, I become its contributing Editor only; and as its Editor in chief I bid its subscribers and readers an affectionate Farewell.

A. B. GROSH.

A WORD TO THE PATRONS OF THIS PAPER.

"Suffer me a little, and I will show thee that I have yet to speak on God's behalf." Job xxxvi: 2.

Brethren, Patrons of the Magazine and Advocate, with many of you I have been long and intimately acquainted, having held weekly intercourse with you for many years through the columns of this paper, and shared with you in all the joys and sorrows, hopes and disappointments, connected with the prosperity and adversity of the cause which we espouse. For eleven years, I was a constant editor, and several of those years the sole editor of this paper. I began in the comparative infancy of our cause in this State, in the midst of persecution, "in much patience and tribulation," with a patronage of only 200 or 300 subscribers, with prospects gloomy and dark enough in every respect but the goodness of the cause.

We have together witnessed the gradual increase of patronage, the uprising of numerous friends, the spread of truth, the extension of a more enlightened devotion, and the diffusion of a more ample charity. For the last three years that I published this paper and the succeeding four years, while published by Messrs. Grosh and Hutchinson, the average weekly circulation was seven thousands, while tens of thousands of readers read weekly the contents of its pages, and doubtless scores of thousands were added to the number of believers.

But about the close of that period (1839) a change, a sad change came over this whole community, this whole country, in the monetary derangements and pecuniary embarrassments which many of us have since but too well known and felt. And though the number of believers in the great and glorious truths we advocate has evidently not diminished, yet the patronage of this paper was most sensibly affected. It commenced decreasing in the ratio of its former increase, and has diminished to less than half its former numbers; thereby materially and greatly curtailing its usefulness, and most seriously embarrassing its present young and worthy publishers. The cause producing this diminished circulation, has occasioned the total loss of many thousands of dollars justly due to the former and present publishers, and compelled the present proprietors at last to the adoption of the exclusively cash system, of no pay, no paper. This is at present their only safe course. And I am truly glad to find the plan so generally, nay I may say, so universally approved by all their honest and honorable patrons.

The monetary derangements and pecuniary embarrassments that have been so severely felt for a few years past, have begun to subside: and we trust, that, by the economy and persevering industry of the community, they will soon be entirely gone. Prosperity is surely, though slowly returning. With the returning prosperity of the country, I hope to see the prosperity of this paper fully restored—to see it circulate as widely, yea, still more extensively than it ever did during its palmiest days—to see its worthy publishers fully and amply rewarded for all their sacrifices and persevering toil—and especially to see the cause its pages advocate triumphantly spreading wider and yet wider, shedding the halo of its glory over every city and village, every town and hamlet, every hill and valley, along every stream and lake, every ocean and river, among the high and the low, the rich and the poor, the old and the young; carrying light to the benighted, consolation to the afflicted, knowledge to the ignorant, reproof to the sinner, encouragement to the virtuous, faith to the wavering, hope to the desponding, and charity to the illiberal; pulling down the strong holds of error and delusion, and to see the ample folds of its broad banner waving triumphantly over every citadel of darkness.

To this glorious end would I invite all of my old friends and patrons, once more to put their shoulders to the wheel and their hands to the work, and see what an impetus they can give to the good work at the commencement of the coming year. Each one can do something—some can procure a dozen new subscribers, some half a dozen, and nearly every one can procure at least one additional subscriber, and get the Post Master to send on the names and remittances.—Brethren, I shall be with you, another year, God willing; and our venerable Br. S. R. Smith, my former, faithful and tried co-laborer in these columns, will be with you; and a number of other brethren, strong, tried and faithful will be with you. Shall we write in vain? Shall we speak to the winds, to vacancy, or to only a few scattering subscribers? or shall we speak to tens of thousands, and have the encouragement that "by our voice we may edify others," and spread the knowledge of the truth over the whole length and breadth of our happy country? Take at once the prospectus or the paper, go with it to your neighbor, ask him to subscribe, and become one of the patrons of this old soldier and Advocate of liberal Christianity, of truth and righteousness, and I pledge my self to use my best efforts to prevent him from saying at the end of the year that he has not got the worth of his money.

My health, which for several years was so impaired that I could not write much, or confine myself to sedentary habits, or speak in public, without injury, is now so far restored that I think I can safely promise to address you frequently hereafter in these columns. I have moreover some things to say to you which I trust will neither be uninteresting nor unprofitable. Therefore, in the language of Elihu, "suffer me a little, and I will show thee that I have yet to speak on God's behalf."

D. SKINNER,

TOUR OF THE UPPER LAKES.....NO. V.

Br. Grosz!—In my last, I took rather short leave of Wisconsin, and find that I overlooked many particulars which might be considered important. You will therefore allow me to go back for a space, and bring to the notice of your readers some items of historical information relative to the "North-Western Territory." This section of country, lying and being west of the great Lakes, was discovered and explored by some French Missionaries from Canada, between the years 1660 and 1680. In 1672, two of their number set out to carry the cross and establish posts throughout the whole length of this vast territory, inhabited only by savages, and undisturbed as yet by the sounds of approaching civilization. Upon the Milwaukee they found the Kickapoos, and farther down on Lake Michigan, the Miami, and west, across a broad belt of prairie, and on the Fox river, the Foxes. Deriving assistance from these tribes, and being joined by others from Canada of their own countrymen, they continued their tour of exploration to the Mississippi, or Great River, passing down the Wisconsin, a broad stream with green islands, and skirted by the most beautiful scenery. Reaching the Mississippi the 17th of June, 1773, they passed on to the mouth of the Missouri, and thence to the mouth of the Ohio, and from thence into the country south, making the acquaintance of many tribes, to whom a "Pale Face" was before unknown, and leaving with them some knowledge of the Gospel, which is retained by their descendants even to this day.

By the assistance of the French Government, Missionary stations and Forts were erected in various parts of what is now known as Wisconsin and Illinois; and every possible pains taken, by a few devoted men, to christianize and enlighten the rude and untutored sons of the forest. But to them and with them this vast country seems to have been left; and the wars, which were of such long continuance, withdrew attention from it; and a long interval elapsed ere the steps of the white man were attracted thitherward, save to barter with the Indian. It was not until within a few years past, that its excellence and resources became known, and that its settlement was attempted. Now, however, it is rapidly filling up, by a hardy, industrious, enterprising, and intelligent population; the light of civilization has broken in upon the untrodden wilderness, and where once the Red Man dwelt and the wild beast prowled, goes up the busy hum of industry, and the sweet, solemn hymn of the Sabbath worshipper. Villages have sprung up in the very depths of the forest, partaking of all the refinements and elegances of our Eastern towns; and upon those vast inland seas which form the eastern boundary of this beautiful country, commerce unfurls her sails, to bear to foreign markets the fruits of its rich and productive soil.

You may suppose me now, if you please at 2 o'clock, Tuesday morning, Sept. 12, on board the steam packet Madison, bound for Buffalo. The wind at this time was blowing fresh from the northeast, against which and a heavy sea, we were obliged to make our way. Our progress was therefore necessarily slow—say from four to five miles an hour. On Thursday night, the wind increased to a perfect gale, attended by rain and hail. We were now on lake Huron. At times the waters seemed heaved up, as if by some mighty hand, from their very foundations, lifting us up a hundred feet, and then plunging down into the depths below. There was something grand and awful in the scene! The waves were running this while as high as the wheelhouse, and dashing every few minutes over the hurricane deck. But on our noble vessel went, battling its way through the storm, and cleaving for itself a path through the opposing seas.

There were not more than one hundred passengers, and the most of these were sick in their rooms. We could count, for three days, no more than twenty at the table, either morning, noon, or night. And those twenty made sad work at eating—they spilt their coffee in their attempts to drink it—(what had not been spilt by the waiters on their heads)—they thrust forks into their faces, and fastened upon their fingers, while the bread they contained stuck fast in the throat. And then to get to and from table—that was so still. Such pitching and staggering, such tumbling and bracing, such jostling and knocking of heads, was altogether laughable, had we been in a laughing mood. As it was, we felt like saying with the yankee—"I b'lieve I'll go ashore!"

Our passage was a rough one all through. Scarcely had we entered Lake Erie, ere we encountered a furious storm; but the wind being in our favor, we dashed along over the "mountain wave" at a rapid rate. We entered the harbor at Buffalo about 2 o'clock on Sunday morning, having been five days in performing the trip from Milwaukee. Glad was I to step once more upon the soil of the Empire State, and to think that but a solitary three hundred miles was between me and my home, and that that distance could be passed over in a few hours. I reached this village Monday night, Sept. 19, having been absent five weeks, and travelling within that time nearly three thousand miles. I now make my bow to your readers, and thus ends the "Tour of the Upper Lakes."

A HARD CASE—CONFESSION.

Some brethren in the Black River Association are punishing with discontinuances, the proprietors of this paper, for what they deem my wrong-doing; (I believe my only offence, my first error, of which they complain!)—and that, too, just as I am leaving the editorial charge! This is rather a vicarious mode of punishing for Universalists to be engaged in. However, every one to his own mode of doing his own business, in a free country!

My offence consisted in the following. The Black River Association published some proceedings in a long, continued and complicated case of discipline reflecting severely on a ministering brother and the Committee of discipline, both of the St. Lawrence Association; which proceedings the B. R. A. intends bringing up in an appeal to the next State Convention. Those proceedings so far as that case is concerned were not published I believe either by Br. Price, or in the Luminary; and Br. Hammond in the latter paper, even censured the B. R. A. for publishing the brother as guilty, before he was tried. We published their whole proceedings. The Committee of discipline of the St. L. A., believing themselves, and their Association and preacher wronged, demanded the privilege of replying; which we granted. The Committee of the B. R. A., deeming themselves aggrieved by said reply, sent in a rejoinder. On looking over it I thought (and yet think) that it was in some particulars irrelevant, in others left the public for private matters, and in others introduced entire new matters. These needless matters (as I deemed them) would, I supposed, call for a reply from the St. L. A. Committee, still more long and severe—and that would call forth a yet longer and angrier one from the B. R. A. Committee; and so on, ad infinitum until our columns were burdened with it, to the disgust of our readers, to the increased enmity of the parties and their special friends, to the multiplying of difficulties in getting a fair and candid decision of the case, and to the injury of our cause, the shame of our friends, and the exultation of our foes. There must be a stop put to the endless controversy sometime, and by excluding some article. The B. R. A. Committee did not deem their article any out of the way, and refused to alter or omit any part of it, and I therefore rejected it. This refusal of mine, is my offence, which is now being visited in a few discontinuances on Messrs. Grosz and Walker.

Now I am willing to confess, and do freely confess, that I erred greatly in that affair—not wilfully, or from bad motives, or partial feelings; but from a wrong judgment. But my error was not in refusing to publish the last article—it was in publishing the first, the proceedings of the B. R. Association relating to the case. That was the beginning of what would have been a long, complicated, angry and extremely injurious controversy, had I not stopped it. Br. Price did not publish that part—Br. Hammond did not, and even censured it; and I believe they are not punished with discontinuances. I erred, then—but not as charged;—and should (perhaps!) be punished for my well-meant error—but not by those who are inflicting it, nor yet in the person of a proxy. I do not believe in vicarious atonement, and demand, therefore, that I may be punished, if at all, in my own person, property, or reputation, especially by Universalists! I have said.

A. B. G.

IMPORTANT, BECAUSE TRUE.

To agents or friends who use their exertions to collect and forward money for subscribers, we would say, that they will be allowed for what they do, according to our new terms, for the subscriptions of those who have taken the paper as well as those who have not, for all are new subscribers under the new arrangement.

Many complain that $1.50 can not be sent by mail free of postage. We say it can, provided the Post Master does not take a large fool's cap sheet for his letter so as to make the package weigh 3-4 of an ounce.

The above complaints need never be made even if $1.50 could not be sent, for one dollar can be sent, which will pay for the paper 8 months, and then another dollar can be sent, and so on.

We shall discontinue all who have not paid, except those for whom a responsible agent has vouched to settle, in a short time. We shall continue however to print about the usual number of copies for 2 or 3 weeks, so as to be able to supply new subscribers from the commencement of the Volume, as well as old ones who may have paid an agent, but who has not been able to make his returns by the time the first No. is issued.

We shall hereafter send receipts to subscribers, or to the agent who sends money for them, in their or his paper, instead of noticing receipts by initials in the old way, through the paper. Although this will make us extra labor, it will show the subscriber how his account stands, and thus avoid misunderstanding.

A FEW QUESTIONS, AND WE ARE DONE.—Who, (if he can not collect and forward to us the pay for six subscribers $9.00 and thereby get his own copy for his trouble) will not obtain at least one subscriber and send us $3.00?

Who, if he can not obtain even one subscriber, does not want the paper enough to get his Post Master to forward one dollar for him, if he can spare no more, and thus continue to lend us his support?

Who, that will wait for an agent to call on him, and thus suffer his paper to be stopped, when he can step into the Post Office and get the Post Master to forward his subscription, and thus be in season for the next volume?

ERRATA.—Br. Lee's last Sermon on Prayer contained several errors which we desire to correct. The manuscript was evidently written in haste, and therefore some words were difficult to make out. It was delayed until a busy season, the close of the volume, when mistakes are more apt to occur. But the proof was carefully read, twice. The following are the errors.

Column 3, line 23, for "eternal night," read "eternal weight." Column 3, line 13 from the bottom, for "self devotion," read "soul-felt devotion." Column 5, line 8, for "revised and perpetuated," read "revised and perpetuated." Column 5, line 26 from bottom, for "things," read "theirs"—and line 22 from bottom, for "two," read "too." Column 6, line 9, for "and increase" read "an increase." This last error was in the copy.

A. B. G.

Will those subscribers who are yet owing for the Magazine for this and past years, in Canton and vicinity, have the kindness to pay their dues to Br. Z. N. Ellis, of that place, so that he may be enabled to make his returns to us as early as possible. Br. Ellis has long acted as our agent, and for his exertions in our behalf we tender him our sincere thanks. Br. W. H. Waggoner by mutual arrangement, will hereafter act as our agent in Canton and vicinity, and will transact business with regard to the paper for us. We should be glad to have Br. Ellis continue to do what he can for us consistently.

Will agents make returns of what they do as soon as possible so as to cause us the least possible trouble in regulating our lists, &c. Also subscribers who attend to sending their subscriptions themselves will confer a favor by doing so early.

THE IMPORTANCE OF CHRISTIAN ACTION. NO. II.

FASHIONABLE, CRITICAL AND HYPOCRITICAL HEARERS.

3. Another class may be denominated fashionable hearers. I mean those who attend church to see and be seen—to exhibit a new coat or a new shawl—to attract attention by some article of dress, or to observe and criticise the garb of others. Such will be better able to tell you on their return from church, how such and such an one was dressed—the color of this bonnet, or the set of that cape, than what was the subject of discourse, or what spiritual lesson was taught. They may be pleased with the speaker if he was fashionably dressed; and his deportment be squared by fashionable rules; and if in addition to this, he possess a fine voice, and is graceful in his style and manner, and introduces flights of poetry and flourishes of oratory into his discourses, they may ever be delighted with him; but the naked, solemn truths of God are unnoticed, and the heart unimpressed with their reality and importance. And when they recross the threshold of the sanctuary, it is not with the prayer that the divine blessing may attend their efforts to act agreeably to the lessons of wisdom imparted; nor with the firm resolve that the heart's best affections shall be laid on religion's altar, an acceptable offering to the living God. Earth and vanity mingle with their thoughts; as though the fleeting, perishable things of this world, were the only sources of pure and permanent enjoyment.

4. Another class may be denominated critical hearers—those who attend church—not for religious improvement—not to pay their vows and offerings unto the Lord—not to seek the blessing of God in their humble endeavors to serve him; but to criticise and find fault. This preacher, with them, is too young, or that one is too old. This one has too rapid an utterance, and that one speaks too slow. Such a prayer was too long, and another one was not feeling enough. A certain gesture was very awkward, and a certain word was not rendered sufficiently emphatic. This sentiment was too liberal, and that point was not dwelt long enough upon. The morning discourse was too doctrinal, and that of the afternoon was not delivered with sufficient energy. And so on to the end of a long catalogue of faults—every thing almost seems to be wrong, or imperfect, or inappropriate.

Such individuals do not listen to the speaker's communications for the purpose of receiving instruction, but to gather subjects on which to exercise their critical powers, to the further cultivation of a fault-finding disposition. And thus every thing that is said or done, is doomed to pass through a fiery ordeal at their hands; and though strictly speaking they may have no evil intentions or designs, yet they serve to unsettle the minds of many, to beget feelings of indifference, to alienate the affections of the people from their preacher, and to inflict deep and lasting wounds on the cause, which they perhaps profess to love. They are unprofited themselves by any thing they may have heard, and in many instances are instrumental in erasing the good impressions made on the hearts of others.

5. Another class may be denominated hypocritical hearers. These will assemble in the house of God on the Sabbath, because they have some object to promote, or some scheme to advance by so doing. They care nothing, or but little, for the worship of Jehovah—they have no thoughts or aspirations that go upward to the Eternal throne; and though they seem to unite in the exercises of devotion, yet it is all a mockery and an abomination in the sight of God.

An individual of this class, who has some personal and private ends to attain, will seem to pay the most marked attention to whatever is being advanced by the speaker, will smile occasionally and nod an approval of some remark, and will appear much affected when a warm and fervent appeal is made to the sympathies, or some strong feeling in the human soul; and as he goes from the house he will be heard to remark to Deacon A., or B.,—"What an excellent sermon your preacher has given us! I really think him as talented and eloquent a man as I ever heard; and you may put me down as a regular attendant upon his ministry." But this is only an empty form of words, and from beginning to end he has been acting the base and detestable part of the hypocrite. For he soon meets with an acquaintance of his, and a member of another church, who says to him, "You did not attend to day at our house." "No," he says, "I went to hear Mr. A., and really I never was so disappointed in my life—he is decidedly the finest preacher we have in the place, and I have about made up my mind that I will never hear him again."

Such is the hypocritical hearer. His sentiments, if he has any, he keeps concealed—his true feelings are disguised, and his principles masked, for fear of injuring his popularity and high standing, or of being defeated in his designs and purposes. And hence, while he is listening with much apparent interest to the instructions of the sacred desk, he is perhaps framing an excuse with which to meet his neighbor who is a member of another church; or revolving in his mind the probable results of this line of conduct he is pursuing. And if truth should find its way to his heart, and search its innermost depths, and leave its burning impressions there, he will resist the demands of an awakened conscience, and maintain still the character of a hypocrite in the sight of God.

UNFAITHFUL HEARERS.

6. Another class may be denominated unfaithful hearers. I now mean those who visit the sanctuary with good intentions—who take a deep interest in all its services, and who have really a desire to be profited by the preached word. They listen attentively to the instructions drawn from the Bible, and at times are made to feel deeply; and when shown the obligations they are under to God and their fellow-men, and are presented with the demands that truth and Heaven have upon their bodies and souls, they determine within themselves that they will go forth to the toils of their mission—that they will yield obedience to the principles and requirements of the Gospel, and fearlessly and fully discharge every moral obligation. This is their firm resolve—that they will no more yield their hearts to the seductions of the world; but will be faithful to the cause they have espoused—faithful to themselves, to the Saviour who redeemed them, and the God who has cherished them as the creatures of his care. And for a season, perhaps, they are so; but after a little time, and in some cases as soon as they come in contact with the world, they lose the impressions they had received, and fail in their most determined resolves. And thus they will be alternately hot and cold. They will form determinations in the house of God to be forgotten in an hour after they cross its threshold; and resolve upon doing their duty only to fail and resolve again. They are drawn away and enticed by worldly allurements, and the vows they have plighted at Heaven's altar, are flung idly away. They accomplish nothing—neither advance their own spiritual interests, nor better the condition of humanity. Their goodness is as the early cloud and the morning dew, it soon passes away. The work they commence is stopped short in the beginning, and from making one or two efforts, they will turn around and fold their hands, and sit down to dream, until they shall again be aroused to activity and renewed toil.

I have now introduced six classes of hearers—the careless, the worldly, the fashionable, the critical, the hypocritical, and the unfaithful. Such, it will be borne in mind are hearers only; and most miserably deceived they are. Blind to their own true interests, and ignorant of the direction in which enjoyment lies, they are keeping back from duty, and trifling with the sacred things of God. The commands, and exhortations, and injunctions of the divine word are faithfully proclaimed, illustrated and enforced, and yet they heed them not, as though they were unimportant and might be slighted with impunity. What fatal self-deception is this! For the time will come, when they will look back in sorrow, and regret that they had not been obedient to the teachings of former days, and devoted their lives to Christ and his cause.

"Be ye, therefore doers of the word, and not hearers only." Let your hearts and hands be engaged in the duties and callings of a religious life, for it is only in obedience to God that you can find the happiness you seek. Disobey him, and you find trouble and sorrow. You can not do it and have peace. You may conceal your sin from every human being but yourself. The darkness of midnight may hide it, or thick stone walls may enclose it, but a voice will speak unto your souls as it spoke unto Cain, and you will bear about with you a greater punishment than the arm of human justice could inflict!

May the blessing of God so attend your efforts to serve him, that living, you may live the life of the righteous; and dying, your last end be like his. A. C. B.

BOOKS AND PERIODICALS.

During my absence from home—twice, several weeks each time—and my illness after my return, and the indolence caused by so long a resting spell from hard editorial labor, (I am determined to have excuses enough, and thus prove myself good at one thing, if at no other!) a number of items have accumulated on my table which I shall be entirely unable to notice before the close of the present volume, unless I lump them up in the manner storekeepers do their small particles in making out their bills at the close of the year. The first lumping bill we will attend to, shall be books and papers.

"The Rush Light"—a new Child's paper—is published in St. Charles, Ills., by Br. William Rounseville. It is a quarto (8 pages) of common octavo sized paper, and will be published semi-monthly, at 50 cents per annum, or 10 copies for $4.50 if sent to one address.

"The Universalist Quarterly and General Review"—commences the volume with next month. We hope all our laymen who can spare two dollars, for real, solid, useful reading will not wait for our promised further notice of this excellent work; (for we have not time and room to give it in season;) but will send off to A. Tompkins forthwith, and review the work for themselves.

"The Universalist Union," (the octavo form of,) and "The Christian Messenger" (folio) commenced new volumes several weeks ago, and have not yet been noticed by us! The oversight was not intentional, however. This is an excellent paper—well filled with useful and interesting matter—and ably edited by Mrs. P. Price, T. J. Sawyer, C. F. Lefevre, and Mrs. C. M. Sawyer—the latter edits the Youth's Department. It is published by C. L. Stickney, Proprietor—weekly—at $2. per annum for the Messenger, and $2.50 for the Union form—Cash, of course; for the custom of giving credit, for newspapers, gave Br. Price, its former proprietor, some ten thousand dollars of uncollectable accounts for all he was worth in the world, and nearly shipwrecked the paper. He still has some interest in the paper, so that he can be helped, by those who wish to do so, by taking the paper he edits.

DEBTORS TO GROSH AND HUTCHINSON.

One-half the amount you owe, if paid as you should do, would enable me to pay every cent I owe, legally or morally, and leave a little to compensate me in part for what we have suffered by your delinquency. Some borrowed money which we owe, and for which we ask no release from our creditors, must be paid out of what you owe us, or from our future toil. Will you not pay us, and so release us at least from these debts, which bear heavily on my mind? Consider the case well—and send in the money to Grosh and Walker who hold our books, and are authorized to receive the money, and receipt it.

"Will not agents who can, use their influence to get us a little of the much that is owing us? This is probably my last appeal to you. A. B. Grosh.

P. S. Persons who owe me individually, will see that I have use for my money. Will they not pay me soon? I want to pay my debts as soon and as fast as I can.
